For Reference

Not to be taken from this room

213509

213503

M 17 51
BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY

LADIES' HOME JOURNAL

JULY
1957 • 35

THE MAGAZINE
WOMEN BELIEVE IN

WORLD'S MOST FABULOUS
JEWELS
WHO OWNS THEM?

CRISTINE'S CHILDREN—NOVELLA COMPLETE IN THIS ISSUE

CAPTIVE—BEGINNING 2-PART SUSPENSE THRILLER

CAMPUS LOVE AND MARRIAGE IN WISCO

BEAUTY SECRETS BY DAWN CROWELL NORMAN—16 NEW IDEAS FO

JUN 59 NO
CALIF
BURLINGAME
BURLINGAME PUB LIBR

NOT A WHISPER OF BAD BREATH WITH NEW IPANA

...its distinct taste tells you so

- New Ipana® Tooth Paste with germ-killing WD-9 prevents bad breath. Use it regularly. Ipana's distinct taste and refreshing after-taste tell you it cleans your entire mouth.
- Ipana with WD-9 actually has twice the decay-germ killing power of any other leading tooth paste. So it can help your children fight tooth decay effectively, too.

Product of Bristol-Myers

Beautiful Hair

B R E C K

8 ounces $1.00

THERE ARE THREE BRECK SHAMPOOS FOR THREE DIFFERENT HAIR CONDITIONS

When you buy a shampoo, keep in mind one thought – the condition of your hair. It is either dry, oily or normal. For each of these hair conditions, there is a different Breck Shampoo. One Breck Shampoo is for dry hair. Another Breck Shampoo is for oily hair. A third Breck Shampoo is for normal hair. You will enjoy using a Breck Shampoo because it is mild and gentle in action and not drying to the hair. The Breck Shampoo for your individual hair condition leaves your hair clean, soft and beautiful.

The Three Breck Shampoos are available at Beauty Shops and wherever cosmetics are sold.

Copyright 1957 by John H. Breck Inc.

JOHN H BRECK INC • MANUFACTURING CHEMISTS • SPRINGFIELD 3 MASSACHUSETT
NEW YORK • CHICAGO • SAN FRANCISCO • LOS ANGELES • OTTAWA CANAD

Ladies' Home Journal

CONTENTS

JULY, 1957

VOL. LXXIV NO. 7

JOURNALITIES

The Gordons

For anyone who's interested in how writing teams collaborate, we quote MILDRED and GORDON GORDON (Captive, p. 42): "People think we must have battles royal, but we don't. In talking we come up with ideas neither of us would have had singly; see pitfalls and mistakes we probably wouldn't spot alone. We start with an interesting character or background, and after we get the outline down on paper we decide who is going to write what. Every few days we exchange pages—and blue-pencil out everything good that the other has done." Mrs. Gordon adds that every morning her husband has to lock her in the den of their Spanish-style home in Sherman Oaks, California—otherwise she'd be painting the garage or repairing the roof instead of writing. She still can't get over the fact that her husband worked with the FBI on counterespionage during the war. "He's blind as a mole around the house," she says. "But maybe looking for spies isn't as difficult as looking for cuff links."

Lucy Cores

From Larchmont, New York, LUCY CORES writes that in private life she is Mrs. Emil Kortchmar, with a husband, sons Michael and Daniel, a dog named Pooching Arfie, and Eliza the cat. Cristine's Children (p.44) is her first appearance in the JOURNAL, but she also has to her credit a number of short stories and four books. Her sons, she tells us, are most understanding about the inroads writing makes upon a mother's time. In fact, one day they turned up with a literary effort of their own, entitled Metamorphosis:

I met a morphosis one day,
I simply looked the other way.

Future writers? Well, right now they're far more interested in sailing and swimming on the annual family trip to Martha's Vineyard.

Abbot Mills

Oregonian ABBOT MILLS, who wrote and photographed Campus Romance (p. 109), ought to be an authority on the subject—he was a student at Pomona College in California when he met and married a Scripps College girl named Jody, whom he describes as "wonderful, sweet, tender, understanding, beautiful, and a great comfort to me in my old age." After college Abbot spent two years as a newspaper reporter, and has free-lanced as a magazine photographer. One of these free-lance jobs (photographing his sister and her family in Montana for a How America Lives story) led to a position on the JOURNAL staff as photographer and assistant to the picture editor. Now Abbot has (besides the beautiful wife) three children, a fourth on the way, and a new house in Connecticut—rather a lot to comfort him, we think, at the old age of thirty.

Printed in U.S.A.

Novelette Complete in This Issue

CRISTINE'S CHILDREN, Lucy Cores . 44

Stories

CAPTIVE (First part of two), The Gordons . 42
THE LITTLEST ONE, Marjorie Dann . 48
THE DURABLE FIRE (Conclusion), Howard Swiggett . 52
DAUGHTER OF KINGS, Lesley Conger . 62

Special Features

THE BANISHMENT OF ANXIETY, Dorothy Thompson . 11
NEW BABY—RIVAL OR RESPONSIBILITY?, Benjamin Spock, M.D. . 16
OVER 60 AND LOOKING FOR A JOB? . 31
TIME TO MAKE A FRESH START, Margaret Hickey . 31
THE WORLD'S MOST FABULOUS JEWELS, Peter Briggs and Margaret Parton . 46
YOUR TOWN CAN STOP RHEUMATIC FEVER, Ronald M. Deutsch . 60
HOW AMERICA LIVES: CAMPUS ROMANCE, Abbot Mills . 109
WILLIAM MAKES GOOD, Polly Toland . 121
WHAT JEWELS MEAN . 136

General Features

OUR READERS WRITE US . 4
DIARY OF DOMESTICITY, Gladys Taber . 25
UNDER COVER, Bernardine Kielty . 28
THERE'S A MAN IN THE HOUSE, Harlan Miller . 34
"DON'T HUSBANDS HAVE ANY RESPONSIBILITY?," Clifford R. Adams, Ph.D. . 36
FIFTY YEARS AGO . JOURNAL ABOUT TOWN . 41
ASK ANY WOMAN, Marcelene Cox . 96
REFERENCE LIBRARY . 99
THIS IS A RING LEAVER, Munro Leaf . 100

Fashion and Beauty

PRETTY DAUGHTERS OF FAMOUS FATHERS, Wilhela Cushman . 56
BLACK AND WHITE . . . BUT BRIGHT WITH COLOR, Nora O'Leary . 58
LOVED YOUR LETTER!, Dawn Crowell Norman . 61
HOW TO DRESS WELL ON PRACTICALLY NOTHING, Bet Hart . 90

Food and Homemaking

SUMMER DIET PLATES . 64
COLLECTOR'S ITEMS: FRUIT DESSERTS . 66
POTPOURRI, Marie Ross . 76
MEMO TO FREEZER USERS, Margaret Davidson . 82
COOLERS TALL AND FROSTY . 116
COOL COOKING WITH PLUG-INS, Margaret Davidson . 122
SUMMER SHELF MAGIC, Nancy Crawford Wood . 132

Architecture, and Interior Decoration

GARDEN FLOWERS THE YEAR ROUND . 50
THE 1782 DUTTON HOUSE, Richard Pratt . 54
PREFAB HOUSE TO BUY IN PARTS, Carol L. Crane . 102

Poems

SUBURBAN SONG, Marjorie Lederer Lee . 71
WIFE, Eva Sparks Taylor . 80
INLAND, Jean Todd Freeman . 88
THE BIGGEST THING, Georgie Starbuck Galbraith . 129
INVITATION, Susan Moira Mok . 135

Cover: Mark Shaw, Photographer
Tina S. Fredericks, Picture Editor

CHANGE OF ADDRESS

At least 30 days before a change is to take effect please send your complete name, new address and a mailing label from a recent issue. If this is not possible, write out your old address and send it with the new one, including zone number. Address the Ladies' Home Journal, Independence Square, Philadelphia 5, Pa. The post office will not forward copies unless you provide necessary postage. Duplicate copies cannot be sent.

Ladies' Home Journal, © 1957 The Curtis Publishing Company in U.S. and Great Britain. All rights reserved. Title registered in U.S. Patent Office and foreign countries. Published on last Friday of month preceding date by The Curtis Publishing Company, Independence Square, Philadelphia 5, Pa. Entered as Second-Class Matter at the Post Office at Philadelphia, Pa. Entered as Second-Class Matter at the Post Office Department, Ottawa, Canada, by Curtis Distributing Company, Ltd., Toronto, Ont., Canada.

The names of characters in all stories are fictitious. Any resemblance to living persons is a coincidence.

Subscription Prices: U.S., U.S. Possessions and Canada—1 Yr., $3.50; 2 Yrs., $6; 3 Yrs., $8.50; 4 Yrs., $11. Costa Rica, Cuba, Dominican Republic, Guatemala, Haiti, Mexico, Nicaragua, Panama, Republic of Honduras, Salvador, Spain and South America (except the Guianas)—1 Yr., $4. All other countries—1 Yr., $7. Remit by Money Order or Draft on a bank in the U. S. payable in U. S. Funds. All prices subject to change without notice.

Unconditional Guaranty. We agree upon request direct from subscribers to the Philadelphia office, to refund the full amount paid for any copies of Curtis publications not previously mailed.

The Curtis Publishing Company. Robert E. MacNeal, President; Mary Curtis Zimbalist, Sr. Vice Pres.; Cary W. Bok, Sr. Vice Pres.; Benjamin Allen, Sr. Vice Pres. and Director of Circulation; Donald M. Hobart, Sr. Vice Pres. and Director of Research; Edward C. Von Tress, Sr. Vice Pres. and Director of Advertising; Brandon Barringer, Treasurer; Robert Gibbon, Secretary; Richard Ziesing, Jr., Vice Pres. and Advertising Director of Ladies' Home Journal. The Company also publishes The Saturday Evening Post, Jack and Jill, and Holiday.

"How we use Murine to rest our eyes"

MRS. JIM PIERSALL

and daughter, Eileen, family of baseball star, Jim Piersall

"I use Murine to rest my eyes after reading or sewing, and I've taught Eileen to use Murine to 'wash', not rub, playground dust out of her eyes," says Mrs. Jim Piersall. Use Murine to relieve your eyes of that gritty or tired feeling. It's so gentle and soothing. Makes your eyes feel clean and rested again. Get Murine now with new, unbreakable dropper.

MURINE
*for your eyes

The Murine Co., Inc.
Chicago, U.S.A.
*Trademarks Reg.
U.S. Pat. Off.

For weight watchers... new low-calorie D-ZERTA GELATIN

Now weight watchers can have dessert—sweet low-calorie D-Zerta Gelatin. It contains no sugar but is so delicious and refreshing the whole family will enjoy it. Makes wonderful salads—try all 6 flavors.

D-Zerta Pudding is made without sugar, too, but it has all the goodness of America's best-liked puddings. Comes in 3 flavors—Vanilla, Chocolate and Butterscotch.

D-Zerta and Jell-O are registered trade-marks of General Foods.

Compare the calories in one serving
Strawberry Shortcake (without cream)	399
Peach ice cream	280
1 oatmeal cookie	114
D-ZERTA PUDDING (with nonfat milk)	54
D-ZERTA GELATIN (all 6 flavors)	12

Made by the makers of JELL-O desserts...so you know it's good!

Our READERS WRITE US

Katy Grows Up

Long Island, New York

Dear Editors: Katy has grown to be a very friendly young lady. She's friendly sometimes to the point of being obnoxious, like going up to our youngsters' beds and waking them by her loud purring and kneading. I think her kittenish pranks annoy our other cats too!

Katy is extremely fond of our kids—and they of her. The girl in this picture is my daughter, Maria. Cordially,

WALTER CHANDOHA

CHANDOHA

Friendly young ladies.

▶ When Katy, as a kitten, appeared on the March Journal About Town page, she received so much fan mail that we made up a limited number of photographic reproductions of the original picture. These prints are matted on heavy paper, 8"x10", and may be purchased for $3 from Photographic Dept., Curtis Publishing Co., Independence Square, Philadelphia 5, Pennsylvania. If any reader is not completely satisfied, we will be happy to refund her purchase price. ED.

Smart Cooky

Pineville, Louisiana

Dear Editors: We have at our house: a hamster; a baby; and a seven-year-old boy who:

1—discovered catchup at an early age;
2—feels that way about spinach, broccoli, carrots, asparagus, peas, string beans, Lima beans, etc, etc.;
3—is allergic to all other foods;
4—reads comic books in the dark;
5—has a room I "rake" every week;
6—when I shout at him "punishes me" by not letting me see his school papers that week—or month.

Thank heavens I am the only one in the family who knows the recipe for brownies. Have you any other recipes I can use? Please advise. Most sincerely,

LOIS W. BRANTON

From Another English Friend

London, England

Dear Editors: I am absolutely disgusted with the letter from Marguerite Budd, of North Wales (April JOURNAL), and I would not like your readers to think she speaks for the majority. She doesn't. Most of us here are deeply grateful for what we sincerely hope is a deep and abiding friendship between our two countries. As in all friendships, no doubt there must be differences of opinion from time to time, but with mutual trust and understanding these breaches can be healed. We owe a very great deal to the U.S., and I speak for many people when I say that I am thankful for the sight of U.S.A.F. planes in British skies.

As the widow of an American pilot who died fighting the war which (according to Miss Budd) England had already won, I wonder if she has any idea how long this country could have gone on fighting if it had not been for American lend-lease?

Sincerely,

LAURA KLOCK

▶ Miss Budd's criticism of U. S. foreign policy has filled our mailbags with protests from both here and abroad. ED.

Note to Doctors

Hatboro, Pennsylvania

Dear Sirs: I am entering menopause and am bewildered and shocked by the attitude of doctors. I have never before had any of the aches, pains and reactions to people that I am having now; but when I have asked questions regarding my health and mind, two gynecologists and our family physician have smiled indulgently and said, "After all, you're forty-four—your body is going through changes." What changes? If my pituitary or adrenal or thyroid gland is unbalanced (I got this information out of a book at the library), I'd like to have something done about it!

Why is the menopause treated as if the less we know about it, the better? I am a semi-invalid, and it irks me no end. Women do not become weepy and anxious because they want to be—and why should a whole family suffer because the mother is irritable, nervous, achy and confused?

Sincerely,

"JUST 44"

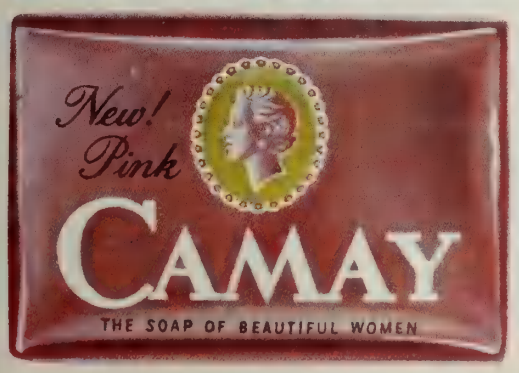
CONTINUED ON PAGE 6

Rebuttal From Russia

From the Literary Gazette, Moscow

by O. Vasiliev

"'We Saw How Russians Live'—Under this title the editors of the American magazine, Ladies' Home Journal, Bruce and Beatrice Gould, published in their February number their impressions of their four weeks' stay in the Soviet Union.



"Full of prejudice and hate for the Soviet Union, they came to our country to find some traces of 'dissatisfaction,' unknown to anyone, in Soviet society. Not finding anything of the kind among us, upon their return they published hackneyed and tired anti-Soviet polemics ——"

▶ Come, come, Mr. Vasiliev. How about your Mr. Khrushchev's irate threats to Soviet students that if they didn't stop voicing their "dissatisfaction" they would be thrown out of the universities and ordered off to work as common laborers, where they'd soon learn to appreciate the joys of living in the Soviet Union?

We are informed that the Literary Gazette has seldom heretofore bothered to rebut a traveler's report on how Russians live. One of these days we hope to visit Russia again and see how they've improved. ED.

New and lavish PINK CAMAY

Probably the most lavish soap
that ever pampered your skin
(yet costs no more than ordinary soaps)

Kept fresh and fragrant in Pink Pearl foil

© The Procter & Gamble Co.

20th CENTURY-FOX presents CARY GRANT
and
DEBORAH KERR in Leo McCarey's
AN AFFAIR TO REMEMBER
CINEMASCOPE COLOR by DELUXE

Produced by JERRY WALD · Directed by LEO McCAREY
Screenplay by DELMER DAVES and LEO McCAREY

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 4

What Can Parents Do?

Somewhere in the U.S.

Dear Editors: I am writing about the child modern society has given the dubious title, "The emotionally disturbed child."

My husband and I are in the "middle-class" income bracket, and we have four perfectly normal children, and one, a boy, who is definitely "different." He is now twelve years old, and for the past three years has been refused admittance to the public schools here. We have been sent to one agency after another, and the boy has also been in a Methodist children's home. (They returned him to us after a year, saying he was a disturbing influence.) He steals, destroys other people's property, and is very noisy and restless. Although he receives four hours' tutorage weekly, the amount our local board of education thinks is enough to satisfy his needs, his education on how to get along in society is very neglected.

I understand there are many children like him here in America. Can anyone shed any light on this subject?

Yours truly,
Name withheld

National Disgrace

San Diego, California

Dear Editors: We read constantly of the physical unfitness of our future mothers, but nothing is done about it. There are boys' clubs, Little League associations, Big Brothers, and numerous other programs to build up the boys; but girls are expected to sit quietly at home. Even the much burdened Y.W.C.A. costs twice as much for girls as the Y.M.C.A. does for boys, with half the activities offered.

It is a national disgrace and even the President has asked that something be done about it. Healthy, busy girls are just as important as boys and just as unlikely to get into trouble. Can't something be done?

Yours,
MRS. V. DALE ALLEN

Who, Me?

St. Louis, Missouri

Dear Mr. Gould: I am highly complimented by the article in the April JOURNAL, in which your author numbers me among the ten richest men in America today.

Unfortunately, however, I am not in this class at all. Your author must have confused my so-called "wealth" with the gross sales of our company, Anheuser-Busch, Inc., which are slightly in excess of $278,000,000 before taxes. In no other way can I account for the figures which have been used.

As a matter of fact, I hardly know where to begin in setting the record straight. In the first place, the total net worth of Anheuser-Busch is approximately $120,000,000; and secondly, the company is owned by approximately 18,000 shareholders.

I am honored to be president of Anheuser-Busch, but I personally am only one of the smaller minority stockholders. Contrary to the author's statement, no individual owns a majority of stock in Anheuser-Busch.

As to Grant's Farm, it is an area of great historic significance. It is owned by Mrs. August A. Busch, Sr., my mother, and, by an arrangement with Anheuser-Busch, Inc., the grounds are made available to and for the enjoyment of the public. Last year, about 80,000 persons made tours of the area. This year, from the requests we already have, it appears that over 100,000 persons may visit Grant's Farm by courtesy of Anheuser-Busch.

Nor am I, as your author states, the "owner" of the St. Louis Cardinals. I am the president of the Cardinals, but the club is also owned by Anheuser-Busch, Inc., and the purchase was approved by the stockholders on March 10, 1953.

For your information, we have never entertained 11,000 persons at Grant's Farm at one time, as your author states. This is a physical impossibility. Anheuser-Busch, Inc., did invite that many customers to visit Grant's Farm and, as I recall it, it took about ten days to accommodate this group.

However, I do appreciate the nice compliment paid my wife and family, although I might add that I find it impossible these days to indulge in many of the sports I am credited with enjoying.

As I said earlier in my letter, I am highly complimented to be numbered among such distinguished Americans as your author places me, but I am sorry I don't qualify by about 250,000,000%!

Not wishing to parade under false colors, I thought the record should be set straight.

Sincerely,
AUGUST A. BUSCH, JR.

Bright Spots From Hungary

New York City

Dear Mrs. Gould: "Children are one of the bright spots in Russia," you say in your account of how the Russians live. As I read this, I thought of the three bright spots from Hungary in our nursery—Miklos, Attila and Susanna.

These children arrived in time for our 1956 Christmas party and have been a day-by-day pleasure since. I'm not sure now what I expected of them; perhaps that they might be bewildered, easily frightened or maybe cowed and withdrawn—but that's not the way it is. They get into and use all the materials, the blocks and trucks, painting and woodwork. They "belong" to the group even though their English is confined to "Good morning," "tie my shoes," "yes," "no." Their willingness to do chores that most of our youngsters avoid or put off (folding a blanket after rest time, replacing materials on shelves) is truly amazing.

Susanna, Miklos, Attila.

Susy really doesn't belong in the five-year-old group with Attila, her brother, or with Miklos, a child of another escapee family. She is not yet even four. But she asks no privileges for her youth. Often she will cock her little head and stand still as still—watching the teacher to find some clue as to what is expected of her. Or I look at stalwart Attila manipulating a train through a tunnel of blocks and wonder about the terror he must have felt when he became separated from his family on their way to the border of Austria. He looks so untouched by anxiety now. I watch Miklos, sweet and bright, and remember that though he is playing with his toys now as though they were his God-given right, he had none in Hungary.

I think these are bright spots in our nursery more because of the joy they are giving us rather than the satisfaction of what we may be doing for them.

Sincerely,
MARJORIE R. MIDDLETON
Director, Winifred Wheeler Day Nursery

It Burns Me Up!

If the manufacturers of wash dresses insist on adding shoulder pads, why aren't they made so they will wash without getting all bunchy?

D.M.
Analomink, Pennsylvania

Whatever happened to old-style slacks with the loose leg? Those tapered pants don't look good on everybody (they look like Dutchboy knickers on me) so garment makers, please note!

GENE ELLIS
Chattanooga, Tennessee

Why are T shirts cut so that they get wider after each wash? If they were cut to stretch vertically they would not be useless so soon, especially for a growing child or long-waisted adult.

MRS. OTTO HOFMANN
Austin, Texas

3 good old-fashioned reasons you'll be glad

Del Monte means Freestones, too!

discover these different Del Monte Peaches

—the ragged-centered, tender peach with the wonderful old-fashioned flavor.

You've never tasted peaches so perfect for juicy, old-fashioned shortcakes as DEL MONTE Freestones. And just wait till you've had these different peaches drenched with cream—or in a warm, fragrant cobbler—or peach sundae.

Yes, the same special genius for peaches that has made DEL MONTE the world's favorite Cling Peach brand brings you the very finest Freestones, too. DEL MONTE Freestones are the real "back-home" kind—delightfully soft and tender, brimming with juice and summery sweet-tart flavor.

More and more grocers have these exciting peaches now. You'll find them right nearby your old familiar friends, DEL MONTE Cling Peaches. Wouldn't it be fun to surprise your family with DEL MONTE Brand Freestone Peaches tonight?

More grown-ups and growing-ups depend on Mum than on any other deodorant

PRODUCT OF BRISTOL-MYERS

New MUM stops odor...without irritation

So safe for any normal skin you can use it every day

If you've ever worried about underarm stinging or burning from using a deodorant daily or right after shaving or a hot bath—now you can set your mind at ease.

New Mum Cream is so gentle and safe for normal skin, you can use it whenever you please, as often as you please.

Mum Cream gives you the kind of protection that you can't possibly get from any other leading deodorant—because new Mum Cream works in a completely different way. It's easy to understand why.

Mum Cream is the only leading deodorant that works entirely by stopping odor...contains no astringent aluminum salts. And it keeps on working actively to stop odor 24 hours a day. When Mum is so effective—yet so safe—isn't it the deodorant for you?

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

AMERICAN INSTITUTE OF LAUNDERING CERTIFIED

WON'T DAMAGE CLOTHES

MUM® stops odor 24 hours a day with M-3

(bacteria-destroying hexachlorophene)

OUR 30th ANNIVERSARY OFFER TO NEW MEMBERS!

Any 3 OF THESE FINE BOOKS ($2.00)

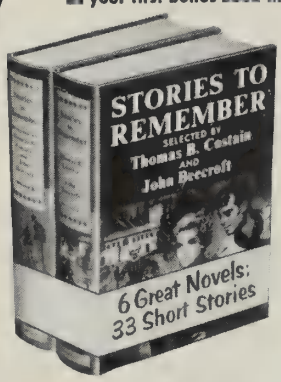
(value up to $35.00 in publishers' editions) Yours for only $2.00

when you join the Literary Guild and agree to take as few as 4 selections during the coming twelve months

THE Literary Guild wants you to share in this 30th Anniversary celebration by accepting the most generous offer in its history. Yes, you may choose any 3 of the wonderful books shown on this page for only $2.00 (value up to $35.00 in pub. editions) — and you will also receive, FREE, the 2-volume edition of "Stories to Remember", selected by Thomas B. Costain and John Beecroft (pub. ed., $7.50), as your first Bonus Book in advance.

For 30 years the Guild has brought to its members the finest new books by such outstanding authors as W. Somerset Maugham, A. J. Cronin, Robert Penn Warren, Thomas B. Costain, Samuel Shellabarger, John P. Marquand, Pearl S. Buck, Anya Seton, James Hilton, Daphne Du Maurier and many others. Practically every Guild selection has become a national best seller, and many of them have been made into smash hit movies! But the greatest tribute to the fine type of reading enjoyment members have received is the fact that more than five million people have joined.

HOW THE GUILD OPERATES. Why don't you join the Literary Guild now — while this 30th Anniversary offer is in effect? As a member you will receive each month your copy of "Wings", the Guild's beautifully illustrated magazine which reviews the forthcoming Guild selection. You may choose either the regular Guild selection or an alternate selection from among the many described. But you need not accept a book each month — only four during the coming year. With every fourth book thereafter, you will receive a valuable Bonus Book FREE.



Even though Literary Guild selections are priced at $3.50, $3.75 or even $4.00 in the publishers' editions — as a member you get them for only $2.00 each, plus shipping. (Occasional extra-value selections at somewhat higher prices.) And you get them as soon as they are published!

MAIL COUPON NOW! Take advantage of this generous offer while you can get 3 of the books illustrated here for only $2.00, plus "Stories to Remember" as your FREE Bonus in advance. Send no money. If not satisfied, you may return the books within 7 days and owe nothing, or pay $2.00 and become a Guild member on a trial basis. Mail coupon now!

LITERARY GUILD OF AMERICA, INC., Publishers, Garden City, N. Y.

Plus

THIS 2-VOLUME SET OF "STORIES TO REMEMBER" FREE as your first bonus book in advance!

- Two beautiful volumes!
- 60 illustrations!
- 832 pages!
- Pub. edition, $7.50

Guild members regularly receive a Bonus Book as a reward for each four selections they accept. However, under this Anniversary offer, you will receive this wonderful 2-volume set as your first Bonus Book in advance. It will be sent to you in the same package with the 3 other books you select from this page.

CHOOSE THE 3 BOOKS YOU WANT AND MAIL COUPON NOW

AMY VANDERBILT'S COMPLETE BOOK OF ETIQUETTE. Your way to be socially correct always, by America's foremost authority. 704 fact-crammed pages! Pub. edition, $5.50.

AROUND THE U. S. A. IN 1,000 PICTURES. Ed. by Runyon & Bergane. All 48 states (in a new edition) and 10 world "tours" in 2,000 photos! 2 vols. Orig. pub. at $15.00.

BARTLETT'S FAMILIAR QUOTATIONS. 13th Edition. New, completely revised version of America's indispensable reference book! Nearly 113,500 index entries! Pub. ed., $10.00.

THE BIBLE IN STORY AND PICTURES. 75 inspiring stories from the Old and New Testaments. 80 illustrations, 8 paintings, 193 photos! 512 pages, 2 vols. Pub. ed., $7.95.

The Complete Short Stories of MARK TWAIN. Ed. by Charles Neider. For the first time — all 30 of Twain's delightful stories collected in 1 big volume! 704 pages. Pub. edition, $3.95.

ENCYCLOPEDIA OF COOKING by Meta Given. Brand-new approach to cooking! Plans meals, guides shopping; 2,000 recipes, hundreds of pictures! 2 vols. Pub. edition, $10.00.

THE FAMILY TREASURY OF CHILDREN'S STORIES. Ed. by P. R. Evans. A fine library of favorite stories and poems for ages 2 to 14. 250 pictures, 1024 pages. 3 vols. Pub. ed., $7.50.

HAMMOND'S ILLUSTRATED TRAVEL GUIDE by Dr. E. J. Jordan. Thrilling new scenic guide to the most beautiful spots in the U.S.! 151 color photos, 64 color maps. Pub ed., $7.50.

KIPLING: A Selection of his Stories and Poems by John Beecroft. This great writer's finest works, including Kim, Jungle Book, stories, poems. 2 vols., 1038 pages. Pub. ed., $7.50.

Ladies' Home Journal INTERIOR DECORATION by Elizabeth Halsey. Now you can make your home a dream house for pennies — with this big, beautiful guide to every phase of home decoration! Hundreds of diagrams and photos, before-and-after pictures. Helps you solve every problem — from color and floor plans to lighting fixtures and table decorations! 10½" by 14" in size! Fully indexed. Pub. ed., $6.95.

MODERN HOME MEDICAL ADVISER. Ed. by Morris Fishbein, M.D. 24 specialists tell you about disease and illness—both symptoms and treatment. Pub. edition, $4.95.

PICTORIAL HISTORY OF AMERICAN PRESIDENTS by John and Alice Durant. Answers every question about all presidents in 566 rare pictures, unusual text. Pub. ed., $10.00.

THE SCAPEGOAT. Daphne Du Maurier's exciting new novel about a young Englishman, tricked by his double into assuming the strange man's wife and family! Pub. edition, $3.95.

Thorndike-Barnhart DICTIONARY. 1957 De Luxe Edition. The only all-new quality comprehensive desk dictionary. Handsomely bound in 2 volumes. Pub. edition, $10.00.

TWILIGHT FOR THE GODS. Ernest Gann tops The High & the Mighty in this exciting story of a sailing-ship voyage that changed the lives of the crew and passengers! Pub. ed., $3.95.

THIS COUPON WORTH UP TO $35.00

30th Anniversary — WHICH 3 BOOKS DO YOU WANT WITH MEMBERSHIP IN THE LITERARY GUILD [IP-STR] — 30th Anniversary

Literary Guild of America, Inc., Publishers
Dept. 7LHJ, Garden City, N. Y.

Please send me the THREE books checked here as my Introductory Membership Package. Bill me only $2.00, plus shipping, for all three. Also send "Stories to Remember" in two volumes as my first free Bonus in advance.

Enroll me as a member of the Literary Guild and send me "Wings" every month. I will notify you in advance if I do not wish to receive the Guild selection described, or whether I wish to receive an alternate selection. My only obligation is to accept four selections, or alternates, during the coming year at only $2.00 each (plus shipping), regardless of the higher publishers' prices. I will receive a free Bonus Book with each fourth selection I purchase thereafter — and I may resign my membership at any time after purchasing four books.

SPECIAL NO-RISK GUARANTEE: If not delighted I will return all books in 7 days and this membership will be cancelled!

Mr.
Mrs.
Miss (Please Print)

Street and No.

City Zone.... State.....

- ☐ Amy Vanderbilt's Etiquette (4)
- ☐ Around World & Around U.S.A. in Pictures—Set (8)
- ☐ Bartlett's Quotations (20)
- ☐ Bible in Story & Pict.—Set (18)
- ☐ Comp. Stories of Mark Twain (28)
- ☐ Ency. of Cooking—Set (3)
- ☐ Family Treasury of Children's Stories—Set (51)
- ☐ Hammond's Travel Guide (16)
- ☐ Kipling—Set (33)
- ☐ Ladies' Home Journal Decor. (7)
- ☐ Modern Home Medical Adv. (22)
- ☐ Pictorial History of American Presidents (37)
- ☐ The Scapegoat (205)
- ☐ Thorn.-Barn. Dict.—Set (9)
- ☐ Twilight for the Gods (54)

TO RESIDENTS OF CANADA: Selection Price, $2.20 plus shipping. Address LITERARY GUILD (CANADA), 105 Bond St., Toronto 2, Ontario. Offer good in U.S.A. and Canada.

30th Anniversary — THIS OFFER GOOD ONLY DURING THE LITERARY GUILD'S 30th ANNIVERSARY — 30th Anniversary

Could this be a preview of the pie you'll be serving? Then maybe it's time to change your shortening!

Isn't it nicer to be sure of more golden-brown results? You are, when you use golden Fluffo!

Something Golden Happens

(golden flakiness you've never gotten with any other shortening)

Pure shortening, not a table spread.
Golden yellow from pure, wholesome carotene.

Expect surprising results when you use Fluffo; it's an altogether surprising shortening. To make it, we had to break down old-style shortening to its very molecules, and improve them; it takes the cream of the crop to make golden Fluffo.

No other leading shortening gives you such tender, flaky, golden-brown pies. No change in the measurement your favorite recipe calls for—just a wonderful change in results.

No other kind of shortening gives you such crisp, light, golden-brown fried foods. Everything fried right and light in Fluffo is beautifully browned all over—and just as digestible as it looks.

Fluffo even handles differently; it's so much lighter and fluffier it's a joy to use. Blends with fewer, easier strokes, and the golden color lets you see how perfectly you're mixing cake batter or pie dough. Try Golden Fluffo; how can you possibly miss?

THE BANISHMENT OF ANXIETY

By DOROTHY THOMPSON

McEVOY'S DAM, lithograph (12⅛"x15⅛")
by Emil Ganso, pictures a landscape near Woodstock in mountainous Ulster County, New York, west of the Hudson River. Ganso is represented in the Metropolitan Museum of Art, the Whitney Museum, the Boston Museum of Fine Arts and the Cleveland Museum of Art, among others. At the time of his death in 1941 he was professor of fine arts at Iowa University. Courtesy the Weyhe Gallery, New York.

If we try to describe to ourselves the outstanding characteristic of the Western mind in this mid-twentieth century, could we not truthfully say that it is anxiety—anxiety and fear?

A spate of books and articles, telling us how to obtain peace of mind, how to achieve relaxation, how to sustain physical and mental powers, are symptomatic of this obsession.

It invades the physical, mental and spiritual realms.

We are afraid of illness and are constantly reminded to watch for symptoms prefacing the onset of chronic and usually mortal diseases, and to change or modify our habits of life to prevent or postpone them.

We are afraid of death and abandon the rituals that remind us of it.

We are afraid for our children, lest they grow up "maladjusted," and, again, we are advised by innumerable psychiatrists and educators (many of them contradicting one another) on the care and training of children.

We are afraid of, and for, the society in which we live, which we see threatened by internal and external forces and subversions, most of which escape precise definition. We live in an age of investigations, when the courts of law no longer suffice as tribunals, and when a youthful and transitory interest or belief may arise from the past to plague our adult years.

We praise the blessings of science, but shrink from its implications.

We find the world divided into two hostile camps, see no possibility of reconciliation between them—and fear even to suggest that there might be. We arm to the teeth for war with atomic weapons, though warned that war with such weapons will destroy civilization for centuries, possibly poison the chromosomes of future generations, and conceivably destroy the planet. And the only "deterrent" we can find against such war is the threat of war itself.

We are exhorted to turn to religion. The popular evangelist is also a phenomenon of our times. Yet, for many, the organized churches hold inadequate answers for the human malaise. The scientific approach to truth has affected all our minds, rendering us skeptical of formal creeds, rituals and practices that appear tied to past historical epochs and prescientific mentalities. Our minds must be able to reconcile religious yearnings and insights with reason, and the churches offer, for many, either no solution or one which, watered down into a mere "ethic," frustrates the religious instinct which can be the most powerfully creative of all instincts, and their guide.

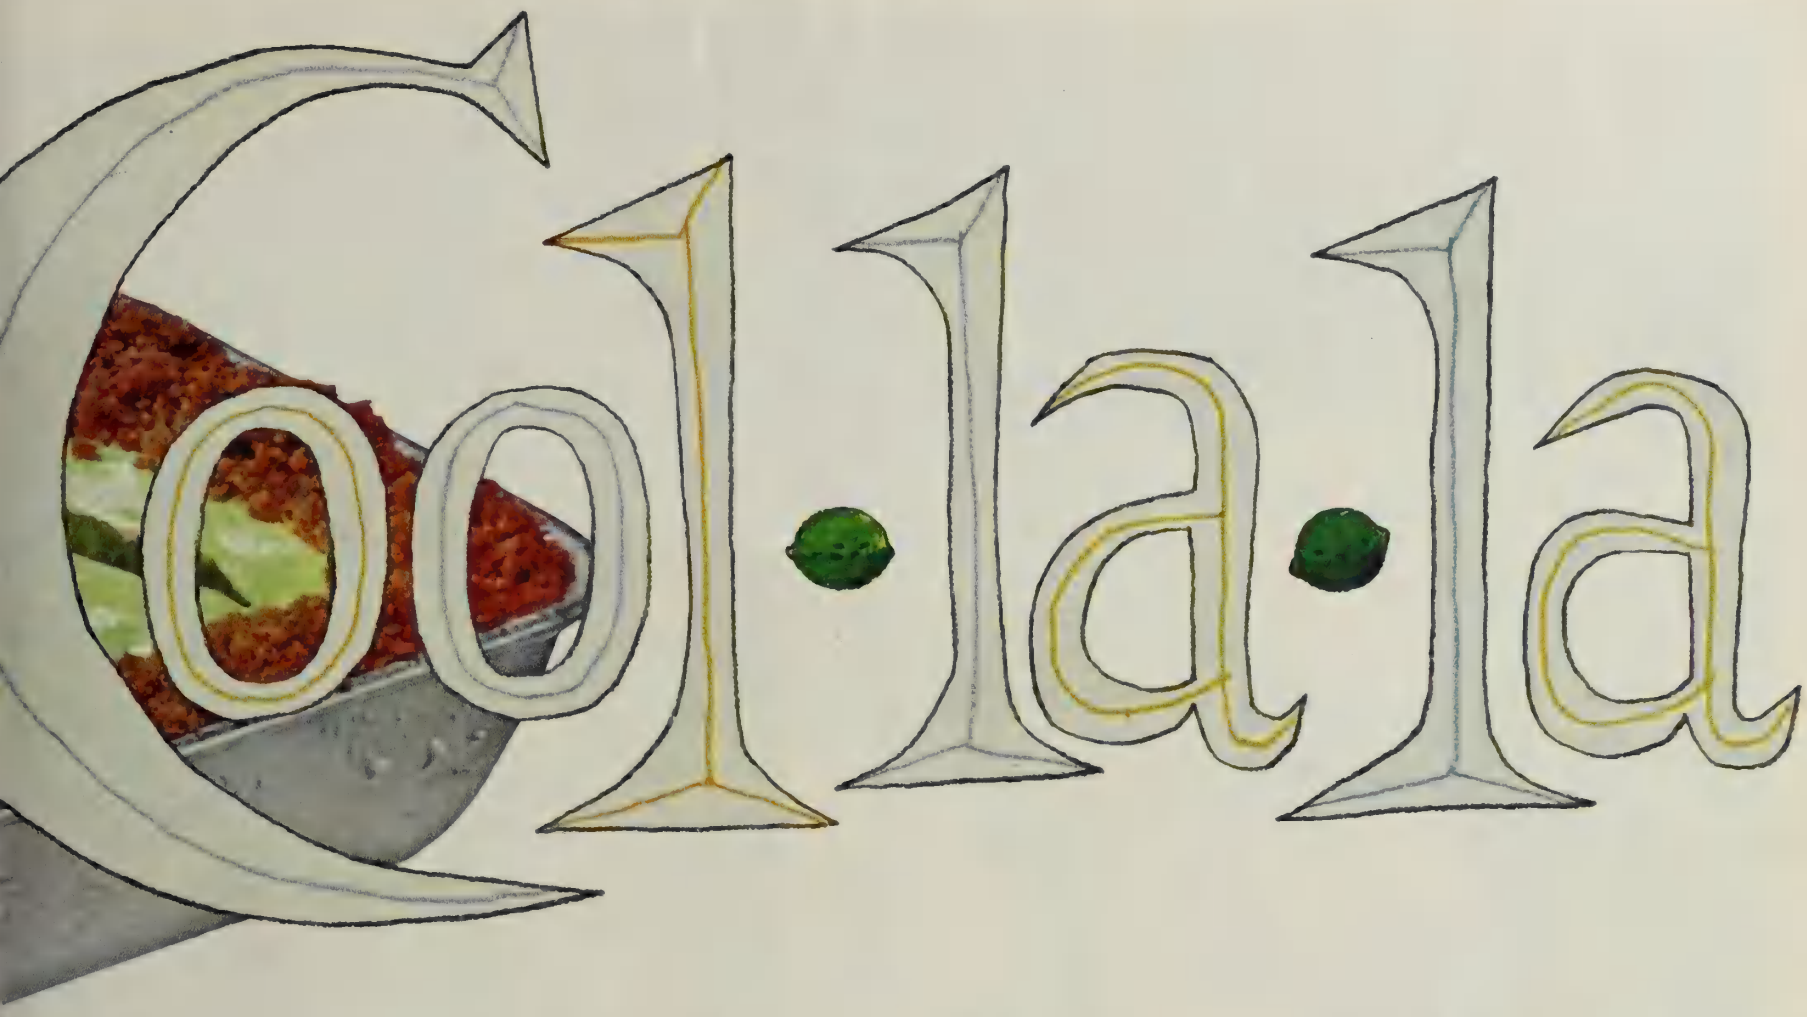
Out of these anxieties and fears, a nostalgia arises for a simpler past, which we tend to sentimentalize, remembering its virtues rather than its faults. This is not to say that the remembrance of past virtues is not, in itself, creative, or that it holds no insights or clues to future transformations. Another feature of our times, called forth by the times themselves, is a vivid interest in the study of history and the forming of a philosophy of history, in the search for knowledge of whence we came and whither we may be proceeding.

Many of the anxieties that beset us are as old as the race. Sickness and death are not phenomena of this century. In all the Western countries the anticipatable average span of life is steadily increasing despite the fact that children born congenitally weak survive to enter the statistics of adulthood.

Death is the price we pay for having had life. What enhances the modern anxiety is the decline of faith in the immortality of the soul, which is not, I think, helped by the repetition of a credo-faith in the literal resurrection of the body.

We cannot blindly escape into religion by rejecting the methods of scientific inquiry unless we are to settle for a vague obscurantism. The search for truth is part of the religious instinct itself. The soul craves for truth as well as the intellect. But insight into great human and cosmic truth is seldom won by the method of the mathematician. There is such a thing as revealed truth, the essence of which is true for all men in all times, immediately recognized as such by those of open heart; validated by human experience; bringing with it conviction without argument. It is truth that is wrung out of suffering—out of the suffering mind that will not abandon the search or quench the thirst for the meaning of human existence, nor accept the idea that it is meaningless, wherein lies the last and ultimate despair.

Is it not this conviction (held by a few) and the suspicion (lurking in the minds of many) that existence is, in essence, meaningless that help to account for our modern anxiety and fear? But whence comes this suspicion? From science, which is often blamed for it?



It is falsely blamed. The scientific spirit of inquiry assumes from the outset that everything is meaningful, on earth, in the universe, and in man himself. Science is a perpetual search for the meaning of phenomena. In that search it destroys many previously held concepts and assumptions. But it also rediscovers the scientific truth of some things rejected by previous scientists. The researches of science are upsetting. Often science claims too much—the scientists themselves less often than their popularizers—and the result is distrust and disillusionment. Or science, in rejecting whatever cannot be "proven," submits tests of proof where they are inapplicable. Or science, delving into the physical secrets of the universe, comes up with discoveries that are put to destructive purposes by powerful men directing human affairs with neither scientific nor religious and human insight.

But the spirit of science asserts that the world and the universe are meaningful. The cosmos is not a haphazard tale told by an idiot, but a complex CONTINUED ON PAGE 14

Executive Editor: Mary Bass Special Projects Editor: Laura Lou Brookman
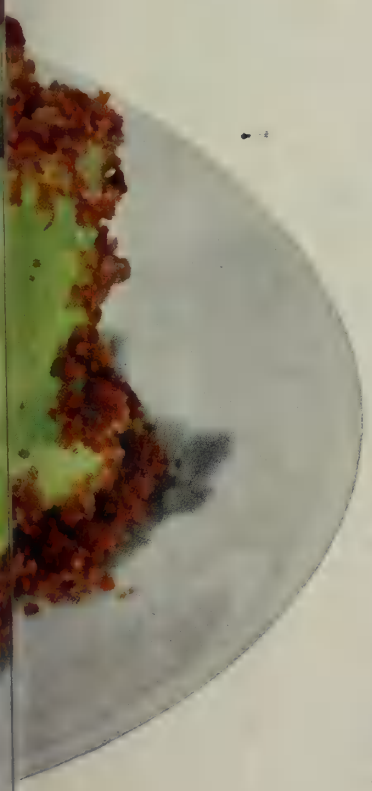
Associate Editors: Hugh MacNair Kahler, Bernardine Kielty, Wilhela Cushman, William E. Fink, Richard Pratt, Louella G. Shouer, Mary Lea Page, Dawn Crowell Norman, Margaret Davidson, Nora O'Leary, Donald Stuart, Tina S. Fredericks, Helen Everitt, Peter Briggs, Anne Einselen, Margaret Parton, Cynthia McAdoo Wheatland
Contributing Editors: Gladys Taber, Gladys Denny Shultz, Margaret Hickey, Ruth Mills Teague, Barbara Benson
Assistant to the Editor: Nelle Keys Perry
Editorial Associates: John Werner, Ruth Mary Packard, Ruth Shapley Matthews, Alice Conkling, Joseph Di Pietro, Elizabeth Goetsch, Nancy Crawford Wood, Jean Todd Freeman, Eileen Sharpe, Betty Coe Spicer
Assistant Editors: Victoria Harris, Alice Kastberg, Virginia Price, Dorothy Anne Robinson, Albert Serwazi, June Schwartz, Carol Crane, Liane Waite, Joyce Posson, Neal Gilkyson Stuart, Ruth Imler, Elizabeth Hart
Editorial Assistants: Lee Stowell Cullen, Patricia Martin, Flora Casparian, Alberte Wright, Simone Smith, Hazel Owen, Laura Date, Patricia Corrigan, Corinna Wildman, Isabel Blythe, Helen Olchvary, Olivia Donovan, Abbot Mills, Sally Platt, Marley Marseilles



So easy, NO COOKING . . . just mix and freeze

MAGIC FLORIDA LIME ICEBOX CAKE

The secret: Borden's Eagle Brand and Genuine Florida Lime Juice

Try this tangy cool dessert on your family tonight. Easy as sitting in an igloo—no cooking, no second beating, no refreezing. All you do is mix, freeze and serve. And what creaminess! What lime-iness! What wonderful eating!

(Makes 6 servings)

1 cup fine graham cracker crumbs (12 to 14—2¼" squares)
3 tbsp. butter, melted • 2 eggs, separated
1 (15 oz.) can Eagle Brand Sweetened Condensed Milk ½ cup fresh Florida lime juice and
1 tbsp. grated lime rind (optional)
(or 1 (6 oz.) can fresh-frozen Florida limeade)
¼ tsp. vanilla extract ▪ ¼ cup sugar
3 to 4 drops green pure food coloring (if desired)

Combine crumbs and butter. Reserve ¼ cup mixture. Press remaining mixture on bottom and sides of lightly buttered refrigerator tray; chill. Beat egg yolks until thick; combine with Eagle Brand Sweetened Condensed Milk. Add lime juice or limeade, rind and vanilla; stir until mixture thickens. If desired, tint pale green. Beat egg whites into soft peaks; gradually add sugar; beat until stiff but not dry. Fold into Eagle Brand—Lime mixture. Pour into tray. Border with reserved crumbs; decorate with slices of lime rind. Freeze until firm—4 to 6 hours.

FLORIDA LIMES

Fresh...or Fresh-Frozen Limeade

Buy tree-fresh, genuine Florida limes, extra-juicy, packed with Vitamin C. More luscious and larger than other limes. Or enjoy their tart-sweetness in fresh-frozen limeade—at your grocer's. Remember—the finest limes come from Florida.

BORDEN'S EAGLE BRAND

Sweetened Condensed Milk

Specially blended like no other kind of milk. Eagle Brand is wholesome milk and sugar, pre-cooked to a rich creamy consistency. It's the magic ingredient that makes the smooth difference . . . makes heavenly desserts of all kinds.

2 FREE BOOKLETS! "Eagle Brand 70 Magic Recipes," and "Florida Avocado and Lime Recipes." Write Dept. J-57, Box 171, New York 40, New York.

What is ACRONIZED* Chicken?

Important facts about poultry freshness every homemaker should know!

Acronized chicken is new, revolutionary! Naturally fresh chicken . . . at the very peak of its country-sweet flavor . . . not the result of a freezing or pre-cooking process.

Acronized chicken is clean, quality poultry, with its farm-fresh flavor retained by a new processing agent that effectively retards the growth of bacteria which cause spoilage and loss of freshness and flavor.

Acronized chicken comes only from specially-licensed plants that must be maintained in the highest standards of cleanliness and sanitation. Each plant is subject to continuing rigid inspection.

Acronized chicken is identified by the Acronized seal —your guide to the tastiest, juiciest chicken you can buy—at any price.

Look for this
ACRONIZED seal of freshness, on your favorite brand of poultry!

ACRONIZED* *Trademark

50 CYANAMID 1907 1957

AMERICAN CYANAMID COMPANY
FARM AND HOME DIVISION NEW YORK 20, N. Y.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 11

of laws, of causes and consequences, not arbitrary but certain.

Science represents the search for certainty, while recognizing that the ultimate and total certainties will always elude man, who did not create the cosmos but lives as one of its creatures within it.

And religion, it seems to me, is a companion search for certainty, for the truth about man's relation to the Creative Power outside and within himself, and for the truth about creative relations with his fellow men.

The anxieties of "modernity" cannot arise from the search for truth, but rather (it seems to me) from our willingness to settle for half-truths; to place our faith in institutions promising what they cannot of themselves fulfill; to elevate as of permanent and unquestionable value formulas for the governance of men, that of, and in, themselves cannot fulfill their Utopian promises.

It is the failure, or partial failure, of institutions which we have invested with so much confidence that, I think, accounts for our fear and anxiety.

Because, for instance, we have placed almost unbounded faith in modern medicine, we are the more dejected by its limitations.

The institution which, in our century, we have invested with the most confidence and the greatest power is the democratic state. The belief in this state is, I believe, one of modernity's most extraordinary idolatries. We naturally expect it to police us against crime and punish the criminals, to defend us against foreign foes, and to conduct our relations with other states. Naturally, because these have always been the powers and responsibilities of states.

But we also expect it to educate our children in wisdom and morality, provide for part of their recreation and to some extent feed them; to assume the burden and responsibility of public charity; increasingly to govern the relations between workers and their employers; to set standards of wages; to prevent racial discrimination; to provide for everybody's old age. We entrust it to make and dissolve marriages. We direct it to conserve and expand natural resources. And finally, we have empowered it to conduct propaganda for America all over the world, and to invest our incomes in providing for the defense and for lifting the standard of living of people throughout the earth. And we instruct the state to do this while preserving our individual liberties.

This enormous apparatus is called into being partly by the existence of another enormous apparatus engaged in doing the same things, another form of state devoted to establishing Utopia—a strange competition by which we copy to some extent what we aim to defeat.

I am not here raising the question of whether any and all of these things are the proper function of the state. But it is fairly obvious that the state of itself can perform none of them.

This truth has been brought out in a most arresting book by William Ernest Hocking, "one of the great survivors of the golden age of American philosophy." Professor Hocking, long "emeritus" of Harvard, has written The Coming World Civilization, from the wisdom and erudition of his eighty-three years, but with the robust affirmativeness of youth. And in a chapter called The Impotence of the State he affirms (and demonstrates) that it cannot punish, cannot educate, cannot create satisfactory family relationships, cannot govern economics, cannot re-create (by recreation) and cannot even establish a system of workable law.

It cannot punish because it cannot instill into men a conviction of sin without which there may be penalty but no punishment. It cannot by itself mold the minds and volitional wills of children and youth. It can only hire teachers. It cannot re-create anyone. It cannot determine the economy because it cannot, of itself, create an industrious people; and though it can legally administer, it cannot create an inner lawfulness. The state, in short, depends upon forces outside its command. It cannot create conscience—in the individual or society—and thus cannot, of itself, supply the life force on which it depends.

One might say that the more power it has, the less satisfactorily is it likely to perform its functions, for it drains its powers and responsibilities from the people it aims to serve, to that extent deprives them of both, and finally stultifies itself.

Professor Hocking is not in despair. On the contrary, he sees a world-wide awakening coming in a "postmodernity" age, in which new recognitions of religious truths and insights will assert themselves with new light.

The recognition of truth always banishes anxiety, which is the product of uncertainty. He who recognizes an idol as such fears neither its magic for evil nor trusts in its power of salvation. His strength is not in himself, but within himself, where it holds company with those who have discerned the meaningfulness of existence, and in whom alone there is the comfort of faith. END

BEST OF THE YEAR

When the Benjamin Franklin Magazine Awards for distinguished achievements in writing and editing were announced by the University of Illinois, it was revealed that the "best article about science or health in an American magazine" in 1956, in the opinion of the judges, was The Uninsulted Child, by Gladys Denny Shultz. It was published in the June, 1956, JOURNAL, and described the latest scientific findings about mental and physical deficiencies in infants, and the strong hope that, with thoughtful, proper prenatal care of mothers, these may largely become preventable.

Five other members of the JOURNAL staff and three free-lance writers who wrote articles for the How America Lives series published in 1956 shared the award for second place in the classification of "articles describing life, culture or institutions in the United States." They are Margaret Parton, Betty Coe Spicer, Eileen Sharpe, Neal G. Stuart, Laura Date, of the JOURNAL staff, and Betty Hannah Hoffman, Peta J. Fuller and Vanna Phillips, contributing writers.

Benjamin Franklin said, "Nothing gives an author so much pleasure as to find his words respectfully quoted by other learned authors." Besides being pleased and proud of our writers, the JOURNAL is impressed by the standard of excellence in writing, in gathering and interpreting facts shown by all the award winners, and by the alert, imaginative and profoundly responsible sense of public service on the part of American magazines which they reflect.

This is no place for "second-best"...

Nancy Holmes suggests . . . tomatoes and rings of Potato Salad, made special with Best Foods Mayonnaise

this is the place for Best Foods

(It's real whole-egg mayonnaise!)

Potato Salad Supreme—for festive buffet or with dinner tonight, Best Foods makes this salad your specialty. Made from the famous recipe with freshly-broken whole eggs—even extra egg yolks—Best Foods stays smooth, light and distinctively flavored, even when thinned.

What's more, it brings out other food flavors, never hides them. Yes, it's truly best, yet it costs no more!

BEST FOODS POTATO SALAD

8 medium potatoes, cooked and sliced
4 green chopped onions; salt, pepper
4 tbsp. Best Foods REAL Mayonnaise
2 tbsp. vinegar 2 tbsp. hot water

Combine above ingredients while potatoes are still warm. When cooled, toss with ½ c. celery, ½ c. Best Foods. Place rings of salad around tomatoes nestled on greens. Garnish tomatoes with small swirls of Best Foods.

P. S. Best Foods® Real whole-egg Mayonnaise keeps sandwiches fresh-tasting!

Get rid of toilet bowl odor and stains. Keep your bathroom fresh as apple blossoms.

Use perfumed VANISH Toilet Bowl Cleaner

REGULAR & KING SIZE

New delete

REMOVES RUST & STAINS from sinks and bathtubs, without harming the enamel. Delete also shines copper pots, pans, stainless steel, chrome car bumpers.

ASK YOUR GROCER

© 1957 JUDSON DUNAWAY CORP., Dover, N. H.

New baby—rival or responsibility?

STAN SZASZ

If the older child can feel mother is on his side, still thinking of him, it is the best proof that he doesn't need to worry.

By BENJAMIN SPOCK, M.D.

DR. SPOCK

"I think most young children show some mixture of love and resentment for the baby who displaces them."

I think a small child's jealousy of a baby used to be considered a sin by a majority of mothers, and there are still some who feel this way. When I would ask how the two-year-old was accepting the new arrival I was amazed how often the mother would say, in a protesting tone, "Oh, doctor, he loves her. He constantly wants to pat her and hug her. Sometimes he doesn't realize how hard he's doing it and he makes her cry." It made me feel like an evil-minded man to keep thinking that such behavior was partly jealousy, when so many mothers were insisting on calling it 110 per cent love.

When I said "sin" I wasn't really joking. I meant that most parents felt that jealousy of a baby was so wrong that they couldn't admit it—even to themselves—they had to call it enthusiastic affection or thoughtlessness.

Of course the doctors and educators who have been pointing out the frequency of jealousy have not been doing it in order to give children a bad name. We have known how severely some children are hurt by jealousy and we have wanted parents to realize how natural and common it is so that they can help their children over it.

One of the hardest jobs in earlier days, when so many parents were trying to deny jealousy, was to get them to sense how devastating it can feel to a very small first child. He can't bury himself in a book or go to a far-off place to forget it all. He doesn't have a job to which he can turn for distraction. He doesn't have a choice of good friends from whom he can get consolation. His whole life is in his home and his whole security comes from the parents who, he feels, have turned away from him.

The best job of dramatizing his plight that I ever heard was done by a woman psychiatrist giving a talk at the Child Study Association in New York. She said to the mothers assembled, "Imagine what it would feel like if your husband came home from work one afternoon, leading by the hand a gorgeous hussy, and said to you, 'I've decided that since it has been good to have one wife, it will be even better to have two. I love this girl Marilyn and I know you'll love her too.'" It's preposterous to think that a wife could be delighted with such a stranger just because her husband expected it, but that's just what we expect of the very young child.

From my experience I think that most young children show some mixture of love and resentment for the baby who displaces them from the youngest position in the family. Even when no resentment shows on the surface, it seems to me fairer to assume that the child has at least occasional twinges of it, underneath. The proportions of delight and dislike will vary tremendously, depending on the child's nature and his situation in the family. On the average the first child, having assumed all his life that he has his parents to himself, will show the greatest strain, but this is certainly not true in many individual cases. The child who has had lots of experience with other children and the one who is relatively independent of his mother are apt to be less upset. By the age of four or five a child is much less likely to show gross disturbances of behavior, because he feels so much more grown up than the baby and less dependent on his parents' attention.

Of course even in earlier days parents would have to face the fact of jealousy when it took uninhibited form: the direct attack with a heavy object, the deliberate push, the mean pinch. I think that parents have usually been able to accept jealousy that was expressed in polite verbal form. The classical example is the child's statement, after the baby has been home a couple of days, "You can take him back to the hospital now." Perhaps parents have felt that as long as a child wasn't aware himself of just how sharp his feelings were, they could accept his jealousy with a smile.

Many young children react to the feeling of being displaced not so much by antagonism as by what the psychiatrist calls regression. This means slipping back to a more babyish stage of development, in an effort to find comfort and security there. Common examples are wanting a bottle again, wetting at night or in the daytime or even soiling, reverting to baby talk, wanting to be fed by the mother again. In one sense regression is a less desirable way for a child to respond than if he becomes angry, knows just whom he's mad at and tries to get even. In the latter case he's refusing to surrender and is going into action to defend his rights. In regression he's been knocked a little groggy and is in retreat. Actually the ordinary symptoms of regression are so common and are usually so temporary that we realize they are not serious under these circumstances. But when they are severe and persistent, when the child is acting like a woebegone baby all day long, it's time to come to his rescue, with psychiatric help if necessary.

After twenty years during which doctors, nurses and other parent educators have called so much attention to jealousy, most parents have come to assume it is normal and have worked conscientiously to help their children make the best of it, knowing that this is all that can be expected. Nowadays it's only a small proportion of parents who try to deny it. But another small number get into unnecessary trouble, I think, by developing an excessive fear of it. This may induce them to pay an exaggerated amount of attention to the displaced child, allow him unreasonable privileges, let him get away with demanding or even rude behavior. When he catches them enjoying the baby, they may startle as guiltily as criminals caught in the act. No child can remain secure or happy when he senses submissiveness in his parents. When they act as though they'd done him wrong, it convinces him that they must have. This increases the jealousy. I think that the excessive fear of jealousy is based on two false assumptions: that it's usually severe and that it's all to the bad. Probably the heavy emphasis that I and other writers have put on it—insisting that it's universal and that it ought to be coped with—is to blame for the dread that has been generated in some parents, particularly the very sensitive, conscientious ones, and those who suffered greatly from jealousy in their own childhoods.

In any case, I want to point out some of the constructive influences that the birth of a baby can have—and usually

CONTINUED ON PAGE 19

Fragile ... handle with Johnson's

YOUR BABY'S DELICATE SKIN needs the safe, lasting protection of Johnson's Baby Powder. It's the powder that Chafe-Guards baby's skin—even when wet. Purest, most trusted baby powder in the world.

THAT PRECIOUS SKIN NEEDS gentle cleansing, too—with Johnson's Baby Oil. It's the purest oil of all, specially blended with lanolin to soothe and soften baby's skin. Favorite with mothers everywhere.

HAT BY JOHN-FREDERI

because you are the very air he breathes...

Moments like these are rare—and who knows when or where? When a memory is in the making, don't let anything come between you. Double check your charm every day with VETO...the deodorant that drives away odor...dries away perspiration worries. (Remember, if you're nice-to-be-next-to... next to nothing is impossible!)

Veto deodorant

One touch of VETO dries away perspiration worries!

VETO is for you in more ways than one

Cream

Spray

Stick

Aerosol Mist

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 16

does have—on a child. It can foster, it can speed up, it can strengthen his maturing. A very simple and clear example, which I admit doesn't happen very often, is the child of about two who surprises his mother by abruptly accepting toilet training or becoming dry at night or giving up his bottle when the baby arrives. The great contrast between the baby and himself—in size, in abilities, in behavior—apparently makes him suddenly realize how grown up he is, gives him pride in this and stimulates him to go further still. Such cases, though rare, should remind us that even the child who reacts in the usual babyish way, by reverting to the bottle or wetting, must also have become acutely aware of how far away he is from infancy; there is always the possibility of using this awareness positively by appealing to his grown-up side.

I think the parent can help him to feel the pride and the challenge by calling attention at times, in a gently pitying tone, to the baby's inability to sit, walk, run, talk, understand, use a spoon, cup or toilet, go out, play with toys, and so on. All he can do is suck warm milk and cry. The parent at other moments can be on the lookout for opportunities to compliment the child on new achievements and skills, to ask for his help occasionally in a polite, grownup-to-grownup manner and then show appreciation in the same spirit, to grant him new privileges, however slight, as a consequence of increased ability or reliability, to remind him of other skills and privileges which are just around the corner. This two-sided campaign, if carried out tactfully and truthfully, is quite legitimate. Its purpose is to help him keep a sense of balance and to get full enjoyment of his grownupness, at a time when stresses are apt to make him forget both.

Sometimes he will make a direct comparison between himself and the baby and ask his parents to agree that he is smarter or stronger. I think it is all right for the parent to agree occasionally, and the mother might add that she would be in a terrible jam if she didn't have so much help from him. But I do believe that the parent should not go in for direct comparisons between her two children from her point of view, as if she were appreciating one more than the other or loving one more than the other. Parental expressions of comparison or preference sharpen rivalry. They give the child the sense that the parent is a player of favorites. Even if he seems always to be judged the favorite, it can't help but remind him of the possibility of falling from favor, the necessity of frequently reassuring himself that he still has it. The campaign I've been advocating consists in reminding the child of the inherent disadvantages of babyhood from his point of view, the delights from his point of view in being older.

ITALIAN PROVERBS

The teacher is like the candle, which lights others in consuming itself.

For a web begun God sends thread.

He who would have no trouble in this world must not be born in it.

Who at twenty knows nothing, at thirty does nothing, at forty has nothing.

One other caution about this program should be mentioned. If a child who has been hard hit by jealousy seems more inclined to regress to babyhood than to feel any pride in being big and if the parents are too insistent in calling everything babyish that the child wants to experience and everything grown up that he doesn't want to do, he only becomes more totally convinced that a baby is just exactly what he wants to be. In other words, there must be some signs that the child responds to the appeal of grown-upness if it's to help.

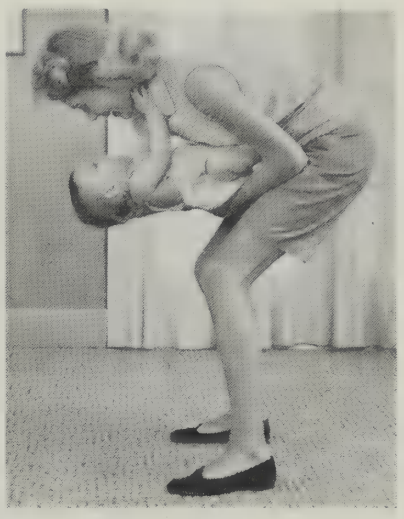
Another aspect of helping the young child to move ahead when a baby comes has to do with encouraging him to feel—to some degree—like a parent. To be sure, this is another form of being grown up, but it's very special. It isn't just taking pride in greater size and capability, which apply to every succeeding stage of childhood. It implies a great leap ahead all the way to adulthood. Boys and girls, especially in the three-to-six-year-old stage, are normally fascinated with acting like fathers and mothers, even if no baby comes along. I think it is the strongest drive at this age and will operate without any encouragement from the parents. But when the arrival of a baby tends temporarily to produce regression and to discourage progression, the mother can tip the scales back again by stimulating the urge to play parent. The child escapes to some degree from the painful situation of being a rivalrous child by pretending that he is completely out of childhood. He convinces himself that he is not in the same league with the baby at all, but approaches him from an entirely new angle as a sort of third parent. His jealous feelings are actually transmuted into altruistic loving ones.

The techniques are well known to many parents: calling the baby "our baby"; encouraging the child to play a responsible role in fetching his bottle from the refrigerator or a diaper from the pile; helping the mother to dry him after the bath; asking the child to watch the baby while the mother is busy or out of the room; having the child take a visitor into the baby's room to show him off. A tactful mother can think of a dozen ways each day in which the child can feel that he and she are working side by side with a common purpose, even if the jobs are actually more of a hindrance than a help. After a while the help may actually prove helpful. In a less direct way a little girl may find equal satisfaction in caring for her doll in a way that exactly mimics her mother, in technique and in spirit.

There are several obvious limits to this approach. The mother dares not permit the child to perform certain jobs, such as carrying the baby around. On the other hand, the craving to hold the baby is so strong in young children that I think it's worth the trouble and the slight risk to arrange the child and baby on a sofa or on the floor so if the baby is dropped it won't be far.

Another limitation is that the impulse to play parent and to feel like a parent is distinctly less under the age of three. One can't say that there is always a small amount at two and a half and a fair amount at two and three quarters. It varies greatly in different children, depending on the sex of the child, his temperament, his ease in getting along with his mother.

Certainly a most important limitation is the degree to which the child enjoys playing parent. There is no point in the mother's imposing the role on a reluctant child. If he has no enjoyment of parenthood, the jobs will only increase his dislike of the baby, or at least his feeling that the baby is a prime nuisance. And neither boy nor girl should be encouraged to be parent all day long. He should still have plenty of chances to be a romping irresponsible child and to be playing with his friends.



I also think that the parent should put the emphasis on the fun of baby care. Frequently the jealous child will prefer to play the part of a rather controlling and disapproving parent. The child who escapes from jealousy only to become a cross, bossy parent hasn't made much progress and will be a pain in the neck to friends and younger brothers and sisters.

There's a third way in which jealousy can be a constructive experience. If a child does not become too seriously upset by it, and is helped by tactful, loving parents to outgrow it gradually, I think he can end up with a stronger character. For a while he imagined that the baby was going to come between his parents and himself. He feared that they would never love him as much as they had before and he perhaps felt more resentment than love for the baby. But he becomes convinced as the weeks and months go by that his parents are just as devoted to him as ever. Reassured by this, he is better able to enjoy the good points in the baby and he develops an increasing fondness for him. It isn't just that he's got

CONTINUED ON PAGE 22

An information-packed article about your baby's care, feeding, growth and fun

What You May Not Know About Your Newborn

When you finally see your wonderful baby, you're probably not surprised by a reddish-pink skin or the soft spot on top of baby's head. And don't be alarmed by a "cross-eyed" look. New babies can't control their eye muscles for a few weeks. Is your little one's head a bit lopsided? A newborn's head bones aren't hard yet, but the odd shape doesn't last long. Why does baby sometimes breathe slowly—other times fast, with gurgling noises and snorts? That's normal. He's just getting used to living in air.

• Happy baby care is easy today. It's "legal" to enjoy your baby, and Heinz Baby Foods give you the time! (Ask your mother how cuddling baby was called "spoiling"—how many hours she spent straining baby food.) Today Heinz prepares over 80 different kinds of baby foods—cooks and packs them in small but specialized kitchens in the nation's garden spots. Now millions of babies are better eaters, because they love the better flavor, color and texture of Heinz Baby Foods.

• What comforts your baby most? A tummy comfortably full of good food—as much or as little as he likes, and served where he likes to be—cuddled in mommy's arms. When your baby's mealtimes are relaxed and friendly, it helps him learn to be a relaxed and friendly baby.

• Don't let baby-care backache spoil the fun of your life-with-baby. (But do let your doctor diagnose that ache!) Back-saving tips: squat rather than stoop; lift baby, held close to you; straighten up seat first, shoulders last. This will save your back. Carry baby in your arms, not on your stomach! (When your tummy sticks out, your back sways in. So keep stomach muscles tight.) Good posture helps prevent an aching back.

• Oh boy, chicken — one of your baby's best friends, nutritionally speaking. Chicken is rich in calcium—a boon to babies who are on a milk "strike." It's an excellent source of body-building protein, too—the nutrient every baby needs every day. Heinz makes better-tasting chicken dishes for tiny babies and toddlers: Strained and Junior Chicken Noodle Dinners; Vegetables, Egg Noodles and Chicken; Chicken Soup; 100% Chicken Meat; and Junior Chicken-Farina-Vegetable Porridge. Every one is a delicious food to grow on.

Over 80 Better-Tasting 57

HEINZ Baby Foods

- Strained Egg Yolks
- Strained Orange Juice
- Pre-Cooked Cereals
- Strained Baby Foods
- Junior Baby Foods
- Str. and Jr. Meats
- Teething Biscuits

a completely new wave! Even-Waving

SIMPLIFIED...NO MESS...NO GUESS

1. WAVE right from the applicator!

Applicator holds all the lotion! Sponge top is wide as a curl. New Even-Waving Lotion spreads smoothly—without splashing or dripping.

One easy stroke wets every strand—clear thru. No combing needed. Never too much lotion—never too little. Most even waving ever!

2. NEUTRALIZE right from Sponge comes off. See those eight spray-tips They spray neutralizer inside each curl—whe hands can't reach. No mess! No miss!

The most even wave ever!
No stragglers—no frizz!

You just can't miss getting the most even wave of your life—because New Way Toni waves more evenly, more thoroughly—without mess or guess!

way to Toni!

he applicator!

Now, the spray-tips are inside the curl. Press! Neutralizer flows in. All waving action stops. Can't under-wave! Can't over-wave!

. . . first double-easy applicator
. . . first even-waving lotion

SPECIAL INTRODUCTORY OFFER

$2.00 value New Way Toni . . . plus
$1.00 value Double-Easy Applicator
$3.00 value Now . . . only $2.29

Be Beautifully Gray

LOOK GLAMOROUSLY YOUNGER... RADIANTLY ALIVE

NEW BEAUTY DISCOVERY

Colors and Conditions

WITHOUT TINTING OR DYEING

You'll look years younger as Nestle Color Creme Rinse glorifies your hair with wonderful, natural-looking, temporary color. Quickly, easily, safely it adds beautiful smoky, delicate silvery or rich charcoal-gray color to gray, white and graying hair.

In moments, unsightly yellow and "off-color" streaks vanish and mixed-gray hair of all shades is cleverly, evenly color-toned. And—the wonderful conditioning cremes in Nestle Color Creme Rinse correct dryness and brittle ends, make hair easier to manage, add the glorious lustre of youth! Six beautiful colors that rinse in—shampoo out!

29¢ 75¢

Nestle COLOR CREME RINSE

At all cosmetic counters or ask your beautician for professional applications.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 19

back almost to the state he was in before the baby was ever heard of. Since he has lived through a real crisis and has not been defeated by it, he must have been strengthened. He must end up surer of parents' love, more tolerant of other children, more serene about life and his ability to cope with it. The same kind of thing happens after a soldier goes successfully through his first battle, a mother through her first childbirth, a child through an operation. "The blade is tempered by the fire." I assume that this is why the first child in a family is so often able to show mostly affection and very little jealousy of the third.

Many parents have written to me pointing out that the advice so often given—to prepare th child for the birth of a baby—has only limited application under the age of three and almost none under the age of two. I agree. No matter how patiently you try to explain the coming event to a one-year-old, you have the feeling that not much is getting through. He may be able to repeat the words. He may be able to form a dim picture as the crib and the layette are made ready. But he certainly is not prepared for the feelings he will have when he sees his mother actually caring for the infant. So I don't think the parent should work at it too hard. It is worth while to make any shifts in living arrangements months ahead of time so that he doesn't feel dispossessed when the rival appears. But for the most part the parents must count on their tact and considerateness when the infant arrives. The core of the matter is to avoid the excessive enthusiasm for the baby, the preoccupation with him. This is hard to carry out because there is something about a baby that seems to call forth the doting attitude of parents, grandparents and friends. But it is unnecessary to ignore the baby altogether. Even a one-year-old has some capacity for affection for him and is helped to increase it by identifying with the affectionate parent. And there is no point in the parent's trying to heap large doses of forced attention on the child. What will reassure him most is realizing throughout the day that his mother and father are not forgetting him, but are talking with him, helping him, occasionally playing with him, keeping tuned to him, in the relaxed, assured manner they always had.

Riches are not from abundance of worldly goods, but from a contented mind. MOHAMMED

There is no doubt that one of the parents' jobs is to keep the one- or two- or three-year-old from actually hurting the baby, whenever possible, by such methods as watchfulness, very firm prohibition, prompt interference, keeping the baby, if necessary, in a closed room when he is asleep and the mother is busy. Though a small child may not be able to resist the urge to be mean, he feels very guilty if he succeeds. He, as well as the baby, needs protection from his hostile feelings.

And finally, everything we have learned from child-guidance work reinforces our conviction that it helps the child to be able to talk about his jealous feelings. (This is very different from letting him carry them into action.) When he has tried to be mean and has been stopped, or when his mother detects that he's feeling angry or depressed, she can remind him again that she knows he feels cross at the baby sometimes, knows he would sometimes like the baby to go away so that he could be alone with mommy and daddy. This usually brings temporary improvement in spirits and a permanent improvement with time. It keeps him from feeling unbearably guilty. It makes it unnecessary for him to hide his antagonism deep inside where it would last longer and do more harm to his character. It shows the child in the most convincing way that his mother is still thinking of him and loving him, which in the long run is what will get him over his despair.

Dr. Spock regrets that it is impossible for him to answer letters personally. However, he is delighted to receive suggestions of topics of truly general interest.—Ed.

"America's Most Popular Nurser"

Model Feeds Baby with Evenflo

Janet Bailey, winner of titles "Miss Ohio," "Cherry Blossom Queen" and "Professional Models' Queen," is shown with her 8-month-old daughter, Lucia. Janet reports she has used Evenflo Nursers right from the start and that her baby finishes her bottle readily. She is shown using an Evenflo "Colorgrad" Nurser with ounces marked in red for easy reading.

Because their patented Twin Air-Valve Nipples are so easy to nurse and their wide mouth bottles so handy to use, more mothers use Evenflo than all other nursers combined!

SELF-REGULATING PRECISION FEEDING Evenflo®

Evenflo Complete Units 25c
" Deluxe Pyrex Units 40c
Unbreakable Plastic Units 8-oz. 39c; 4-oz. 35c
Unbreakable Plastic Bottles 8-oz. 25c; 4-oz. 20c
Evenflo Nipples & Parts 10c
Evenflo COLORGRAD Nursers 35c, 3 for $1.00

THE PYRAMID RUBBER CO., RAVENNA, O.

DISCOURAGE
THUMB SUCKING NAIL BITING

THUM TRADE MARK

Just Paint on Fingertips
60c at your drug store

Welsh Winkie "Hitch - Hiker"

When There Is More Than One Tot To Take Along

STROLLER–WALKER–SLEEPER
- AUTO SEAT
- BOOSTER CHAIR
- STROLLER FOR TWO!

Sold Separately

Wonderful new folding feature, the latest in folding mechanism. Exclusive spring seat—such smooth riding for baby.

Baby Grows Into—Not Out Of The Winkie

WELSH CO., St. Louis • World's Only Maker of "Boodle-Buggies"

Make $62.50 EASILY on Just 50 CHRISTMAS CARD Assortments

Best Spare-Time Plan Anywhere!

Yes, you make $1.25 on every Fine Arts box! You can't help but make extra money quicker with this fast-selling, big profit Christmas Assortment. You don't need experience. New ideas in Slim, Religious, other most popular Cards at 21 for $1 up, stationery, inexpensive Gifts you'll enjoy showing to friends. Over 200 amazing values.

GET SAMPLES NOW!

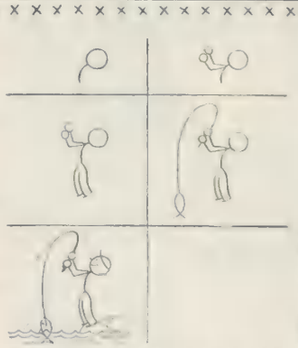
Up to 65c of each $1 is your cash profit. Samples start you earning at once. Send no money. Get gorgeous Personalized Christmas Card Album FREE. Bargain List, other Samples on approval. $1.25 Gift FREE on 15-day Offer. Write now!

Boulevard Art Publishers, Dept. 526-X
235 South Wabash Ave., Chicago 4, Illinois

FINE ARTS
Special Assortment
Ultra-fine quality cards, sold as to 35c each. You sell for 8c and make $1.25 on box of 25 for $1.95



Salad Secret

Bring out all the natural, delicate flavors with

POMPEIAN
Pure Virgin Imported
OLIVE OIL
2 oz. to 1 gal.

Insist on POMPEIAN... oil from choicest olives.
Free recipe book. Dept. L-7 Pompeian, Balto. 24, Md.

NOW YOU DRAW ONE, TOO!

Hours slip happily away when boys and girls have fun like this with the drawing lessons in JACK and JILL magazine! And there's much more in each issue...stories, games, puzzles and ideas for things to make and do. To send a year's happiness to your favorite child, just fill out and mail this coupon. We'll send a gift card signed in your name—and bill you later.

Prices (U.S., U.S. Possessions and Canada) 1 year $3.50 2 or more 1-year gifts from the same donor—$3 each.

UNCONDITIONAL GUARANTY: The Publisher agrees, upon request direct from subscribers to its Philadelphia Office, to refund the full amount paid for any copies of Curtis Publications not previously mailed.

JACK and JILL Dept. 7307 Independence Sq., Philadelphia 5, Penna.

My Name_____
Street or R.D _____
Town_____ Zone_____ State_____
____Bill Me ____Payment Enclosed

Please send a JACK and JILL gift subscription to:

Name_____
Street or R.D._____
Town_____ Zone_____ State_____
____Birthday ____Just a gift

Sign my gift card_____

Additional subscriptions may be written on a separate card or paper

Curtis Magazine

MONEY... in Your Free Time

Write us for details and supplies.

CURTIS CIRCULATION COMPANY
992 Independence Square Phila. 5, Penna.

See the difference DOLE makes!

Look how DOLE Crushed Pineapple lifts just plain ice cream to a sundae treat—in a jiffy!

Look how DOLE Pineapple Chunks make a gelatin mold sparkle! It's so easy, too, with delicious DOLE.

A simple cottage cheese salad becomes fit for a king, crowned with golden Hawaiian DOLE Slices.

VONDER-WORKING VARIETIES • Sliced • Chunks • Spears • Tidbits • Crushed • Juice

Hawaiian Pineapple Company, Ltd., Honolulu, Hawaii—San Jose, California

New fun with cupcakes

from Betty Crocker

"Gay tricks! Easy tricks! Win-yourself-a-kiss tricks! There's no end to the fun you can have with light 'n lovely cupcakes made with Betty Crocker Cake Mixes! Easy cupcake directions are right on the package. (Takes about 15 minutes to bake 24!) Then add your own decorative touches. Or start with a brand-new idea—fresh fruit to make luscious little upside-down cakes! Here are just a few ideas. You'll think of many more, I know!"

Merry-Go-Round Cakes

Use Betty Crocker White Cake Mix. Frost cupcakes with Chocolate Fudge Frosting. Trim with animal crackers. Add candies.

Snowballs

Betty Crocker Yellow Cake Mix makes these cupcakes. Frost with Betty Crocker Fluffy White Frosting. Roll in coconut.

Peach Surprise

Use Honey Spice Cake Mix, first placing in each of 14 custard cups, ½ tsp. butter, 1 tsp. brown sugar and 1 peach half.

Cake Cones

Use Devil's Food Cake Mix, filling flat-bottomed cones a scant ½ full. Trim with Fluffy White Frosting and candy sprinkles.

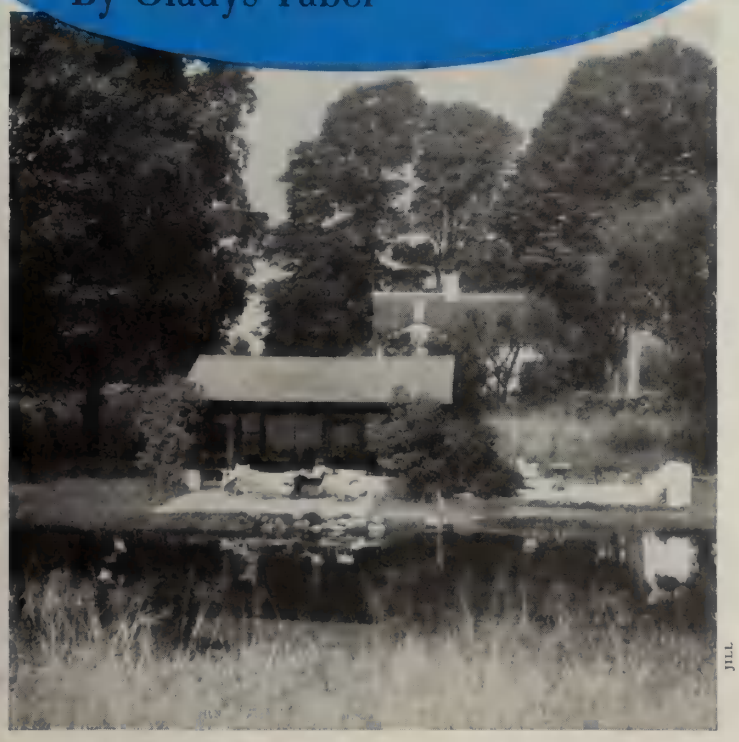
Trix Cakes

Use any Betty Crocker Cake Mix. Frost cupcakes with Fluffy White Frosting. Then dip in Trix—the gay fruit-colored cereal!

Kissin' Cakes

Use Betty Crocker Peanut Delight Cake Mix and Peanut Creme Frosting Mix. Make candy nose and eyes, a cherry mouth.

"I guarantee a perfect* cake—cake...after cake...after cake!"



*Yes, every mix we make for you is guaranteed to come out perfect, or send the box top to Betty Crocker, Box 200, Minneapolis, Minn., and General Mills will send your money back.

Betty Crocker

General Mills

DIARY of DOMESTICITY

By Gladys Taber

Recipe for July: first a swim, then supper by the pond.

A day is an odd sort of unit. It begins, flows like a tiny rivulet toward eternity, and ends as we fall asleep. No day can ever be like any other day. Nor do we ever experience exactly the same thing twice! We can, and do, store precious moments away in memory, but nothing ever repeats itself.

And so, when I wake up on a still July morning, I think of the day ahead as a small new world to adventure in. What shall I make of a whole day? It won't be anything sensational, but it can be filled with living. As my Virginia friend says, "You dip your bucket where you are."

I let the dogs out, and watch them follow the tracks of all the mysterious night people who have taken the yard over in the moonlight. Holly, the Irish, follows a dizzy circle, and I wonder just who went that way. Each cocker picks its own trail, and the day lawn is filled with flying ears, bounding paws and happy waggings. Dogs have the gift of savoring every moment, which may be one reason they are such fun to live with.

Coolness is laid like gauze over the earth, and I savor it fully, for later on it will be hotter than boiling maple syrup. The giant sugar maples cast deep shadows, which move a bit as squirrels fly through the upper branches. Squirrels seem almost to be winged, more creatures of air than earth.

Jill is already making the coffee. "I wish it could taste as good as it smells," she says, sniffing the fragrance.

We carry our trays to the terrace. A soft-boiled egg, a slice of crisp toast and coffee make a good breakfast. We like a glass of iced tomato juice with a squeeze of lemon in it instead of fruit on a hot day. Holly and Sister and Jonquil sit with earnestly uplifted eyes and get most of the egg and toast.

"The beans are at it again," says Jill.

I reflect that it takes a lot of time to keep up with those beans. For beans are like a circus with all rings going at once. I doubt if there is any other growing thing that can outdo a bean. But at least we can now freeze them, whereas in the old days we got out the cold-pack kettle and beans went on all day.

After breakfast, we do the maintenance chores. This takes a good hour and a half, and we fly around not speaking a word to each other unless we bump in the narrow low doorways. The dogs are fed. The pans are scrubbed. Fresh water is set out on both sides of the house, as well as inside. The beds, the dusting, the pickup take time. We feed the barn cats across the road and scrub their pans.

Then I attack the middle kitchen. Elswyth Thane once pointed out that if we had a middle kitchen, there must be three of them. But we call it the middle kitchen only because it is in the middle—between the back kitchen and the family room. It is all very confusing. This kitchen, I firmly believe, upsets itself during the night. I clean it up after supper, and it looks very tidy, but by morning it is clearly the haunt of gremlins.

Or the brownies are at it. How I used to love reading about the brownies, who came nightly to drink the bowl of fresh milk—and woe to the housewife who failed to set it out for them!

Jill burns the trash, cleans the kennels and runs. Then she decides what to weed and what to put off. You have to have a philosophy about weeds, for you never really get to the end. And weeds have a natural determination, far beyond that of anything edible.

After lunch we have errands, and this is not simple when you have to go ten miles in one direction for the bank and ten in another for the express office and ten in a third direction for cedar chips for the kennel. Often we add up fifty miles, what with one thing and another.

But wherever we go, we go on quiet country roads and see the meadows rich with hay. The whole color of the country is richly green, and the cows stand dreamily in upland pastures, and bouncing Bet spreads pink carpets everywhere.

Every year more farmland is given over to houses, fewer fields are tilled, but

So easy! 50% more jelly ...and fresher flavor

because you boil only 1 minute with SURE-JELL or CERTO

Recipe: perfect homemade plum jelly. Crush 5 lbs. ripe tart plums. Simmer 10 min., covered, with 1½ cups water. Squeeze through jelly bag or cheesecloth layers. Mix 5½ cups juice with 1 box Sure-Jell in saucepan. (Or use Certo—recipe on bottle.)

Bring to boil, over high heat, stirring constantly. At once, stir in 7½ cups sugar, bring to boil again. Boil hard 1 min., stirring constantly. This short boiling time gives you fresher flavor! And less juice boils away, so you get up to 50% higher yield!

Remove from heat, skim off foam and pour into glasses. Paraffin at once. Yield: 12 medium glasses, at mere pennies a glass! And you're sure of perfect results with all kinds of fruits—when you use powdered Sure-Jell or liquid Certo!

Your choice!

SURE-JELL

powdered natural fruit pectin

or CERTO

liquid natural fruit pectin

Pectin causes jelling. Amounts of pectin in fruits vary . . . but no guessing with recipes you get with Sure-Jell or Certo.

Products of General Foods

PY-O-MY announces new Ice Box Pie Mix—with a bag of complete graham cracker crust and a bag of chiffon filling all in one package.

This New Chiffon Ice Box Pie Mix Needs No Baking

One morning, not long ago, a group of the Py-O-My baking mix people anxiously opened the door of a refrigerator and took out a Chiffon Pie.

This was no ordinary pie. In fact—it represented 16 months' work to develop a "baking mix" that needed no baking! It had to be simple enough so that anyone could make a delicious lemon, chocolate, strawberry or butterscotch pie—just by adding milk or water—and chilling.

Why all the excitement? Because if a fluffy, full-flavored, ice box pie could be made even by a beginner—without turning on the oven—America's housewives would have a new dessert—as convenient to make on hot summer days—as during the rest of the year. And that would be something!

Over 600 test mixes had been made in these 16 months. But—until that morning—some didn't whip easily enough. Others whipped well—but the flavor was too faint. In some—the graham cracker crust crumbled too easily. Others were too complicated to make—or didn't chill quickly enough. In some—the filling was more like a pudding than light chiffon.

All of which brings us back to that morning not long ago. If you've "found" Py-O-My Ice Box Pie Mix—you know the rest.

But if not—here's the story. This new Py-O-My mix contains two bags—one a complete graham cracker crust (no more rolling out crumbs!)—the other a fluffy chiffon filling. Only milk (or water) need be added. You just mix and chill.

Your choice of 4 flavors

Is it delicious—and easy? The best answer is that almost every good grocery store is already featuring it—and if your grocer doesn't have your favorite flavor—he can now get it for you quickly.

Enjoy your first package this week. Ask for new Py-O-My Ice Box Pie Mix in your family's favorite flavor—Lemon, Chocolate, Strawberry or Butterscotch.

Contains two bags. 1. Complete graham cracker crust. 2. New chiffon filling.

this is still basically an agricultural countryside, and the villages still keep the old look of New England. White church spires lift above the summer green, and most of the houses, in the villages or in the farmyards, are white, because they have always been so. And the old split-rail fences mark off pastures. We still have many stone fences, but they are dwindling as people quietly take the best stones for terraces and paths. Nowadays most of them are too low to keep the cattle safe, and sometimes a strand of barbed wire is strung along the top.

Here and there black Angus crop the good grass, and they are lovely with their furry black coats and compact bodies. They are still to wonder at after all the years of Holsteins and Guernseys we are used to. They always look like overgrown Teddy bears to me.

A buffet supper by the pond is fun. Hamburgers are glorified with Louella's Goop. For this, you put ¼ pound blue cheese through a sieve, cream well ½ cup soft butter or margarine, and add. Then add ½ clove garlic, crushed, 2 tablespoons prepared mustard, salt and freshly ground pepper.

When you take the charcoal-grilled hamburgers off, and spread the Goop on, it melts in, and slithers over, and is indescribably delicious. The rolls should be crisply toasted, better a little blackish at the edge, so they will invite the juicy melting sauce. And the salad can be a pick-up-and-eat one—scallions, carrot sticks, celery curls, olives, slivers of dill pickles.

A late swim makes supper especially good, and it is pleasant to sit as dusk brings those lovely violet tones. The cicadas are in full swing now. Hal Borland says that cicadas live on sap, but that mostly they just make noise! They do sleep at night, because they must have to rest their voices some. I don't really mind them, for they mean summer.

A prejudice is a vagrant opinion without visible means of support.

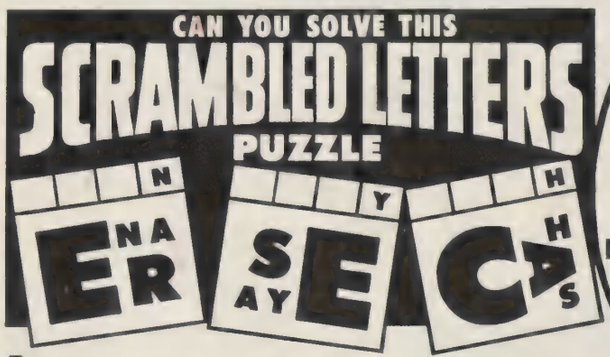
BIERCE

A cool breath steals from the pond as the moon rises. It is such a tangible thing that I think I could pick up handfuls and hold them to my cheek. The pines give off their fragrance, too, and in July the smell of hay makes the air especially sweet (but is ruinous to those who suffer from hay fever and asthma).

Sometimes we do broilers, and simply marinate them in spicy garlic French dressing which we buy at the market. Everyone does her own. I think one of the greatest improvements in products has been in the salad-dressing field. When I make my own, I just toss in half a dozen things and stir and season and add dry mustard and Worcestershire and so on, but I think for quick use the new dressings are elegant. You can buy a dozen kinds, and they are a far cry from the first French dressings.

If it has been a very hot and very much doing-of-beans kind of day, we take a night dip in the pond. I always tell myself that water snakes do not go out at night, for the water is so black almost anything could be in it and I would never see it at all. The plop of the little frogs is pleasant, but any strange huffing or chonking makes me wonder what is swimming around under me!

Possibly a baby Loch Ness monster has made his way in from the uncharted swamp waters and ended in our pond. Or an otter is there. But I do not worry overmuch, for I know any wild creature is all right if you let it alone.



The day ends. It is time now to read, and write letters, and, of course, pick up the middle kitchen again. It has now disarranged itself completely. Jill lets the dogs out, lets them in, lets them out.

What has my day been worth? Possibly I said a comforting word where it was needed,

CONTINUED ON PAGE 78

CAN YOU SOLVE THIS

SCRAMBLED LETTERS PUZZLE

WIN THIS BEAUTIFUL ROSE BALL PEN DESK SET WITH PERFUMED INK

There are three boxes in the puzzle. In each box are four letters that form a word. We'll start you off by writing the last letter of each word in the squares above the boxes. Can you put the other letters in the correct squares? Try it and see. When you have unscrambled the words correctly, write the 3-word sentence in coupon and mail for FREE GIFT!

YOUR CHANCE TO MAKE $50 – $100 AND MORE!

We're running this Test to find people with active minds who want to make money. We show YOU how easy and simple it is to get spare time orders for our All-Occasion and Christmas Greeting Cards, Stationery and Gift Items from friends, neighbors and co-workers. They are so beautiful, so different, so amazingly low in cost they sell themselves on sight.

Pink plastic rose pen holder. Jet black base. Sleek pink-and-gold ball pen leaves an air of delicate fragrance on correspondence. This exquisite set is yours FREE when you mail your answer. Solve and mail it NOW!

HURRY! SEND YOUR PUZZLE SOLUTION TODAY!

We'll send you a Rose Ball Pen Desk Set ABSOLUTELY FREE when you answer our Puzzle. You don't pay a single cent for it—now or ever. But you must hurry! We reserve the right to reject entries dated 60 days after the month printed on the cover of this publication. Mail answer today for your FREE Desk Set gift, FREE Imprint Samples and Christmas Card Assortments On Approval. Only one entry accepted from each household. Write to: ARTISTIC CARD CO., Inc., 112 Way Street, Elmira, N. Y. (In Canada, write 103 Simcoe St., Toronto 1, Ont.)

PASTE ON POSTCARD OR MAIL IN ENVELOPE!

HERE IS MY THREE-WORD SENTENCE:

1st WORD

2nd WORD

3rd WORD

Puzzle Editor, ARTISTIC CARD CO., INC.
112 Way Street, Elmira, New York

Here's my solution. Rush my FREE Rose Ball Pen Desk Set—also spare time Money-Making Plan, Free Imprint Samples and Christmas Card Assortments On Approval.

Name _____ (Please Print)

Address _____

City _____ Zone _____ State _____

ORGANIZATIONS! Check here for special Fund Raising Plan. ☐

...WHAT DO YOU SUGGEST?

Other Models Available

Funeral Directors Say:

THE Wilbert® BURIAL VAULT

Used for over 1¼ MILLION interments. Made of thick, precast asphalt and reinforced concrete. Quality controlled! Guaranteed! It's true peace-of-mind protection! Send for FREE booklet, "Facts every family should know about funerals and interments". Write Wilbert, Box 147-J, Forest Park, Ill.

Wilbert—the Foremost Name in Burial Vault

® Trade Mark of Wilbert W. Haase Co.

New 1957 4-STYLE CHRISTMAS ASSORTMENT OF 24 CARDS

FREE SAMPLES Name Imprinted Christmas Cards

Make $50, $75, $100 Extra Money

Start a GREETING CARD & GIFT SHOP at home

Show friends New Ideas in Christmas All Occasion greeting card assortments, gift wrappings, home and gift items. It's easy—it's fun! Profits to $1.00 per box. Bonus. Write for Free Trial Outfit of Feature boxes on approval. Free Catalog, Selling Guide, all details and Sensational Free Offer.

NEW ENGLAND ART PUBLISHERS North Abington 767, Mass.

MONEY...

In Your Free Time

Spare-time income can help you meet expenses. Write for details about our subscription-selling plan. No obligation.

CURTIS CIRCULATION COMPANY
988 Independence Square
Philadelphia 5 Pennsylvania

NEW IMPROVED GOLDEN-LIGHT MAZOLA® OIL

...now 3 ways better than ever!

Mazola won't smoke or burn even up to 440° F. This means clean, smoke-free frying you just can't get with solid shortenings. Crisp golden-fried foods look so good . . . taste even better.

No fresher oil available! Protected by a new process, golden-light Mazola is a superior salad oil for all homemade dressings. Here's lightness you can see... freshness you can taste!

Lighter, more delicate flavor. New, improved Mazola is the best liquid shortening for all baking. Look for Mazola in the clear glass bottle... see the golden-light quality of this pure corn oil.

Mazola
PURE GOLDEN CORN OIL

rhythm step

JOHNSON, STEPHENS & SHINKLE SHOE CO., ST LOUIS, MO.

NEW RADIOEAR 850
cuts harmonic distortion to an all time low

Only expensive HI-FI phonographs produce distortion-free sound to compare with the RADIOEAR 850 hearing aid. So powerful it offers to added thousands their first opportunity to hear through a clear transparent tube, with no receiver in the ear. Send today for Free six page booklet—No. 527.

radioear
CORPORATION
Pittsburgh 16, Pa.

Name_____
Address_____
City_____ State_____
527

UNDER COVER

By Bernardine Kielty

© 1946 KING FEATURES SYNDICATE INC. WORLD RIGHTS RESERVED

"Darling, remember those dinner invitations you gave me to mail last week? . . ."

For light relief in July heat try Ogden Nash, whose latest book YOU CAN'T GET THERE FROM HERE (Little, Brown) is a joy. Not only is Mr. Nash one of the funniest men alive and writing, but he's so exactly like the rest of us! Take "The Invitation Says From Five to Seven":

The major trouble with a party
Is you need a guest to give it for,
And the best part of any guest
Is the last part out the door. . . .

The best location for a party
Is in a room without a floor.
And the best way to give a party
Is leave town the night before.

●

Hammock reading seems to have gone out lately in favor of solemnity and worry, but for those who want them, there are still a few laughs to be found. THE PINK HOTEL (Putnam), by Dorothy Erskine and Patrick Dennis (Auntie Mame) is one—about a resort hotel—which I promise will not be depressing. CINDY AND I, The Real Life Adventures of Mr. and Mrs. Joey Adams (Crown), is also far from serious. And THE BRAVE COWARD, by Art Buchwald (Harper).

"A modest record of my accomplishments," says Art Buchwald. "I like to think it has gotten me where I am today—just six seats down from an Elsa Maxwell dinner party, and four stalls down from the Rothschild racing stables."

About his cover girl, as Joey Adams calls his Cindy, he says she is 5'3½" and weighs 110 pounds. With full make-up, 125 pounds. She's easily recognized by her patent-leather haircomb—jet black with a part in the middle. Whether she combs it with an iron or paints it on, he doesn't know. But he has discovered why she never shuts her mouth: her hair is too tight.

●

The new novel that I've enjoyed most—fresh as the Elysian spring—is NATALIE, by Alexandra Orme (Comes the Comrade and Paris Original). We Americans have no preparation for an understanding of a girl like Natalie, or the people she lives among. Life has given us no inkling. But here she is—a fourteen-year-old Polish girl, living in one room of a squalid Budapest boarding-house with her grandmother, a princess with an outrageous angle on morals, and her mother, pious, bourgeois and dull. They sleep on the floor. They steal rolls from the dining room. They wear rags, except for the ostrich plumes which the princess dons when invited out.

Natalie is the pest of the pension. Undernourished and skinny, always with dirty hands and loose cotton stockings, but with golden shining hair which she brushes unceasingly, she sneaks into people's rooms and listens; she speaks Hungarian, Polish and French fluently, and deliberately disconcerts the various groups in this international rubbish heap.

Though Natalie is a bad girl, this is no Bad Seed; it is no Anne Frank, though war and bombs and émigrés make it a sinister background for the young; it is no Lower Depths because it is often hilariously funny. Her devoted companion is a little Russian boy, somewhat younger, much smaller, and these two make a combination quite without equal in all my literary memory. (Simon & Schuster.)

●

A far more normal child than Natalie, living a far more normal life, with parents and sister, but in Hollywood, is the eleven-year-old heroine of DEDE O'SHEA, by Peggy Goodin (Dutton). This is authentic American and never strikes a false note—at least where the children are concerned.

In HOUSEFUL OF LOVE, by Marjorie Housepian, there are also plenty of children—the real story of an endearing Armenian family living near Gramercy Park in New York. (Sometimes you drop into a restaurant and have rice rolled in a grape leaf and shish kebab of lamb—that's the section.) Like all Armenian books—Saroyan, Bezzerides and the rest—this one is warm, affectionate, good-natured, full of family and love of family.

●

Just as his fine novel of the business world, THE DURABLE FIRE, started running in the JOURNAL, and within forty-eight hours after it was chosen as the June Book of the Month, the author, Howard Swiggett, died in a Long Island hospital. It was a great loss to the literary world, for Mr. Swiggett was a writer of widest interests and knowledge. Besides his many popular novels (The Power and the Prize has been made into a movie), he wrote fascinating historical studies. In this reader's opinion his biography of Gouverneur Morris, The Extraordinary Mr. Morris, is one of the best American biographies ever written.

●

It is hard to believe that a book about how sheep are raised, bred, born, fed and sheared can be fascinating. But it is. OF SHEEP AND MEN, by R. B. Robertson (Knopf), is as good as its predecessor, also a fascinating book, Of Whales and Men. This time we're steeped in the atmosphere of the Scottish border.

●

I don't know quite why, but readers in the mass seem to adore YOU AND YOUR OPERATION, by Dr. Benjamin R. Reiter (Macmillan). I might add that I couldn't put it down myself, and I've never had an operation (fingers crossed). It tells all.

THE AMERICAN MAGAZINE

DAN KILGO

"Well, well, senator—I heard your speech favoring socialized medicine."

Four big handsome, profusely illustrated books have come out, one after the other, called PEOPLE, PLACES, THINGS. IDEAS, edited by Geoffrey Grigson and Charles Gibbs-Smith (Hawthorn). They are informative, entertaining, and should be good books to have about for the school child (as well as the rest of the family) to browse in. IDEAS, the latest one, has short discussions, by 63 contributors, on everything, from Art for Art's Sake to Nature to Yoga. A good gift, but expensive ($12.50 each).

●

A charming juvenile, of which adults will appreciate every word, is* GOD'S TROUBADOUR. The Story of Saint Francis of Assisi by Sophie Jewett, a new edition with thirteen beautiful Giotto paintings as illustrations (Crowell, $2.75).

Doll by Madame Alexander

Yardley products for America are created in England, and finished in the U.S.A. from the original English formulae, combining imported and domestic ingredients. Yardley of London, Inc., 620 Fifth Ave., N.Y.C.

To make you feel so fresh and feminine

YARDLEY dusting powder . . . of course

The freshest, most feminine thing you can slip into after a bath or shower is a fragrant cloud of Yardley dusting powder. Fluff it on generously with its own big velvet puff to smooth your skin, to scent it delicately . . . delightfully! It's a wonderful basic way to capture the fresh, feminine feeling that only Yardley can give you. Choose from five delightful fragrances—April Violets, Bond Street, Red Roses, Lavender, Lotus. Generous box, $1.85 plus tax.

Tampax Incorporated, Palmer, Mass.

OVER 60 AND LOOKING FOR A JOB?

. . . Arlington, Virginia, Offers Help

GEORGE TAMES

Rising prices, fixed incomes and the desire to be useful and occupied bring many an older person to the Over-60 Employment Service. Here 72-year-old Mrs. Anna Matthews asks office manager Mrs. Fannie Vossen about part-time work.

Time to Make a Fresh Start

By MARGARET HICKEY

Today, a woman of 50 is as likely to be holding down a job as a woman of 20. More and more mature women, according to Womanpower, a recent report of the National Manpower Council, are making a fresh start or returning to the jobs they left for marriage and children. By 1965, women will account for more than half of the expected increase of 10,000,000 in the labor force over 1955.

But jobs for mature women will more than ever call for definite skills. The woman with previous office experience who can brush up on her ability will have an easier time. There will be even greater demand than there is today for teachers, nurses, dietitians and nutritionists, librarians and technicians, recreation and other group workers.

In Washington, D.C., a booklet on job-training courses prepared by six women's groups for mature workers lists as free courses advertising art, bookkeeping, office machines and practice, shorthand, typing, cashiering, retailing and sales training. Boards of education in other states have organized similar refresher courses.

Last year the Department of Labor allocated $449,500 to state employment-security offices to pay the salaries of older-worker specialists in each state headquarters and in about 70 larger cities. In Cleveland, Ohio, through counseling, job leads and direct referrals from the Vocational Guidance Bureau (a Red Feather agency), many workers who had given up or had been told they are too old are finding they are needed after all.

Senior Achievement, Inc., in Chicago, is fitting skills of retired people into light manufacturing and assembly work, done on a subcontracting basis with industrial firms, and also supplying clerical help to outside employers on a part-time basis.

A booklet prepared by the Massachusetts Division of Employment Security offers these tips to the "Over Forty and Looking for a Job":

Register with your local public employment office. Use the placement bureau of your trade-union, professional association, school or college. Ask your friends about openings. Call on your former employers. Apply in person or by letter to firms where you would like to work. Answer help-wanted ads. Watch newspapers for announcements of new plants, branch banks or stores to be opened in your neighborhood. END

The telephone on Mrs. Vossen's desk has been busy all afternoon. Calm and businesslike, and looking not at all like her 72 years, she answers promptly, "May I help you?"

"This is B——'s real estate," a harried voice on the line says. "Can you send me somebody who knows what the inside of a file cabinet looks like—and who has a notion of what a day's work is?"

Mrs. Vossen puts down the receiver and riffles through the green metal box on her desk until she finds the name she wants. "Indeed I can! I'll send Mrs. George over first thing in the morning."

In an ordinary employment service, such calls are routine. But the fact that many are now coming to the Over-60 Employment Service of Northern Virginia means that a number of business firms are beginning to recognize that older people can fill jobs reliably and efficiently.

"You never have to worry about whether she is going to show up," is the current report from the real-estate man who interviewed—and hired—68-year-old Mrs. George, a white-haired widow who believes in punctuality. "And she keeps the office running smoothly when I'm out with a client," he adds. Mrs. George's employer previously had hired high-school girls part time, in the hope that they would fit in as permanent employees after graduation. But this didn't work out. The girls quit, were married, or did their work so carelessly he had to let them go.

Mrs. George hadn't expected it to be easy to find a job after the company where she had worked for several years closed down. But she did think her experience ought to count for something. Interviewer after interviewer, however, had the same curt smile and the same "We'll let you know," and Mrs. George soon realized they really meant, "You're too old."

In January, 1956, a newspaper item about a new employment service for older people changed all that for Mrs. George and many others in the same situation.

The service, now located in the office of the Recreation Center on North George Mason Drive, Arlington, Virginia, was started by a group of 27 women—the Soroptimists International of Arlington County, a women's service club. Their interest in senior citizens began in October, 1954, when at the request of the Recreation Department they agreed to serve refreshments at Silver Age Club meetings. But they soon learned that the Silver Agers wanted more than a cup of punch and a good time on Saturday afternoons. They wanted jobs—and not volunteer jobs either. Some needed money to help pay their taxes on their homes, which Social Security benefits couldn't possibly cover. One member, her income having dwindled since retirement, wanted to be able to continue to contribute to her favorite charities. Another wanted to earn money to pay her bus fare to and from Silver Age meetings. A number wanted something to do. "I looked forward to retirement for so long," one elderly gentleman remarked sadly, "but it's turned out to be pretty monotonous."

Several Silver Agers had left applications at the state employment service. "Over there they consider forty-five a senior citizen," a spry little woman commented. "What chance have you got when you're seventy?"

This was a problem for Mrs. Evelyn Devers, chairman of the Soroptimists' service objectives committee, to solve. She asked three members—Mrs. Pearl Sharpe, a building contractor; Miss Martha Schubmehl, a secretary on Capitol Hill; and Dr. Lois Platt, a cancer researcher—to work with her. Together they called at the office of Carroll Early, manager of the Northern Virginia State Employment Service, for ideas and suggestions.

"We do try to place these older people," he told them. "They make up about four to five per cent of all our applications, but it's largely a matter of getting employers interested—and frankly, we don't have the time to make personal contacts."

"That's where we could make our start," the Soroptimists decided.

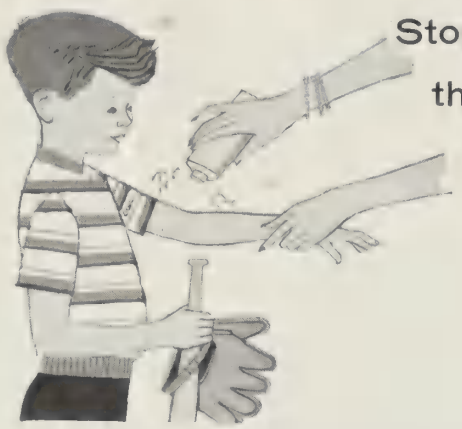
When Evelyn Devers and her committee talked with W. A. Richardson, director of the Recreation Department, about setting up an employment service, he offered them use of a desk and telephone in his offices. That was in October, 1955. With the help of Mr. Early, the Soroptimists drew up an application blank containing information a prospective employer would want. Then they ordered 500 forms printed. Next they began scanning newspaper ads for jobs that elder-agers might fill, including those that stated "not over 40," and called the firms to ask if they would be willing to list their vacancies with the service. Nearly everyone was willing—whenever anything "suitable" came up. Only a few admitted their policy was to hire within a specified age bracket.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 33

IMPORTANT SKIN DISCOVERY FROM JOHNSON & JOHNSON

The first truly effective Medicated Powder

FOR BABY...AND ALL THE FAMILY



For diaper rash, chafing, urine scald

Only powder that clears up and prevents even "problem" diaper rash

New, exclusive Johnson's formula stops not only ordinary diaper rash caused by wet-diaper friction—but sore, difficult ammonia dermatitis.

Clears up rashes completely—prevents their return. Ends ammonia diaper odor, too. No other powder can give your baby this sure, soothing protection.

For heat rash, bites, minor skin irritations

Stops more kinds of skin irritations than any other medicated powder

The special formula contains two antiseptics...clears up really stubborn rashes as well as simple chafing.

And you can feel completely at ease when you use this medicated powder on the baby or children. For it has been hospital-tested, hospital-proved completely safe for the most sensitive skin.

For girdle chafe, feet, underarms

Exclusive absorbent action keeps skin cool, dry—in hottest weather

The moment you smooth on Johnson's Medicated Powder, your skin will feel cooler, more comfortable. Its thirsty absorbing agents dry up moisture fast.

And it's the pleasantest medicated powder you can use. Silky-soft, never gritty—clings gently—smells fresh and clean. Get a can for your family today!

4 ounces, 49¢

NEW Johnson's Medicated Powder

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 31

On January 23, 1956, the Over-60 Employment Service opened officially, with scheduled hours 1:30 to 3:30 on Monday, Wednesday and Friday and staffed by volunteers from the Silver Age Club and by Soroptimists who could leave their jobs or businesses.

During the next month Soroptimists sent out 1500 letters to businessmen on the Chamber of Commerce mailing list. More and more job offers came in—until the volunteers found it hard to keep track of their placements, and complained they couldn't read one another's notes. Mrs. Libby Deaver, director of the Silver Age Club and a Recreation Department worker, found herself shouldering more and more responsibility.

Soroptimists convened a hasty meeting to discuss hiring a permanent part-time manager to take charge of the service. With Mrs. Deaver's concurrence, they decided to ask Mrs. Fannie Vossen, a charter member of the Silver Age Club and a volunteer worker at the employment service, to act as manager. Her salary of $30 a month would be raised through Soroptimist fund-raising projects.

Mrs. Vossen had worked during World War II in the censorship division of the post office in New York City. In recent years she had been living with her son in Arlington. The $30 extra income now meant that Mrs. Vossen could leave her son's crowded household and share a house with a friend.

Shortly after Mrs. Vossen took over in May, the Over-60 Service moved from the Recreation Department building to the new center in an apartment-development neighborhood close to two modern shopping centers and to bus lines.

When Mrs. Vossen first arrives at the office, which she shares with Libby Deaver, supervisor of the center, she looks over the newspaper ads for possible jobs for senior citizens, puts through calls to prospective employers to find out if they would be willing to consider an applicant over 60. At first, some are hesitant. "Can they keep up the pace?" is their first concern. The personnel director at one large department store is one who has come to realize that age limits deprive employers of the qualified workers they need. Arlington County is short of good workers because so many people under 35 are in the armed forces or employed by the Government. "I'm tired of these irresponsible teen-agers," the personnel man who previously had refused to hire anyone over 55 told Mrs. Vossen. "Do you think you could find us two salesladies, a guard and a man for our receiving department?"

Mrs. Vossen immediately began lining up appointments. Her friendly, poised manner ("She has simply bloomed since she took that job," her friends say) often helps reassure the older man and woman sensitive about being unemployed for the first time in their lives. She tries to place people in jobs near their homes whenever possible—though some applicants come from Washington, D.C., and from towns as far as 100 miles away. Applications must be made in person, and references, other than Government service, are checked by telephone when an applicant is being considered for a specific job.

A supervisor at another store which has no age policy does try to fit the older person to the job he can do best, even if it means as many as four transfers. A 62-year-old man hired in the receiving department sometimes had to handle only two packages at a time. But when as many as 70 flooded in, he got a little rattled. This was solved by transferring him to the packaging platform where he is "working circles around his 50-year-old partner," according to his supervisor. The same supervisor discovered the "gift of gab" in another employee past 60 and stationed him at the sidewalk pickup station to pacify impatient customers waiting for their purchases to be sent down from the storerooms.

The manager of a bank, which only recently became interested in hiring older people in an effort to stem high turnover in personnel, follows the same procedure. "Keep the older people away from the pressures of deadline production work, and they do an excellent job."

Through the Over-60 Service this bank employed 65-year-old Mr. Brown, who had retired at 62 after 32 years of Federal Government service, in its stockroom. Mr. Brown's earnings are a welcome supplement to his Government retirement pension, a few investments and the income from his wife's dressmaking.

From May to December, 1956, 42 applicants were placed. Altogether, though, there were 99 applicants and 133 openings—for baby sitters, companions, housekeepers, clerical workers. One young mother called in September to request a baby sitter for New Year's Eve; at Christmas there were four requests for Santa Clauses. Mrs. Vossen explains that many of the job openings could not be filled because some applicants had no means of transportation. A number of the offers were for "live-in" baby care, which few wanted, although one woman did respond to the plight of the father of a six-week-old baby whose mother had to spend several months in a hospital. Some applicants could not be placed because they were hard of hearing. One opened a business of her own.

Many of the jobs, unfortunately, offered ridiculously low pay for the duties involved. And there are practically no offers of professional or executive positions. One attractive, young-looking woman, a former teacher, had followed up a dozen leads without success before coming to the Over-60 Service. Now she is selling in a store—and doesn't like it. Other women, among them former business and professional women, have resigned themselves to baby-sitting. "It seems sometimes," Mrs. Vossen laments, "that employers come to us with jobs nobody else wants."

In her follow-up calls to employers, Mrs. Vossen keeps tab on the progress her "clients" are making. One employer reported that his new clerk was inclined to be "childish" and a little jealous, but made an extra effort to do things right. Sometimes it's hard for an older person, especially one who has formerly been a boss, to take orders from a younger person and do things differently from his accustomed way. But for the most part, employers are well satisfied. One woman with 40 years' experience in bookkeeping systems in insurance companies and mortgage banks now is working part time for a plastics manufacturer, has her own office and chooses her hours. A 65-year-old man who had to give up his contracting business after a back injury, but is still wiry and strong, now is the night manager of a gasoline station, earning $90 a week. For Mrs. Rose Landry, a Silver Age Club member, the service has filled the crushing need to earn enough to live. "You see," she explains to Mrs. Vossen, "when my husband died his pension died with him." She is now taking care of three small children in a motherless home.

Soroptimists understandably are concerned about the future of the Over-60 Service. They feel it should be located in an office all its own and have a full-time director. And they're meeting with other service groups to find out if this can be done. There's certainly no question about continuing interest in the service. Applications are pouring in. A number are even registering several months to a year before their planned retirement in order to have a job waiting for them. END

My code of life and conduct is simply this: work hard, play to the allowable limit; disregard equally the good and bad opinion of others; never do a friend a dirty trick; never grow indignant over anything; live the moment to the utmost of its possibilities; and be satisfied with life always, but never with oneself.

GEORGE JEAN NATHAN Testament of a Critic
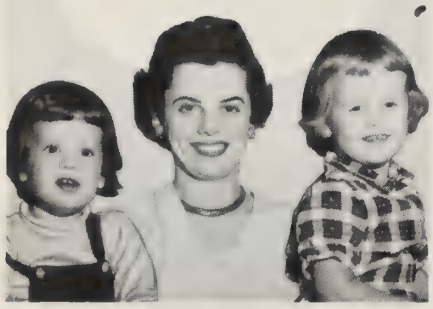
Published by Alfred A. Knopf, Inc.

Unretouched photo of Jan Rylander, St. James, L. I. (See her pretty face below.)

GOOD HOUSEKEEPING MAGAZINE proved in its famous testing laboratory: New Woodbury Shampoo holds curl better, keeps set longer! Example shown above: Left side of Jan's hair, washed with her usual shampoo, got limp, straggly. Right side, washed with Woodbury, is springy, curly, beautifully manageable.



Leading shampoos were tested this way on hundreds of women. Results show New Woodbury, with its curl-keeping ingredient, holds waves best. Protects hair from drying out – leaves it shiny-clean, without dulling soap film.

Costs less than other leading brands. And right now, for a limited time, the big $1 size is only 59¢. If you don't agree Woodbury is the finest shampoo you ever tried, we'll return your money.

WOODBURY HOLDS CURL BETTER, KEEPS SET LONGER

"It's easy to give accurate dosage with St. Joseph Aspirin For Children" says MRS. WILLARD SMITH, Detroit, Mich.

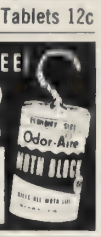
St. Joseph Aspirin For Children makes it easy on both mother and child. It's easy to give dosage "just as the doctor orders", no cutting or breaking is necessary, you simply count out the number of tablets prescribed. More mothers trust this specialized tablet, more children like its pure orange flavor, it's America's mother and child favorite! Approved by more doctors than any other brand.



World's Largest Selling Aspirin For Children

200 Tablets 79c • 100 Tablets 49c • 12 Tablets 12c

$1,000.00 INSURED GUARANTEE CLOTHING REPLACED
IF DAMAGED BY MOTHS
Odor-Aire Moth Blocks, Nuggets & Crystals; Bowl Clean; Bathroom Deodorant; Roach Block; Mildew Block; Insect Block; Diaper Pail Deodorizer; Garbage Block.

FREE! Beautiful Christmas GIFT WRAPS
Get YOURS! A gay collection of 18 handsome sheets for Gift packages. Will be sent entirely FREE! Also get details on Sunshine Plan to earn . . .
BIG Sums of EXTRA MONEY

You'll have fun . . . and you'll delight your friends and neighbors when you show the beautiful SUNSHINE SUPER-VALUE PERSONALIZED CHRISTMAS CARDS . . . full-color cards with names imprinted, costing only a little more than 3c per card and envelope! Many other exclusive Sunshine Christmas Card Assortments—at astonishing low prices that mean quick sales, BIG EARNINGS for you! Write TODAY for your free Christmas Gift Wraps and the Kit with all details on the Sunshine Plan.

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

SUNSHINE ART STUDIOS, INC.
70 Warwick St., Springfield 1, Mass. • Pasadena 1, Calif.

New Way To Sell Christmas Cards...
EASY WAY TO MAKE $100

9 Ways To Make $1 Per Box
Show friends FREE Samples of 62 gorgeous new Christmas Cards. Give discounts when ordered without name imprinted, yet you make full profit—$100 profit on 100 boxes. 250 Card and Gift Shop Novelties pay you up to 50c on every $1; CASH BONUS besides! No-risk Money-Back Guarantee assures you up to 20c more profit per box. No experience needed. Get FREE Album, best Assortments on approval and offer of $1.25 gift FREE for prompt action.
Mail Coupon TODAY!

EXCLUSIVE! Sell original designs shown nowhere else, low as 40 for $1.25.

CARDINAL CRAFTSMEN, Dept. 37-B
1400 State Ave., Cincinnati 14, Ohio
Please send exclusive samples on approval with FREE Album and "TINY TV" prompt action offer.
Name .....
Address .....
City ..... State .....

"TINY TV" Salt & Pepper Console FREE For Prompt Action

THERE'S A MAN IN THE HOUSE

By HARLAN MILLER

"What do you mean, didn't I get anything done today? I got everything done at least twelve times!"

"I suppose the routine morning-and-evening husband-wife kisses are O.K.," muses Betty Comfort, frowning in perplexity at the power lawn mower, "as a regular token of affection. But I think the unexpected kiss is more convincing."

Too many of our friends seem tangled in exaggerated private anxieties, their reverse-English 1957 daydreams. "Their tiger hiding behind the potted palm," our local psychiatrist calls it. (Our braver friends make a pet of this animal.)

One or two of my Dream Girl's chums are so utterly vivacious, so overwhelmingly animated, that I'm tempted to slip 'em a tranquilizer before I confront 'em conversationally.

Even our town's more arrogant males concede it's the women who import the culture inside our city limits. In one suburb the Great Books club includes sixteen housewives, only one businessman.

Stop me if I've mentioned the fifty-foot lot before; I think it's a corset on modern life. Myself, I'd give up a crowded barbecue terrace or even a swimming pool in favor of a hundred-foot lot, or bigger.

It's neighborhood gossip: The father in the house with the turquoise awnings successfully insults every young man who calls on his only daughter. "If you make me a spinster," she warns him, "I'll give you no grandchildren!"

My neighbor who owns a house on a Florida beach tells me life's rugged down there. "Every week or two," he says, "I have to spray the encrusted salt off our TV aerial."

At our town's biggest supermarket, the manager tells me, one customer's shopping check in every ten adds up to $25 or more. "Usually," he explains, "they're the ones where the aroused husband comes along to teach his wife how to economize on groceries."

I've stumbled on a new, sure-fire way to end a quarrel with my Princess of Sheer Delight: I remind her of a romantic evening when we backed out of her garage through a closed garage door. Could we have been necking?

"Another way I recognize a gentleman," muses Peter Comfort, moving the sprinkler toward his wife's favorite plants, "is that he ranks people high instead of low. Till they betray themselves, anyhow."

At a party I cornered a glamorous local disk jockey and chided him for playing a fifteen-hour all-Elvis program. He promised me to play a program of 100 different versions of Stardust.

When Marquis Childs, the columnist, came to our house recently I noticed his resemblance to Jack Benny. "Yes," he said sadly, "when a stranger asks me for an autograph I sign 'Your dream man, Jack Benny,' and try to collect a quarter."

After eating one of those fried-chicken dinners they deliver in twenty minutes after a phone call, I'm positive somebody'll get rich someday delivering tasty diet dinners, not quite so greasy.

Love across the Pacific's dateline: A cablegram to Junior in Japan on a Thursday that newborn Harlan III had landed reached him Friday in a plane 900 miles offshore. He phoned back on Saturday from his air base in Japan, reached his wife on a Friday in the States, the day before.

One of our town's tycoons who thinks he resembles Greg Peck gets his suits cleaned after each wearing. His wife estimates indignantly that if he wore 'em three times he could buy her a mink coat in eight years.

I've promised my Dream Girl not to be so nervous about the poison ivy around her vegetable garden if she'll relax about garter snakes, upon my oath that they're harmless. When they flick their tongues she thinks it's a nest of cobras in our old cistern.

At lunch we exchanged brags about the magical teachers we had in the fifth grade. After the pie à la mode we wound up pledged to organize an annual Teacher's Day, celebrated like Mother's Day and Father's Day, sentimentally, with gifts.

Whenever I visit Florida or California I'm convinced people up North ought to paint their houses brighter colors. A few of the younger people do; it's their elders who need the cheerful tints.

Our town's oldest obstetrician is impatient with expectant families who go to pieces waiting the last two weeks for a new baby to arrive. "Do they want the poor brat," he asks, "to arrive underdone in this frigid world?"

Often when I turn off the radio in the middle of an irritating tune, or terminate TV in the middle of a boring skit, the silence has the lovely quality of a Bach sonata.

We've talked for years of revolving shelves in the awkward corner cupboards of our kitchen, where we bend and squat and poke into far dark corners so peevishly. I've bet my wife a necktie to a new hat we get it done this year.

A proud gramp down the block showed me a letter written by his daughter-in-law he accidentally saw. "Our baby is now very handsome," she wrote. "At first he looked like his grandpa, but now he resembles his father."

On the country-club terrace the girls were overheard compiling a list of the town's ten most eligible bachelors, till one girl crimped it. "An eligible bachelor gets that way," she said, "because girls can't stand to date him more than once."

My wife read me aloud that the average house now has thirty electrical appliances. Why doesn't our high school eliminate one or two of its courses, offer instead training in household repair and maintenance?

One of our morbid border-line patriarchs thinks retirement is murder if it's compulsory, suicide if it's voluntary. Our mail carrier thinks if a man's smart enough to enjoy retirement, he's smart enough to hold down a good job.

If the people along Main Street (like the folks on the Appian Way) are ever the same age, maybe it's because they keep meeting schoolmates of twenty years ago who tell 'em they haven't changed an iota.

. . . When our youngest inevitably O.K.'s my favorite necktie by adopting it as his own,

. . . Or my son-in-law says my muscles are remarkable for a man of my age,

. . . And Junior offers to buy me a bush jacket if I'll visit him in Japan,

. . . Or my Dream Girl comes up after all these years with tinned potato pancakes,

Then I'm glad I'm not an eligible bachelor, just a defensive husband, a pleasanter role.

Such delicate color and softness . . . in the luxurious velvet-banded silk net negligee specially designed for Scott . . . in the luxurious matching Soft-Weve—Scott's superb "facial quality" 2-ply bath tissue. Choose from five exquisite Soft-Weve colors to complement your bath or powder room.

Probably the most noticed luxury in your home...

Soft-Weve® by Scott

MAKING MARRIAGE WORK

"Don't husbands have any responsibility?"

By CLIFFORD R. ADAMS, Ph.D.
Pennsylvania State University, Department of Psychology

FOR HUSBANDS ONLY

Each month my mail includes several letters along familiar lines—I always "take the husband's side," or "blame the wife for whatever is wrong." A recent article about a husband's brutality produced a record-breaking number of such protests. Because I suggested ways the wife might avoid arousing her husband's temper, and so protect herself, my critics complained that my counsel is always directed to the wife, no matter who is to blame. "Don't husbands have any responsibility?"

Of course they do. No wife, however conscientious, devoted and perceptive, can achieve a happy marriage without her husband's co-operation.

But the counselor can accomplish little by sympathizing or assessing blame. He tries to help his clients find ways to improve the situation, or adjust to it, no matter who is responsible.

When all the facts about a critical marriage problem are known, it is usually clear that neither party is wholly to blame, or wholly innocent. Occasionally, however, an exception comes along, in which the guilt is obviously one-sided. Mrs. Osborne's experience is an example.

She first consulted me over two years ago, in great distress because her husband had abruptly demanded a divorce. He made no accusations, but said he didn't love her, and wanted his freedom while he was young enough (36) to find happiness with another woman.

She agreed their marriage wasn't perfect—"How many are?"—but she loved her husband and had worked hard to make a happy home for him and their three children.

For about six months we played for time, hoping he would change his mind. Then he renewed his demands, offering a substantial settlement if immediate action was taken, but warning that further delay would alter his attitude. To safeguard the children's financial welfare, the wife reluctantly accepted his offer. She and the children moved to another city.

The next months weren't easy. She missed her husband, despite his indifference and lack of appreciation. However, she found part-time work in her own profession, and has done a splendid job of rebuilding a life for herself and her children.

After the decree became final, the family had no contact with the husband except for occasional notes to the children and a short visit Christmas Day. Then two months ago he asked to see her, and she agreed. Here is her account of what happened:

"He asked me to marry him! He said when he dated women his own age he found himself wondering why they weren't married, and when he dated younger girls, they seemed too childish. He said he'd learned there is more to marriage than he had realized, that he really needed me, felt we could now make a success of marriage. He wanted a companion, a home and his children. I told him we both needed time to think it over."

We discussed the pros and cons. She said it was a temptation to accept, but she had to think it through. I agreed.

Yesterday she came in to tell me her decision. "I've made up my mind not to marry him. He doesn't love me any more than he ever did and I'm no longer interested in a marriage for his convenience. I've spent two years getting used to the situation he created, and making a life for myself and my children. I don't want to risk facing the same thing all over again. I'm sorry for him, but I no longer love him. If we couldn't make our marriage work when I loved him, how can we hope to now?"

Mrs. Osborne did her utmost to achieve a successful marriage. Now she has made a satisfactory adjustment to a divorce she didn't want. Her husband has done neither. Husbands (and wives) can understand the point, without comment from me.

PICKING UP THE PIECES

"I was to have been married a week ago today. Just six days before the wedding, my fiancé called and said it was all off. He'd become so involved with a girl he'd met just two months ago that the only fair thing was to cancel the wedding. What could I do? My mother canceled the arrangements and we left for a short trip while I tried to pull myself together.

"Now we're back, and I dread facing people. Everybody's sorry for me, and I'm sorry for myself. We'd been engaged since I graduated from college a year ago, after dating for three months. I know you can't help me, but can you help me help myself? All I have left is a sense of failure. I resigned my job to get ready for the wedding. Shall I go back to it, or find work in another city? Somehow I have to pick up the pieces and go on living."

Broken engagements are not unusual. Though never a pleasant experience, in nearly half the cases both members of the couple are able to accept the situation without serious difficulty for either. Understandably, the girl is more likely to suffer than the man, particularly when, as in this case, it was he alone who made the decision. Then she is almost certain to feel that she is unwanted and a failure.

The first step toward recovery is to recognize the truth—she has done nothing to be ashamed of, to hide or to regret. It was not she who broke a promise, who postponed a vital decision till the eleventh hour. Her error was one of judgment in trusting a person who didn't deserve it.

This man's behavior shows that he is too callous, irresponsible and uncertain of his own feelings to be a good risk as a husband. Perhaps even now the girl is beginning to realize that she is better off without him. But she is left without occupation for the present, plans for the future, or diversion to take her mind off the situation. The sooner she can fill in some of these gaps, the more quickly she will regain a wholesome outlook. Here are some suggestions, directed specifically to her, but adaptable to other girls in similar plight. She should:

- Get busy. A demanding, useful job will leave little time for brooding, and will bolster self-confidence. She would be wise to return to her former job at once, avoiding the additional strain of adapting to new associates and unfamiliar surroundings.
- Get back in circulation. It may be necessary for her to take the initiative by telephoning a few friends, since they, too, may feel diffident about approaching her. As invitations are extended, she should accept and reciprocate.
- Postpone major decisions and long-term plans. This is not the time to set out on unfamiliar paths. For the present, she is almost certainly better off in her home community than in a strange city.
- Accept dates, but regard them as opportunities for companionship and recreation, not romance. She should be slow to form a serious attachment, lest she react on the rebound. A long engagement following a short acquaintance ended in disappointment, as is often the case. She, or any girl, will do better to reverse the procedure.

Her broken engagement was a painful experience. But it undoubtedly spared her the greater ordeal of a broken or unhappy marriage. She knows that a man she thought acceptable once wanted to marry her. She can be confident that she will meet others, better qualified, who will feel the same way.

DO YOU AGREE?

At what stage in breaking up the marriage is a wife most upset?

The time when the couple finally separates.

ASK YOURSELF:

Is My Husband Provoking?

The questions below concern shortcomings common to many husbands, and annoying to many wives. Answer "Yes" to each one that reflects a type of action which is a habit with your husband, and a source of irritation to you.

Does Your Husband:

1. Forget errands he promised to do?
2. Grumble nastily when meals are unavoidably delayed?
3. Drop cigarette ashes heedlessly?
4. Dole out household money grudgingly?
5. Talk loudly or shout unnecessarily?
6. Twist your words to mean something else?
7. Leave his belongings scattered around?
8. Keep talking when he has nothing to say?
9. Insist that every nickel be accounted for?
10. Have an excuse for his every mistake?
11. Criticize you when things go wrong?
12. Expect you to wake him most mornings?
13. Conveniently "forget" needed home repairs?
14. Ignore a ringing telephone?

Not one husband in a hundred has a perfect score, and half of all college wives answer "Yes" to at least six of these questions. If you give your husband as many as ten "No" answers, count yourself lucky—he is a rare jewel. But if you think he has too many "yeses," ask yourself if you are overcritical—or what little habits you have that annoy him.

Avon invites you to a fragrance try-on

"Avon Calling" means selecting cosmetics and fragrances at home, with the help of your Avon Representative.

It's new . . . this Avon way of trying on fragrances in your own home, to be sure they're becoming! Avon makes selection so easy and pleasant by enabling you to explore the world of fine fragrances until you discover the ones you like best. Seven scents to choose from . . . each different . . . all delightful . . . all distinctively Avon. When your Avon Representative calls, she will invite you to a fragrance try-on. You'll enjoy it!

IF YOU WISH AN AVON REPRESENTATIVE TO CALL, PLEASE CONSULT YOUR PHONE DIRECTORY.

© AVON cosmetics

RADIO CITY, NEW YORK

AVAILABLE ONLY THROUGH YOUR AVON REPRESENTATIVE WHO CALLS AT YOUR HOME

COPYRIGHT 1952, AVON PRODUCTS, INC.

Discovery!

Discovery!

Feminine Fabric

sheerest luxury . . . . perfected protection make New Modess your own discovery this month

Modess . . . . because

You're Prettier than you think you are!

...and you can prove it with a Palmolive bar!

Here's Proof that Mild and Gentle Palmolive Care Cleans Cleaner, Deeper, Prettier!

When you wash with your regular soap—in the ordinary, casual way—you leave hidden dirt behind that hides the prettiness of your complexion. But what a glorious difference after a 60-second Palmolive massage! You'll look fresher, lovelier! And to prove that hidden dirt is gone, rub with a tissue. The tissue will stay snowy-white . . . proof that Palmolive care cleans cleaner, deeper, prettier!

Be Palmolive Sweet and Clean All Over It's Wonderful for the Bath!

Yes—new complexion beauty is yours in just one minute with Palmolive Soap. Because Palmolive care removes beauty-robbing hidden dirt that casual cleansing misses. And only a soap as mild as Palmolive can cleanse so deeply without irritation. Start Palmolive care today, and see your true complexion beauty come through!

Journal ABOUT TOWN

Gossip about people you know, editors you like, and what goes on in New York

FIFTY YEARS AGO IN THE JOURNAL

Feminine hearts beat faster in July, 1907, when Enrico Caruso sang Love's Pleading. Small boys wore knee-length dresses called Russian tunics and little girls played in ruffled white lawn aprons. On their open porches on hot summer evenings, families sang By the Light of the Silvery Moon and played Diabolo. Pres. Teddy Roosevelt, who timed his antitrust, anti-railroad bombshells to explode every Monday morning, exulted, "The White House is a bully pulpit."

A reader asks Editor Bok in the July, 1907, JOURNAL, "Why do you not attack some of the great evils of today, like cigarette smoking, drinking, Mormonism, tight lacing, theatergoing and card playing, just as you attacked patent medicines." Answers Bok, "We are not in the attacking business."

"Bathing Without a Bathroom" mentions many ingenious methods of taking a bath, with tubs of papier-mâché or tin, folding rubber baths, sitz baths, or sponge baths with water heated over an alcohol lamp. The writer concludes that no baths can equal in fascination "those gambols under the hard pelting of a warm summer rain."

"I want a pattern for a silk bathing suit," requests a reader who signs herself Great Expectations. Replies Mrs. Ralston, "Silk, you know, is treacherous and does not wear as well as mohair. Be sure and choose a dark, gunmetal color.

"Can I dye a pair of white canvas shoes to match a new lavender evening gown?" Answer: "No, but you can paint them with any good water color."

"A woman fortunate enough to own a gas range can eliminate much heat from her kitchen in the summer, but for the majority of housewives a gas stove is out of the question."

"How to Shake Hands: Some hands feel like a dead thing, others by overcordiality inflict torture, while others are impertinent in giving too lingering a pressure," believes Mrs. Kingsland, manners expert.

"A bon-voyage luncheon for friends going abroad: For the center of the table have a large mirror set in a bed of water cress and smilax. Serve bonbons in little steamboats floating on the mirror, and ices in papier-mâché globes."

HARRINGTON HARLOW

Manhattan's steel-lined sky line during a summer thunderstorm creates a spectacular picture; but it's safer to be in one of the buildings than at home.

This is thunder-and-lightning month here in New York, and we are ready with a brief report. First, forget about lightning never striking more than once in the same place. Why, last summer it struck the building next door seventeen times and the Empire State Building forty-eight, though nobody in either building felt it. In fact, with all this steel to dissipate the charge, Cynthia Wheatland is safer here at her desk by the window than one of her JOURNAL fans crouching on a feather bed in the country. Which brings us to this exciting photograph of a flash over Manhattan taken by a lawyer friend of ours from his window in New York Hospital while recuperating last July, with his camera at his bedside. One prong is striking the poor old Empire State Building again, another our building. And as for thunder turning milk sour, don't believe a word of it, said Sally Platt when we appealed to her as a specialist. "To turn a cup of milk sour," she said, "simply add a tablespoonful of vinegar."

As the final installment of The Durable Fire was being prepared for this issue, word came of Howard Swiggett's death. Just a week before, his novel had been made the Book of the Month selection for June, one of the last pieces of news Howard heard. . . . An alternate selection for June, suggested for its "superabundance of perfect summer reading," is the Ladies' Home Journal Treasury, edited by John Mason Brown*. "I never knew a book about a magazine to get such bright and gay reviews from the newspapers," Mr. B. exclaimed happily here the other day. "As packed with variety as a woman's pocketbook," quipped the New York Times, while the Atlanta Journal-Constitution observed, "Women will enjoy reading it immensely—after their husbands lay it aside."*

"Here are some snaps I took on the Libyan Desert back in February," Phil Stern told Tina Fredericks a few days after he returned in May from months of photographing in North Africa. "Ran into John Wayne doing a film called Legend of the Lost, starring Sophia Loren. The temperature was over a hundred and ten degrees, and the only shade in sight was under the copy of the January LADIES' HOME JOURNAL which Sophia was holding over her head. Thought you might be amused—you know, it's her favorite American magazine, now that she's learned to read English"

PHIL STERN-GLOBE PHOTOS

Sophia Loren puts the Journal to a new use.

Two readers who now realize by what an infinite process of selection we arrive here at the picture essence of a story are Judy Dorlester and Steve Ambrose, the principals in this month's How America Lives piece. A week or so after they'd been extensively photographed and interviewed on the Wisconsin campus by Abbot Mills, they paid a visit to the Workshop, where in the picture department with Abbot they looked at the pages Florence Sweet was pasting up. "Say, Abbot, how many pictures was it you took of us out there!" Judy exclaimed, counting the pictures on the layouts. Abbot guessed about 800, explaining that though many are taken, few are chosen. In this case a higher percentage than most. Out of 800, nine. You can count them yourself.

The day after Charles van Doren was dethroned on the Twenty-One program by Mrs. Nearing, we had the pleasure of meeting the Belgian Baroness Moens de Fernig at luncheon with Mary Bass in the Entertainment Room upstairs. The baroness was here with her husband, who is commissioner general of the world's fair to be held in Brussels next summer to celebrate the atomic age, and she showed us pictures of the United States pavilion, a simply enormous cylinder of glass, very atomic indeed, designed by Edward D. Stone, the architect of many JOURNAL houses, the baroness was interested to hear. It was Mary Bass who asked the baroness if she'd heard that the King of Belgium had caused the downfall of Van Doren when Charles said "Leopold" instead of "Baudouin." "Oh, yes," she laughed, "and we've already invited him to come over and meet the king, a charming young man himself. But Charles had made other plans. He was getting married."

JOSEPH DI PIETRO

Mary Bass and the baroness get a bird's-eye view of the town.

Author-photographer Abbot Mills (left) with H.A.L.'ers.

AUDREY SALISBURY

Everyone froze

for a second.

Then Ruth said in a low, angry voice,

"Get out of here!"

CAPTIVE

What do you do when you suddenly realize that the nightmare is real . . . that the impossible has happened and you are right there in the middle of it NOW?

By THE GORDONS

FIRST OF TWO PARTS

He was a rugged, limber man in his mid-thirties whose bluff good looks were drying up from too much sun and wind. The land was sweaty hot about him, and the acrid smell of gunpowder fused with thousands of particles of red dust, suspended in the still air, to smart his nostrils.

The explosion of a .45 cracked and shook the quiet and reverberated until it lost itself. The strip of red mesa pasted across the far horizon wavered, and his chest was a caldron that burned out the scream, rising from deep down. His gun arm shook as he struggled to squeeze the trigger in answer. But his body no longer obeyed, and he sagged forward. His thought then was of a woman, a woman called Anne Hayes, who two hours before had put up a carton of hot coffee for him back in the little mountain town of Flagstaff, Arizona.

Shortly before seven, he had driven into Flagstaff. He pulled into a vacant lot behind the Pueblo Bank and parked under a lone light that shone ineffectually on a barred door. He slid his tight, faded Levis across the seat, and climbed out. He was wearing a lumberjack's shirt open at the collar, a battered Stetson, and well-hacked boots. His name was Clayton Jackson, but no one had ever called him Clayton except his mother.

A man emerged from the shadows, in his twenties, hair cut short, with a ready-for-anything look. He took a tug at a wide black gun belt, fitted with cartridges. A holstered .45 rode on his hip, like a part of him. He said nothing.

"Harya, Jim," Clay greeted. "Been waitin' long?"

"Not long," Jim answered. He was wearing dark green trousers and shirt, and on his left shoulder was an insigne that read: NAVAHO POLICE.

Clay continued, "Skinned off a retread on the way in. Had to pick me up another."

Jim nodded. English did not come easy for him, although when he tried he could speak it like a white man. His full name was Jim Begay.

He knocked on the bank's back door as Clay turned back to the car and honked twice, glancing across the street to an all-night café whose lights still burned. A sign read simply: ANNE'S. A woman hurried to the door, waved happily and called, "O.K., Clay," in a husky voice.

Humming to herself, she turned toward an old-fashioned, nickel-plated coffee urn that was burping. She was blond, full-lipped, not too young, not too slender, with a face reminiscent of the flowers in the glass behind the counter, full-blown and faded but not yet ready for discard.

She drew the coffee into a carton, and dumped in sugar and cream. The phone ring startled her. She wiped her hands hurriedly before answering.

In the bank, Charlie Frazier counted the bills jerkily. Everything he did he did fast, whether he had to or not. Twenty-one years of working as a teller in a little cage for the same bank, with the same faces bobbing before him and saying the same words, had worked him into a nervous state in which he could scarcely quiet his body to sleep. Yet his eyes were still clear behind his horn-rimmed glasses, and time had been frugal with the wrinkles.

He droned off a list of names: Uranium Exploration, $16,700; Garson Steel, $7900; Red Butte Trading Post, $3700; Big Wash Trading Post, $3400; Bekihatso Trading Post, $4100; and so on. The total came to $62,700. Clay stuffed it into a moneybag as though it were so much newspaper.

Charlie hastened to open the back door, and the rusty, screeching bars that protected it. "Tell the trader at Tonalea my wife wants a couple saddle blankets next time he gets some in."

Clay nodded.

As the three emerged from the back door, Anne walked toward them with the carton. Jim Begay smiled for the first time. "Hello, Miss Hayes."

"Hi, Jim. How's the baby?"

"He's fine, Miss Hayes."

Clay said, "Much obliged, honey," as he took the carton, then opened the back trunk and tossed the moneybag inside.

Charlie's eyes stayed with Anne until she moved uncomfortably, then he grinned at Clay. "Why don't you two get married?"

"She hasn't asked me," Clay answered.

"I have, too," Anne retorted.

Clay and Jim Begay took Highway 66 east out of town, past motels and steak houses and lumber mills. Smoke from sawdust burning in the giant beehives alongside the mills mixed with the scent of pine woods, and Clay took a deep breath, relishing it.

They turned north on Highway 89, Clay gunning the car through towering pines, past a marker pointing to Sunset Crater, an extinct volcano, and at last breasting the summit at 7250 feet, and dropping until the trees grew scrubby and then ran out. After that, miles of nothing except the gas station that was Deep Wells and the trading post known as Gray Mountain, topping a black plateau. They came then to a slight rise and looked out over a pink land of mesas and gorges that stretched out to turquoise skies, a land brilliant in the yellow glare of the rising sun, a lonesome country without sign of man or habitation.

"Geminy," Clay said, "I never see it I don't get a bang out of it."

Jim nodded soberly. "It won't be around like this much longer."

"Nope, I reckon not."

"I keep thinking ——" His words drifted away.

"Same here. Maybe it'd been better if they'd never found uranium."

Jim sat thoughtful a moment, then said quietly, "This is the finish for The People. The white man's going to absorb us." He added dryly, "I CONTINUED ON PAGE 117

© 1957 by Mildred and Gordon Gordon

They baffled him. frightened him. infuriated him ... and he couldn't

But they belonged to the woman he loved.

THE JOURNAL'S COMPLETE NOVELETTE

By LUCY CORES

Mr. Willing swallowed two red pills and took rapid stock of himself, as he always did when four o'clock came around. Everything considered, he was in not too bad shape. The migraine brought on at lunchtime by being slapped on the back by an overhearty author seemed to be receding. He could now lift the arm that was afflicted by bursitis a little higher; pretty soon he would be able to type his own letters and not have to use Miss de Vries, who was a good secretary but who embarrassed him by yearning at him. Mr. Willing didn't care to be yearned over even if he was a sick man. Unfortunately, his rather pale mournful face with its forelock of fair hair had a quality of sweetness that made rebuffs ineffective. Among the secretarial staff of his magazine, Mr. Willing was known as a living doll.

He ticked off the last name on his appointment pad, took another pill—a yellow one—and was ready for his interview with C. Massey, whose mystery novel they were considering serializing.

Ten minutes later he found himself falling in love. Miss de Vries, who always worried about Mr. Willing's falling prey to one of those bold and spectacular lady novelists, hadn't even a premonition about C. Massey, who turned out to be a slim, dark-haired woman in her thirties, not at all spectacular.

But Mr. Willing, who had just turned forty, had, unlike many of his contemporaries, no special penchant for loud glamour. The slinky young glamourpusses on the magazine staff unnerved him. He preferred precisely the sort of quality that Cristine Massey had: that of subdued charm, and the gentler sort of sophistication.

"Very nice indeed," said Mr. Willing. He was referring to the manuscript before him. "Your first, I understand."

"My first mystery novel." Her voice was both soft and clear. "I have written articles in collaboration with my husband when he was alive."

Mr. Willing, murmuring regrets, felt his spirits rise unaccountably. He went on discussing the manuscript with his usual competence. But there was something pleasantly disturbing about the proximity of this latest author: the faint clean perfume of her, the way a few black tendrils curled at the nape of her neck, the droll way her eyebrows slanted when she smiled. She had long sooty eyelashes which imparted a certain velvety quality to her blue eyes, so that whenever she looked at him, he felt as if he were being stroked. When the interview was over, he was conscious of downright panic. Hastily he suggested further discussion over dinner this very evening and was absurdly relieved when she accepted.

"I hope you like this restaurant I'm taking you to," he told her, as they left the office. His hold on her elbow tightened tenderly. Though she wasn't very tall, she matched her stride to his, making their progress a harmonious affair, unlike the jerky unassorted motion of less well-matched couples. "It has good Provençal cooking and very considerate proprietors— always go there. It's quite near, but perhaps I ought to call a cab; it's starting to rain and you have no rubbers."

"Oh, I never catch colds."

Mr. Willing gave her a sad, incredulous smile as he hailed a cab. In his experience, people always said that until it was too late. He himself took no chances, and kept a pair of rubbers and an umbrella in his office at all times. "The colds I catch," he told her, as he handed her into the cab, favoring the arm with the bursitis, "are unbelievably savage."

At Chez Michaud Mr. Willing noted fondly that his guest had a healthy appetite as well as a discriminating palate. She ordered escargots, onion soup, filet mignon. He himself asked for his usual Melba toast and boiled chicken.

"Unfortunately," he explained, in response to her questioning gaze, "I am not allowed to eat after the fashion of mankind. Nothing important—a small friendly ulcer."

"I am so sorry." She really sounded sorry, her eyes widening at the multicolored array of pills he scattered on the table before settling down to his meal. Mr. Willing sighed.

"I must be making a terrible impression on you. A complete crock."

His newest author met his rueful eye gravely, though a small shadowy dimple formed by the corner of her mouth. "On the contrary," she said. "Everything considered, you strike me as a fine figure of a man."

Altogether it turned out to be a totally delightful dinner, over far too soon, he thought as he took her to the station to catch a train to Ellendale, the small town in Connecticut where she lived—at a commuting distance from New York, he learned gratefully.

"When shall I see you again?" he asked her. "Are you coming in soon? Next week, perhaps?"

"Well ——" She looked doubtful and he was conscious of an absurdly fierce pang of tell them apart.

disappointment. "You see, my daughter Marnie is just coming in from college ——"

"You have a daughter old enough to go to college?"

"Yes—it's her first year. . . . Thank you for the flattering astonishment." There was laughter in her voice. "I had Marnie at nineteen—and she's eighteen now."

"A wonderful age," said Mr. Willing heartily. He was thinking that if Cristine Massey had a daughter it was nice that she was old enough to go to college, leaving her mother comparatively free. "Won't you be able to get away for dinner at all?"

"Yes—but I don't think I'll have time to make any of the revisions you suggested."

"I am not talking in my editorial capacity now," Mr. Willing assured her.

"Oh. Oh, then I'd love to, next Thursday."

In the weeks that followed Mr. Willing contrived to see a great deal of Cristine Massey, and not in his editorial capacity. They went to concerts and plays—finding happily a delightful community of tastes wherever they went—or just spent their evenings in conversation. Cristine was one of those rare women who would rather talk about

CONTINUED ON PAGE 92

THE

PIX

PHIL BURCHMAN

At home with Prince Charles and her family, Queen Elizabeth uses jewels with the restraint shown by any well-bred Englishwoman. Three strands of pearls, small pearl stud earrings and a handsome brooch are her usual choice for the rare days of privacy.

As a tiny princess, Elizabeth (left) wore a little necklace of coral. It has now been passed on to her daughter Anne (right).

Queen Elizabeth's latest official photograph. She wears the riband and star of the Order of the Garter adorned at the shoulder by her favorite diamond bow brooch, a gift from Queen Mary. The famous diamond-and-emerald tiara and necklace were also inheritances from her grandmother. The flawless emeralds, won in a charity lottery by her great-great-grandmother, have been handed down in the family.

COMBINE PHOTOS

For semiformal public occasions such as the Ascot races, the queen often chooses a four-strand pearl necklace, little pearl earrings and a large diamond clip. She is said to have twenty sets of pearls from which to choose, and hundreds of diamond brooches, jeweled clips.

At home Margaret likes to wear turquoises because they match her intensely blue eyes. But for official photographs and formal public events, she must wear precious stones. Here, with a filmy evening dress, she wears diamond necklace and earrings, and wide diamond bracelet.

PHIL BURCHMAN

Princess Margaret, noted for her sense of style, is particularly fond of this large rose-topaz brooch, and often chooses it for semiformal daytime occasions. With it she wears five strands of precious Oriental pearls.

COMBINE PHOTOS

For evening dress Margaret, like Elizabeth, often wears diamonds. When the sisters appear together in public Margaret's jewels are invariably simpler than those of the queen. But they are as real.

WIDE WORLD

WORLD'S MOST FABULOUS JEWELS

Pearls for daytime, diamonds for evening, emeralds and rubies for those very special occasions when a woman should look her best—the ladies of the British royal family together own the most dazzling jewel collection in the world today. By PETER BRIGGS AND MARGARET PARTON

COMBINE PHOTOS

Three-strand pearls to visit a hospital or christen a ship. With them the queen chooses a flower brooch of rare jewels, small pearl earrings and one of her favorite tiny wrist watches.

Queen Elizabeth is the personal owner of one of the greatest—and possibly the greatest—jewel collections in the world today. She has emeralds the color of mountain pools at sunrise, sapphires like the ocean at high noon, pearls shining with the luster of a creamy sunset, diamonds glittering with the icy fire of the Snow Queen's palace—and she has lots and lots and lots of them. So have the Queen Mother, Princess Margaret, and all the women of Great Britain's royal Windsor family.

Probably only the family and the Keeper of the Royal Jewels know the full extent of the collection, for royal wills are private and many of the pieces have been inherited. The gems, only a few of which have ever been seen by the public or photographed, have never been appraised. The collection is not insured, and is held simply as a "crown risk." Entirely separate from the Crown Jewels, which belong to the nation rather than to the royal family, its extent and value remain a family secret. Most jewelers, unable to examine the stones, refuse even to guess at the collection's value, although one estimated it might be $150,000,000. This is merely speculation, since many of the gems have never been on the market; others have such great historic value that, like the Crown Jewels, they are beyond price.

This royal collection is perfectly in keeping with a tradition which has existed since human beings first decided kings and queens were a good idea. From the beginning of time royalty has amassed jewels, either for their value (you can flee for your life with a couple of diamonds clutched in the non-sword hand), their beauty or their magic properties. Royal Roman matrons, who seem to have had considerable marriage trouble, prized diamonds because they were thought to enhance the love of a man for his wife, and amethysts because they were believed to preserve the affection of husbands.

Renaissance kings believed that the ruby would reconcile disputes and bring about peace and concord. When they trotted off to war they wore a turquoise on their left arm, believing that it would protect them from injury by falling, particularly from horseback. It is doubtful whether Elizabeth, who has never been known to fall off a horse, values her jewels for these reasons. But it is no secret that she knows a good gem when she sees it, and will wear nothing less than perfect.

In this she apparently takes after her red-wigged ancestor, Queen Elizabeth I, who had a passion for pearls (despite the fact that according to the old lore they were emblems of the un-Elizabethan virtues of purity and modesty). Sailors like Sir Francis Drake kept a sharp lookout on her behalf for good pearls as well as Spanish galleons and new he queen mother has perhaps alf a dozen tiaras from which choose when she really wants dress up. Here she also wears iamond drop earrings and one her many diamond necklaces.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 135

PIX

No queen has ever worn jewels with the regal splendor of Queen Mary. But no queen today would wear as many as Queen Mary thought appropriate. The emerald-and-diamond tiara and the emerald necklace now belong to Elizabeth, who shortened the necklace and added one of the emeralds and a portion of the Cullinan diamond as pendants.

COMBINE PHOTOS

Queen Mary, Elizabeth's grandmother, appreciated and knew jewels, as she did most works of beauty and of art. She passed on much of her knowledge and many of her pearls, diamonds and rubies to her granddaughter.

HAY WRIGHTSON

Pearls have always been fashionable for such events as christenings and hospital visiting. Today, however, Queen Elizabeth's would be shorter than the ones worn here by Queen Mary.

KEYSTONE PRESS

ILLUSTRATED BY C. FREDERICK SMITH

The littlest One

Bonnie was too little to understand that the heart has room for more than one.

By MARJORIE DANN

Bonnie didn't know what had wakened her or why she was afraid. She listened to the soft breathing of Emily and Alice, in the big brass bed in the other corner. She heard Timothy's sleepy babbling, off in the other room, but still she was afraid. She tightened her arm around Rudy's neck and wished for daylight to hurry.

Rudy was her new Teddy bear. Yesterday Bonnie had found him sitting under the Christmas tree, holding his stubby arms up, his yellow glass eyes filled with love for just her. Annabelle was suddenly lost; but no matter—Annabelle was quite grown up now and could do very well for herself. Besides, Annabelle's ear was chipped and her face was cracked from Timothy's dropping her on her head.

Suddenly Bonnie knew what had frightened her. Sobbing in the house, low and muffled. And stirrings belowstairs. And over all a strange fear that snaked itself under the coverlet and under her flannel nightdress and made her cold.

There was another sob which wavered away on a sigh, and then a long, black stillness. Bonnie huddled under her coverlet and said in loud, shaky whispers into Rudy's ear:

"Don't you be afraid now. It's probably just the old owl, stuck in the chimney again. Go back to sleep, littlest one."

She pulled the cover over her head and his, so that he might not hear the sound again and be afraid. She longed to slip out of bed and go downstairs and wedge herself in between mamma and papa. Papa would turn over and cuddle her and whisper, "Hush now and sleep, my littlest one. Don't wake mamma." And mamma would smile, without opening her eyes.

But there was the cold hall, and the darkness, and the strangeness, and some fearsome thing that might get Rudy.

When she came up from under the cover again, dawn was putting long, gray fingers through the window. Alice, the gentlest one, was tossing about, trying to wake up. Timothy coughed and creaked his bedsprings and went back to sleep.

He was the teasingest one, but no one did much about it because Timothy was weakly. Papa would sometimes lay a hand on his head and say, "When will you learn to be kind to your sisters, teasing Tim?" But papa's eyes would crinkle and his hand was gentle and Timothy would begin teasing papa.

The door at the foot of the stairs opened. The banister was shot through with shafts of yellow lamplight. Papa's voice boomed up from below:

"Emily, Alice, Timothy, Bonnie! Come see what we have for you! An after-Christmas gift! Just wait till you see!"

Emily always managed to get the lead, because she was the biggest one. Bonnie was last, holding up her nightdress with one hand to keep from tripping. But papa would wait for her, holding the door open as she came down, a step at a time. When her bare feet touched the last step, he would reach out and swing her up high and sing:

"Diddle, diddle, dumpling, sugar bun;
Come to papa, littlest one!"

Her feet touched the last step. She held up her arms, Rudy and all, and almost lost her balance. No one was there.

Papa sat in the rocking chair near the blazing black range, holding something in his arms. Something wrapped in soft flannel, and held the way Bonnie used to hold Annabelle, when Annabelle hurt herself. Papa looked at the children about his knee, an all-alike look, not the special look he had for each of them. Alice leaned over.

"Do let us see!" said Emily, anxious with excitement.

Papa turned in his chair to face the lamp. He laid the bundle on his knee. There was a tiny head, with hair like the down on a peach. There were two eyes, so tight shut they were only wrinkles. There was a small mouth that kept twisting itself into strange shapes, whimpering and mewing.

"It is our new one," said papa, smiling at all of them.

Emily and Alice and Timothy pressed closer, their eyes big. Bonnie backed away. She would give herself to mamma until papa was quite finished with this new one. Mamma would tell her, as she did every morning, that she simply couldn't last another minute without a good-morning kiss from her littlest. And mamma's face would be serious and pleading until she got the kiss.

Bonnie hurried to the sink. The pump rattled and water splashed. But it wasn't mamma. It was Mrs. Burschendorff, from over the field. She dipped white squares up and down in a pan of suds.

Bonnie stared, not too close, her first two fingers in her mouth. Mrs. Burschendorff beamed down a big smile. "Well, good morning, little Miss Bonnie. Aren't we proud of our new baby brother! Yes, indeedy, we are!"

Bonnie sucked hard on her fingers and stared.

"Nah, nah!" Mrs. Burschendorff said. "We don't suck fingers. We're a big girl now. We can dress ourself."

Bonnie pulled her fingers from her mouth and wiped the wet on her nightdress. "Mamma dresses me," she said, and put the fingers in her mouth again.

She turned back to papa. He stood with the new one in his arms.

"Come now," he said, "we will go see mamma. But you must all be very quiet. Mamma stayed awake all night, waiting for this little new one."

So they followed him through the parlor where the light was dim, past the fat black heater stove with its fire-lighted windows, past the Christmas tree draped with strings of popcorn and cranberries and tinsel; Emily first and Bonnie last. Bonnie stopped at mamma's doorway and looked in. The others went close to the bed. Mamma looked white and tired, and they thought she slept until she opened her eyes.

Papa put the new one carefully in the curve of mamma's arm, and she held her cheek against the fuzzy head.

Emily picked up the tassel of mamma's braid and said, "I remember when Bonnie came like this. But this time I'm big and I can help."

Mamma smiled at Emily. Then her eyes went searching.

Timothy picked up the other tassel of braid and said, "Mamma, I will never, never tease the new one." And he wanted so much for everyone to believe him that everyone did. Mamma smiled at Timothy and her eyes went on searching.

"I will rock his cradle and sing to him," said Alice, the gentle one. "I will learn new songs for him."

Mamma smiled at Alice, but still her eyes were searching.

"Mamma," said Bonnie from the doorway, "please dress me." She tried to keep her voice from shaking.

Papa put his hand on Bonnie's head, motioned for the others to come and said, "We'll see that you get dressed. Emily will dress you."

"Mamma dresses me," said Bonnie, sucking on her fingers.

Back in the kitchen, Mrs. Burschendorff had big bowls of steaming oatmeal set on the table. "Dress now," she said, "and be quick, before your breakfast is cold." She hurried her voice so they would uddenly she knew what had frightened her.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 80

Sobbing in the house, low and muffled.
And stirrings belowstairs.

Garden

The joy of tulips is in the grace and movement of their stems.
Begin your arrangement with the deeper colors low, and let the lighter colors extend their slender long stems into free and graceful curves.
Do make the most of their beautiful spiked leaves.

Zinnias in profusion are the spirit of midsummer. Their multicolored brilliance and variety in size make them most effective massed together rather than in combination with other flowers. A solid white or black container with some weight is most compatible.

Roses in June—forever romantic.
And sweet as heaven, single or clustered, they charm in any container—here a milk pitcher. Cut them gently on a dewy morning, not at midday, for long life.
For rose fanciers, there are more varieties of blossoms than ever, old and new.

Anemones, temperamental to grow, are so full of charm and color and delicacy it pays to coax them into your garden for late spring-early summer bloom. Speckled and solid, they'll hover like butterflies over any jar, cup or bowl—brilliant on a bookshelf, in an entry hall, on a window sill.

Sweet peas—with glorious fragrance, delicate bloom, whirl of color to span the season (count on July to September)—are deservedly the darlings of gardeners. Little work brings a heavy yield. Here they mass in nosegay effect in a Victorian bowl to captivate all callers.
Or fluff them out loosely in a contemporary dish.

Flowers the Year Round

Count on color and fragrance all year for the house—daffodils in April, geraniums in December, vivid variance between, if you garden.
Here, cut-flower arrangements, most of which call for only a handful of blossoms; or why not take a leisurely walk and gather a medley of wild flowers?

he first daffodil of early spring as beauty in a single stalk.
he strong stem with its oth of blossoms can and alone in a needled older, sheathed in s own foliage. Pebbles over the holder. For a patio ble or against a blank wall, the ngle tall spire is dramatic.

Wild flowers and weeds are among the happiest collections of all, can be gathered from country roads and summer shrubbery. For a foot-loose assortment try black-eyed Susans, daisies, Queen Anne's lace, spiraea—anything the children bring home from a Sunday walk. Idea for connoisseurs: assorted wild flowers come in seed packets. Sow your own for a surprise package in spring.

Lovely, the geranium—for being an outdoor or indoor plant, blooming all year, sometimes with pungent leaves as delightful as blossoms. A whole mass of scarlet makes a cheerful cut-flower arrangement in a breadbasket (a low bowl and needled holder are concealed). Foliage acts like a ruff around the blooms.

ARRANGEMENTS BY
LOUELLA SHOUER, JUDITH GARDEN,
ANN HAGAN, LEO AARONS, RACHEL CARR

Along in midmorning Paula Hewitt telephoned Rosalie to say, "My dear, how are you after that thrilling rescue? I want to hear all about it, but I've called about something quite different. You wouldn't want to come in to lunch, would you?"

Rosalie hesitated. "I really don't think I'd better, but why don't you come out? It's lovely and cool."

"I think I will if you're sure it's convenient. Is two o'clock too late? I'm counting on some help from you." Rosalie detected a tinge of anxiety in her voice which was somehow comforting to her. It was a relief to think someone else needed help.

Paula arrived a little before two in a flowered cotton dress of staggering cost and simplicity. Asked about a drink, she said tomato juice only. There was no sign of anxiety about her. She loved the house, the garden, the weather and the food, and even Smoky, who sneezed heavily and backed away, snarling, after a sniff of the delicate fragrance about her. Rosalie thought how unworthy of herself it was to wish Paula had been anxious about something.

Rosalie asked, "You said you were counting on some help from me?"

"Yes, but there's an awfully long preamble to my problem. I'll wait till we've lunched."

Over the coffee she said, "Well, to begin, did you hear from Jim?"

"Yes, I did. A nice little note about the rescue."

"I told him to write you. He told you he'd left those awful people?"

"Yes."

"Evidently he didn't tell you what he was doing."

"No, but he said he had hopes of getting everything straightened out. What is he going to do?"

"You can't guess?"

"No."

"Want to try Twenty Questions?"

"Please not."

Paula lit a cigarette. "Although not accurate yet in every detail," she continued calmly, "I think you'll understand the situation more clearly if I tell you we are living together."

Rosalie choked over her coffee. "Paula, are you sure you want me to hear this?"

"Sure, it all bears on your helping me. But to go back. I told you about my taking Jim to lunch the first time. He was pathetically pleased at having someone he could talk to, and he talked a great deal. What he wanted was someone who didn't care what he'd done or what his shortcomings were—and I told him I didn't. I suppose at the time I was flattered and certainly very moved at having someone bare his whole life to me. Well, I found myself doing the same. And I concluded that in a very odd way we needed each other."

"But ——"

"What he really needed was to get it out of his system. But Evelyn was unable —— I don't make the mistake of saying Evelyn was all wrong for him, and I'm just right. I'm sure now that he and I are both rather shallow people who are at our best when everything's pleasant. And of course, with all this money, you can have an awful lot of pleasantness. Unfortunately, at our third meeting, deep remorse and self-accusation overcame him and he left me, never to see me again. I spent a horrible night because I realized that the one thing I wanted was to get him on his feet and out of those horrible places he was working and living. I telephoned him at six in the morning and I said I cried all night, which wasn't quite true, and that I needed him, something which I doubt anyone had ever said to him. For which I was grateful, because if any of his friends had said to him after his resignation that he was needed, for anything, anywhere, by anyone, I wouldn't have got him."

"Paula, dear, I see what you mean—at least I think I do—but how will it all end? After all, there's Calvin and there are all of Jim's debts and—I don't know—the world at large, I suppose. Besides, can it be good for him to go on that way?"

"It's good for him, all right. You'd hardly know him. As for that money thing, I'm giving him the money to pay everybody. We don't know how to do it with Mr. Rutledge and I hope Stephen can think of a device."

"Calvin?"

"I have already devoted half my life to being deceived and made a fool of by him, so that I'm not feeling too responsible. He can have the apartment. I have another one."

"Isn't it difficult about seeing people?"

"No, we don't see them. That will all straighten out. I can see you're shocked, but you must understand this and you must make Stephen understand it. For all the good there still is in Jim, regeneration by atonement, expiation, that sort of thing is beyond him, far beyond him. He would not have been able to hold on at Excello. He would have gradually drifted down. Now, as to your helping us."

A slight shiver ran through Rosalie. We can't have them here, she thought.

"You mustn't think I've lost my head or my heart in all this," Paula said. "I see Jim's faults more clearly than anyone else. There is a basic fine gold in Jim. It's what Stephen saw in him originally. His faults are many, but they don't exasperate or bore me. In most ways he's very conventional. Of course he can't be trusted with money, but, on the other hand, he has a great deal of sense about it. He is still pathetically devoted to Stephen and yearns to regain his good opinion."

No, no, Rosalie said firmly to herself, we cannot have them out here.

"What he wants most to do now is to write and publish a book, and I think it would be a very good thing for him to do. The trouble is he's chosen the wrong thing to begin on. Have you read Marcel Proust?"

"Um, not all."

"Well, I had only heard the name and knew nothing about him. I went up secretly to talk to the Suydam professor of French at Columbia and got him to give me two hour lectures on Proust. Jim wants to write on The Comic Spirit in Proust."

"The Comic Spirit is one of Stephen's big ideas."

"I told you, dear, how Jim imitates him."

"It isn't original with Stephen, of course."

"No matter. My Frenchman told me," Paula continued, "that while the satire and comedy are marvelous, there's a frightful amount of Lesbianism and homosexuality all through it. I don't think Jim is ready for that; I mean he isn't out of the morbid state enough himself to be objective."

"Paula, have you been going to an analyst?"

"Well, to get advice about Jim, I am talking to the chief psychologist at the Suydam Clinic."

"So what is the alternative?" Rosalie asked.

"That's where you can help us. I propose that I take Jim to Europe for six months and that we put a whole équipe—wonderful French word—in Paris and Oxford on Principal Errors under Jim's supervision. Do say you'll try to get Stephen to agree."

"Does Jim know about this?"

"To a degree. Don't feel that it wouldn't be all Stephen's book. What we do can be dismissed in a line's acknowledgment, but it would provide Jim with one of the disciplines he needs."

"Stephen would certainly do a great deal for Jim, but I don't think he would like this idea, Paula. I really don't."

"If we get material and give it to him to use, I can't see the harm."

As she said it they heard the far-off whistle on the firehouse in the village. "What's that?" Paula asked.

"Four-thirty."

"I must go. If Stephen agrees, you won't oppose it, will you?" CONTINUED ON PAGE 68

© 1957 by Howard Swiggett
THE DURABLE FIRE
is soon to be published in book form by Houghton Mifflin Co.

was inevitable that I should volunteer for Sardine_"

THE DURABLE FIRE

By HOWARD SWIGGETT

An entertaining feature of the old saltbox is the saltbox wing that sprouted from one corner.

THE 1782 Dutton House

FROM CAVENDISH, VERMONT

By RICHARD PRATT
Architectural Editor of the Journal

First let me tell you that this enticing old house is now part of a rare townlike collection called the Shelburne Museum in Shelburne, Vermont, which includes many other examples of vintage Vermont and nearby New England; not only houses but barns, a store, a jail, a bridge, and even the great side-wheeler Ticonderoga from Lake Champlain down the road. And contained within this collected village are myriad other collections, housed and displayed with naturalness and taste, yet with showmanship too—fine early furniture galore, of course, together with carriages, quilts, wood carvings, dolls, decoys, and tantalizing arrays of tools for men in particular. It is entertainment and enlightenment of the first order and a sight to see, all brought together here and made accessible by Mr. and Mrs. J. Watson Webb, Americana collectors extraordinary.

Brought together or not, the whole place looks and behaves so much like a long-standing village that it seems a misnomer to call it a museum, though that's the name it goes by, and that's what I suppose it really is. In it, the delightful saltbox that Salmon Dutton built for himself at Cavendish, thirty miles to the northeast, has been made very much at home here after its move. And I am sure Salmon would feel very happy in the house if he could only see it now, for it is furnished just as he would have furnished it himself, if only he had had the time and patience to pick and choose and assemble with the perfection which is here displayed; though the Webbs assure me that Mr. Dutton was a man of means and possibly something of a connoisseur himself. There are several more rooms in the house, and a number of them are almost as dreamy as these.

EZRA STOLLER

In the dining room with its paneled fireplace wall, connoisseurs of early decoration exclaim with delight at the stenciling discovered under layers of old wallpaper and are seized with pangs of violent envy when they suddenly espy that priceless William and Mary highboy, its drawer fronts decorated with painting—not that there is anything less rare about the rest you see here.

We took this close-up picture in the parlor, with its paneled wall, and its stenciling too, in order to bring out clearly the lived-in look that Mrs. Webb has achieved in a house that is meant to be a museum of its period. Outstanding are the old wing chair covered in a paisleylike wool material, the rush-bottom ladderback, the butterfly table in the foreground, the primitive portrait.

Between the great Queen Anne highboy and the four-poster of painted pine hung with fringed dimity stands a marvelous high-back Windsor in front of the dimity-curtained window. It is unfortunate that a camera cannot take in everything, for then collectors could even see the Spanish feet on the stretcher table. It would be nice if these pictures started the art of stenciling again.

Pretty

. . . wearing some of the loveliest of the summer-night

fashions . . .

dresses that many other pretty girls will also adore and wear . . .

By WILHELA CUSHMAN
Fashion Editor of the Journal

JOHN ENGSTEAD

Gretchen Foster, daughter of Director Norman Foster, wears a three-tiered white organdy with a cape collar, a beautiful dress for a very special evening (it could even be a country-wedding dress). The fashion of the long dress, and of snowy white is loved by the young everywhere. Miss Foster wears it with a pearl bracelet.

Ava Astaire—her father is Fred Astaire—adores party separates. This embroidered organdy has a blue linen sash.

Linda Hope, daughter of Bob Hope, agrees with the starchy-white theory. This dress is eyelet organdy with a pink ribbon neckline. She wears a ribbon around her blond chignon.

Daughters of Famous Fathers

Jane Fonda, daughter of another well-known father, Henry Fonda, wears a long printed dimity, a fashion for a garden party or summer evening at home.

Sharon Disney, whose father is famous Walt Disney, likes short dancing dresses. This cool blue polka-dot cotton is pleated in tiers and has tiny ribbonlike shoulder straps.

BLACK and

The coolest, prettiest look this summer is black and white but bright with color. These gay easy-to-make designs have both your time and your budget in mind. Some can be made in an afternoon; others can be made for infinitesimal sums. One pattern consists of three different tops—each to be made from less than one yard, all pretty over a black linen sheath. Our two "conversation piece" skirts—one a potpourri of black-and-white prints arranged patchwork fashion, the other a chintz stripe with a gay dish-towel apron front—combine with black sleeveless blouses. Because these designs are all so easy to make, any one of them would be a nice last-minute addition for the warm weather ahead. By NORA O'LEARY
Pattern Editor of the Journal

A sheath in black-and-white warp-printed cotton satin is a perfect dress for a bright cummerbund, beads. Make it today, wear it tomorrow. Vogue Design No. 9027.

For the beach, giant black polka dots on white terry cloth—kimono fashion. The pattern also has longer versions. Vogue Design No. 9248.

This patchwork skirt in black-and-white prints is a real "conversation piece." We've topped it with a sleeveless black piqué top with giant-sized bows. Skirt, Vogue Design No. 9243. Blouse, Design No. 9244.

A hand-appliquéd and embroidered dish towel makes an amusing apron front on a black-and-white-striped chintz skirt. Or, use a printed towel. Vogue Design No. 9243. The blouse, No. 9244.

Other Views, Sizes and Prices of Vogue Patterns on Page 95. Buy Vogue Patterns at the store which sells them in your city. Or order by mail, enclosing check or money order,* from Vogue Pattern Service, Putnam Ave., Greenwich, Conn.; or in Canada from 198 Spadina Ave., Toronto, Ont. Some prices slightly higher in Canada. (*Conn. residents please add sales tax.) These patterns will be sent third-class mail. If you desire shipment first-class mail, please include 5c additional for each pattern ordered.

© VOGUE

WHITE...

but bright with Color

Wide beading with black ribbon is a perfect accent for a simple white piqué bodice. Add a perky bow. Vogue Design No. 8931. The four-gore black piqué skirt is Design No. 9216.

Nylon organdy with a flocked design in a lace pattern is an effective evening dress to make in minimum time. The top could be worn with a black skirt, too, and the skirt with a black sweater later. Two-piece dress. Vogue Design No. 9246.

CUMMERBUNDS BY HELEN LYNCH. SCARVES BY VERA PHOTOGRAPHS BY EMMA GENE HALL

Polka-dot cotton satin makes a charming drawstring topper for a black linen sheath. Add a red cummerbund, and a straw hat. Vogue Design No. 9245.

Crisp white piqué trimmed with black washable grosgrain ribbon. Wear it over black or a bright color. Opens in back. Vogue Design No. 9245.

A brief bolero, again trimmed with washable black grosgrain and accented with arrowheads. Vogue Design No. 9245.

Your town can stop Rheumatic Fever

Science has given us the means to wipe out this crippling, often fatal, disease. But we are not using it.

By RONALD M. DEUTSCH

Last winter the doctors took stock and saw that many thousands of children were still being crippled by, and many were dying of, rheumatic fever—a disease which should have been beaten two years ago.

A million Americans now suffer from rheumatic fever. It causes the majority of all heart disease among children and young adults, as well as most of the heart deaths among those groups.

Yet, ironically, medicine has known for some five years how to prevent rheumatic fever. The only drug needed is plentiful and quite cheap. But still the waste of lives goes on.

Why?

As early as 1955 Dr. E. Cowles Andrus, president of the American Heart Association, gave the answer. "Rheumatic fever," he said, "can be made a rare disease, provided that the medical profession can obtain the full and intelligent co-operation of parents, teachers, nurses and social workers."

Despite a two-year "Stop Rheumatic Fever" campaign conducted by the Heart Association and the U.S. Public Health Service, adequate co-operation has not yet been achieved. This is why the toll continues—in all but a few forward-thinking communities.

Pioneer among these is Orange County, a suburban neighbor of metropolitan Los Angeles. "In Orange County," say Heart Association officials, "there has not been a rheumatic-fever death in over a year—among the young people in a community of some 600,000 people.

"Orange County has shown that when a community works together, rheumatic fever can be licked. If every American community followed the simple pattern set by Orange County, rheumatic fever could be a thing of the past."

How is Orange County beating the disease?

Researchers know that rheumatic fever follows attacks of beta hemolytic strep—one strain of the streptococcus bacterium. In most people this strain causes the sore throat often known as "strep throat."

But a few of every 100 strep patients—as many as 10 in epidemics—suffer strange aftereffects. In a few weeks there is a low fever; joints may swell and ache; nodules can appear under the skin; tissues anywhere in the body may become infected and inflamed. Many or all of these symptoms may not be detected. But sometimes the inflammation hits the brain and results in the temporary but unmistakable signs of chorea—the involuntary movements known as St. Vitus's dance.

The tragedy of rheumatic fever, however, comes when—as it has in so many cases—the heart tissue becomes inflamed and scars. The disease itself subsides slowly, after months, sometimes many months, of bed rest. But for many there is permanent heart damage.

Each patient, it seems, has a heightened susceptibility to strep and to rheumatic fever. With each attack there can be more heart damage and weakening. For some 20,000 Americans each year, these recurrences mean death.

As soon as doctors pinpointed strep as the trigger mechanism for the disease, they had an answer. Give penicillin when strep-struck and the bacteria cannot get a foothold. There can be no rheumatic fever.

Keep penicillin in the blood streams of patients who have had an attack, and the susceptibility to strep is no problem. These patients' fears of new attacks are ended.

Physicians saw the end of rheumatic fever in sight. But there was one weak link. Unless strep was spotted at once, the penicillin would go to work too late.

In 1955, when strep hit Orange County hard, doctors realized that unless children ill with strep could be recognized in time, the toll of rheumatic fever and the consequent heart disease could be alarming. Working together, doctors, the Orange County Health Department and the Heart Association took steps to meet the disease.

The only way to diagnose strep certainly is by a simple lab culture. A smear is taken from the nose or throat of the patient, cultured, and eighteen hours later is studied for signs of bacteria. So the Health Department offered to take as many cultures as doctors sent in for study.

Meanwhile, Orange County's doctors became public speakers. They talked about rheumatic fever and strep at P.T.A.'s, at service clubs and union meetings. School nurses instructed teachers in the signs of strep. The Heart Association prepared a pamphlet on strep symptoms which every child took home from school. Local newspapers and theaters publicized the program. The police stations became clearinghouses for cultures, and a Health Department messenger made rounds to pick them up and rush them to the lab.

The people of Orange County responded enthusiastically. In a short time it was almost impossible for a child to go twenty-four hours with strep symptoms before someone—his parents, teachers, neighbors, school nurses or even his playmates—spotted them.

How well did the campaign work? Despite epidemic levels of strep in three cities, far fewer than the normally expected number of rheumatic-fever cases developed. Several strep carriers, who could infect others though they showed no strep symptoms themselves, were discovered when members of their families were cultured. In most cases, heavy doses of penicillin knocked out the carrier condition.

Now programs along the Orange County pattern have been begun in a number of cities across the nation, and still other cities are considering the plan. As the facts are reported by these communities, their experiences are serving to guide the newer programs. And the Heart Association has developed special films, leaflets and experts to help them.

Your town should know how it will face the future threats of strep and rheumatic fever. For the epidemics strike every year. But until a working program is under way, you can protect your own child.

If he has had rheumatic fever, he should have penicillin or sulfa drugs throughout the year, to guard him against recurrences. The new long-acting form of penicillin makes one monthly dose protection enough.

If your child has never had rheumatic fever, you can be alert to the signs and symptoms of strep. These are (1) A sore throat which comes on suddenly. Often, if you press gently at the angle of the jaw, there is tenderness. Swallowing may be painful. (2) Fever, usually 101°–104°. (3) Headache. (4) Nausea and vomiting. (5) Exposure to the disease, or to scarlet fever.

If a number of these signs are present, call your doctor. If he suspects strep, a throat or nasal culture should be made. If this is positive, penicillin should be given at once, and the doctor should then watch for signs of rheumatic fever, which usually appear in from six to eight weeks. It is difficult even for a physician to diagnose rheumatic fever, and for the layman it is impossible to do more than watch for signs of low fever, weakness and easy fatigue.

Only the understanding and the willingness to act of an entire community can really beat rheumatic fever. The reward in whole and useful lives can be immense.

Not long ago, Dr. Leonard Scheele, then Surgeon General of the United States, said, "Many thousands of new cases of rheumatic fever occur each year, and there are many more thousands of old cases. An intensified campaign can... forestall much untimely death and suffering. Here is a very real and great public-health opportunity."

The opportunity is yours. END

PRIGENT

Loved your letter!

Dear Readers— Thank you for your wonderful letters! I love to hear from you and to have you tell me about the beauty problems which are uppermost in your minds. With your special questions right here at hand, I feel I have the inside track on how I can help you the most. In recent weeks, for instance, I have noticed that you seem especially interested in ways to improve your skin. (Who doesn't want to radiate under the summer sun!) Here are some answers, worked out in consultation with our dermatologist, which should help make you just as fresh and smooth and glowing as you would like to be! Most sincerely,

Dawn Crowell Norman—
Beauty Editor of the Journal

Q I have a sprinkling of brown spots on the backs of my hands that look like king-sized freckles. What causes them, and can I get rid of them?

A Dermatologists call these "lentigos," which are freckles, often caused by prolonged exposure to the sun. It is not unnatural for "king-size" freckles to appear on hands as we grow older, which explains why elderly people are likely to have them in profusion.

The most sensible way to avoid any freckles is to see that your skin is sufficiently protected by sunburn preventives when you are out-of-doors for long periods of time gardening, sunbathing, driving in an open car, and so on. Gardeners should doubly protect against hand freckles, as well as raggedy-looking fingernails, by wearing suitable gloves. Coat your hands with lotion or cream (petroleum jelly is good too) before pulling on your gloves, to give yourself a beauty treatment as you work.

A dermatologist is the physician best qualified to determine whether treatment for removing freckles would be feasible. Under favorable circumstances, he might try a mild remedy such as an application of dry ice or the use of a special acid, to banish or at least tone down the discolorations. If there are no noticeable results after the first or second treatment (indicating that the pigment penetrates into the under layers of the skin), the doctor would abandon treatment rather than risk a stronger remedy which might remove the freckles at the expense of leaving scars in their place. If yours are the deep-seated type which refuse to respond to treatment, don't feel discouraged. At least men think freckles are cute!

Q As my skin darkens under the summer sun, my make-up looks drab and colorless. What to do?

A Most sun-tinted skins take prettily to lighter, brighter colors. The rich, deep blue-reds that looked so perfect with winter black and spring navy may be too dark combined with your new golden glow—and your more colorful summer clothes. Try, instead, one of the pretty pastel pinks, a sun-kissed orange or a pinky-coral shade. These fresh, new accents on finger tips as well as lips will do a lot to liven your look. Powder shades need to be cued to summer, too; substitute one of the warmer colors—a pinky or golden beige, for instance, for the lighter shades you have been wearing. For evening glamour try eye shadow—in a flattering shade of blue, green or violet—smoothed ever so sparingly on your upper eyelids. You'll like your summer-lady look—and it's always fun to make a change!

Q I'm a working girl and get to the beach only on weekends and my two-week vacation. How can I get a really good summer tan?

A The best time for summer tanning is early in the day when you can be out-of-doors under the pleasantly warm, but not hot, sun without danger of burning. Thus conditioned, your skin has a better chance to take small amounts of midday sun safely.

For your short jaunts to the beach, be sure to take cover-up clothes with you (things that can cover you from the top of your head to your toes!) and use a sun-screening preparation which will help prevent you from burning while it simultaneously works toward pretty tanning. These preparations come in sprays, liquids, creams or lotions and should be chosen according to personal preference and record of past performance. A few sun-screening preparations are designed purposely to discourage tanning (for the fair-skinned girls who wish to stay that way) so be sure to read the directions on the package before you buy!

Treat yourself to no more than five to ten minutes' exposure to the sun on your first day out, take ten to fifteen minutes the second day, and so on, but increase exposure time slowly. Controlled exposure will gradually bring you the tan of your dreams—but at least when you have it it will be painless and pretty!

Q My hair turns to straw the minute the sun gets at it. How can I avoid this parched, unpretty look?

A Try using a hair spray with a cream or lanolin base for putting up the ends of your hair; and when your hair is combed out, spray it lightly with the same preparation to help hold curls in place. Hair that has been artificially colored dries out more quickly, needs extra care. Preface your shampoo with

CONTINUED ON PAGE 87

Daughter of Kings

Solva's story is significant.

Not because she discovered she was the descendant of a queen. But because the man of her dreams discovered Solva.

By LESLEY CONGER

By five-thirty in the morning, every morning but Sunday, Solva Bjornson stood in the back room of the little bakery, kneading dough with her strong, square hands. She wore a white apron—a fresh one every day—and her pale hair, wound around her head in a thick braid, was also bound with a strip of white cloth, so that not a single strand should ever fall into a customer's loaf.

The milk truck, clanking empty cans, shifted gears on the hill; Miss Addie Blough, waking in her tidy little room behind her tidy little store, sighed and turned over, letting her metal curlers dig into the other side of her head for a while. The sun rose. Solva Bjornson punched the dough down, folded it under, set it to rise again, and began the sweet things—twisted coffee ring, nutmeggy doughnuts, flaky pastries glazed with sugar. The bakery smelled wonderful, like a dream of home and mother, and when the dough was ready Solva made the loaves, plain honest loaves as plain and honest as her own broad face. She hummed a little and forgot herself; in the bakery, forgetting herself, Solva was happy.

Mrs. Bjornson, Solva's mother, came later, after the beds were made at home and the dishes washed up. She sniffed the yeasty, cinnamony, nutmeggy, raisiny smells with the nose of an expert, put her hat on a shelf, hung her coat on a hook. At nine she unlocked the front door, swept the sidewalk, and they were ready for business.

Mr. Bjornson, Solva's father, left the house right after breakfast (two shredded-wheat biscuits, one poached egg, stewed prunes and coffee) and waved at Solva when he went past the rear window of the bakery. Then he unlocked the door of his little repair shop (Bjornson's Fix-It), went in, put his hat on a shelf and hung his coat on a hook, and began tinkering. He soldered wires in Mrs. Kroll's waffle iron, replaced the condenser in Miss Addie Blough's radio, mended a broken switch in little Sally Baxter's toy electric stove that could really cook. He took apart a broken cuckoo clock and a vacuum cleaner which made a lot of noise but refused to pick up dirt.

At the end of the day, when the cuckoo clock cuckooed and the vacuum cleaner cleaned, and when the breadboxes in Ferndale were full, then the Bjornsons locked the doors of the bakery and the repair shop, walked up the narrow sidewalk to the corner, and they were home.

Mrs. Bjornson folded the weekly newspaper front to back and read in the social column the account of the latest wedding. Mr. Bjornson rattled the pages of the daily paper, which came by mail, and read of murder and violence, of Li'l Abner and Rex Morgan, M.D., and an enormous advertisement prescribing sheep fat (spelled backward) to ward off baldness. He touched his thinning hair, under which his pink scalp gleamed in the lamplight, and wondered. Solva, having finished her book from the lending library at the back of Miss Addie's corner store and knowing therefrom that love triumphs over all, sat and knitted.

"And Mildred Logan is only seventeen," said Mrs. Bjornson. "Why, Solva used to baby-sit with her for Mrs. Logan!"

These remarks required, for the Bjornsons, no elucidation. Mr. Bjornson did not look up from the paper, in which Steady, industrious, German descent, desired meet affectionate lady 35–45, some means, no objection one child, send photo, no triflers, please, obj. mat. The conversation was an old one; he gave one of his old replies.

"She's a good girl," he said. "Some man will want her."

Solva shut her eyes for an instant involuntarily. Knit, knit, purl, purl, turn, bind off three—hands deft and quick, but big as a man's—knit, knit, purl, purl.

"There'll be a man for you," Mr. Bjornson said, speaking loudly to Solva now, from behind his paper. "You wait and see. A good man will come—a good, strong man who wants a good, strong woman. Not all men are romantic fools." But he was thinking, nevertheless, Good, strong girl, 23, Norwegian descent, desires meet kind gentleman—and he turned the page with distaste and began to read the Will Swap column.

Solva said nothing. She hunched over her knitting, as if by crumpling herself up she could make herself smaller. But even with her shoulders round and her head bent—as it always was, looking at the ground when she walked, at people's skirt hems and trouser cuffs and feet, and sometimes, bravely, at the middle button of a shirt—even so, she was still a tall girl, tall as a man, and big, and plain, a big plain girl with no fragility to her, except perhaps in her heart.

"After all, he doesn't have to be rich," said Mr. Bjornson ridiculously. And he reached over and turned up the radio which had been muttering softly to itself, and they listened to the ten-o'clock news, shaking their heads at the endless disasters which constantly overtake the innocent of the world, the airline passengers, the travelers on buses, the sleepers in an apartment blown sky high by a faulty furnace; and then, after a cup of hot chocolate, they went to bed.

In the big bedroom, Mr. and Mrs. Bjornson talked in bed. They talked about the bakery and about the repair shop, about new linoleum for the kitchen and about the twinge in Mr. Bjornson's back, and then they gave each other a little pat on the shoulder, and turned away, back to back, to go to sleep. And each of them, before sleeping, gave a secret and tender thought to their daughter, Solva.

In the small bedroom, Solva lay awake, staring at the ceiling. Send a man, she thought. Just a good man, not young, not handsome, not rich; not a romantic fool, else why would he want Solva Bjornson? Just a good man—or even . . . even not a good man—just a man who would want her. She touched her broad, smooth cheek with gentle finger tips, wishing CONTINUED ON PAGE 84

They all turned to look; but what really matters most is that Edward saw what they all saw: Solva Bjornson, maker of good bread; tall and fair and rega

ILLUSTRATED BY HARRY ANDERS

Summer

Four tempting luncheo within your limit of 400 calories—all me just ke

Most of us seem to be concerned with either attaining or maintaining a lithe and lissome figure. Our philosophy about diet menus is that they needn't be repetitive or lacking in flavor. They can be glamorous and have just as much plate appeal as more fattening menus. So these four delectable meals prove.

CHARMER ONE

This summer luncheon, pretty as its picture, would be a wonderfu choice for your next bridge luncheon. It's so easy to prepare and serve Cook the shrimp the day before. Make the consommé and sherbet, an scoop out the pineapple shells, in the cool of the morning. There will b plenty of time between then and lunchtime to arrange a bouquet and se the table with your most summery mats and china or milk glass.

MUSHROOM CONSOMMÉ. Simply canned consommé dressed up with finely chopped cooked mushrooms, and you know how really low in calories they are. Allow ⅓ pound mushrooms to each 3 cups consommé. Figure on 16 calories for ½-cup serving. Since this menu is under 400 calories, increase the serving a bit if you wish.

SHRIMP-AND-PINEAPPLE SALAD. For 4 salads, simmer 24 medium-sized shelled and cleaned raw shrimp in a little water with lemon slices,

MUSHROOM CONSOMMÉ
SHRIMP-AND-PINEAPPLE SALAD
RYE WAFER
LIME-MINT SHERBET
HOT OR ICED TEA

371 calories

"The summer's flower is to the summer sweet," and this light, refreshing luncheon is to the dieter both a delight and good eating. Hot consommé to perk the appetite, followed by a chilled crisp shrimp-and-pineapple salad and fresh lime-mint sherbet to make you forget the heat.

STUART-FOWLER

CONSOMMÉ
CHICKEN BREASTS IN ASPIC
TOMATOES STUFFED WITH GREEN-BEAN SALAD
MELBA TOAST RELISHES
YOGHURT WITH RASPBERRIES
ICED TEA

400 calories

Floating flower candles twinkle among the rosebuds as you sit down to this summer plate that is "the very pink of perfection": slices of cold chicken, laced with pâté, reposing in aspic; a refreshing green-bean-and-tomato salad, relishes and Melba toast. Doesn't it make you hungry?

Diet plates

dinners—

ur family and guests will relish too—e calorie scores a secret!

pot herbs, a piece of bay leaf, salt and whole black pepper for flavor. Cool in the broth, then drain and chill in the refrigerator overnight. Cut 2 small fresh pineapples in half lengthwise. Trim the tufted green tips; cut out the core and remove the pineapple meat in as nice pieces as you can. Cut into slivers. There should be about 3 cups. Chill along with 1 cup canned bean sprouts that have been well drained. Just before serving, mix with 2½ cups thinly sliced cucumbers and ½ cup cottage-cheese dressing to which you have added a little more minced green onions or scallions and 1 to 2 teaspoons curry powder, depending on how hot you like it. Now is the time to taste for salt. The salad may need it. Serve in the pineapple shells, which you have also chilled well. Though this is all you will be serving for your main course, it's a filling salad and the servings are generous. Count on 168 calories for each salad, one rye wafer (20 calories) and hot or iced tea with lemon and sugar substitute (absolutely no calories).

COTTAGE-CHEESE DRESSING. This is a good basic dressing to have on hand while you are dieting. The flavor may be varied in many ways without adding any more calories—curry, for instance, as in the above salad, caraway seeds or herbs for vegetable salads, and so on. To 1 cup creamed cottage cheese (if you are CONTINUED ON PAGE 131

VEGETABLE-JUICE COCKTAIL
BROILED SWEETBREADS
JULIENNE CARROTS
ZUCCHINI CREOLE
ORANGE-AND-ONION SALAD,
COTTAGE-CHEESE DRESSING
HOT TEA

400 Calories

Dieting or not, who wouldn't enjoy sitting down to this mouth-watering porch supper? Sweetbreads twined with crisp bacon, zucchini cooked in ■ creole sauce so you'll never miss the butter, and carrots cooked in bouillon for the same reason. Instead of dessert, a refreshing orange-and-onion salad.

POACHED EGG AND BACON WITH SPINACH
TOMATO-AND-CUCUMBER ASPIC, COTTAGE-CHEESE DRESSING
CELERY
STRAWBERRIES COOKY
ICED COFFEE

395 Calories

The simplest meal can be a feast—and with calories in line! A poached egg on spinach, the dieter's stand-by, is enhanced by the company of a shimmery tomato-and-cucumber aspic, strawberries ripe from the vine, and a crisp sugar cooky. Serve your supper on ■ tray—pamper yourself with ■ "just for you" nosegay from the garden and off you go to the coolest corner of the porch.

COLLECTOR'S ITEMS

From the Journal Kitchen

Fruit Desserts

The thrifty French, who know more than a thing or two about good food, say, "Always use what is in season; quality is at its peak, prices at their lowest."
It is a pleasure to follow this rule with luscious summer fruits—from the first strawberries to the last melons and grapes. A dessert should provoke exhilaration and leave satisfaction.

STUART

Drama for a midsummer night—and as cool as can be. Fruit Flotilla is the name for a crisp delicate meringue filled with raspberry sherbet and wreathed with ivy or vinca vine.

FRUIT FLOTILLA. Here is a celebration dessert—gay and beautiful. A ring of meringue has raspberry sherbet heaped in the center over which are sprinkled crystallized violets or a few whole raspberries. (Variation: lemon sherbet with rose petals.) Serve it with trailing strands of periwinkle (myrtle), vinca or ivy wound around the edge of the platter for an aura of glamour.

The Mering e: Deliciously tender and not difficult to do. It may be made several days ahead of time. If it gets soft, set in a slow oven again to crisp. (The same recipe may be used for individual meringue shells.) Beat until stiff 3 egg whites with ½ teaspoon baking powder and a speck of salt. Have ready 1 cup sifted sugar; in another cup, 1 teaspoon water, 1 teaspoon vanilla and 1 teaspoon vinegar, mixed. Continue beating the egg whites, adding alternately, a small amount at a time, the sugar and the liquid. Shape the meringue into a ring on a well-greased baking sheet. Bake about an hour in a very slow oven, 250° F., until firm and dry. Let it cool.

Raspberry Sherbet: Heat 1½ cups milk with 1 cup sugar until sugar is dissolved. Cool. Pour into a freezing tray and freeze until partially frozen. Thaw ½ package frozen raspberries and strain to remove seeds. Spoon the frozen mixture into a cold bowl and beat until light and fluffy—but still thick. Add the juice from the raspberries and ¼ cup fresh lemon juice while beating. Pour into 2 freezing trays and partially freeze again. Whip the whites of 3 eggs until stiff but not dry. Whip 1 cup heavy cream. Combine. Spoon partially frozen raspberry mixture into a cold bowl and beat only to soften. Carefully fold in the egg-white-cream mixture and return to the freezing trays. Freeze until firm. Makes about 1 quart sherbet.

CHERRY FILLIP. Pit 1 quart fresh red cherries, or use canned ones already pitted (1 can). Add 1 cup sugar. Heat with ½ teaspoon cinnamon, a pinch of cloves and ½ teaspoon nutmeg. Simmer the fruit, covered, for 10 minutes. Then remove the cherries with a strainer scoop. Add ½ cup red-currant jelly to the juice and continue boiling down. When syrupy, remove from heat, add to the cherries and chill. Serve very cold with sweetened whipped cream flavored with maraschino juice. Or serve hot over vanilla ice cream.

FRUIT FROST. Those delicious coconut chips that are so often served as an appetizer become news here treated as an accent for fruit. Not only do they supply a bit of drama with this surprise use, but their crunchy texture achieves the similar pleasure of a crisp cooky—but with a difference!

Select fresh ripe apricots or nectarines; peel, halve and remove pits. Canned apricots may be used, in which case pour off the syrup. Arrange the fruit in a pretty bowl, and if you use fresh fruit sprinkle it with a little lemon juice. Chill. Meanwhile, let ½ pint vanilla ice cream get a little soft, then whip it together with 1 pint heavy cream, whipped and flavored with ½ teaspoon vanilla. Keep the cream in a refrigerator tray until ready to use, but don't let it get too hard. Heap the cream on the fruit and bring to the table garnished with coconut chips. Other fresh fruits or berries are just as delectable served this way: peaches, raspberries, red currants well sugared, strawberries, blackberries.

OMELETTE AUX CONFITURES. This sweet omelet is another French classic, and anyone who has a light hand with eggs should not fail to try it. First prepare the fruit you intend to use—blueberries or red raspberries are a good choice. Wash, drain and sugar the fruit. Prepare the skillet for the omelet by warming it, shaking a little salt in it and rubbing vigorously with a paper towel. Discard the salt. It is important to have a scrupulously clean pan. Beat 2 egg yolks until light and lemon-colored. Add gradually, with continued beating, ¼ cup confectioners' sugar. Flavor with ½ teaspoon grated lemon peel. Fold in the separately beaten whites of 4 eggs and a pinch of salt, about ⅛ teaspoon. Melt 2 teaspoons butter in the skillet and let it coat the bottom. When warm and foamy, turn in the omelet and cook it over low heat. Cover with a lid. Cook until nicely browned around the edges. Don't be afraid to look. Place in a moderate oven, 350° F., for about 5 minutes, or until the center is done. Now drain the sugared fruit and have it ready when the omelet is cooked. Remove the omelet from the oven. Turn the fruit onto one half of it. Slash the edges of the omelet at the center to facilitate the turning and flip the other half over the fruit (without breaking the center if you can). Serve at once with a little powdered sugar. Serves 4.

PEACH ALASKAS. Peel, halve and stone 2 large fresh ripe peaches. Sprinkle with lemon juice to keep them from turning brown, and chill thoroughly. Meanwhile have ready any ice cream or fruit ice of your choice. Let it be well frozen. Prepare a meringue by whipping 1 or 2 egg whites and adding 3 tablespoons confectioners' sugar for each egg white used (more or less to your taste). Preheat oven to 450° F. On a baking sheet place 4 commercial sponge cups as a base for the fruit; then add the fruit. Scoop the ice cream into the hollow of each peach half. Spread a heavy coating of meringue all over the ice cream, peach and sponge cup. Set the sheet in the oven just long enough to brown the meringue. Serve at once on dessert plates upon which you have previously placed a grape leaf.

PEAR ZABAGLIONE. This classic sauce, zabaglione, is a worthy accompaniment for almost any fresh fruit and is a welcome change from so much cream, whether plain, whipped or iced. First peel, halve and core 3 fresh Bartlett or French pears. Keep them from turning dark by dropping them in water with a little lemon juice. Have ready a syrup made in the proportion of 2 cups water to ½ cup sugar, boiled with a bit of lemon and orange peel and a stick of cinnamon. Simmer the pears in the syrup until tender. Remove them from the syrup and chill them. Serve them in pretty dishes, topped with pitted black cherries, fresh or canned, and surrounded with zabaglione sauce, made as follows: Beat 4 egg yolks until light and lemon-colored. Add ½ cup confectioners' sugar with continued beating. Set over hot water and continue beating with a wire whisk until foamy. Be careful that the bottom of the pan does not touch the hot water in this process. Flavor with ½ cup fresh orange juice—or sherry, if you like—and ½ teaspoon grated lemon rind. Remove from the heat and cool. Makes about 2 cups.

SAVORY BANANAS. Our grandmothers used this old-fashioned dessert. The sour-sweet combination enhances the blandness of the banana to produce a delicious flavor.

Allow 1 banana to a person. Peel and split the banana lengthwise and lay it open on the plate. Sprinkle it with lemon juice, then with sugar, then with cinnamon. That's all. What could be easier?

MELONS WITH CHEESE. The flavor of a sharp cheese with a good melon is an idea that appeals to the Italians, who, like the French, are fond of good eating. The success depends on a good cheese and a good melon.

Chill the melons to be used. Quarter them, remove the seeds, cut off the rind and slice them thinly. Arrange the slices on dessert plates alternately with thin slices of cheese.

Watermelon Disks

Slice a watermelon. Cut out the center portions of the slices in round disks. A bread-and-butter plate might be used as a pattern for this. Place a disk on each dessert plate. In the center of the disk place a scoop of pistachio ice cream. Garnish with salted almonds or pecans. This makes a pretty pink-and-green décor.

How to make a
SOUPER
BARBECUE SAUCE

Here's a humdinger of a barbecue sauce for any meat — smooth and tart and ready in a fraction of cookbook time. And soup's practically all there is to it. Just add the chef-tested extras in our recipe — or your own favorite herbs and spices. It's a simple secret to the outdoor (or indoor) cook's success!

CAMPBELL'S SOUPER BARBECUE SAUCE

- 1 tablespoon brown sugar
- 1 tablespoon vinegar
- 1 tablespoon Worcestershire sauce
- 1 can Campbell's Tomato Soup
- ¼ cup sweet-pickle relish
- ¼ cup chopped onion

Combine all ingredients in a skillet or saucepan. Simmer until onions are done and tender, and the spicy-sweet aroma tells you all the flavors are blended thoroughly. Makes 1½ cups.

Good cooks cook with Campbell's Soups

Not just a promise

... a guarantee!

SOFT, SMOOTH,

RADIANT SKIN IN 7 DAYS

... or it costs you nothing!

Here's your chance to see how lovely your skin can be when you give it proper care with the proper soap... that means, lather-massage a full minute morning and night with Cuticura Soap.

Cuticura Soap does such wonderful things for your skin because it is: Mildest of all leading soaps by actual laboratory test. Uniquely superemollient to help maintain the natural moisture and normal, healthy acidity of your skin. Mildly medicated for extra skin care and protection. No other soap contains Cuticura's remarkable skin softening, skin smoothing ingredients. And it's fragrant, triple milled, long lasting too!

For problem skin—hateful blackheads, externally caused pimples, flaky dryness—use jade-clear Cuticura Ointment nightly to soften and gently stimulate as it soothes and relieves.

See exciting new softness, smoothness, radiance in 7 days—or return the bar and wrapper to Cuticura for a full refund.

New Way To Wash Hair—
Squeeze On Cuticura Shampoo.

Better than soap shampoo—better than soapless shampoo—combines best features of both. Leaves hair brighter, softer, more manageable. And unbreakable squeeze bottle gives you up to 50% more shampoos! At leading drug counters.

Cuticura

Wishing won't help your skin
— Cuticura will!

THE DURABLE FIRE

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 52

"But I know he won't agree. He's not changeable."

"You can't say that. Everybody changes. Look at me. Ask Stephen to call me. Here's my new number."

Half an hour before, Lorna Hume had telephoned Stephen. "Stephen, it's Lorna. Do you take a train at the Long Island about five?"

"Yes."

"Could I meet you for a few minutes outside the bookstore on that level? It will take only a moment. Quarter of five?"

"All right," he said, and at that time was waiting as the commuting rush streamed past him. He felt vaguely uneasy that she had something she must say about the tabloid story. Then he saw her, cool and trim-looking, at the top of the steps leading to 34th Street. They both waved as she ran lightly down the long stairs, but as they met her smile was so sorrowful that it touched his heart.

"I hope you'll think this was better than writing or having you at the apartment. I tried to think it out."

"What is it?"

"You don't know about Principal Errors?"

"Well, I know I'm working on it."

"Stephen, my dear, it has been written by Professor John Bancroft Twombley of Harvard, and is about to be published."

"Oh," he said, "how's it possible? Not the same book as mine?"

"Yes. Here, this is in the trade paper this week." She handed him a clipping:

Loud and louder paeans from the editorial offices of Dunstable and Company about the new book on which the Sales Department foresaw a modest two thousand going to libraries. The Volume of the Month for November. All this for ■ volume of erudite research on which Professor John Bancroft Twombley of Harvard has been engaged for ten years. The book is entitled Principal Errors of Rulers and Peoples Since the Reformation. There is ■ strange and tragic story of the source of the book epitomized in its dedication to the memory of Col. Garrett Maynard, who died of wounds received at Anzio. Professor Twombley, then in the American Intelligence, met Colonel Maynard there and was given by him the idea of the book ——

"I feel so terrible at telling you. I still don't know anyone who can take things as you do. I wanted to be unselfish and have you able to go straight to your wife. That's part of why I met you here."

The commuting rush was increasing, men and women discarding cigarettes to find the change for an evening paper, or another pack of cigarettes.

"It still doesn't seem possible. I never heard of Twombley." He straightened up and patted Lorna's arms. "I suppose the only thing that matters is that he was better equipped than I, and it will be a better book. Can I keep the clipping?"

She nodded, said good-by quickly and left him. He turned and went for his train. Monday morning he had not wanted to go in the club car because of the rescue story. Now what did it matter? A great quadrant of his inner life was lost, and hereafter his only familiars would be the bankers and brokers, lawyers and executives of the club car. He had never been any better than they, anyhow. Several of them would probably have had the moral courage to go to Parry's assistance.

Rosalie, seeing Stephen drive in, called from her window, "Why, darling, how lovely you're home early. I'll be down in just a moment, bursting with news. Paula's been here."

He walked into the library and sat down, looking at the long table with the boxes of notes, the results of so many long, happy hours. He had not told Rosalie of the moral conflict he was going through about Parry, or of Hewitt's call about Cramer, and now he did not want to tell her their book was lost. The synopses he had written Saturday and Sunday were back from the village typist, and Rosalie had put a jug of small golden zinnias as a paperweight on the first copy.

He heard her coming down the stairs and she burst in, gave him a quick kiss and pushed him down on the sofa.

"Paula Hewitt and Jim are living together! That's why you couldn't find him. She's paid, or is paying, all his debts."

"Keeping him?"

"I know it sounds like that, but it isn't just that. It was comic, and yet it wasn't ridiculous or sordid—she's frightfully practical and she seems to understand him. Believe it or not, she says she needs him and I think she does."

"I thought he had it in him to make something of himself. What will they do? Keep going on round-the-world cruises?"

"Oh, no; he wants to write a book on Proust."

"But he doesn't know anything about Proust. That's fantastic."

"Paula realizes that. What she wants to start with is to go to Paris and for you to let him put researchers on Principal Errors at her expense and turn the results over to you."

"On my book?"

"I told her, of course, you'd never agree——"

He looked down at the rug, leaning forward with his elbows on his knees. "I've already lost the book. Someone else has written it." Giving her the clipping, he got up. She read it quickly and followed him, her eyes full of tears.

"Oh, my dearest."

He smiled grimly, looking down into her face. "I've had an unbroken run of luck from the moment you came into Pastor Larsen's church. I couldn't expect it to last forever."

"How did you find out about it?"

"Lorna Hume saw the clipping and brought it to me at the station."

"Just now?"

"Yes."

"Perhaps with her you would have finished it in time. Oh, darling, why did this have to happen?"

Lowry saw Cramer, with his son in train, sweep through the office at eleven-thirty the next morning. Within a few minutes Miss Marshall said the president would like to see him, and he went to his office.

Without his usual greeting, Cramer said, "Do you know where we can reach Mr. Hewitt?"

"No. Is something the matter?"

"I've brought him back from Chicago a sick man. John and I took him to his apartment and got him to bed. His wife wasn't there and the servants didn't seem to know where she is."

"Is he seriously ill?"

"We had to leave before his doctor got there. When a man vomits all night and looks like death, I call him seriously ill."

"Appendicitis?"

"He has no appendix and he had no chest pains. It's not his heart. He's overworked—I don't know what it is. Where in the world could his wife be?"

"I'm sorry, but I don't know."

Cramer's usually benign face was wrinkled with anger and impatience. "Did you telegraph him in Chicago?"

"No. Why do you ask?"

"He got a telegram from someone, the boat captain told John, that seemed to start this. I thought it might have been from you about this disgraceful incident in the papers. I have already seen it. I never thought I'd live to see the day when an officer in one of my companies would be written up in a scandal sheet. My work has been with men whose names don't get in the papers unless it's some fine community effort. Are you still a Johnson trustee?"

"So far as I know."

"We might as well have this out. . . . Miss Wilkins, find out if Mr. Hewitt's doctor has been there yet or if Mrs. Hewitt has been found. . . . Now, sit down. When Cal showed me the clippings about you—I had not yet received them from Miss Wilkins—I had been deeply moved by the apparent heroism, as my telegram showed; he minimized it all as your good friend. And he to me what I should have guessed, I suppose, that your real interest was not your company and your job here, but a book on which you spent half your time."

"I did not spend half my time, or any time except weekends, on it. It's somewhat academic today, as someone else has written the book and is about to publish it."

"This is not a subterfuge because of the papers to keep your name out of it?"

"No. Do you mind coming to the point of all this?"

"There you are, that perpetual chip on the shoulder. That resentment toward me. You seem to feel I'm against you. Not at all, but I am for the company."

"So you would like me to resign?"

There was a pause, and when Cramer spoke again it was with his customary tone of unction. "Friend Lowry, those are your words, not mine, but, and this is as friendly as it is frank, I wonder whether, no doubt with good intentions, you are one of those men who give the kiss of death' to whatever you engage in? Peale, Doran, and so on, and if what you say is so, evidently to your own book. When the directors put them all together and then read how you and a member of your family and your friends amuse themselves ——"

"I'd be careful, if I were you, Mr. Cramer. I'd strike out that last sentence. And make quite sure you never refer to it again."

"Are you threatening me?"

"I suppose so, yes."

Cramer, pinching his face like a barber testing the work of his razor, blinked at him a moment.

"Well, I have work to do," Lowry said briskly, and left.

Even now what to do, where to turn and stand was a problem. In all that had happened so far with Cramer, the directors, or even friends like Colonel Channing, could say, "Cramer has his objectionable points, but it still seems to come down to the fact that his personality is so strong that you can't handle him."

He dialed Hewitt's apartment and, after saying who he was, Hewitt answered.

"How sick are you?" Lowry asked.

"I'm not sick except deep inside. I know you know about Paula. Have you any idea where I can get hold of her?"

"No."

"I'm going to call the Pinkertons and get her traced."

"I wouldn't call them. I've read they don't take divorce cases."

"This is no divorce, Steve. I want her back, that's all, before Cramer knows about it. I got to thinking last night how when you're married for years, all the little things you do for each other. Brought tears to my eyes—there's somebody who knows how you take your coffee. Why, I'd be lost without Paula. We men don't realize what a job running a home is. My clothes were always pressed. All I had to do was throw them over a chair. I haven't the foggiest idea who pressed them. It's been years since I knew who did the laundry. All those little things. I suppose you think I'm sentimental."

"Not at all."

"Steve, I want you to know I did everything I could for you with Cramer."

"So I gather."

"If the Pinkertons can find Paula, I'll have to go there and fight it out with Peale. My honor demands that, but I tell you I'm sick of responsibility. If Paula won't come back, though I'm sure she will, and wanted to settle with me—I don't know what would be fair, maybe ten, better twenty per cent of the Suydam estate—I think I'd take it and live in Vermont."

"I should think even ten per cent would be a million dollars."

"About, I guess."

"Well, Calvin, the possession of a million dollars would only involve you in new responsibilities. People would want to get it away from you."

"I only say this to you, Steve. I've been hurt deep inside and I'm tired of slaving. If Paula persists, then she's got to pay for it. Isn't that the sensible way for me to look at it? I hope you'll keep in touch. It's a time when a man appreciates his friends."

Miss Marshall signaled as soon as Hewitt had hung up to say that Mr. Devers, one of the engineers, was waiting and wanted to see Lowry at once. He said to send him in.

Devers was a tall man, with the same pointed features, the high receding forehead and steel-rimmed spectacles of Burnham at Larus. In eight months Lowry did not recall having said more than hello to him, though he had heard Evans speak highly of him, especially in connection with the calculating on the bridge bid. Across the outer breast pocket of his coat was a stockade of pens and pencils with a slide rule. An outsize slide rule with a sheaf of papers was in his hand and his hand was shaking violently.

Instinctively Lowry knew at once what he was going to say. He got up to hear it, standing.

"The bridge bid," Devers gasped; "it's out five hundred thousand dollars. There's an error in man-hours. It's not my error originally. Have we got time to withdraw?"

"No. How did you happen to recheck this?"

"I got nervous about it."

"Does anyone else know?"

"No, sir."

"Are those your work sheets?"

"Yes, sir."

"Miss Marshall, bring me the work sheets on the bridge bid, please." She brought the "Martha, it's the vines or me. One of us has to go."

FRANCO-AMERICAN IS A TRADEMARK OWNED BY THE MAKERS OF CAMPBELL'S SOUPS

3 ground beef dishes made extra delicious with Franco-American Beef Gravy

Skillet Burgers with Gravy! Shape 1 lb. ground beef into 6 patties, season to taste, then brown on both sides in skillet. Then add 3-ounce can sliced mushrooms, drained, and cook until browned. Add 1 can Beef Gravy and simmer a few minutes.

Here's the kind of gravy a man can remember from 'way back. Only this is FRANCO-AMERICAN Beef Gravy. It's rich, brown, perfectly smooth. Made from good lean beef so it's low in calories. (Only about a fourth as many as homemade gravy.) And it's always ready, handy as your pantry shelf. Franco-American Beef Gravy makes all kinds of dishes taste better. Here are just a few.

Baked Beef Patties! Combine 1 pound lean ground beef, ½ tsp. salt, dash of black pepper, 2 tbsp. minced onion and ¼ cup Beef Gravy. Shape into 4 large patties. Bake in small casseroles or 8-inch baking pan about 30 minutes at 350° F. Pour off excess fat, then pour remainder of gravy over meat and return to oven until heated through.

Skillet Supper! Cook 1 lb. ground beef and 1 small onion, sliced, in 2 tbsp. butter (or margarine) until brown. Stir occasionally to separate meat. Add 1 cup very thinly sliced raw carrots, 1 can Beef Gravy, ½ tsp. salt, dash of pepper. Cover, cook slowly, stirring occasionally, until carrots are tender, about 15 minutes. Serve on cooked rice or noodles.

Now, delicious beef gravy on your mashed potatoes, anytime

With Franco-American Beef Gravy in your pantry, you're all set for potatoes and gravy anytime, even when your meat doesn't give you gravy-makin's.

folder quickly. "Now show me where it occurred," he said to Devers.

Well, there it was, the original calculation O.K.'d at the point of error by all, including Evans. Lowry started his own calculation in pencil, Devers breathing down his neck as he followed with his slide rule. The error was now so palpable that it was as though they had all been hypnotized when they passed it.

"I feel pretty sick, Mr. Lowry."

"There's a lot of sickness around, evidently," Lowry replied. "Miss Marshall, see whether Mr. Cramer's gone to lunch, please."

She returned to say Mr. Cramer was having a glass of milk at his desk. Lowry picked up the papers and walked to his lonely execution. He said as unaffectedly as possible that he was solely responsible for something that had happened and then he told Cramer what it was. If Cramer listened pitilessly, it was with the professional calm of an auditor. With an auditor's control and competence he followed Lowry's finger through the two sets of work sheets.

"Naturally I'm not a bit surprised," he said, picking up the papers and handing them back. "Leave these with my assistant, if you will, please. What do you propose now?"

"I've known of this only a few moments longer than you have. I've not had time ——"

"Have you telephoned Caracas to see if we could simply not bid?"

"They've already filed and it was effective when we had it notarized at the consulate here."

"Miss Wilkins, ask John to come here, please." When he came in, his father said, "Mr. Lowry has something to tell you. Be good enough, Mr. Lowry, to go over it all again in the same detail. I may have missed something."

Lowry went through the humbling business. Young Cramer listened aghast, trying hard by glancing at his father to ape his impassivity.

"You see the whole situation, John?"

"Yes, dad."

"Not a very nice one, though what was to be expected," Cramer said. "Have you thought of what you intend to do, or is this 'just one of those things that happen' in your eyes?" he asked Lowry.

"Without minimizing my responsibility, I may say that this line of talk is not conducive to clear thinking."

"Are we expected to feel sorry for you, or for the stockholders who must take the loss? Unlike you, I'm said to be a slow thinker, and I see the way out."

"Then may I hear it?"

"I want to talk it over with John. Is it asking too much for you to hold yourself in readiness in your office, or can you tell me where I can reach you?"

"I'll be in my office," Lowry replied.

It was not until after five that Cramer appeared at Lowry's desk. It had been apparent from the normal behavior of Halleck and the other department managers that nothing was known of the error, and Curtis had been downtown the entire afternoon. Evans was reported at the Tidewater plant, in New Jersey.

As Lowry went back over every step of the bid's preparation, he could not see where, even now, he would have done anything differently. Every care and control possible had been used. But all the justification in the world was not going to avail him. "While it was not your responsibility, Mr. Lowry, personally to prepare the figures, and aware as we are that Mr. Evans and Mr. Curtis had the same duty and responsibility, nonetheless taking this and various other things into consideration, we feel the best thing all around is to make a settlement with you on the most friendly and favorable basis for you, looking to the discontinuance of your services." That was about what they would say, he supposed.

"I want to say first and right off," Cramer began brightly, "that I very much regret my attitude and what I said in our talk this morning. I hope you'll accept my apology." He put out his hand and Lowry took it.

"Certainly no apology is necessary, but it's nice of you to say this. I feel very badly about it, to put it mildly."

"Now you mustn't feel too badly, because we're going to find a way out. I've got to leave again now. Could you come to my hotel at seven tonight for a further talk?"

"Certainly."

He was glad Rosalie was out when he phoned that he would not be home for dinner, as he was not sure he could have kept the reason to himself.

By six, when he left, the office was empty. He went down to the drugstore in the lobby and had a sandwich and a glass of iced coffee, glanced through an evening paper, and started uptown on foot to Cramer's hotel. At two minutes before seven he went up in the elevator and rang the bell at Cramer's door.

Cramer opened it himself and, going in, Lowry saw over the back of a chair facing the south windows the crisp hairs of Hewitt's head.

"Hello," he said. "Are you feeling better?"

Hewitt looked very worn. Cramer said that friend Hewitt had insisted on getting out of bed to be of whatever help he could, as soon as he had heard of the trouble. "There'll be just the three of us and we're not going to have anything to say about who's to blame. We're going to be constructive. Calvin, suppose you start us off." Voice and manner were benign.

"Well, Steve, I wouldn't be a bit surprised if when D. P. gives you his plan, you were to tell us you were hours ahead of us and it was rolling."

"Have you done anything yet, friend Lowry?" Cramer asked.

"No."

He waved the "no" aside and said, "That's all right. Go ahead, Calvin."

"I think I've told you, Steve, that I've always made it a point to keep the good will of the little fellows I started with. Never got too big for them. Now in your way you have that same quality."

"You and I had some words about Doran's resignation," Cramer interjected with a smile. "You were right. I was wrong. You kept his good will, helped him get a job."

"I wouldn't say that about the job."

"It amounts to the same thing. Now, friend Lowry, the way out of our problem is apparent. You can pick up that telephone and put a call through to Paris for your brother-in-law or Doran. I leave that to you. Explain what's happened and have Doran go to the Venezuela ambassador in Paris—let him give the ambassador the whole story, including this list of benefactions C. I. C. has made to Venezuela. The ambassador can tell Caracas whatever he pleases, so long as all present bids are thrown out and new bids asked. I quite understand some money will have to pass, but it will be a manageable amount, not a disaster. When in Rome—well, you know the old saying. You see how perfectly the whole thing meshes—your brother-in-law's natural desire to help you, Doran's chance to make up ——"

"And the ambassador?"

Cramer chuckled. "I guess I needn't tell you about Latin American diplomats after your long experience."

Hewitt got up and came over to put his hand on Lowry's shoulder. "Steve, believe me, it's the thing to do and you can do it easily."

"Is there any more to this?" Lowry asked.

"No," Cramer replied. "There are details, but they're going to be left to your own good judgment."

"Well, of course, I would never do what you propose, so there's no more to say," Lowry said. "Mr. Lainvee wouldn't be a party to it any more than I would. Nor would Daran—which, by the way, is his name."

"You seem to be taking a moral tone," Cramer said, "about a business proposal while a matter of primary morals didn't bother you at all. You insult, if I may be permitted the word, Mr. Hewitt and me by implying we have asked you to do something improper. All we have done is suggest a way for you to get out of your trouble."

"Does Mr. Delano know of this?"

"Naturally he knows," Cramer said, "of your trouble. What we have said here is within these four walls and between the three of us."

"You told him. What did he say to you?"

MOTHERS! SAVE 50¢ ON YOUR FIRST BOX

Take the word Chux (in white letters) from the pink-striped end panel on the $1.98 box. Write your name and address on reverse side of panel and send to

Chux
Box 49-C
Mount Vernon, New York

Chux will refund 50c for box panel mailed on or before Sept. 1, 1957. Limit 50c per customer.

Offer good in Continental United States and Territory of Hawaii. Subject to state and local regulations, and not valid where restricted or forbidden by law.

"I was obliged to call him out of a meeting," Cramer said. "I can only tell you he was aghast."

"Well, I shall see him in the morning," Lowry replied, "and tell him what I propose."

"Suppose you tell us now."

"Steve, let me urge you to consider what it would mean to you to have the solution on its way before you see him. I think I can speak for D. P. when I say, with this book of yours now out of the way, as he tells me, we can forget bygones."

"We certainly can," Cramer added. "If you feel I can put it to Doran better than you, well and good. Or Calvin can, if you prefer that."

"You don't seem to understand I will not allow it to be put to Daran or my brother-in-law."

"We have been frank with you. Why can't you be frank with us?" Cramer asked.

Lowry looked at him. There was something almost and truly pathetic in his tone. He was not the shifter, the turncoat, the little valiant that Hewitt was. He was one of those men without any ability to see himself as he was, and he was in water far over his head. Sure that blame was as clear-cut as an arithmetical error, he wanted to be sure it was all Lowry's before it was all his own.

"There is nothing more I have to say tonight," Lowry told him and went to the door.

Late in the afternoon Rosalie drove up to her door and got out of the car, hot, sticky, exasperated. That morning the cook had appeared with one bare foot enormously swollen from an insect bite and demanded that she be taken to her sister in Brooklyn where she could "have some care." Doctor Hovey's arrival and assurance that hot Epsom-salt soakings would cure it by night did not shake her strong wish to be with her sister.

The way to the City of boarded-up Churches was difficult, though vestiges of its once Victorian charm—trees, a street of detached frame houses amid a long line of brownstones—fascinated her. The married sister and her neighbor, with their children, were waiting on the sidewalk, in the evident hope that a mad dog had bitten their relative.

"Oh, no," Rosalie said, "it wasn't the dog."

"It was that dog, all right," the cook said. "It's his fleas and the ants all over the place ——"

All glanced at Rosalie. She said she was very sorry and carried Helga's large bag up the steps.

"Will you call me when you're better, Helga?" Rosalie asked. "You must rest until you're entirely well."

"I don't know when that will be, Mrs. Lowry. The pain's already running up my leg. It costs you plenty when you have to have them off," Helga replied as though she had already had a number of pedal amputations.

"Well, we expect to pay for everything," Rosalie said.

"Money doesn't buy a leg," the married sister said. All the children began to cry and the neighbor made a general comment on the heartlessness of certain people.

An hour and a half later, Rosalie reached Garden City for shopping she had to do for the children. Coming out to drive home, she found herself in the worst of the afternoon heat. The way back was one long detour around new roads, new sewers, new shopping centers, new developments.

She got out of the car with an armful of bundles. From the garden side of the house she heard the children yelling. She hurried into the cool, dim house, hoping to bathe and change a very damp and wrinkled linen dress before she faced the children. They ran her to earth by the hall table and she looked at them in amazement as they embraced her. They were all clean and scrubbed, all of them in spotless shirts and shorts.

"Oh, mummy, we're so glad to see you," Lainvee said, mounting the table to hug her. "The most wonderful thing. We're going to have a club and you will be head and daddy will be storyteller and Richard will be treasurer and we meet every Sunday evening and I thought up the most wonderful name for it. The Sprikeling Club, you know like a sprikeling day. Oh, mummy, say we may and daddy is storyteller but members like Peter and me and Richard can tell stories, too, like when we were children."

Richard broke in: "And, mummy, come out now in the hammock and tell us about when you were a little girl in Estonia. Please, mummy, it's as cold as ice in the hammock."

"Please, mummy, about Uncle Armas teaching you to swim."

"Oh, darlings ——" she said.

"Why are you crying?" Lainvee asked. "Because you don't know what happened to grandmother and grandfather? Would you like to tell a happier story?"

"No," she said. "Any story you want, but wouldn't you like me to have a bath and change my dress first? I'm so sticky."

"Oh, no, you smell best of any mother in whole Ridingtown and Penny Rossiter thinks so too," Lainvee said.

In the hammock she told the often-told tale of herself as a child on the Baltic dunes. Smoky came to listen, sitting torridly against her ankles. They all sighed happily when she finished.

Then with cries of "Me, me, me," all three children were off in a flash to answer the ringing telephone. The winner, Richard, called his mother. She came to answer, hoping it was not Stephen to say he would be late.

"Mrs. Lowry, this is Martha Rossiter. I've been trying to get you, but you were out."

"Oh, I'm sorry."

"I should like to see you right away and unfortunately I must be here. Could you come to the school? I can't very well explain over the telephone."

"Why, yes," Rosalie said. It could mean, she supposed, but one thing. She was being summoned, politely, to testify in her own behalf before Ridingtown's high court of respectability. Anger, shame and embarrassment surged through her.

"I'll explain, but, on the off chance that Lainvee might want to play with Penny, would you come alone?"

When Stephen reached home at about nine she had not returned. The children told him where she had gone and he called the Rossiters' house. The maid said Mrs. Rossiter had gone out to dinner and then the movies, but what movie she did not know. She said she didn't know Mrs. Lowry by sight, but yes, a lady had been there and left in her car about five-thirty.

SUBURBAN SONG

By MARJORIE LEDERER LEE

Of all the sounds, enchanting, clear,
That fall upon suburban ear—
A bark of dog, a hum of bee;
A burst of robins, April-free;
A church bell, sonorous and sweet,
Winging its way from Maple Street;
The splash of hoses, fresh as dawn,
The whir of mowers on the lawn;
A tree saw, and a model plane;
The whistle of a distant train;
A cricket clicking out its code,
And children shouting in the road—

Of all the sounds that stop and start
And make a music in my heart
The best occurs at after five:
A car that turns into the drive,
Brakes smartly in the evening gloam,
And tells me that my love is home!

What do giraffes have to do with High Blood Pressure?

IN ITS SEARCH for more knowledge about baffling diseases, medical science takes some strange turns. For example, doctors have gone to Africa to study the blood pressure of giraffes.

They found that it takes an unusually high pressure to pump blood from the giraffe's heart to his brain—a distance of some 14 to 15 feet. Yet, its heart and blood vessels are not under strain.

Doctors are trying to learn more about how this is accomplished for it could shed new light on the disorder affecting an estimated 6 million Americans—high blood pressure or hypertension.

This condition causes certain of the smallest blood vessels to tighten up and make the heart work harder to maintain the flow of blood through the body. Fortunately, most cases of hypertension can be helped by proper treatment.

This condition can often be controlled simply by relieving day-to-day emotional stresses . . . worry, tension and "drive" . . . which push blood pressure up and tend to keep it excessively elevated.

If you have hypertension, your doctor may suggest a way of life especially adapted to your needs. Among other things, he will probably recommend—

1. Plenty of rest, including a short daily nap and 8 to 9 hours of sleep every night, since blood pressure usually falls during rest.

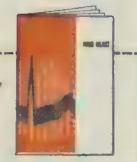
2. Avoidance of fatigue. If you stop short of tiredness, you can accomplish more in the long run and also overcome the tenseness and irritability that come with fatigue.

3. Weight control. This is an important factor in treating, and possibly preventing, hypertension. In fact, hypertension is four times as common in overweight men as in those who are underweight.

If changes in living habits do not control this disorder, then other treatments . . . including medicines, special diets or surgery . . . may be used.

Hypertension is usually more easily controlled when discovered early. This emphasizes the importance of periodic health examinations for everyone. Those who have reached middle age, are overweight, or whose parents or close relatives had elevated blood pressure should be especially watchful.

When hypertension is diagnosed, a patient should continue to see the doctor regularly. Then possible complications can be prevented, postponed or, if they occur, treated promptly.



Other helpful and encouraging facts about hypertension are given in Metropolitan's booklet, "Your Heart." Return the coupon for your free copy.

COPYRIGHT 1957—METROPOLITAN LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY

Metropolitan Life Insurance Company

(A MUTUAL COMPANY)

1 MADISON AVENUE, NEW YORK 10, N. Y.

Metropolitan Life Insurance Company
1 Madison Ave., New York 10, N. Y.

Please send me Metropolitan's free booklet, "Your Heart," 7-57-J.

Name_____

Street_____

City_____ State_____

New Spray-Set
by the makers of
Lustre-Creme...

SETS HAIR TO STAY THE SOFTEST WAY!

SUPER-SOFT
LUSTRE-NET HAIR SPRAY

Loved by Hollywood Stars because it's non-drying... contains no lacquer... mists hair with Lanolin!

HOLLYWOOD FOUND IT FIRST—NOW IT CAN BE YOURS!

There are 2 types of Lustre-Net. Super-soft for loose, casual hair-do's. Regular for hard-to-manage hair. 5½ oz. can—a full ounce more! Only $1.25 plus tax.

"What did your mother wear?" he asked Lainvee.

"That blue linen. She had it on all day."

Yes, the lady had on a blue dress. Yes, she would leave a note for Mrs. Rossiter to call Mr. Lowry.

He sent the children off to bed, waited while ten minutes took twenty years to pass and called the police, gave a description of Rosalie, and the license number of the car, and asked if any accident had been reported. They checked and said no. He hesitated. "You would know, wouldn't you, if something more serious had happened?"

"We'd only know, Mr. Lowry, if it were reported or a body or abandoned car were found. Nothing so far. We'll have our cars on the lookout."

He remembered the caveat from Jane Alden about the school, but whatever Mrs. Rossiter might have said, it was impossible to suppose so essentially levelheaded a person as Rosalie could have been overcome by it. She had left the house before his message about being late, so she would not be at some friend's for supper. And she was not one of those people who stop for a minute and have no idea of the passage of time. Anxiety became almost certainty that she had been waylaid. Yet a former Resistance officer would not fall easily into a trap.

Then he saw the lights of a car turning in the gates and went to meet it. He saw it was a police car with its red top light—coming to break the dreadful news.

The police driver had been one of those in the boat. "Just checking, Mr. Lowry. Your wife left here to go to the Ridingtown School. Have you any idea where she'd have gone from there?"

"I told the lieutenant I had no idea——"

"Is there anybody she'd be likely to meet?"

"No, no. I explained that ——"

"O.K. O.K., keep your shirt on. We'll find her." His radio crackled and he held up his hand. Lowry could make nothing of the gibberish coming over it. "Nothing. Bus rammed a car in Lynbrook. See you."

At twelve minutes past ten, as he stood in the doorway within arm's reach of the telephone, she arrived. He ran to the car and as she opened the door he picked her up in his arms.

"Are you all right?"

She turned her mouth away as he kissed her, but put her arm around his neck. "What you mean, yes. I must get to the telephone. Put me down."

She looked exhausted but composed in the light. He followed her into the library.

"Close the door," she said, picking up the telephone. "Give me the overseas operator." Then her voice broke and she said, "Stephen, please help me. I can't speak. Get Armas. He must come at once."

In the long wait she told him in a torrent of emotion, sometimes in his arms, then with the length of the room between them. Mrs. Rossiter had said it was difficult for her. She knew it was difficult for Rosalie. There was the possibility of a mistake.

"I thought it was all about the rescue. She said she knew I was born in Estonia from the children's application. Then she said it all came from a newspaper account of the rescue and my picture. She said, 'Mrs. Lowry, have you any idea what I am going to say?' I shook my head and she said, 'I never had this experience before. Forgive me if I do it badly.' She had not seen the article or the picture. A maid of the Dubosques', who have the school in Lattington, went to Mrs. Dubosque and showed them to her. She said it was a wonderful thing. And the maid said she had shown them to their new school cook, who said, 'It is not wonderful to me. That woman is my sister.'"

"Inge?" he asked.

She nodded. "I've been there. It is Inge. She looks over sixty. I said, 'Inge, my darling, what joy to find you.' I told her about Armas and that I would help her pack her things and she must come with me and she said she never wanted to see me again. Oh, Stephen, she is full of hatred. She said, 'I have no sister. I have no family. I don't want anyone. Go away.'"

"Darling, in the first surprise of seeing you it may not have been unnatural."

"She wouldn't listen to anything. She looked horrible—old, some of her teeth gone, her hair thin and pulled back—and she said, 'Did you ever suffer?' I tried to answer and she said, 'You look as young and beautiful as when you ran away from your mother and sister that day in Tallin while they searched for you.' I said I had not run away, I couldn't get home. Stephen, you have to hear all she said. She said did I want to learn what they did to my mother and her, and, oh, Stephen, how many there were and that she had remembered it all these years except when she mixed it up with the day the Nazis came. And I said, 'Inge, my sister, you must try to forget.' She screamed at me that she did forget with her cooking, and her clean food, until she saw me. And did my husband, the American businessman she read about, know about wars and labor camps? I said you knew and understood everything, and she said, 'Does he know what it's like when you're no longer good enough for a Nazi camp guard?' I think I'm sorriest of all for you because now I'll never be riante again for you, and that's all there is about me you really love."

"Dear," he said calmly, "there are some other things."

"I have no right to this house and its lovely things." She looked around the room at the new things bought in America. On the sofa were some of the children's things and she sat down holding them, overwhelmed by the thought of her mother and all the tender little things of girlhood.

"You must stop crying this way," Stephen said. "Inge is ill and we shall have her cured. You mustn't get sick. Too much depends on you."

"Everything I said about love she rejected and kept telling me the horrible things that happened to mother and her. That last morning I saw her she was one of the most beautiful girls I've ever seen, and now she's ghastly like someone from the House of the Dead. I tried to put my arms around her. She said I had hidden from them that day. You must understand what happened, you must let me speak of it. I can't go on with it inside me any longer."

"Dearest, I knew when Nedberg translated as 'an unhappy time' whatever you told him, I didn't need ——"

"But I need to tell it. Can't you listen?"

"Yes, of course," he said quietly. He started toward her and she shook her head, standing by the fireplace half turned away.

"I was at the bakery three streets from the flat. We thought we had several hours yet when their motorcycles burst into the street and, farther down, I saw them jumping out of their lorries. Then it seemed like masses of cavalry tore past at a gallop, spreading out across the square, and I saw I couldn't get home and I saw a cellar door under a shop. I ran down the steps. It was dark and I crouched in a corner. I could hear them yelling and some firing and I was terrified more at the moment because I was afraid mother and Inge would try to go to the bakery to find me. I had on a pretty little wrist watch father had given me and I could see its dial in the dark and I thought of the long-long daylight that day. You could tell from the noise that the streets were full of soldiers! You cannot imagine how frightening it was. Late in the afternoon I could tell by glass breaking and the yelling that they were beginning to loot the

A man who has tried to play Mozart, and failed, through that vain effort comes into position better to understand the man who tried to paint the Sistine Madonna, and did.

GERALD W. JOHNSON
A Little Night-Music
Harper & Brothers

shops. I heard them breaking the shutters open over my head, and then the door. It was a little dress-and-notions shop. Then three of them came down the other stairs in the cellar and saw me."

"My darling."

"It wasn't then. They were laughing and they weren't drunk yet, and an officer with a flashlight came in and began to question me. I was afraid to say who I was because of father. They took me to the street. It was crowded with their horse wagons, piled with every sort of thing from the shops. Three doors away there was a sort of headquarters where people were being questioned and sent off under guard to the railroad. I saw a woman I knew who whispered to me that our apartment house was full of them and mother and Inge were arrested. I was taken before a colonel and when he saw me he ordered his aide and his orderlies out of the room and he sat on the edge of the desk, offering me a cigarette. He said I was very beautiful and that he could tell from my face that I was an aristocrat and I said I was a peasant. I mustn't think they were rapists; was I afraid, he asked? I tried to say no. He took my hand and I couldn't get it away and he said that if I was nice to him, I had nothing to fear and that he would protect any women in my family too. I didn't believe him. He drew me to him. He kissed me. I didn't struggle. I was trying to think. Then he released me. It was not beastly, a bare half minute, and I said, 'May I think a little?' and he said yes, not too long and if I said yes, I must mean it. He wanted love, real love, he said, and then he took my wrist watch off and put it in his pocket. Then a general and a lot of officers came in and soldiers marched me out to a room in the back of the place and I couldn't understand what they were saying. They left me alone. It was much later when two of them came back and I was terribly hungry, frightened as I was. It's hard to believe how quickly you get hungry at first. They were drinking and they offered me the flask. I knocked it away and the man holding it almost dropped it and he turned on me. I fought and fought. I forgot mother and Inge and everything but myself. One of them laughed and took his coat off and put it on the floor. The other one did it first. I don't know when it was he fell asleep. The other one drank until he fell half asleep. I got up very quietly. The streets were almost quiet. The other one was by the door and when I opened it he sat up and started to pull me down beside him. I was on one knee. I managed to smile at him. I patted his cheek and made it clear I would be back in a moment. And he let me go. The streets were full of patrols. I could not go near our apartment. I realized my whole family were gone like my wrist watch. At the time I didn't want to live and yet I did, terribly. Each hour that I was not found I wanted more to live and escape. I knew in my bones my father was already dead and even then, as I have all these years, I tried not to think about what was happening to my mother and Inge. And now at last I can run away from it no longer because she has told me, hating me. I don't know what I shall do except that I can't go on even with you and the children as I did. Don't pity me. Be sorry for your poor self, married to me."

He went over to her.

"No, no," she said, crossing her arms.

The telephone rang and he reached across the sofa to answer it. There was the seemingly interminable pause before he heard Armas.

"Armas," he said, "Rosalie has found Inge here. . . . Yes. . . . Yes. . . . No, very bitter. . . . Yes, very old. . . . She is dead. . . . Can you leave tomorrow night? . . . Good. . . . He wants to speak to you, darling." He handed the phone to Rosalie.

"Oh, Armas, come quickly. She may listen to you because you were taken. . . . I don't know. . . . Good-by. . . . What? . . . Oh, what does it matter about me?"

When she hung up, he took the telephone and asked for the police and told them Mrs. Lowry had returned. That there had been trouble with the car.

She sat, breathing like a spent swimmer. "Now that you know about that day and night it's almost like the stone rolled away, but I don't see how you will stand being with me. I thought about telling you all the way home." In a moment she went on, almost without emotion. "Mrs. Dubosque sent me out to speak to her alone. She was looking down absorbedly at carrots she was dicing and there was an air of peace about her until she glanced up. I said in Estonian, 'Inge, my sister, what joy to see you,' and she said, 'I have no wish to see you. I have no family. I have my work.' And when I talked to Mrs. Dubosque before leaving, I said I hadn't been able to persuade her to come to our house. Was it possible for her to keep her temporarily? She said she knew how bitter Inge was and realized how terrible it had been for us, but that I must understand that to her Inge was an individual and that if she wanted to stay with her, her conscience would not let any pressure be worked on her. She said that Inge had had a thorough medical examination, and was entirely well. The school psychiatrist found her competent, self-reliant and adjusted to her sphere in life."

"But, dear, all this is very encouraging. Stop crying. Here, blow your nose." He tossed a large, clean handkerchief into her lap. She obeyed, trying without success to control her tears.

"I feel as though if everyone's to know my sister went through these things and is a school cook —— Oh, Stephen, if she won't come to us, what am I to do? How am I to go on day after day with her so close, without seeing or talking to her?"

"Dear, she's alive. Time and love are on your side. All these other things will be solved."

He looked at her, his heart aching with love and pity for her woe. If anything, her story had been less dreadful than he had feared.

"What is it," he asked, "that you blame yourself for? I understand the first shock of seeing Inge, changed as she is. I know that any arrangements will be very difficult. They will not be impossible. This is all very terrible, but are you glad or not that Inge's alive? Or is a dead sorrow better than a living?"

"Why do you ask such a terrible question?"

"Because I want you to be yourself, the person who has learned to live with the present so well until now. Unless you feel you're superior to the human race, you have no reason to blame yourself for what you've done. Few people, none we know, have faced the terrible choice you did that day. To me you are superior to everybody else. Who else is capable of bringing Inge back to herself? Think of the challenge to your love and wisdom. And there's something else. You must not let me down. I need your love and absolute confidence because tomorrow Cramer may be able to force me out of the company. There was a great blunder in the bid for the bridge in Venezuela for which I am responsible."

"Oh, Stephen ——"

"Now don't be guilty about me."

"No, no," she said, "I won't. I'll take care of you. I'll help you. Oh, darling, if it helps I'll be riante."

"That," he said, "is very good news. I shall now carry you up to bed. All will yet be well."

"I know," she said, as he swung her up in his arms.

As he reached the bottom of the stairs with her, Richard's head poked over the banister. He yawned prodigiously, rubbed his eyes and said, "Oh, mum's home! That's super! Good night, dad, good night, mum."

Lowry awoke a little before seven the next morning. Rosalie was not beside him. The room was tidy and their bathroom empty. He was so light a sleeper, she so sweetly drowsy in the morning that for a moment he was half afraid of what might have happened.

He went to the head of the stairs, hearing the boys talking in their room. The aroma of coffee was in the air and he heard the chink of table silver as a sideboard drawer was opened.

"Forks and knives, mummy?" Lainvee was asking.

"Yes, darling, and spoons."

CYD CHARISSE LOVES LUSTRE-CREME SHAMPOO never dries–it beautifies thick and creamy...

blessed with lanolin!
needs no after-rinse!

of course, it leaves hair more manageable!

Cream or Lotion

NO WONDER IT'S THE FAVORITE SHAMPOO OF 4 OUT OF 5 TOP HOLLYWOOD MOVIE STARS

"Well, would Aunt Inge live here with us, then, mummy?"

Knowing that all was well, he went to shave and shower. When he came down, Rosalie met him at the pantry door with floury arms. Tired though she looked, he saw from the beauty and peace of her face that all was indeed well.

"Mummy's made scrumptious muffins, daddy, and I beat the eggs. I have to turn the bacon now," Lainvee informed him.

"Dear, I thought your wife's cooking your breakfast was what you needed on a day like this. Are you all right?" she asked, opening a drawer for a napkin to cover the muffins.

"I started early because I wanted to call Mrs. Dubosque, unless you think it's too terribly early, before you left. I have told Lainvee about Inge and she accepts it quite easily, so the boys will hear about it from her at breakfast. You do think I was right, don't you?"

"Oh, yes," he said, "but it was startling to find you gone from bed."

"Darling," she said, kissing him, "I am not a lie-abed-till-noon just because I don't like the sunrise. I was up very early in a place called Norway, if you can remember."

Mrs. Dubosque answered her call and brushed away her apologies pleasantly.

"I wanted just to ask whether my sister was there and as usual. Our brother will be here tomorrow and I thought I would make no further effort to see her before I talk to him. But if anything happens, will you call me, please? I can never tell you how grateful I am to you."

"Well, first, your sister is as usual. I think—now I can't be sure—but I think in spite of everything she was glad to see you, because this morning I said, 'Inge, your sister is a woman whose goodness shows in her face.' And she said, I thought just a little proudly, 'In a beautiful face.' I'll call you if there's anything. And please don't thank me."

"Just to be sure, please don't mention my brother's coming."

"No, of course not."

Rosalie drove Stephen to the station. There she said to him, "Now, my dearest, please understand that whatever you decide to do, I will help. I was not born of a peasant family for nothing. I have a savings account, a hoard in a small way, but plenty to pay off the maids and still have enough for the children's first-term tuition. And I have no objection to your getting rid of the car or the station wagon. Or of anything but me and the children."

"This is all very good, my angel," he said, "but I have no intention of losing to Master Cramer."

"No, I am sure of that too. I just wanted you to know you have a sensible wife with reserves—even reserves of love."

In asserting he was not going to lose to Cramer, Lowry had pretended to a greater confidence than he felt. As he went through the office, he saw that Curtis was already at his desk.

"Have you heard about Venezuela?" Lowry asked.

"Yes, I've heard," Curtis said. "I was at a meeting at Mr. Delano's when he was called out to hear it. I'm afraid it's rather a bad setback for you."

"I realize that."

"Mr. Delano is not a Rutledge. He blew his top. I couldn't but think how wise you'd been in not going to him about Parry." Curtis' voice was as cold as his words, his manner aloof as though he were making clear that he did not want to be involved in support of Lowry any more than of Parry. "For your information," he added, "Mr. Delano will not be at his office today."

Though Lowry had not expected him to say, "Well, it's not your fault; it's an organization mistake and we're all in on it," he had not expected so arctic an attitude.

The ordinary activity of the business filled the morning. Lowry talked to Delano's secretary about seeing him the next day. She said she would speak to Mr. Delano on his return. Paula Hewitt telephoned. She said Rosalie had told her about the book and had said not to call him but she was so sorry, it would have meant so much to Jim to be working on something with him again, and, besides, she had another reason for calling.

"Would you like some money for your Johnson Foundation? Something in low six figures to start with?"

He groaned, knowing of course what would follow if he accepted this offer. A first gift and then the next, then a place for Jim in the foundation, then why not on the board? She would say, "If you want him with you, Dennison and Caithness won't say no." And how holier-than-thou he would sound if he said, "Paula, you can't just buy his way back."

So he said, "Paula, this is very kind of you. I'd have to talk to Mrs. Johnson and ——"

"Oh, I'll talk to her," she said quickly.

"Well, let me think it over."

"But you could use the money, couldn't you?"

"Oh, yes."

"Then why don't you and Jim talk it over? Be a lamb and say yes. It would mean so much to him."

"All right," he said, "but not this week." He hung up with a sigh.

Before leaving his house the next morning he got word of delayed arrival for Armas and, calling Idlewild again on reaching the office, was told his flight was now expected at eleven-thirty.

He turned from his telephone call telling Rosalie that he would not be able to meet Armas, to find Cramer beaming.

"Friend Lowry, just by chance Miss Wilkins heard the operator telling you that your brother-in-law's plane was late and I hurried in to say how glad I am you've reconsidered my little suggestion."

"His coming over is fortuitous. He's come on a family matter."

"Why won't you tell me what you intend doing? I strongly urge you to work with me.

A new idea in smoking...

Salem refreshes your taste

Created by R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Company

SALEM is a new idea in smoking—you smoke refreshed. SALEM refreshes your taste the way a bright, clear spring day refreshes you! You get Springtime freshness in every puff! The freshest taste in cigarettes flows through SALEM's pure white filter... rich tobacco taste with a new surprise softness and menthol-fresh comfort. Smoke SALEM ... you'll love 'em!

Smoke Salem ... smoke refreshed

f you plan to go to Mr. Rutledge or Mr. Channing, I can tell you they carry no weight."

"I hope to see Mr. Delano if he's back."

"Do you know where he was yesterday?"

"No, I don't. Do you?"

"Do you feel that my proposed solution was thically wrong?" Cramer asked, without nswering.

"Well, I try not to sit in judgment on peo-le, but you must know what I think about t."

"In my desire to help perhaps I spoke too uickly, but any issue you raise on that will ot cover your responsibility for the loss we're nvolved in. Let me say one final word. You'll eed friends. You must know that Charley urtis won't lift a finger to help you. Hewitt s gone. Are you wise in turning on me? I lon't believe so. I think you'll find I'm right."

"Well, we shall just have to wait and see," owry replied and Cramer left. A few mo-nents later Lowry saw him with his hat on, eaving the office.

Shortly before noon he was surprised by a elephone call from Curtis, saying that he vas at Mr. Delano's office, where Lowry was sked to be at one-thirty.

"I had better tell you that Mr. Cramer has ust left, after giving us a run-down on the ridge. I'm afraid that's all I can tell you."

Lowry thanked him and buttoned his coat. He had already heard of Armas' arrival from Rosalie, who said that he was going alone to ee Inge. By nightfall they should know where hey stood at home and abroad.

When the receptionist at Delano's an-ounced him, Curtis came out after a moment ke a bailiff to lead im in.

Delano, behind his lesk, said, "Howdya lo," without getting p. A third man, look-ng out the window, urned around and aid, "Good after-noon, Stephen." It vas Rutledge.

"Before we get to his unfortunate busi-ess in Venezuela, Mr. Lowry, there are some questions I should like to ask you," Delano aid. He went on to say that he had a great nany interests—far too many, in fact—and owry must realize C. I. C. was only one of hem, though, because of long friendship and ssociation on many boards with Mr. Rut-edge and Mr. Johnson, by no means a small ne. "Now then, how do you and Mr. Cramer et along?" He asked the question as though he were inquiring how Lowry liked his new ouse.

"All right," Lowry replied.

"Are you interfered with at every turn?"

"No."

"Did his son—that is to say, his assistant—articipate in the bridge bid?"

"No, sir."

"But Mr. Cramer had asked for such par-icipation, had he not?" His tone was casual, ut there was now some acid in it.

"He had asked for general participation, omething that was difficult to arrange in ractice."

"So that he has no responsibility for this rror?"

"None. And he was in Chicago when I igned the bid."

"Had he been in New York, what would ave happened?"

"I suppose he would have seen the final igures before they went out."

"Might he not have caught the error, had he een given the chance?"

"That is possible."

Delano stared at him for a moment and hen said, "Would you mind if I had a word with Mr. Rutledge? Could you step outside a moment?"

"Certainly."

He was waiting in the anteroom when Henry Dennison hurried through with a curt greeting and joined the others. And it was perhaps five minutes before he was called back. From a glance at the faces he got no idea how it was going. The four of them had the air of judges about to sentence a man to whom they wished to show consideration rather than sympathy.

"Henry," Delano said, turning to Dennison.

"Yes. Mr. Lowry, when you were made a vice president of C. I. C. you presumably had already found out who the directors were and decided they were men in whom you could have confidence. Is that so?"

"Yes."

"Now these men, in whom you had confidence, after careful thought elected Mr. Cramer to be president of C. I. C. We want you to tell us what you think of their choice and decision."

Delano, with unexpected hospitality, lifted the cover of his silver cigarette box, pushed it toward Lowry and then took a cigarette himself, which Curtis lighted for him. Lowry shook his head.

"Do you regard that as an improper question, Mr. Lowry?" Delano asked.

"I think it's a very broad one."

"I'll reframe it," Dennison said. "Mr. Lowry, has a proposal for the settlement of the Venezuelan bridge been made to you which you find morally offensive? That is a simple question, pertinent to the issue."

He could not believe that Cramer had told them what he proposed, nor could he see how otherwise they had heard of it. But he was determined that he would not charge Cramer with it, above all in his absence.

"I'm not prepared to say that any proposal made in the excitement and the difficulty we're in is morally offensive. An idea I didn't like was put forward, possibly only to be shot at. That's all I have to say about it."

"I see," Dennison replied. "Do you mind telling us why your brother-in-law, Mr. Lainvee, came to New York so suddenly today?"

"No. My wife's sister, who disappeared when the Russians entered Estonia in 1940, has been found. I naturally telephoned my brother-in-law in Paris night before last and he's here."

"Oh, I'm delighted to hear that," Rutledge said.

"I'm sure we all are," Dennison said, "but I must put another question to you, if you'll allow me. Do you intend, in view of this happy coincidence, to use your brother-in-law yourself as was suggested?"

"The answer is no, and as emphatic as I can make it."

"Then what, Mr. Lowry, are you going to do to get us out of this grievous loss, for which in the final analysis you are responsible?" Delano asked.

"We shall have to take the money loss. Nonperformance would involve far greater losses in reputation and prestige."

"May I ask this?" Curtis said. "Have you considered the damage to our reputation and prestige which will result from our competitors' spreading the story that this was a deliberate error, made either to buy our way into a new field, or made because it suited a tax situation?"

"Does it suit a tax situation?" Delano asked quickly.

"It may," Curtis replied.

"Well, whether it does or not, we can't ask an easement in Caracas and we can't consult our competitors' wishes," Lowry said. "The bid had a fair margin of profit. I know we're not in business to do it for nothing, but I'm sure also that as regards the organization, our competitors, the Caracas government, we must proceed as though we still had a profit."

"We've concluded that is true," Delano said. "But it raises two points. What lesson are we to learn from it and, to put it frankly, are we safe in entrusting another bid, or rather the future of our foreign business, to you?"

"The second you must decide. As to the first you may be sure that all concerned have learned a bitter lesson they will not forget."

"Before asking you to retire again for a moment, Mr. Lowry," Delano said, "you are entitled to say anything you like. As you may know, we talked to Mr. Cramer this morning. Has this come about, in any part, because of pressures and annoyances put in your way by him?"

"In no way at all."

"As you look on the matter of Jim Peale, do you feel now that you could have handled it differently?" Dennison asked.

"I shall always wish I had had more wisdom, or that I had found some way to help him. But I don't see that I could have done anything different as regards the company."

"You know where he is today?" Dennison asked.

"Yes, I do."

"Now will you be good enough to give us a few minutes?" Delano asked.

He had been waiting some time when the receptionist told him his secretary wished to speak to him.

"Mr. Lowry, I'm sorry to bother you. Mr. Cramer is looking for you and I didn't tell him where you were. He wants me to trace you, call your house, and so on. What shall I do?"

"Tell him you just heard from me and that I'm here."

"Thank you."

He went back to his chair with outward composure. He was inclined to feel he had not

I regard marriage as the holiest institution among men. Without the fireside there is no human advancement; without the family relation there is no life worth living.

ROBERT INGERSOLL

FOR A LIMITED TIME – the Shulton Dusting Powders packaged with a gift of matching Toilet Water – at the price of the Dusting Powder alone, 1.40 and 1.65. At leading department and drug stores.

done well. The best he could say was that he had not been drawn into an attack on Cramer.

He heard the receptionist speaking. "Mr. Lowry, would you come through here? That door," she directed. "Mr. Rutledge will see you in there."

Well, Lowry thought, it will at least come at the hands of a friend.

"Sit down, Stephen," Rutledge said soberly. "When we first talked New Year's Eve afternoon you said something to the effect that your job might not be such 'fun,' et cetera. Do you remember that?"

"Yes."

"It troubled me at the time. What did it mean?"

"To paraphrase Chester Barnard, I suppose it was a poor way of saying there was not enough vitality in dollars alone to make business anything but a lifeless failure."

Rutledge pondered it a moment. "I remember how you looked when you came to me about Jim. I watched you while you were being questioned now. It hasn't been fun for you, has it?"

"No, not fun," Lowry said.

"I suppose there was a quicker and easier way of telling you what we decided. The others felt it necessary to do it this way. However you may feel about it, you have the satisfaction of knowing that each of us was deeply impressed by the way you behaved in there and by what you would not be drawn into saying. I don't know just how to tell you this, Stephen," Rutledge said, rising and walking around the room, hands in his pockets.

"You can tell me straight out," Lowry replied.

"In the first shock of Jim's tragedy, I took the easiest way out. I'm ashamed of it now. If ever a man was called on to stay and face the consequences of what was his own negligence or misjudgment, I was that man—though I did not, of course, foresee Tom's breakdown. But I should have. As a consequence we put in a man who, all of us ought to have known, was utterly unfitted for the place. Jim's affair was so shocking that we went to the other extreme. Harold Titcomb came out to warn me. Titcomb, the head of the mail room, saw what none of us saw. Bill Delano thought the sun rose and set in Cramer. Well, I'll not go on, but on September first I'm resuming the presidency of C. I. C. Bill Delano will keep the chairmanship, pending some negotiations I'll tell you about. What do you think of it?"

"Well, I think it's marvelous. What happens to Mr. Cramer?"

"Oh, we're sugaring the pill, you may be sure. We can use him in the Shelbyville project. He doesn't know yet. Now what about you? You've elected to say nothing against Cramer and I'm not going to ask questions ——"

"I better say this. I elected not to go into trivialities and personal matters with or about him, but I want to make clear that I was not prepared to lose to him on the large issue of the bridge."

"Henry Dennison had a call from Hewitt about Cramer's plan to use Daran and your brother-in-law," Rutledge told him. "He also told Henry about his wife and Jim. With Bill and Henry, a senior warden and an elder of the kirk, you had every chance, my boy, of saying the wrong thing. Cramer said it in every instance. Well, now, I'm going to have your support?"

"You want it in spite of this bridge business?"

"Most decidedly." Rutledge put out his hand. "Susan and I are looking forward to Rosalie's and your dining with us Saturday."

"I have tried to avoid personalities, but I would like to know before we go in there: is Charley Curtis opposed to this and to me, as his manner indicates, and has for several days?"

Rutledge smiled. "In a way Charley has brought it about. What you said to him about Parry brought him out to see me. In his quiet way he has great influence, and when he told Delano that Cramer must go, or he would, the thing was settled. Bill Delano spent yesterday with me. Charley was sure you would behave as you did, but he wanted Delano to see for himself. If anybody but Charley had told us you had no idea what was coming we wouldn't have believed it. Or believed the intolerable annoyance Cramer has been to you. You know, I have been terribly depressed about my responsibility for Jim—and now about Calvin—but when I consider that in our whole organization only two men without character have appeared, I don't feel too badly."

"They are not entirely without character," Lowry said. "They both missed the great builder of character."

"Which is?"

"A happy marriage."

They went through to Delano's office.

"I hope you don't feel we were too hard on you, Mr.—er, Stephen," Delano said. "And I would like you to know I never understood what advance-action cables meant, had never heard the word."

Curtis was smiling. "I shouldn't have blamed you if you had told them that I said I was too tired to fight with Cramer. I think we'd better get back to the office. Cramer's due here shortly."

"Yes, and you and I better get out, Henry," Rutledge said.

Delano shook his head sadly and then said "Oh, Stephen, I'd like to have some men meet Mr. Lainvee at lunch or dinner, whichever

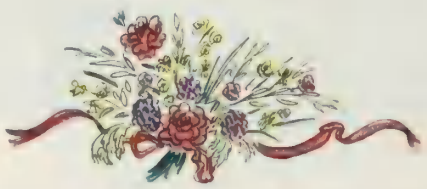
CONTINUED ON PAGE 78

POTPOURRI

Keeps the beguiling scents of your summer garden in the house the year round.

By MARIE ROSS

STUART



Rose jars used to be found in many American houses. In these jars, rose petals were blended with spices and oils, and seasoned. They were not only decorative but useful, giving out a lovely scent when the jars were opened.

The old recipes for potpourri were often very elaborate and time-consuming, requiring a great deal of patience in the making. The modern method of drying the petals is much simpler and the process enables more of the colors and shapes of the flowers to be retained.

It is, of course, more fun to use flowers from your own garden, if you are fortunate enough to have one; however, flowers may be obtained from greenhouses, nurseries or florist shops. Flowers other than roses can be used in making potpourri. If roses are hard to come by, try using such things as violets, pansies or any other scented flower that you find dries successfully. Wherever you get your flowers, be sure that they are really fresh; and if they come from your garden, pick them in the morning after the dew is dry. Choose flowers that are not quite full out, as the scent is at its peak at that time.

The simplest, fastest and most effective method of drying the petals is to use a box of sand. The petals should be placed on a layer of sand, then sprinkled with more sand. Do not put too many petals in one box as they may mildew. After drying for a few days in some secluded warm corner of the house, the sand should be sieved out with a colander or kitchen sieve and the petals are then ready to be blended with the spices, oils and fixatives which release their delicious, subtle scents in the room. Leaves, such as rose geranium or lemon verbena, should be dried in separate boxes.

We have selected two of the most successful recipes for you to try. When the potpourri is completed it can be put into small glass jars to be given to friends, or kept to bring the perfumes of the flower garden into your own house.

POTPOURRI DELIGHT

1 quart rose petals (red and deep pink)
3 rosebuds (deep red)
2 small daisies (yellow)
6 violets (African or blue)
6 mint leaves
4 rose-geranium leaves
1 fern leaf (for decoration)
1 tablespoon dried orange peel (crushed)
1 tablespoon each of: ginger, cinnamon, ground cloves, nutmeg, allspice
2 tablespoons orris root (crushed)
5 drops oil of jasmine
2 pounds sand or fine aquarium gravel
½ cup kitchen salt

DRYING METHOD: Dry rosebuds, daisies and violets whole in separate box from leaves and other petals. Keep boxes of drying flowers away from sunlight and drafts. Dry until petals are crisp.

MIXING METHOD: Place rose petals, daisies and whole violets in large bowl. Add orris root (a fixative for petal scents and oils), blend with spices, orange peel, crushed mint and rose-geranium leaves, ½ cup salt and the jasmine oil. Add bits of fern leaf for decoration. Pack in jars or other containers and seal tightly.

For extra fragrance, seal the petals, after drying and before mixing, in quart jars with 2 tablespoons salt. Let stand for three weeks and then mix as above with other ingredients.

POTPOURRI PACKET

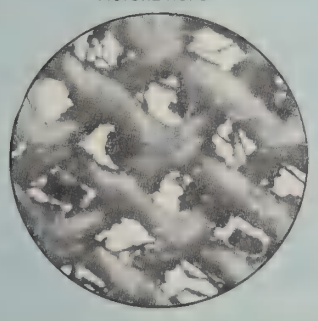
Petals from one dozen roses (red and deep pink)
1 pint lavender flowers
2 daisies (yellow)
12 mint leaves
4 rose-geranium leaves
1 fern leaf
1 tablespoon each of: stick cinnamon (crushed), ground cloves, nutmeg, allspice, ginger, caraway seed
2 tablespoons orris root or calamus root (crushed)
5 drops oil of jasmine or bergamot

METHOD: The method of drying and mixing is the same as in the recipe for Potpourri Delight.

CLEAN CLEAR THROUGH

—and Deodorized Too!

THAT'S A FAB WASH!



Microscope, magnifying fabric 100 times, shows the amazing difference between FAB-washed clothes and others washed with less effective products. FAB (see Picture No. 2) gets clothes clean clear through, not just surface clean . . . not just bleached white or blued white. Millions of women use washday products (see Picture No. 1) that let soil and scum pile up in clothes. Do you? Dirt can cause odor! No such problem with FAB-washed clothes. They're really clean, yes, clean clear through—and deodorized, too!

Millions use washday products that leave hidden dirt in clothes. Dirt can cause odor . . .

PICTURE NO. 1

Clothes washed with modern FAB are clean clear through—and deodorized, too . . .

PICTURE NO. 2

FAB Is The Hard-Working, Heavy-Duty Detergent For The Whole Family Wash . . . And Dishes, Of Course!

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 76

suits him. I'd suggest dinner at my house at Cold Spring. Will you ask him about it and let me know?"

At a quarter past four Lowry's telephone rang and Cramer asked him if it would be convenient to come to his office, "Or I can come to you."

Lowry said that he would be right in. Whatever his feelings toward Cramer might be, pleasure in his downfall was not one of them. But Cramer was standing by his desk, looking like a feline that has just eaten a small yellow songbird.

"Charley's had to go out and can't join us, but I didn't want to hold you up. Sit down, please. Let me say right off that what I have to tell you should not affect you. I made it a prior condition of my agreement that you are to go on, others are to go on, just the same as though I were here to look out for you. But, friend Lowry, if the President of the United States appeals to the American Red Cross in some disaster, they answer the appeal."

"You mean that you're going to do something for the Red Cross?"

"For years, as you know, I have been the Red Cross—in a management sense, that is to say—to the Founders Trust Company or the industries represented on their board. Well, I pack my grip tomorrow and head out for Shelbyville, Kentucky. That whole setup there is, as we used to say in the war, snafu. I know what you're going to say: I'm needed here. But, friend Lowry, if you'd been in my shoes today, being asked for help by Mr. Delano, you couldn't have found it in your heart to say no, any more than I could."

He leaned back in his chair and, from every outward sign, appeared to be a man entitled to a good deal of satisfaction in what he had accomplished. As he would have phrased it, Delano had done it in the nice way.

"This will be the seventeenth rescue—or, to put it another way, the seventeenth time I have been the disaster unit to a hard-hit business. Well, I know you and I'll meet often, but I wanted you to know how much I value our friendship and the help you've given me." He put out his hand and Lowry shook it heartily.

"Knowing you has been a rare experience, Mr. Cramer," he said. "I wish you every possible luck."

"Thank you," Cramer said, beaming.

Lowry telephoned Rosalie from the station, asking her to meet his regular train, telling her what had happened.

It was still hard for Stephen to take in what it meant to be free of Cramer. It was even invigorating to realize that hereafter there would be no excuse for anything he himself did, and that all his immediate associates would be men who were his equals or superiors.

As Rutledge had said, the months had not been fun, nor in prospect were those ahead likely to be. The day's work, even without the capital letters in which Cramer referred to it, blanketed his whole life. Whatever else, however personally important, he wanted to do was subject to its discipline. But he had been shown clearly today it was not the service of mammon and there was a great company besides himself who, having been born men, were unwilling to die as less. And what demanded more from the talents, aspiration and energies of men than the relentless purpose still to seek and find wisdom and beauty in spite of the din of the market place? Ardent the struggle, splendid the prize!

The club car was the last on the train, but Stephen was one of the first to reach the line of waiting wives, chauffeurs and parked cars. He kissed Rosalie as though it were the first in months.

"I'm full of ideas," he said. "Another book, better than Principal Errors. Trips, love under the stars, lots of business and beaucoup francs. Do you love me?"

"Oh, I adore you, but we must be very humble about all these blessings."

"I know. What about Inge?"

"Armas wasn't back when I left. I hope he hasn't been arrested. We were both so excited we forgot he had no driver's license."

Armas was soberly pacing the driveway as they turned in.

"Well," he said, "it went badly. Nothing I said seemed to be right. She was perhaps less bitter toward me—because I was captured—but she refuses help. And my suggestion that she would be happier in Europe with me offended her. I suppose one mistake was to let her see how shocked I was by the change in her, but I was overcome by emotion."

Rosalie patted his hand. "Don't blame yourself. So was I."

"Yes, but you had warned me ——"

"Armas, you are her brother. You're not a psychologist or a physician. You behaved like a brother and I don't believe it harmed her. We must remember it is a shock to her to see us. I think we can only move step by step, but all will be well, I am sure. Now I must get dinner. The children will be back from the beach in a few minutes. It's very blowy on the terrace and I think it's going to rain."

Shortly after dinner, Rosalie took the sleepy children and the exhausted Armas up to their beds. It was now raining heavily and the wind was wrenching at the branches of the trees and flattening the flower borders. Stephen, watching it from the darkened room, saw an apple tree, heavy with fruit, sink to the ground like a weary ballerina, her sequined skirt spread wide around her.

Rosalie came softly in, her feet in Wellingtons, as the children still called them. "Darling, I must see Inge tonight. I suddenly know what I must tell her. Will you drive me there, storm or no storm?"

"Of course. Get your coat," he said.

"You'll never know, Stephen, what heaven it is to have a husband who doesn't weigh pros and cons."

They were an hour and a half reaching Lattington, moving slowly through the torrential rain. Finally they saw the school's white shingle and turned in between the stone markers. Lights were on in the Dubosque cottage and they could see the low lines of the school adjoining.

The best minds that accept Christianity as a divinely inspired system believe that the great end of the Gospel is not merely the saving, but the educating, of men's souls, the creating within them of holy dispositions, the subduing of egotistical pretentions, and the perpetual enhancing of the desire that the will of God—a will synonymous with goodness and truth—may be done on earth.

GEORGE ELIOT

"Say a prayer," Rosalie said, getting out and steadying herself a moment before the wind. He watched through the lowered window as she ran to the vestibule and stood waiting. A light over her head snapped on and the door opened. He could see her talking to someone inside, then she turned to wave an instant to him and went inside.

It was three quarters of an hour before the door opened again. Rosalie stood in the vestibule alone, pulling on coat and soft hat. He leaned across the seat to open the car door and she got in with a sprinkling of rain.

"I wasn't sure until the last moment that I had succeeded. But I have, I am sure, because she wouldn't let me bring you in and she wouldn't come to the door because she didn't want you to see her as she is now."

"What did you tell her?"

"It's hard to repeat exactly. I realized today that she was someone to be proud of, not to pity and care for—that underneath her bitterness was wonderful strength and self-reliance, and that few people could survive, get to America, make their living as she was doing. I asked her to go away with me someplace for three or four weeks. And she asked what it would cost, and I said it didn't matter. Armas and we would arrange that. Finally she said that in another month she would have saved over five hundred dollars and that, if she could pay her own way, maybe she would. Then she asked if I had a picture of you and the children. and I said I hadn't brought my bag, but I could bring you in; I was sure you had pictures of them. It was then she said she wouldn't see you yet. Dear, we better leave. I see someone watching us from upstairs, and they must want to go to bed."

Stephen started the car, steering carefully around the winding, scarcely visible driveway.

"Oh, she said also that I must not press her to live with us."

"What do you think made her change?" Stephen asked.

"Different things. Armas's coming so quickly. He apparently quite broke down with her. And your bringing me on such a night. The terrible need even very brave people have to be wanted and loved, whatever they pretend."

"I must remember these roads. Rutledge wants us to dine Saturday night and Delano wants me to bring Armas to a men's dinner. Would you like to stop in a diner for some coffee?" he asked as they reached the Jericho Turnpike.

"Oh, darling," she said, "I want to be home. I'm not quite as composed as I sound. I'll get us some supper there." He could feel her trembling beside him and turned on the heater.

The house was quiet, snug and curtained from the storm. There were no messages by the telephone and Rosalie said, "Go up and count the children while I fix something."

They had some eggs and cocoa, washed their cups and dishes, put the pans to soak and went upstairs together.

"Are you very tired?" he asked.

She turned and gave him a little smile. "A little, not too tired."

He leaned back on the chaise longue, watching her as she undressed.

"I was wondering," he said, "whether I possibly had the brains to write a book about Chance and Destiny and was it always inevitable that I should volunteer for Sardine ——"

"And find a herring gutter?"

"Um. And did that bring Jim where he is and Calvin where he is? And put poor old Cramer out in Shelbyville?"

"And save Kenneth Hopkins from drowning? Oh, never tell Armas about that."

"Oh, no. But was it inevitable and did these other things happen because of it?"

"Darling, you are the most important man in the world in my eyes," she told him, "but even I suspect these people all had their own destinies."

He rose and took off his coat and tie and looked down at the rain-soaked cuffs of his trousers. His clothes would need pressing, and as Hewitt had once said, he would only have to leave them over a chair.

"I must have seen you get ready for bed three or four thousand times and each time it's like seeing a New-Found Land," he said.

"Dear, I'm too tired even to wash my face. Peasants and herring gutters ——"

"It's rain-washed. You know, I made a brilliant observation to Rutledge today. I told him something that transcends chance or destiny, God and mammon. Like all great truths, it is quite simple."

"I listen."

"A happy marriage is the great builder of character." END or gave a little practical help to someone in trouble. Nothing world-shaking, to be sure. Nevertheless, I am grateful to God for granting me a small place to make a home, cherish my neighbors, and look with wonder at the world.

DIARY OF DOMESTICITY

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 26

How brilliant the moon is after a sizzling day. The leaves on the maples hang motionless. How many wars they have lived through, how many changes in this world since they were planted as seedlings by our first Stillmeadow folk! And still they stand, and still grow toward the sky.

Possibly that is all we are meant to do, to grow toward the sky in our own way. I feel humble as I look at them with stars caught in their branches.

The dogs settle with long satisfied sighs. A cool air stirs the ruffled curtains, and the moon is right on the polished black oak floor of my room.

And this day, my unit of eternity, has been a good day, of chores done, work managed without fretting, people and dogs and cats cared for as best I could; and as I take a last look at the stars, I am grateful to God for the still and lovely night He has given us again. END

How to be the world's best outdoor cook

In three easy meals

Ten exciting new menu and recipe ideas from FRENCH'S, the world's most popular mustard

GOOD NEIGHBOR BRUNCH

Assorted fruit juice bar
Ham Slice with Minute Marvel Sauce
Eggs scrambled with parsley and French's Onion Salt Filled coffee cake

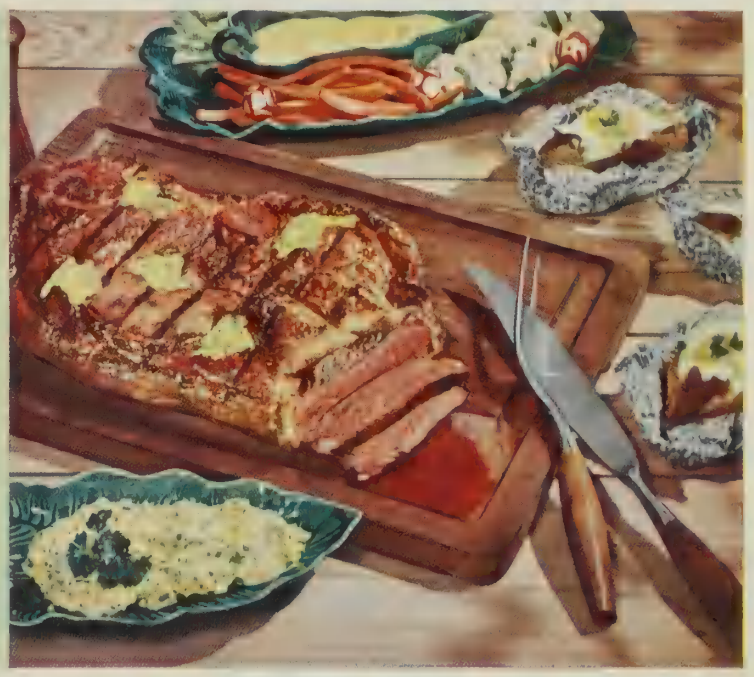
Ham with Minute Marvel Sauce

½ cup currant jelly
½ cup French's Mustard
1 precooked ham slice

Melt jelly over low heat. Stir in French's Mustard until well blended. (French's flavor won't fade out in cooking!) Brush one side of ham slice with mustard sauce. Broil 5 to 8 minutes depending upon thickness. Turn and brush second side. Continue to broil until nicely browned. Pour additional sauce over ham before serving. This sweet-and-sour sauce is also delicious served hot or cold with turkey or chicken.



HIGH NOON FAMILY FEAST

Steak with Savory Butter Spread
Foil-baked potatoes
Raw vegetables with dip of French's Mustard-flavored mayonnaise
Cherries and butterscotch brownies

Savory Butter Spread for Steak

¼ lb. butter
3 tbsp. French's Mustard
2 tbsp. chopped chives
2 tbsp. French's Parsley Flakes or chopped parsley
½ tbsp. French's Oregano

Have butter at room temperature. Cream in French's Mustard, chives, parsley, and oregano. (French's is the smooth-blending mustard!) Beat until well blended. Spread on hot broiled steak. Keep ready supply in the refrigerator for lots of uses. It's wonderful on chops, hamburgers and vegetables, too!

CANDLELIGHT TERRACE DINNER

Shrimp topped deviled eggs
Oriental Broiled Chicken
Rice cooked with chicken broth
Marinated green bean salad
Half watermelon filled with melon balls and fruit

Oriental Broiled Chicken

3 broilers, split or 6 halves
3 tbsp. French's Curry Powder
½ cup honey
½ cup French's Mustard

Rub 2 tablespoons curry powder into chicken before broiling. Combine remaining ingredients. Place chicken well brushed with sauce on grill, skin side up. Turn about every 5 min., basting each time in the sauce. (French's makes it smooth and spicy!) Cooking takes about 45 min., but exact time depends on heat intensity and broiler size. Meat's done if joint moves easily when you grasp leg bone.

On food...In food

no other mustard has the light and lively flavor of hurry more. They all scurried for the chimney corner behind the kitchen stove, where each had a little bundle of woolens stacked on the wood box. Bonnie climbed to one corner of the box, careful not to touch the hot stovepipe. She watched the others dress and listened to the excited plans which they made for the new one.

FRENCH'S MUSTARD

THE LITTLEST ONE

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 49

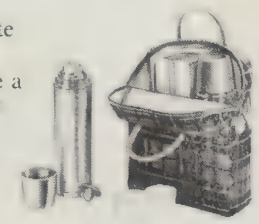
"I'll pull him all over the field in my new sled," said Timothy. "We'll tie on a basket and put blankets in it."

The Best Family Outings start with

THERMOS®



INSULATED

OUTING JUGS and ICE CHESTS

At home or away, THERMOS® jugs and chests are the center of attraction . . . and use . . . at any party or outing. Finished in handsome, two-toned green baked enamel, their extra-thick insulation provides maximum temperature retention. Jugs in one-gallon, two-gallon and five-quart sizes. Chests from 16 to 28-inch lengths. Styles and prices to suit every taste and purse.

To complete the family picnic, take a THERMOS® OUTING KIT

There are many brands of vacuum and insulated ware . . . the best known and most used bear the name

50th ANNIVERSARY THERMOS REG U S PAT OFF

THE AMERICAN THERMOS PRODUCTS CO.
NORWICH, CONN.

Canadian Thermos Products, Ltd., Toronto
Thermos (1925) Ltd., London

Yesterday, on Christmas Day, after the roast goose and the plum pudding, Timothy had given Bonnie a ride. It was fun until he made the sled turn over and spill her into the snow.

"I will go to the attic," said Alice, "and dust the cradle and polish it like new."

The cradle made a good game for rainy days. It was a game of pretend, with Alice the mother and Bonnie the baby. Bonnie would squeeze herself in while Alice fetched an old quilt from the trunk and covered her. Then Alice would rock the cradle and croon.

"And I," said Emily, whom mamma had taught to sew, "can make little shirtwaists and all sorts of snuggly things. And dress him myself."

Bonnie wished Emily would dress her. They all were pulling on their Mackinaws and stocking caps and mittens.

"Let's make a snowman," suggested Timothy, "one that's big enough to look through mamma's window."

Timothy was being very, very good this morning. He was not much older than Bonnie and not a bit bigger. Bonnie liked it when he played with her because he could think of such different things to do.

He looked up and saw her watching as he did the last button on his boot. Emily and Alice were already gone, but Timothy just stood, looking at Bonnie in her nightdress, not eating her oatmeal. Then he came close to her and she was afraid of the look on his face.

"Ha!" he whispered. "You're not the littlest any more. When papa gets a peppermint, he will give it to the new one. He's the littlest now."

Bonnie's eyes puddled.

Timothy banged happily out the door, singing, "Crybaby! Crybaby!"

Mrs. Burschendorff turned from the stove with a stick of pine wood in her hand.

"Dear, dear," she said. "Why can't you finish like a good girl? Put the Teddy bear down and eat. Why didn't Emily dress you as she was told to? Though I should think such a great girl as you might dress herself."

Then Mrs. Burschendorff popped the stick of pine into the leaping flame. She snatched the shaker and shook the grate, causing the fire to crackle and roar. But over the rattle of the grate, her voice went on complaining.

Outside the others were laughing and starting their snowman. The last one had been for Bonnie. Because she was too little to roll the balls of snow, Emily always saved the faces for her, putting pieces of coal into her hand and holding her up. "You make the best faces of anyone," she would tell Bonnie. And then they would all stand back and laugh and clap because Bonnie made such a good face.

She slipped off her chair. She decided she and Rudy, who loved her, must hide and never, never come out.

Where? Where was close enough so she could see mamma and papa weep for their lost one, but far enough never to find her? She stood in the parlor door, looking. The Christmas tree! What better place than in the corner, with piny smells and green branches and a candy cane if she wished it?

She wriggled, like a white shadow, past the low-hanging branches and scrooched down. She drew her knees up under her chin and tucked her nightdress under her bare toes.

"Don't you worry," she said to Rudy. "I won't let you be lonely."

She took his paws and lifted him high over her head.

"Diddle, diddle dumpling, sugar bun;
Come to Bonnie, littlest one," she whispered.

But it wasn't right when you whispered it. It was supposed to be sung out, with laughing.

She could see just a little of the bedroom. She could see mamma's braid, falling over the edge of the bed. Papa had put the back of the Morris chair down and a pillow under his head. There was no talking and everything was still, so they must be asleep. She could see nothing of the new one.

She talked to Rudy. "The new one will take my peppermint," she said. "He will sleep in the big bed with mamma and papa. He will make me a bother. He will try to take you away from me, but you must not let him. Scratch him and come back to me."

She dandled Rudy until he bounced out of her hands and fell with a plop on the floor, face down.

She scolded, "You were going to leave me. You were going to be his Teddy bear!"

She hit him on his face and on his stomach. She bit his ear. She wept.

Mamma woke up with a jump. "Bonnie!" said mamma quite frantically.

Bonnie pulled herself into a tight knot and held a hand over Rudy's red yarn mouth.

"Papa, papa, wake up!" said mamma.

He woke up right away. "What is it, my love, what is it?" he asked, bending over mamma.

"Where is Bonnie? Bring Bonnie to me. I haven't even seen her."

"Yes, yes," said papa. "I will, I will!"

WIFE

By EVA SPARKS TAYLOR

Quietly, in loving praise,
She let him know in gentle ways
Her never-failing faith. Success
That crowned his work was no surprise
To her who lived encouragement.
"His was a meteoric rise,"
They say, unknowing. Patiently
She lifted him from adversity
By always seeing him the man
That he might be. They wonder why
The great man chose so plain a mate,
Doubting if she can keep in pace
With his ascent. They should see
Him search a crowd to find her face,
As loving glance shares victory
With one whose faith worked alchemy.

He hurried through the rooms, calling, "Bonnie, Bonnie." He looked out the window, but she was not with the other children.

"Mrs. Burschendorff," he said, in the kitchen, "have you seen Bonnie?"

"Gracious, no," said Mrs. Burschendorff. "She was here but a moment ago. She didn't eat her oatmeal and she simply wouldn't get dressed. A body can't do everything when there are so many."

Papa came back to the living room and looked behind all the chairs and into the dark closet. Then Bonnie was sure he had spied her, because he came straight toward the Christmas tree, holding his arms out and singing:

"Diddle, diddle dumpling, sugar bun,
Come to papa ——"

But he cut the song off short. He slapped his hand on top of his head and said, "Oh!"

Then he said, "Oh! Oh!"

He went back to mamma, very slowly, and Bonnie could hear them whispering together. Papa had not found her; he hadn't even looked very hard. Bonnie felt herself sinking, down, down, down, to the very bottom of aloneness.

The whispering stopped and mamma said, "Oh, dear!" And in a louder voice, "I think I simply cannot last another minute, unless Bonnie gives me a good-morning kiss."

Bonnie held her breath and peered through the branches.

"If only Bonnie would come back to us," said papa, walking up and down. "I haven't told her half the stories I know, or sung half the songs."

Then Bonnie crept out from behind the tree, not looking toward the bedroom at all. She went to the parlor window and stood with her back to them.

Papa came and picked her up, just as he had when she was the littlest, and carried her into mamma's room. He took her to the side of the bed where the new one was not, and sat her down beside mamma.

"Could this be Bonnie?" he asked.

Mamma put her hand on Bonnie's arm and slid it up to her shoulder, and over her back and her neck and her face.

"It looks like Bonnie," she said. "And it feels like Bonnie. It feels nice. But it doesn't talk, and Bonnie talked so beautifully."

Bonnie stared into the corner and pinched her lips together. Then she dug her fists into her eyes. "He will snatch my Rudy away from me, and keep him for his own," she said.

"Indeed he will not," said mamma. "We will teach him to be good like you."

"He will sleep in the big bed with you and papa, and I can't come down when I'm afraid."

"He will sleep in the cradle, near the parlor stove," said papa. "And you may come down whenever you like."

Bonnie looked at papa accusingly. "You gave him my peppermint," she said.

"I would never give your peppermint to anyone but you," said papa. He reached into his pocket and pulled out a peppermint and laid it on her tongue. It tasted the same as always.

"What am I?" Bonnie said to mamma. "I'm not the littlest any more."

"That is right," said mamma. "And everyone must be the most of something, mustn't they? Then you will be the dearest. You will be the dearest little girl in the whole world."

Bonnie looked at papa again.

"You will be the dearest," he said. "Come let's try it out."

He swung her up and sang:

"Diddle, diddle dumpling, sugar bun,
Come to papa, dearest one!"

When he put her down again, she said, "Timothy is putting a basket on his sled for the new one to ride in. Alice is polishing the cradle and Emily is sewing new clothes."

"And Bonnie," said mamma, "has come to visit him, which makes him very happy."

"Let me see," said Bonnie, and she went to the other side of the bed to look at the new one. "Yes, he is happy," she said.

Then she went back to the parlor and crawled under the Christmas tree. She dragged Rudy out and took him to the bedroom.

"He may have Rudy for a little while," she said, "but not for always."

"He will give Rudy back whenever you say," said mamma. "Thank you."

As Bonnie tucked Rudy under the blanket, she touched the hand of the little new one. It felt like velvet. Then she went to the window to see if the snowman was built. It was all made, except for the face.

Emily looked up at the window. "Come on, Bonnie," she called. "Get dressed and come out. We need you to make the face."

But Bonnie was remembering velvet. "Wait," she called back, quite breathlessly happy. "I must do something first."

She scurried back through the kitchen, up the stairs and down the long, cold hall. She opened the door of the dark hall closet and pulled out the box of blocks. Behind the box, Annabelle lay hiding. Bonnie took her up and brushed the dust from the blue velvet dress which Emily had sewn.

"Shame," she said into Annabelle's chipped ear. "You must learn to keep your lovely dress clean." Then she rested her cheek against the crack in Annabelle's painted face. "Never you mind," she whispered. "You will always be my dearest one."

And she took Annabelle down to sit on the wood box while she dressed herself. END Especially on Hot Foods...

The flavor of real butter is still nature's secret!

Why does real butter make such a big flavor difference on hot foods? Because it's churned from 100% real cream, of course. Real cream is the heart and soul of its goodness, the source of the subtle flavor that agrees with you always. Just like milk, real butter belongs on your family table—and your family deserves real butter as much as your guests. Serve the best—serve real butter.

BUTTERY CORN IDEA: Pour or brush melted butter on each golden ear of corn before serving. Serve with additional butter for individual use at the table.

You never outgrow your need for foods made from milk!

AMERICAN DAIRY ASSOCIATION
Chicago

Representing the dairy farmers in your area

See "Disneyland" on ABC-TV

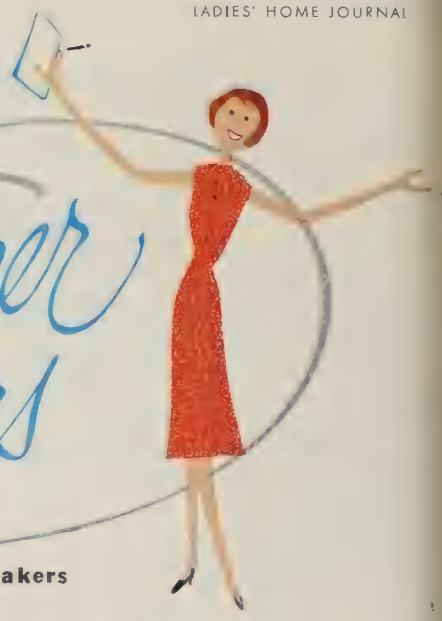
© 1957, AMERICAN DAIRY ASSN.

THE DEVIL WITH COOKING

They roll their own "Hamwiches" at this easy chuck-wagon picnic

Picnic recipe you'll find easy enough for roadside serving and delicious enough for porch or patio! All you do is set out Underwood Deviled Ham (so tasty just as it comes from the can – and one family-size can feeds five) . . . a plate of sliced tomatoes . . . and one of minced onions! Then join your hungry guests and help yourself to a real feast!

FREE PICNIC RECIPES! WRITE: WM. UNDERWOOD CO., DEPT. 3A, WATERTOWN 72, MASS.



THE SECRET OF WHOLE-HAM FLAVOR

Underwood is made from whole hams, chosen for quality, perfectly cured, and blended with a secret formula of spices. Result: all the goodness of whole hams . . . plus a delicious, can't-be-copied flavor.

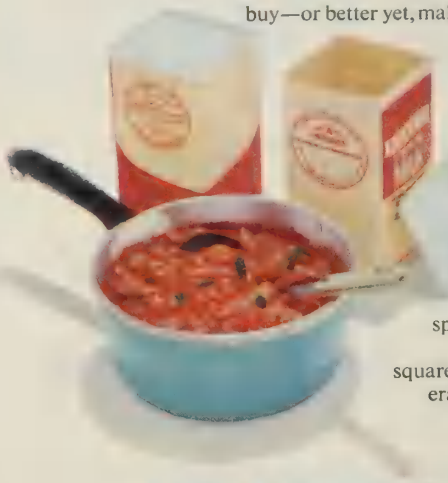
MEMO TO

Freezer Users

A bag of tricks for homemakers with freezers to help them cope with mealtime situations.

By MARGARET DAVIDSON
Homemaking Editor of the Journal

Trim and square. One way to keep food frozen in plastic bags trim and square is to line the bags up in straight-sided pans during freezing. The squared shapes will stack compactly; they fit freezer space neatly.



Ice-tray way. Try the ice-tray method with sauces, soup stock and gravies. Just count out the cubes to give the servings needed; with applesauce and frozen relish, frozen the ice-tray way, a cube makes an individual serving.

Keep it fresh. Containers for vacuum-packed coffee and shortening serve admirably for freezing some of the drier foods—buttered crumbs, nuts of all kinds, cookies and such. Sterilize the cans first; and if a fragrance lingers, wash with baking soda. Then, lest they lose their lids in the inevitable shuffle, seal them with special freezer tape—it adheres at zero when the ordinary kind loses its "cling."

For the bride. Know a bride-to-be? A thoughtful offer would be to freeze some of the wedding cake, to serve on the first anniversary. But be certain your reminder system is working, to prompt you about the date.

Cube it for baby. If there's a baby in the house, purée fruits and vegetables for days ahead and freeze for the future in ice trays—with dividers in place. Two cubes make a baby-size serving. Twist each frozen cube in freezer wrapping and then keep all of a kind in a plastic freezer bag.

Two in one. If yours is a family that likes a variety of breads, buy—or better yet, make—loaves of each favorite kind. Repack a half or a third of a loaf of each kind per package and freeze. Then monotony doesn't set in before the bread stales.

Double duty. Waxed milk cartons make useful freezer containers. Trim the top until it's square, wash and dry the carton. It's ready then to ladle in Italian meat balls, lamb curry or your favorite. To speed defrosting, cut double thickness of freezer wrapping into squares the size of the carton. Put several of these as separators between layers of food. The smaller sections will thaw faster.

A twist of the wrist. Have you discovered the pleasure of using pipe cleaners with plastic freezer bags? A simple twist and the bag's closed—or opened, as you wish. Other easy-to-use sealers for these bags are made of special rubber—as well they should be, for ordinary rubber gives up its elasticity when it is chilled to very low freezer temperatures.

Whip and freeze. Extra whipping cream after a party? Whip and freeze it for another day. Two tips: use confectioners' sugar—no "weeping"—and shape cream in individual swirls on wax-paper-covered cardboard. Freeze these small servings uncovered, but when solid, slip them into a plastic bag for storing—ready to decorate a dessert later.

Cubed and crushed. Before a party, freeze up a supply of ice. Store it crushed or in cubes in plastic bags. The ice will be so cold in the freezer that there is not a chance of its melting and sticking together.

STUART

The modern "emergency shelf" is the freezer.

Load limit, or speed's the thing. To avoid a warmed-over taste, always cool cooked food as quickly as possible. Fill containers, seal and cool to 50° F. in running cold water or iced water. Newest tests show that speed in lowering temperature from about 50° to freezing is important if flavor is to be at its best. Most freezers can properly handle about 3 pounds per cubic foot of storage every 24 hours. So—if your freezer is small and if you have much to freeze, best stow some in a refrigerator overnight rather than overload the freezer.

Straight and narrow. Squares and at least straight-sided foods and containers save on freezer space. For freezing, have you tried making square cakes? There are new square angel-food-cake pans, and high oblong ones sized for packaged mixes.

On the record. An inventory of freezer contents is as handy as a bank balance—it tells you at a glance where you stand. The most practical inventory we know is a simple notebook, kept in the kitchen—where it can be consulted—not in the freezer. A check-in and check-out system is most useful.

Variety is the spice —— For general use, we've found an assortment of freezer packages is best. The flexible plastic ones in square shapes stack well and are re-usable. The heavy waxed ones are easy to fill and nest compactly for storage. From a wealth of wrapping materials available, you can choose foil in heavy freezer weight and a new style, quilted for strength; clear plastic, treated paper, and various laminated materials.

Biscuits to bake. Frozen-juice cans are just the right size for keeping ready-to-bake biscuits—particularly if the can itself was used to cut the rounds. Fill well-washed can with biscuits, using double thicknesses of wax paper between (so they will come apart easily). To close, tape freezer wrapping over the top; to open, remove both ends. So handy to have for meat-pie or fruit-cobbler topping or to serve with honey, maple-flavored syrup or jam.

All dated up. Every food that goes into the freezer by rights should be dated and identified. When icy crystals form, it's hard to tell from the outside the beef Bourguignon from the leftover ham. China-marking pencils, that write on plastic or glass or metal, are good for containers that are used over and over again—the markings do come out in the wash. A marking ink in its own applier can is very permanent, is easy to use and comes in 9 colors. It's fine for marking any material, or for writing labels on tapes.

In reserve. The modern emergency shelf is in the freezer, and many a homemaker these days makes sure she always has on hand basics for a meal: meat or casserole dish, vegetables, relish or frozen salad and dessert. Add rolls or bread and butter, milk and cream, and we are in business.

No other rice is this easy!

Minute Rice is already cooked – just boil water... add Minute Rice... cover... remove from heat!

Yes, it's really easy! Because Minute Rice is already cooked, there's never any danger of gummy failure! How your family will enjoy those white, fluffy, tender grains! Try Minute Rice tonight . . . the quickest, easiest way to balance a summer meal!

Another favorite from General Foods

Only Minute Rice is perfect every time take it easy!

make it easy!

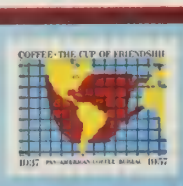
3 SURE
WAYS
TO MAKE
ICED COFFEE

a QUICK METHOD. Make extra-strength coffee by using ½ measuring cup (4 fluid ounces) of water for each Standard Measure (2 level tblsps.) of coffee — pour hot over ice cubes.

b PRE-COOLED. Make coffee: 1 Standard Measure (2 level tblsps.) to each 6-oz. cup of water. Cool in covered non-metal container. For freshest taste, serve within three hours. Pour over ice cubes.

c INSTANT. Mix twice the usual amount of instant coffee with a little water (hot or cold, according to brand) — add ice cubes, fill glass with cold water.

HINT In refrigerator trays, freeze regular strength coffee into cubes — pour fresh coffee over them. Delicious — and no dilution!



TRY THIS COOL IDEA!

Iced Coffee Float

Scoop a generous amount of your favorite flavor ice cream — coffee, vanilla, chocolate or other — into Iced Coffee.

PAN-AMERICAN COFFEE BUREAU
120 WALL STREET, NEW YORK 5, N. Y.
Brazil • Colombia • Costa Rica • Cuba • Dominican Republic
Ecuador • El Salvador • Guatemala • Honduras • Mexico • Venezuela

© 1957, Pan-American Coffee Bureau

DAUGHTER OF KINGS

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 62

the hand were not her own, and turned to the small window where the foolish, romantic moon floated, and caught her breath, and wept.

The man who came on the early-morning bus was neither very young nor particularly old, neither handsome nor ugly, certainly not rich (the bag he carried was even shabbier than the one Mr. Bjornson had used when he went to his brother's funeral in Duluth), and it was not possible to tell whether he was good or not, merely by looking at him. With the shabby bag in one hand and a shabby portable typewriter in the other, he got off the bus alone and watched it roar away to its next destination, a town of a more respectable size.

He was a little rumpled and he could have used a few hours in a proper bed, but first he went walking, carrying both his burdens and exploring by the first clear rays of the sun. He walked slowly, reading the modest little business signs down the main street: The Eatateria. The Corner (Miss Addie Blough's place), Bert's Service, Bjornson's Bakery, Bjornson's Fix-It. He went past the beer parlor, sadly deserted in the manner of beer parlors in the morning sunshine.

"And those who stood before
The Tavern shouted, 'Open then the Door!'"

he quoted aloud, smiling, and he turned the corner and doubled back along the alley, liking to see both sides of things. It was in this way he saw Solva Bjornson, kneading bread dough in the back of the bakery. Because she was in the bakery, doing what she knew how to do so well, and because she was not aware of anyone watching her, she was standing straight and tall, her full size, letting her big, sensitive hands work the dough and not looking down at all.

The stranger saw her through the glass of the rear door, and he lifted his somewhat crooked nose and smelled the wonderful, heartbreaking smell of the bakery. On an impulse (he did most things on impulse, even to deciding when to get off buses) he rapped at the door, turned the knob, opened it a few inches, and said to Solva,

"A jug of Wine, a Loaf of Bread—and Thou Beside me singing in the Wilderness ——"

But Solva, whirling, hurried in alarm to the door and replied (to the middle button of his coat), "We're closed now—we don't open until nine!" and firmly shut the door and pulled down the blind that covered the glass. If she had stopped to remember that she had asked for a man—and here was one—she would have dismissed him anyway: for if he was only moderately youngish, not handsome, not rich, and gave no sign of being either very strong or very good, he was, on his own damning evidence, a romantic fool. But she only shivered a bit and plunged her hands back into the warm, comforting, familiar dough.

When the stranger came back later in the day, it was Mrs. Bjornson who waited on him. Solva was in back, as she usually was, writing "Happy Birthday, Sally" with green icing on a rose-ringed cake.

"A half dozen doughnuts," he said. And in the back, Solva had to take a toothpick and straighten a wobble in Sally's y.

Mrs. Bjornson smiled at him. "Glazed, powdered or plain?" she asked.

"Plain." He could see Solva over her shoulder. "A fine little town here," he said.

Mrs. Bjornson, pleased, thought it was a fine little town too. She looked at him more closely. He had a nice face. A crooked nose, but a nice face; not handsome, just nice. "You just passing through?" she asked, knowing full well she had just counted seven doughnuts into the white paper bag.

The stranger leaned on the counter. "As a matter of fact, I thought I might stay awhile," he answered, "and do a bit of research."

"Research," echoed Mrs. Bjornson, a little dubiously.

"I'm a genealogist," he said. "Specialize in family histories, family trees. After all, what is history but a record of the world's families, famous and infamous? But doubtless you understand that." His voice took on a dreamy, mystical quality. "We are all the stuff of history itself," he said, intensely, and then he smiled, ducking his head. "But I don't mean to bore you, ma'am!" And, taking his doughnuts and his change, he hurried out, leaving Mrs. Bjornson thirsting for more and Solva holding the icing cone in her hand and reading over and over again, "Happy Birthday, Sally, Happy Birthday, Sally, Happy Birthday, Sally . . ."

His name was Oliver Weekes. He rented a box at the post office and took a room in Mrs. Chesley's Tourist Haven (which never had any tourists in it) and, although before he came no one in town had given much thought to such things as ancestors, such was his gentle persuasiveness that within a day he was busy in his little, musty, lace-curtained, antimacassar'd room, working on the genealogies of a number of Ferndale's citizens.

He had little enough information to begin with. Miss Addie Blough of the corner store, for example, meek victim of little boys with peashooters and sticky fingers, always short a couple of candy bars at the end of the day, knew nothing beyond the maiden name of one of her great-grandmothers. Mr. Edward Allistone, the postmaster, a vague and somewhat fuddled gentleman, had to admit that as far as he knew, his paternal grandfather had sprung ully formed from a void. Mrs. Baxter (wife of Bert of Bert's Service, mother of Sally of the oy stove and the birthday cake) was excepional, being able to trace her lineage back our generations on one side and three on the ther—but then she came to a dead end in a umber of places ranging from St. Louis, Mo., o Montreal, P.Q.

"Norton, I've decided to do you over."

But, said Oliver Weekes, the less known, he more exciting the chase, and he worked irelessly, drawing and lettering his charts vith exquisite care, clattering away on is typewriter, until he was able to give Mrs. Baxter definite evidence, under the etterheads of genealogical societies in St. Louis, Mo., and Montreal, P.Q., that she was elated to Presidents on one side and Indian hieftains on the other; and for Mr. Allistone he discovered a long and illustrious line of udges and lawyers in the deep South. Miss Addie Blough, however, he had to approach vith delicacy and hesitation, preparing her gently for the disquieting news (gleaned, as he could see, from genealogical societies, harriage registries and departments of vital tatistics in half a dozen cities from Victoria, B.C., to Leeds, England) that she was, in act, a direct descendant of the illegitimate laughter of one of England's bloodiest pirates. Miss Blough, trembling with the nearness of iolence and sin, disclosed this terrible secret nly to her best friend, and went to bed for he first night in fifteen years without putting ll her eighteen metal curlers in her graying air.

Meanwhile, he had begun on the Bjornsons. He dropped in occasionally at Bjornson's Fix-It, where he pitched in and helped Mr. Bjornson while they talked, rewiring Mrs. Baxter's toaster and astonishing Mr. Bjornson vith his dexterity by inscribing a delicate, eathery "Herbert Warrington Baxter" on the ack of a gold pocket watch. And more than ccasionally, he stopped in at Bjornson's Bakry and bought a half dozen doughnuts—to olster the meals he received from Mrs. Chesey's hands at the Tourist Haven, Mrs. Bjornon thought, sympathetically and erroneously; ut seizing the opportunity nevertheless, Mrs. Bjornson even went so far as to disappear once nto the back of the bakery on some pretense r other and insist that Solva wait on him. olva, expecting another disconcerting poetic uotation, tremblingly looked past his left elow and asked the far doorknob what he anted, and Oliver, overcome with tender ercy, merely asked for his half dozen plain oughnuts and let her escape.

But as he explored further into the tangled eaches of the Bjornson ancestry, Mrs. Bjornon invited him over for those few evenings he id not spend burning the forty-watt lamp in Mrs. Chesley's Tourist Haven room far into he night. He sat with them eating coffee ring nd drinking Solva's ambrosial coffee and alking with Mr. and Mrs. Bjornson while olva bent over her knitting so that all he ould see was the shining top of her head and he thick pattern of her braids. ("He looks at ou," Mrs. Bjornson said afterward, more han once. "I watch him and he looks at you. You could look up, just once." . . . "No," olva said. How could she tell them? But she new—a man like Oliver did not want a big, umpish peasant of a woman; he would be ooking for a beautiful, elfin creature, a fairy rincess, someone to whom you could quote oetry and never feel it was silly—she knew. "No," she said. "Don't be silly, mamma.") And when he said good night to her, she replied always to the cuffs of his trousers and the cuffed toes of his shoes; who would know hat when she lay in her bed at night, she whispered his name to the foolish, drifting moon: "Oliver, Oliver!"

Mr. Bjornson liked him too. "You ought to be in the repair business," he said. "Watches, maybe. Jewelry. That was a fine job you did on Bert's watch." He was thinking of retiring; he was thinking of someone's taking over the business; he was thinking of Solva. But it was all pretty impossible—a man like Oliver Weekes, with a streak of fancy in him, a bit of the dreamer—no, it was all quite, quite impossible.

Sometimes, Oliver admitted, he did want to do something else. Sometimes he did want to quit. Like now, he said, when he didn't seem to be getting anywhere, when he felt like giving up the search ——

And he protested wearily and vainly when Mr. Bjornson pressed on him the further sum of fifty dollars to carry on with; and if Mr. Bjornson, on second thought, regarded this as a usual business gambit, he had no way of knowing that Oliver Weekes, back in Mrs. Chesley's Tourist Haven, spread the money out on the table and looked at it and thought of Solva and hated himself more than a little.

It was on a Friday morning he came into the bakery with the news. He had stopped at the repair shop and had Mr. Bjornson with him. First, triumphantly, he took something from the portfolio of papers he carried and laid it on the counter.

"Look," he said. "Take a look."

They both looked—and in the back Solva stood very still and listened.

What he showed them was a picture, an engraving of a woman's head and shoulders. It looked very old and very strange, and at the same time it seemed to Mr. and Mrs. Bjornson very familiar.

"Who is it?" asked Mrs. Bjornson.

"Queen Margrete," Oliver said. "That's Queen Margrete, born in the year 1353, daughter of Waldemar the Fourth, wife of Haakon the Sixth, Queen of Norway, Sweden and Denmark—but who does it remind you of?" he asked eagerly.

"Why," said Mr. Bjornson, "it—it looks like our Solva!" and Mrs. Bjornson nodded her head.

"Ah-h," said Oliver Weekes, and he drew from his portfolio an enormous genealogical table which unfolded like a giant railway ticket. Mr. and Mrs. Bjornson bent over it and followed Oliver's guiding finger up the maze of lines and names as the table cascaded over the edge of the bakery counter. "In direct line," Oliver was saying, "back six hundred Get extra flavor, extra goodness in America's finest spices from the House of Flavor!

The outdoor cook never had it so "good". You just can't fail to turn out tastier meals that everybody loves with these McCormick and Schilling Spices and Seasonings. You'll want to have all five for your meats, salads, vegetables—SEASON-ALL, GARLIC SALT, ONION SALT, BARBECUE SPICES and PURE BLACK PEPPER. Season-All and Barbecue Spice are packed in decorative glass shakers. A sprinkle on your foods makes all the difference—gives new zest and a special goodness to both outdoor and indoor meals. Try them.

McCORMICK
ONE FAMOUS EMBLEM—TWO GREAT BRANDS
McCORMICK and Schilling

Send for free "OUTDOOR EATING" cookbook containing cues for barbecues. Address Public Relations Dept., McCormick & Company, Baltimore 2, Md.

McCORMICK . . . The House of Flavor

McCORMICK
Seasoning of the Month

SEASON-ALL

The new SEASON-ALL brings together a number of the finest pure spices in a special secret blend by McCormick master blenders. Careful selection, high skill, delicacy were necessary to perfect this blend. All spices had to be compatible in flavor, none must overpower the others. Combined they had to contribute a special flavor and the ability as well to bring out the flavor of the foods they are used on.

Use SEASON-ALL indoors and outdoors on steaks, chops, stews, roasts; fish, eggs, vegetables, tomato juice. Sprinkle it on your foods as you eat them. And on them while you cook.

years ——" and he looked up and over Mrs. Bjornson's bent head and straight into Solva Bjornson's startled blue eyes. Suddenly, with no warning (for any warning certainly would have sent her scuttling to hide by the flour bins or behind the ovens), Oliver ducked around the end of the counter, took her by the shoulders and kissed her on her soft, astonished mouth.

"Remember," he told her sternly, "always remember, Solva—you are a daughter of kings!"

That night the moon outside Solva's window drifted into her dreams and made a track on northern waters for a Viking ship to travel, while she dreamed of a prince who was young and handsome and rich and who kissed her and was Oliver Weekes. But, waking, she faced reality; what if the family tree had gone back to nothing more than simple peasants scratching the difficult, mountainous earth—would he have kissed her then? But even though she placed his kiss in its proper, congratulatory context, she thought again of Queen Margrete and she shivered with a thrill of pride, and dreamed again of Vikings until morning.

In the big bedroom, however, Mrs. Bjornson had already forgotten the labyrinth of ancestry that led to Queen Margrete; her mind was occupied with more important matters, for Oliver's kiss (even though it had apparently taken place behind her back) had not been lost upon her sharp maternal eye, and as she drifted off to sleep she was composing in her head probable social items and announcements for publication in the Ferndale Weekly Courier.

News travels fast in towns the size of Ferndale. The incredible news about Solva Bjornson had reached Mr. Edward Allistone within the hour. While Oliver Weekes was sitting back in his room in Mrs. Chesley's Tourist Haven, feeling happy and miserable at the same time, knowing the moment had come to pack up his shabby bag and take his shabby typewriter and move on, and yet not wanting to go, Mr. Edward Allistone was thinking about Solva Bjornson and Queen Margrete, about Mrs. Baxter and the Indian chieftains, about Miss Addie Blough and the illegitimate daughter of the English pirate, and (reluctantly) about himself and the long line of judicial experts. And the next morning, quite suddenly, perhaps because he had discovered in himself—the legacy of his illustrious ancestors—a hitherto unused lode of deductive powers and of logical reasoning, he stopped sorting the morning mail and shouted (all to himself) Fraud! and, quite against Government regulations, he locked the post office and marched out into the main street of Ferndale with blood in his eye.

N N N N N N

You must have long-range goals to keep you from being frustrated by short-range failures.

CHARLES C. NOBLE

N N N N N N

He stopped first at Miss Addie Blough's corner store and waited a moment while she confiscated two peashooters and threatened murder and mayhem on two small boys, who turned pale at her unaccustomed fury and fled in a streak of striped T shirts.

"Tell me," he said, as the doorbell tinkled after them, "how much did you pay that young man to look up your family tree?"

"Fifty dollars," said Miss Addie Blough.

"Addie," he said, "you've been taken. You're as big a fool as I am, and that's saying a lot."

Then, with Miss Blough in tow, the postmaster proceeded to the Eatateria, where Mrs. Bert Baxter was having a cup of coffee in the middle of her morning shopping. He wasted no time; he discovered she had paid Mr. Weekes thirty-five dollars, declared her an idiot and moved on—with Miss Blough, Mrs. Baxter and several curious and delighted Eatateria customers—up the street to Bjornson's Fix-It and the bakery.

"Tell me," he roared, cornering both Bjornsons together. "What did that fellow Weekes get out of you?"

"Why—forty dollars," Mrs. Bjornson said.

"And another fifty," Mr. Bjornson confessed.

"Swindled!" cried Mr. Allistone. "We've all been swindled!" He pounded on the bakery counter and Solva came to the doorway, staring. "Letters from Montreal, letters from Norway, letters from . . . Montgomery, Alabama! Do you know how much mail that young fraud has received since he came here? One miserable letter, by surface mail, and three cents postage due, from Scranton, Pennsylvania!"

Solva, alarmed and unbelieving, dropped her apron to the floor, ran for her coat and followed them.

Together, they stormed the parlor of Mrs. Chesley's Tourist Haven. Agitated, clutching the afghan she was knitting, and trailing purple wool behind her, Mrs. Chesley followed them to the stairway.

"But he's the dearest young man," she objected, almost in tears, "and he showed me how I was a direct descendant in the female line from Dolly Madison ——"

"For how much?" asked Mr. Allistone, pausing at the landing.

"—— and besides, I think I heard him go out," she said, but the postmaster had already flung open the door to Oliver Weekes' room.

Mrs. Chesley was right; Oliver was not in. Neither, it developed, were his suitcase and his typewriter. But the table was spread with his work—a number of pen-and-ink sketches, several kinds of paper, a magnifying glass, a tidy box of engraving styluses, a number of pieces of copperplate, and an assortment of discarded imprints of Queen Margrete. Mr. Allistone picked up a small strip of copper, and with a postmaster's genius for reading things backward, upside down, and otherwise distorted, he said "Genealogical Society of St. Louis."

"Oh!" cried Mrs. Bert Baxter, wounded.

"We'll run him out of town!" howled Miss Addie Blough, with the fury of pirate blood boiling in her veins. "We'll—we'll ——"

"Make him walk the plank?" Solva whispered, half to herself. But he was gone, and he would never come back, and they would probably never find him. She stood at the table, picking up the sketches, one after another. It was all very clear. They were all sketches of her, of Solva Bjornson, gradually transformed and yet not really changed—until she wore royal robes and was her own ancestor. There was no picture of Queen Margrete; or if there was, anywhere, heaven knew what she really looked like.

So Oliver Weekes was a swindler, a common criminal.

Solva wanted to cry. And then it occurred to her in a burst of elation: he had known all along she was no princess, and yet he had been able to see her this way, for there was nothing in Queen Margrete's face that was not also in hers. And not only that; moreover, he had kissed her!

A common criminal—but he was gone now, and almost certainly (because he had left all this behind, hadn't he?) he was sorry; and Solva gently laid the sketches down, and smiled, and forgave him.

"Lies! Lies!" raged Mr. Allistone. "He's not going to get away with it—why, how gullible does he think we are? Solva Bjornson the descendant of ancient royalty indeed—why, it's preposterous!"

It was almost as if he had, tactlessly, pointed at her. They all turned to look; but what really matters most is that across the room, in the doorway, was a young man who had lived in Ferndale all his life, a young man, not particularly handsome, certainly not rich, but by all accounts both strong and good. And he saw what they all saw: standing at the table, tall and fair and regal, Solva Bjornson, maker of good bread, with her head held high and her hair in a golden crown. And he was, if the truth be told, a bit of a romantic fool.

END

Oh So Good! Cookies and Snacks 'Round the Clock!

Oh, So FRESH in OLIN CELLOPHANE. Breakfast, lunch, dinner, and 'round the clock – how easy it is to set a more colorful table with delicious snacks. And how simple to satisfy mid-morning, after school, or late evening hunger pangs. Remember, cookies and snacks are nutritious, as well as delicious! Cookies and snacks at their freshest are cookies and snacks at their best. That's why so many bakers are wrapping their products in OLIN CELLOPHANE. They always reach you at their freshest, cleanest, tastiest. And how easy to inspect before you buy!

Quality Products Deserve to be Seen

Olin CELLOPHANE®

FILM DIVISION, OLIN MATHIESON CHEMICAL CORPORATION

LOVED YOUR LETTER!

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 61

ot-oil treatment. Massage the oil into the p and distribute it down through the ls—then wrap your hair in a towel which , been wrung out in hot water, and allow en minutes to let steam and oil work to-er to keep your hair soft and shining. A mpoo specifically designated for dry hair help too. Be sure to keep your hair well ered when you are out-of-doors; those being straw beach hats, triangular scarves bicycle clips, and colorful snoods have real ne-hither—give added protection (and action!).

My hands and nails are a sight: rough, pped skin; brittle, peeling nails. Sometimes actually embarrassed to shake hands with ble! What can I do?

This is a problem you share with many, y of our readers. Nowadays, when women most of their own housework, inside and hands and fingernails take a beauty beat- It means (you'd think you had enough to without hearing this!) that you have to them more attention than ever.

weekly manicure or a daily application of d cream or lotion isn't enough, when your n lively days include digging in the garden, ing down tiles for the new patio or help- Susie build her new cardboard super- ket.

rotect your hands! Water, strong deter- ts, cleaning preparations and harsh soaps ang up to dry out skin. So before you take the day's dishes, scrubbing or laundry, er your hands with your favorite skin ener and pull on a pair of waterproof es. The newest rubber gloves have built-in nicidal ingredients designed to prevent e skin rashes which are caused by heat and spiration. Rubber gloves come in pretty el colors, as well as in different thicknesses, d or not, to suit your fancy.

Hand preparations containing silicones are ul at any time, especially before dipping the day's work. These creams and lotions e water-repellent properties, and when you sage them into your hands and wrists they duce a kind of "invisible" glove that pro- s against drying and chapping.

ich creams and lotions, based on animal vegetable oils, are excellent hand protec- day and night. Distribute your favorite parations around your home—in the bath- m, near the kitchen sink, on your dressing e—so that you will be sure to bump them, and use them, regularly through day.

ere's a hand-and-nail-care treatment that work for you while you sleep: lather your ds generously with a lotion or cream, king it into the cuticle area of your nails, on a pair of old, clean white cotton gloves keep stains from bedclothing) and take ved hands to bed for an eight-hour skin- ening stint. (Treat your feet to the same thing beautifier, using a pair of clean socks. old pair of your husband's will do!)

good nail-saving solution consists of a e-a-morning inspection, at which moment can file down all ragged edges or split ners. (Think of the stockings you'll save!)

chronic-nail-biting friend of ours, who nned colorless nail polishes because she ught they only drew attention to her stubby er tips, has just recently grown ten of the test-looking fingernails we've seen. On im- se, she decided to have a professional mani- e, and the girl doing her nails encouraged to use a pale pink polish, on the theory t her nails would then look so much pret- , she wouldn't want to bite them. It worked. wadays, our ex-nail-biter branches out to sorts of dashing colors, chosen to match od or costume.

ometimes brittle, splitting, peeling nails are ymptom of a vitamin and/or calcium de- ency. When they are, your doctor might scribe vitamin D and/or calcium, to help ew their strength. Gelatin is an excellent rce of protein, and some medical authori- believe that drinking one envelope (ap- ximately one tablespoon) of unflavored atin dissolved in water or fruit juice each day is another helpful way to strengthen nails. There are gelatin capsules, available in stores, designed to work toward the same goal. These internal methods of restoring better health and strength to fingernails generally take several months (no overnight miracles!) to produce results. In the meantime, see that your diet includes sufficient protein foods—meat, fish, eggs, cheese and at least eight ounces of milk (it can be nonfat milk)—each day.

Q I have a combination oily and dry skin which makes achieving an over-all smooth and clear look doubly difficult. Can you suggest a routine for me to follow which would help this condition?

A Short of absolute perfection, this combination comes pretty close to being normal. It is natural for skin to show oiliness in areas where the oil glands function freely—at the sides of the nose, on the chin and between the eyebrows. The remaining areas—forehead, cheeks, jawline and neck—dry out more quickly simply because the skin is not so generously oil-fed from the inside.

In general, cosmetic preparations designated for "normal" skins are your best choice. But of course you will benefit by being especially careful about using them correctly. To remove make-up and clean your face, use a normal-skin cream, liquid or lotion. Tissue off excess and follow up with a soap-and-water washing for the oily areas. Next, pat the oily areas with cotton which has been wrung out in a refreshing skin astringent or lotion, to help absorb all excess oils and close pores. If you are not planning to renew make-up right away, gently massage the dry areas of your face with your favorite skin softener. In the morning, before applying make-up, treat the dry areas of your face to the sheerest "base coat" of a moisturizing cream or lotion, then gently pat with a tissue to absorb excess. This acts as a daytime softener and can be worn under powder and/or powder base. If you use a foundation (cream, lotion, stick or cake, whichever works best for you), smooth it sparingly and evenly over your face and neck. Gently tissue off the excess. Then use a clean tissue to blot (don't rub and smear) the oily areas. The blotting will help prevent make-up from clogging and producing an "orangey" look that sometimes comes when too much make-up mixes with too much natural oil. After you have applied the base and have tissued off the excess, use your skin astringent or lotion to pat on the oily areas. Finish your make-up, and see if the whole effect doesn't look—and feel—natural and pretty!

Canada Dry Ginger Ale brightens any ice cream soda with its natural Ginger flavor. So tasty...easy to make!

CANADA DRY

Canada Dry frosty summer sodas are quick and easy to make right at home. A chilled glass, a scoop of ice cream and any one of 10 Canada Dry delicious flavors.

Q Why doesn't someone put out a product to stop perspiration permanently? This is a summertime problem that can ruin my disposition as well as my clothes.

A A normal flow of perspiration is Nature's way of cooling the body by evaporation, and ridding it of whatever waste may be expressed through the pores of the skin. It is not only impractical, but impossible, to hope for or expect any preparation to put a permanent stop to normal perspiration.

Excessive perspiration, caused by hot, humid weather, excitement, nervousness or strenuous exercise, is another (maddening!) matter. No woman wants to be embarrassed by moisture marks on her clothes, or to be faced with the inconvenience and expense of having her clothes ruined by perspiration stains and odors.

Happily, there are many excellent products available, at prices within every woman's reach, to reduce excessive perspiration to a healthy, and aesthetically satisfactory, minimum. All antiperspirants are designed to do double duty as effective deodorants. Your choice from among the delicately scented creams, lotions, liquids, sprays and pads depends upon personal preference. Method of application varies. Among the newest are those which can be smoothed on directly from their applicators. One woman may get desired results from a comparatively mild preparation, whereas a woman who perspires profusely may require one of the stronger types designed to put a temporary stop to perspiration for periods of time ranging from eight to twenty-four hours. For day-in, day-out protection, it is best to apply an antiperspirant at least once a day after your bath; and for your bath you might like to use one of the freshly scented soaps which contain built-in deodorizing ingredients.

Occasionally, a woman develops a sensitivity to an antiperspirant which results in an itchy, painful rash or some other form of skin irritation. In such cases, it is important to ask your doctor immediately how to clear up the condition and to have him suggest a type of product for you to use in the future to avoid recurrence of the problem.

A few people, no matter how regularly they use antiperspirants, still are troubled with abnormally excessive perspiration. In these instances, dermatologists can use small amounts of X-ray therapy to shrink the glands in areas where it is necessary, and thus permanently reduce the flow of perspiration. In rare cases where regular deodorants do not sufficiently control odors, a doctor might prescribe an antibiotic ointment as an effective substitute.

Q I am embarrassed by a growth of dark hair on my upper lip. Is there any safe way of removing it?

A Fortunately, yes! There are many cream, lotion or wax depilatories designed especially for use on the face, which do an excellent job of temporarily removing superfluous hair.

A cream depilatory is applied to skin which has first been moistened with clear water. The cream is allowed to remain for a specified number of minutes, after which it is washed away with a clean cloth and clear water, leaving the treated area of your face hair-free. Lotion depilatories are applied with immaculate finger tips and work in a similar manner.

A wax depilatory is first melted in a pot over heat, applied while warm, allowed to set, and then pulled off, bringing the offending hairs with it.

Whether you plan to use a cream, lotion or wax, it is essential to read every word of the directions that come with the product you choose. Directions for applying and timing cream depilatories vary with each manufacturer. This is true, also, of the wax and lotion preparations. Manufacturers are very careful to caution first-time users, or users with especially sensitive skins, to try their product on a small patch-test area to make sure their skin can safely take it, before proceeding full scale. Depilatories should never be used on irritated skin.

Our dermatologist tells us the only safe-and-sure method of removing hair permanently is by electrolysis. With this treatment, individual hairs and their follicles are destroyed, thus preventing further growth. Naturally, this is a treatment requiring the utmost skill and should be performed only by a trained and fully qualified technician. The number of treatments necessary to do a complete job depends upon: 1—how large an area of superfluous hair needs to be treated; 2—the individual patient's tolerance to the discomfort of the treatment (one woman may not be particularly sensitive to the hot, prickling sensation of the electric needle, while another might find it most disagreeable); and 3—the technique and type of needle used. If you are contemplating electrolysis, we suggest you consult first with your doctor who will be able to recommend a qualified electrolysis technician to you. Costs vary and it is always best to find out in advance of treatment what the charge will be.

Doctors warn against the use of X ray as a means of removing superfluous hair. The amount of X ray necessary to destroy the hair also destroys other skin tissues and has been known to cause serious damage.

Q I often have a puffy, swollen look around my eyes which makes me look tired, worn-out when I'm not! What to do?

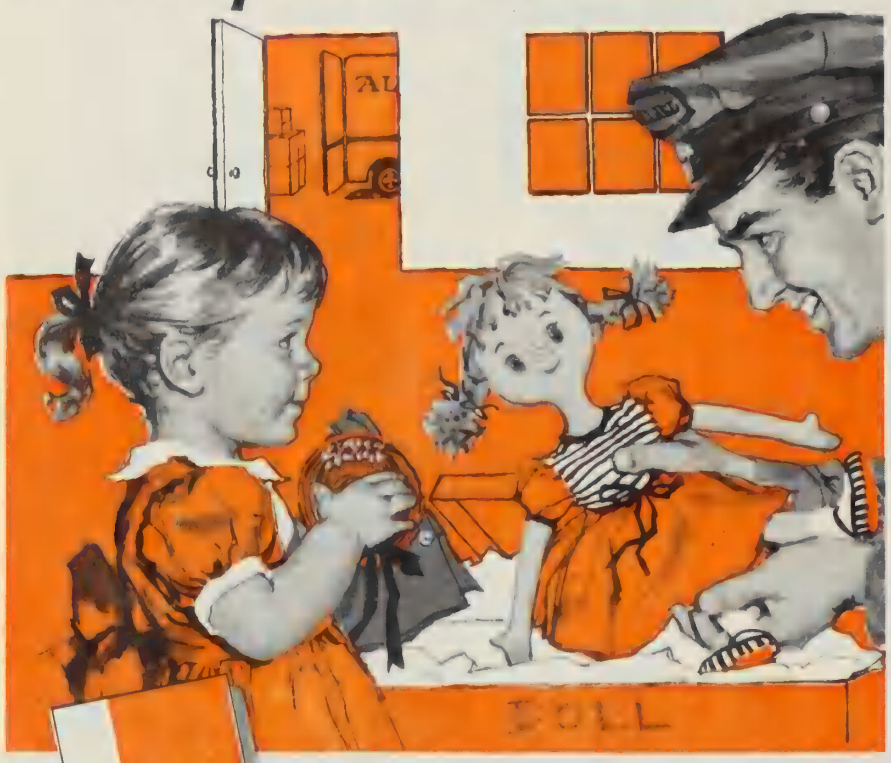
A If the puffiness persists each day, becoming more pronounced as time goes by, better have a physical checkup. Such swelling could be a symptom of kidney disorder or some other form of ill health.

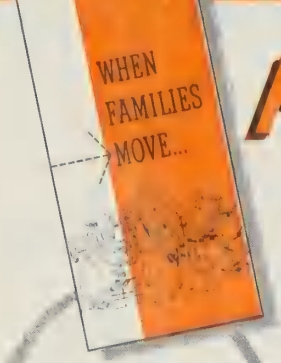
If you have passed a physical with flying colors, and still have the puffiness, here are other possible reasons. It could be caused by a familial tendency for full eyelids and fullness around the eyes; take a good look at your parents or grandparents and see if this is something you might inherit from one of them, along with the color of your eyes or the shape of your nose. Occasionally, the puffiness might be caused by a reaction from drugs, even the mildest type, taken internally. An allergy to some cosmetic preparation used on your face or hair is another possible cause. A diet containing too much salt which causes a retention of fluid in the body tissues may be responsible for the puffiness. Swelling around the eyes in the early morning which disappears soon after you are up is not at all unusual. The circulatory system slows down while we sleep and needs to be stirred up through normal physical activity to erase that early sleepy-eyed look.

To help counteract eye puffiness which is not caused by ill health, try applying cold compresses of a mild boric-acid solution consisting of ½ teaspoon of boric acid to 8 ounces of water. First, dissolve the boric-acid crystals in a small amount of hot water. When completely dissolved, add enough icy-cold water to make up the full 8 ounces. Apply the mixture over closed eyelids and above and below the eyes, using sterile cotton pads which have been wrung out in the icy solution. If you have the time, lie on your back and relax while the cold, soothing compresses are doing their work.

INLAND



By JEAN TODD FREEMAN



That I did not walk into the waves that day,
But stood in caution of love too strong;
That I watched and waited and turned away
From the power and peril was wrong, wrong.

There is no forgiving ears that close
To music. Eyes that fall from beauty
(Or call it danger) of star, of rose,
Turning instead to a safer duty

Deserve all blindness. That I did not go Into the sea may explain in part
This self-contempt when salt winds blow
And break against my shuttered heart.

What about the children when you move?

FREE Booklet!

New report by Child Study Association gives 26 tips on carefree moving

With all the details of moving, we often overlook the emotional reactions of our children. Is the move a new adventure, or a painful uprooting of a secure and happy life? The Child Study Association of America discusses this subject in the booklet entitled "When Families Move." A six page report, it gives 26 tips on things to do before, during and after the big day. Every parent planning a move in the foreseeable future will benefit from this report, now available from your Allied Mover as a public service.

A few of the things you'll learn:

- Telling your children about the move
- Writing change of address cards to friends
- Weeding out the children's things
- Preparing meals on moving day
- Enrolling children in new schools

Send today for your free copy—see the Yellow Pages for name of

YOUR ALLIED MOVER

OR WRITE ALLIED VAN LINES ▪ BROADVIEW, ILLINOIS

"My daddy goes a hundred thousand million miles away sometimes, but he always calls us up and makes us feel good"

BELL TELEPHONE SYSTEM
Call by Number. It's Twice as Fast.

LONG DISTANCE RATES ARE LOW

Station-to-Station Rates

For example:	First 3 Minutes	Each Added Minute
Baltimore to New York	55¢	15¢
Milwaukee to Des Moines	75¢	20¢
Indianapolis to Memphis	85¢	25¢
Los Angeles to Salt Lake City	$1.05	30¢
Chicago to Denver	$1.30	35¢

These rates apply every night after 6 and all day Sunday. Add the 10% federal excise tax.

Midsummer—and Cool

How to Dress Well on Practically Nothing!

Longer days—and slightly lazier ones; even Barbara J. admits to that. The usual hubbub of fashion calculating, notes and memos to herself has subsided momentarily. Her fashion thoughts on the future are still in a nebulous stage; meanwhile, her previous spring and summer purchases carry her through now for the office and for right-after-work dates.

For midsummer, Barbara thinks of clothes easy to care for, that take happily to fair weekends, sunshine and gaiety—but most of all that look and feel like a breeze! Her sewing, the coolest of all, and very fast in the making: a white halter top and striped denim shorts. She buys a dress, bright red dotted in white, equally gay, but in an entirely different mood. We can see Barbara isn't thinking of an efficient behind-the-desk appearance for these . . . but as cool, exceedingly pretty additions for midsummer!

By BET HART

One summer's morning...

baskets packed, and off for a picnic. Barbara wears her striped turquoise shorts and halter top, both easy-to-sew designs. The shorts, Vogue "Easy to Make" Design No. 9233*, cost her all of $1.46; the halter top, Vogue "Very Easy to Make" Design No. 9228*, comes to $2.05.

A lazy afternoon...

finds Barbara meeting friends at a favorite lunching place. Her red dress is a bright note to an already gay party. Barbara wears its own matching stole tied with gay abandon at the front. This and yards of hemline are edged with white Irish lac The price for all---$17.95. For other sunny days (and we expect lots of them!), Barbara could wear her new halter top; with it, her bright cherry denim skirt made last spring. Or, for that matter, her rose-printed skirt would make a happy twosome with the halter an informal party, a dinner date with a favorite beau, Barbara wears her polka-dot dress. Without the stole, it shows off th pretty bare top and low scoop neckline. White jewelry and her red shoes bought last April are perfect accessories with this; and if the evening is too cool Barbara can add her white sweater or matching stole.

In the cool of evening...

*For back views, sizes and prices, see page 13

Out of the blue . . . the whitest, brightest nylon ever!

NEW LA FRANCE BLUING with its special nylon brightener actually prevents "graying" of new nylon.

What's more, La France restores even the dingiest nylon in just five washings. And it won't turn fabric yellow as most bleaches will.

Try it tonight . . . La France is detergent, nylon brightener and bluing all in one handy box.

P. S. La France is perfect for all your family wash, too.

washes away "nylon gray"

La France is detergent, nylon brightener and bluing all in one handy box

Another fine product of General Foods

CRISTINE'S CHILDREN

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 45

her companion than about herself, and Mr. Willing, normally a shy and uncommunicative man, found himself being constantly insensibly sidetracked into talking about his work, his hopes, even his childhood memories.

The best of all was that sense of well-being that seeing her gave him. The minute he walked into Chez Michaud and saw her smiling at him, he would feel healed, complete. His headache would abate and the minuscule tic which had been plaguing him ever since a stormy sales conference would stop as if by magic.

"Even my wretched allergies disappear when I am with you," he told her once. "I remember in my callow youth whenever I took a girl out, there would be something about her I'd be allergic to: her woolen dress, or the dye on her scarf, or the furs she was wearing. Once I kissed a girl and immediately broke into hives. Turned out I was allergic to her brand of lipstick."

"Oh, Paul." There was laughter sparkling behind the dark eyelashes. "I don't believe it."

"Word of honor. But everything about you suits me, including your brand of lipstick, I suspect. In fact, I might as well find out right now."

Her lips were cool and smiling against his.

"No hives?"

"No, no hives." He added soberly, "But I do have the oddest sensation, like maybe falling in love."

Cristine was subdued for the rest of the evening and Mr. Willing kept catching her looking at him with a curious expression of indecision. It was a strange look and Mr. Willing pondered about it anxiously later. He was definitely in love with Cristine, he knew. She with him? Well, he was no prize, certainly, he thought humbly, with his allergies, hives, ulcers, bursitis, low rate of metabolism, and other disabilities. And yet—and yet, she liked him, he felt sure of that. "You're a fine figure of a man," she had said, and the corners of her mouth had turned up sweetly.

He didn't see Cristine for a while after this; whenever he called her she would be vague and gently evasive, putting him off. During this time Mr. Willing suffered agonies of anxiety and went into a species of decline: his allergies multiplied, he began to be plagued by insomnia and mild palpitations, and to lose weight.

"You mustn't do this to me again," he told her plaintively, when she finally came into

Men will always be what women make them; if, therefore, you would have men great and virtuous, impress upon the minds of women what greatness and virtue are. ROUSSEAU

New York again to have dinner with him. "I've been miserable without you. . . . What kept you away so long, anyhow?"

Cristine looked down. Her breast rose and fell in a small suppressed sigh. "Things came up—family ——"

"Oh ——" Mr. Willing paused, at a loss. "Is your daughter back from college?"

Cristine shook her head. "But Marnie is not the only child I have."

"She isn't?" Mr. Willing was unpleasantly startled. "But I thought—I don't remember your mentioning any others."

"I know." Her smile was rueful. "That was very careless of me. But there are circumstances that make one feel like forgetting one's family. Particularly when it's as large as mine. . . . Paul, I have six children."

"Six!" Mr. Willing's head reeled. He heard his own voice asking foolishly, "Are you sure?"

Cristine disregarded this inane remark. "You know about Marnie—well, she's the oldest. Then comes Beatrice—we call her Binkie—who is seventeen." She went on, ticking them off on her slim fingers one by one. "Vickie is fifteen; the twins, Hank and Hal, are fourteen; and Amy, the youngest, is thirteen. Six altogether." She managed a wan smile. "Well?"

Mr. Willing was silent, a prey to many whirling emotions, which gradually narrowed down to a dull resentment at Cristine. A woman had no business to make one fall in love with her when she had that many children, he thought bitterly.

Cristine reached across the table and put her hand in his. Her eyes searched his face, with the soft look he loved. "It was completely inexcusable of me not to tell you, terribly unfair—even to myself, really." Her lips quivered. "You've been very sweet, Paul. I—I loved every minute of seeing you. But perhaps it might be better not to see you again."

Mr. Willing turned pale. For a moment he hung on the verge of a tremendous decision. On one hand the very thought of Cristine's children, an anonymous and vaguely threatening crew, filled him with dismay. On the other hand, he thought of life without Cristine, and was conscious of sheer panic. Actually, he realized, there was no choice; children or no, he had to have Cristine. He tightened his grasp on her hand which lay soft and passive in his.

"Darling Cristine, you must marry me." His voice wasn't quite steady. "Because I love you most terribly."

"Do you?" said Cristine. She blushed radiantly. "And I, you."

"Darling." They held hands, smiling fatuously.

"I'm so glad you asked me to marry you," said Cristine. "Even if it is impractical. Because how could I possibly marry you—or anyone, for that matter? You have no idea what our household is like, Paul: all these strong personalities, all the problems that keep coming up. . . . Vickie has no social life and Amy has too much, and the twins—half the time I don't even know what they're up to; for all I know, they might be splitting the atom down in that cellar. And now Marnie's talking about quitting college because she thinks she's in love. . . . How could any man be expected to take any of this on? Why, darling, we'd drive you crazy in a week—you'd hate it all and —— Oh, Paul, I don't think I could bear your growing to hate my children."

"You're talking too much," said Mr. Willing, gazing fondly into her beautiful blue eyes, now suddenly bright with tears. "In the first place, I could never hate anything that belonged to you; in the second place, one can get adjusted to anything—I was in the Army for two years, you know."

"This could be worse than the Army."

"And anyhow, that's not the point. I love you terribly, Cristine; I don't see how I could live without you."

"Yes, but could you live with my children? I suppose," said Cristine reasonably, "the sooner we find out, the better."

Mr. Willing came to Ellendale on a balmy Friday afternoon. He alighted from the 5:12 train with his heartbeat considerably quickened in spite of a sedative he had taken half an hour before, and stood about in the midstream of home-coming commuters, looking for Cristine. Presently he was hailed by a young girl wearing trim gray Bermudas, a black blazer and garish knee-length socks. Cristine's eyes smiled at him from a guileless round face.

She wrested the suitcase out of his hand and strode toward a battered station wagon, talking to him over her shoulder in a loud and

Faster...easier...starch in an INSTANT

And Niagara Starch gives you perfect results for only 1¢ a quart*

You'll love the ease of making Instant Niagara starch. Just swish it in cold water . . . it's ready! Dissolves instantly . . . stays dissolved. No white spots or streaks.

Gives a wonderful "like-new" look to all your cottons. Clothes stay cleaner longer, are easier to wash.

So thrifty . . . makes a quart of medium starch for a penny! Instant Niagara saves time, saves work . . . gives results beyond compare. Try it.

*Medium Starch Solution

Niagara Instant Starch

Produced by Corn Products Refining Co.

cheerful voice. "Mother tried and tried to get away, but she was trapped. Amy's dress has got to be fitted and this was the only time Mrs. Perkins could squeeze her in—everybody is after her as it is—and it's only because mother's one of her favorite people." She flung the suitcase into the back of the station wagon and climbed in, followed by Mr. Willing. Marnie? he wondered distractedly, as she swung the car out of the station with a nonchalant mastery that impressed him. Binkie? Vickie? He bent his whirling mind on the problem.

"You couldn't be Marnie, because she's away at college. So you must be Binkie." He beamed at her timidly.

"Yes, but actually, as it happens, Marnie is not away in college. Mother doesn't like it, but what can she do? She's been presented with a whatchamacallit—oh, what's that French word? Anyhow, my dear sister came home last week and announced out of a clear blue sky that she'd gotten this job as a model at Whiting Brothers and she wasn't going back to college. . . . Fat aycomplee."

"What?" said Mr. Willing, startled.

"Fat aycomplee. That's the French word I couldn't think of. What Marnie presented mother with. She said college was supposed to fit you for life and work and here she's able to go out and get herself a job, so why go to college? But of course that's a lot of hooey; anyone could get a job at Whiting Brothers if they happened to be going steady with Charles. He's Charles Whiting Third, you know. I personally think he's an awful drip, but I guess it's fun to be taken out to all those snazzy night clubs and have your picture taken and all like that. . . . Marnie made Earl Wilson's column the other day: 'Who's that dark lovely with the Whiting heir?' Pretty cool, wouldn't you say?"

She went on talking in a voice that was remorselessly loud and clear as they wound their way through the typical small-town streets, wide and tree-lined, with the old houses wearing that solid smug look that Mr. Willing, a confirmed cliff dweller, found mildly irritating. At last they stopped in front of a large sprawling house, overshadowed by a great elm tree. Cristine was waiting on the doorstep. Her slow, lovely smile was tinged with anxiety.

"So you've found each other. Come in and meet the rest."

Mr. Willing found himself in a small crowd of young people of different ages, shaking limp warm hands, acknowledging greetings uttered by voices that somehow in all their varying registers echoed Cristine's, responding to smiles from lips that smiled like hers. A little later he was seated at the dinner table, trying vainly to pin names to faces.

It wasn't a very sedate dinner party. Periods of formal quiet would be followed by outbursts of deafening chatter, so that it was rather like having your dinner in an aviary. Cristine sat at the head of the table, looking miraculously unruffled by it all. Their eyes met and he was amazed all over again at the way she could make a small spot of serenity and comfort for him in the midst of chaos.

His right-hand neighbor was talking to him: "Mother tells us you're her editor. That's a terribly exciting profession, isn't it? Of course what you're doing is providing a father image for all your writers ——"

Mr. Willing raised his eyebrows at these sibylline words and took a closer look at the speaker. (Marnie, surely?) She was really a very pretty young thing, and quite conscious of the effect she produced. The smile that accompanied the words was both provocative and mechanical, a professional model's smile, with its inaudibly enunciated "cheese."

"Hey, you're a good man for this family to know," his erstwhile chauffeur shouted across the table. "Mother's not the only one who writes here—Vickie, too, is a literary type." Mr. Willing's left-hand neighbor squirmed on her chair in acute confusion. "She's written tons of stuff for the school mag, poems and everything," Binkie went on. "Miss Davis, our English-lit adviser, thinks she's the greatest. . . . By the way, Vick, I ran into her yesterday and she wanted to know why you weren't writing for them any more, so I said you're probably too busy writing the great American novel."

The object of these well-intentioned remarks received them with a glare. "Snooper," she said bitterly in her small hoarse voice.

"Who, me? Well, thank you kindly!"

"Never mindly." She slipped out of her seat and faded out of the room with a murmured excuse. Mr. Willing watched her with some curiosity: there was a strange remote quality about this child of Cristine's, he thought; skinny and sallow in her faded dungarees, she reminded him of nothing so much as the wistful great-eyed waifs of Picasso's blue period.

Her mother threw an anxious look after her retreating figure. "Oh, Binkie, really. You know Vickie hates to have her things read before she's ready to show them."

"But, mother"—her daughter's voice rose another outraged decibel and Mr. Willing winced—"I wasn't snooping. Gee, if a person leaves her stuff around, how's a person to know? I wasn't reading her old novel; I don't understand half of it anyhow."

"Plenty of sibling rivalry there," commented the beauty next to Mr. Willing sotto voce. She raised her voice, addressing her mother with a sort of languid authority. "You know, you do tend to overprotect Vickie, mother. She's getting to be a terrible little introvert. This business of leaving the room, for instance—that's sheer escapism."

"Nonsense, dear," said Cristine equably. "She just wanted to be alone; all of us do sometimes. . . . A little more goulash?"

"Mark my words," her daughter said darkly, "that child is going to Need Help. . . . No, I don't want any more goulash, thanks. . . . Really, mother, I wish you'd try planning meals that are not so—oh, gross. I abominate goulash. So does our guest, I see." She bent an approving eye on Mr. Willing, who was just finishing the boiled chicken that was thoughtfully served him in place of the communal stew.

Mr. Willing, conquering the disastrous impulse to answer that yes, he liked goulash all right, but goulash liked him not, reflected briefly on the correlation between embarrassment and inanity. The twins, across the table from him, suddenly plunged into their plates with loud and exaggerated slurps meant to indicate derision.

"I think all of us eat too much—probably as a result of some inner conflict or insecurity," their sister continued loftily. "We're getting to be a nation of compulsive eaters. Don't you agree, Mr. Willing? I think I'll call you Paul, if I may. . . . Mother, please tell Hank and Hal to stop slurping, they're positively disgusting."

"We're just enjoying our food. We," said the twins virtuously, "are Growing Boys and Need Our Good Nourishing Food."

"Well, no need to be so revolting about it."

"Thank you kindly."

"Never mindly."

This formula, Mr. Willing decided, was apparently used to mark the end of a skirmish.

"You certainly don't eat enough, Marnie," said Cristine. "You're getting much too thin."

Marnie received this piece of maternal solicitude with a certain amount of complacence. "Another two pounds and I'm a perfect ten. Charles says there's nothing so seductive as hollows under the cheekbones."

"Perhaps so, dear, but it's not a view a mother can be expected to share."

Marnie gave a light little laugh. "Of course not. But then you'd prefer me to stay your little girl, puppy fat and all, wouldn't you, darling?" She gave her mother a look that wasn't entirely friendly and turned to Mr. Willing with a prettily confidential air, which he for some reason found himself disliking. "You see, Paul, my mother just hates to see us grow up and become persons in our own right. And if we do have to grow up, why, she would like to have us follow a pattern—do certain accepted things, finish high school, go to college, marry someone nice and safe. Any deviation from the pattern and she goes into a panic—oh, yes, you do, darling, you know you do."

Cristine lowered her eyes, and a tiny quiver at the corner of her mouth told Mr. Willing that she was both embarrassed and pained by this attack. She said steadily, managing a smile, "Just stay in the pattern long enough to finish college, and I'll be happy. It's not a bad way of attaining maturity."

"But I have," cried Marnie gaily. "Why, I'm as mature as all get out—so why go to college? How about it, Paul?"

Mr. Willing thought it over. "To keep out of mischief," he suggested. "Girls who mature early are bound to get into mischief."

"Oh," said Marnie blankly, her air of slightly flirtatious camaraderie slowly fading away. She ignored him for the rest of the dinner. After they had retired to the living room, she stayed aloof, smoking and walking up and down with the conscious grace of a professional model, until an imperious blast of a horn in front of the house sent her outside in a hurry.

"His majesty summons," said her sister with heavy sarcasm. Mr. Willing glanced through the window and saw a tremendous cream-colored car swim away majestically from the gate. "That's Charles Whiting Third, the one I was telling you about. His father owns Whiting Brothers and they're fabulously rich, and he's had a nervous breakdown, so now he's being psychoanalyzed like mad" (Aha, said Mr. Willing to himself, suddenly enlightened as to the source of Marnie's barrage of heavily psychological terminology), "only if you're asking me it's not doing him much good. He's about twenty-six and he's been divorced twice. Honestly, mother, I can't help wondering ——"

Cristine sighed. "Neither can I," she said wearily. "More coffee, Paul?"

"—— because I don't know about Marnie, but I think it's much more fun to date boys of your own age."

"Oh, I don't know—I think it's fun with older men." This remark, uttered in an indescribably complacent tone, came from the youngest Massey girl and was greeted by a chorus of derisive hoots.

"Listen, kid," said one of the twins, "don't get a swelled head. I bet Dick only asked you because he's bucking to get into the Experimental Club—and dating the sister of the president of the club is as good a way as any."

"No, he didn't," said the child, unruffled. She was a pretty youngster with a bright peony bloom on her cheeks, her mother's extravagant eyelashes and shining black curls. "Because if that's all it was he would have asked Vickie—she's in his class—but he asked me!"

"As a matter of fact," said Cristine, "I can't help wishing it had been Vickie he asked."

"Well, thank you kindly!"

"Never mindly." A dimple flickered in Cristine's cheek. "All I meant was you're doing pretty well for yourself as it is. Vickie could do with a little social flutter."

"Oh, Vick doesn't care for that sort of thing, she's a Brain. . . . Mother, do you realize that this is the first time in years a seventh-grader has been asked to a ninth-grade Spring Prom? I'm making history!" Her eyes were rapt as she contemplated the glory of it. She said to Mr. Willing in the soft confidential accents of a dreamer lost in a dream, "I'm wearing the darlingest white lace formal with the thinnest red velvet ribbon edging at the top. Optional straps, but I'm not wearing them." She gave a short ecstatic sigh.

"All I hope is it stays on," said her sister darkly. "Mother, how come you're letting her? I know I wasn't allowed a strapless when I was thirteen."

Cristine shrugged her shoulders. "Everybody at that dance is wearing one, it seems, and Amy assures me passionately that she'll be forever déclassée in an off-the-shoulder ——"

"And I think," Amy pursued, addressing Mr. Willing in the same rapt, confiding tones, "I think a corsage of red roses or perhaps carnations—deep dark red ones ——"

"Or a single red camellia," said Mr. Willing, carried away despite himself.

"Oh!" Delight leaped into the bemused eyes. "Of course—a camellia—that'll be the greatest. . . . If you'll excuse me, I've got to phone ——"

As if the words were a signal, the living room was suddenly emptied of young Masseys. Cristine glanced at Mr. Willing and broke into her delightful low laughter. "Poor darling—you look so bewildered."

"Well, it's rather like being admitted into a completely alien tribe," Mr. Willing confessed. "Fascinating, but a bit weird. . . . Where have they all gone to now?"

"To telephone. The center of the family life is not the hearth nor yet the television; it is the telephone. Particularly on Friday night."

"I see." Mr. Willing relaxed; he was thinking how pleasant it was to have nobody but Cristine talking to him. The ringing in his ears, induced by the constant shrill conversation, began to recede. It was quiet around him except for the sound of the faraway voices cooing like so many pigeons into the telephones. Come, said Mr. Willing to himself, that's not so bad.

But the surcease proved merely temporary. Doorbells rang; doors slammed; uninhibited young voices asked for various young Masseys; pretty soon the house was filled with an anonymous welter of young humanity that overflowed from the library where they played queer and raucous records to the kitchen where they sat around for hours doing an improbable amount of what the absent Marnie would probably call compulsive eating.

And they wanted Cristine constantly. The twins emerged from the cellar and wanted to know where she had put the chemistry set somebody had given them for their birthday two years ago; Cristine went up to the attic to find it for them. Her youngest daughter decided that it was imperative to try on again the legendary strapless formal. After this was over, her older sister burst in with six contemporaries, all of them wearing what was apparently the teen-agers' uniform of Bermudas, blazers and garish socks; they all exploded into a series of bloodcurdling but rhythmic yells ending up with a cart wheel from which they recovered panting but triumphant to receive Cristine's sedate "Very nice, girls. . . . The cheerleaders squad," she explained to Mr. Willing, who had risen in alarm. "For tomorrow's game."

NEW! Quick! The prettiest wave in the world leaves your hair instantly shampoo-fresh!

Takes ½ the time, ½ the work!

New! The only wave you dare wash at once!
Only Richard Hudnut's new Quick has Crystal Clear Lanolized Lotion. A lotion so pure yet penetrating, you can wave without washing first—and shampoo right after you wave! So easy! When your wave is finished, you shampoo instead of rinsing. No need to wait a week to wash away "new perm" frizz and odor. No fear you'll wash out or weaken your wave. It's locked right in with Crystal Clear Lotion!

So quick! Wave and wash with ½ the work!
Quick's the quickest! Only Quick's exclusive Crystal Clear Lotion penetrates so fast it lets you wrap more hair on each curler and still get a firm curl to the tips of your hair. So you get a complete new-style wave with just 20 curlers—½ the winding time—½ the waving work! Shampoo instead of rinsing and, from the first minute, your new Quick wave is lanolin-soft, sweet to be near. Use Quick today—be shampoo-fresh tonight!

2 new-style waves for the price of 1
Crystal Clear Lotion can be recapped. Use ½—Save ½.
$2.00 plus tax. 1 wave size, $1.25 plus tax.

©1957 Lambert-Hudnut Division, Warner-Lambert Pharmaceutical Co.

All in all, it was a rather strenuous evening nd Mr. Willing was only too glad when it nded and he could go to bed. He took a henobarbital for his humming nerves and vo aspirins for his headache, and stretched mself gratefully in bed, groaning softly. uddenly something hurled itself against the oor of his room; a big golden retriever lloped over to the bed, jumped up on it, and y down comfortably across his legs. Mr. illing, who was allergic to dogs, sat bolt upght and began sneezing, startling his visitor, ho broke into an obbligato of deep baritone arking.

A small figure in pajamas came in, said rmly, "No, Heathcliff!" and dragged him vay.

Mr. Willing got out of the bed, shook out e blanket to get rid of dog hair, and took vo antihistamine pills which, he figured, ould serve the double function of alleviating s allergy and putting him to sleep. But sleep ouldn't come; instead, he remained in a midrugged state, listening to the night noises, hearing the house stir and settle itself around him creakingly. He was beginning to drop off when a powerful beam of light moved across the ceiling and he heard the muted purr of the Whiting car stopping by the house; the last of the young Masseys had come home, at half past two, as a sleepy look at the luminous dial of his watch told him. There followed the longest good-bys he ever heard, he thought with irritation. They whispered and whispered under his window. By the time this was over, and he heard the front door click shut, he was wide awake again.

Mr. Willing put on the light, lit a cigarette and in desperation looked around for something to read. It was between the pages of a battered copy of David Copperfield that he found the poem. It said passionately in childish handwriting:

Let there be wailing
Sorrow immense
But not this confusion
Of purpose and sense.

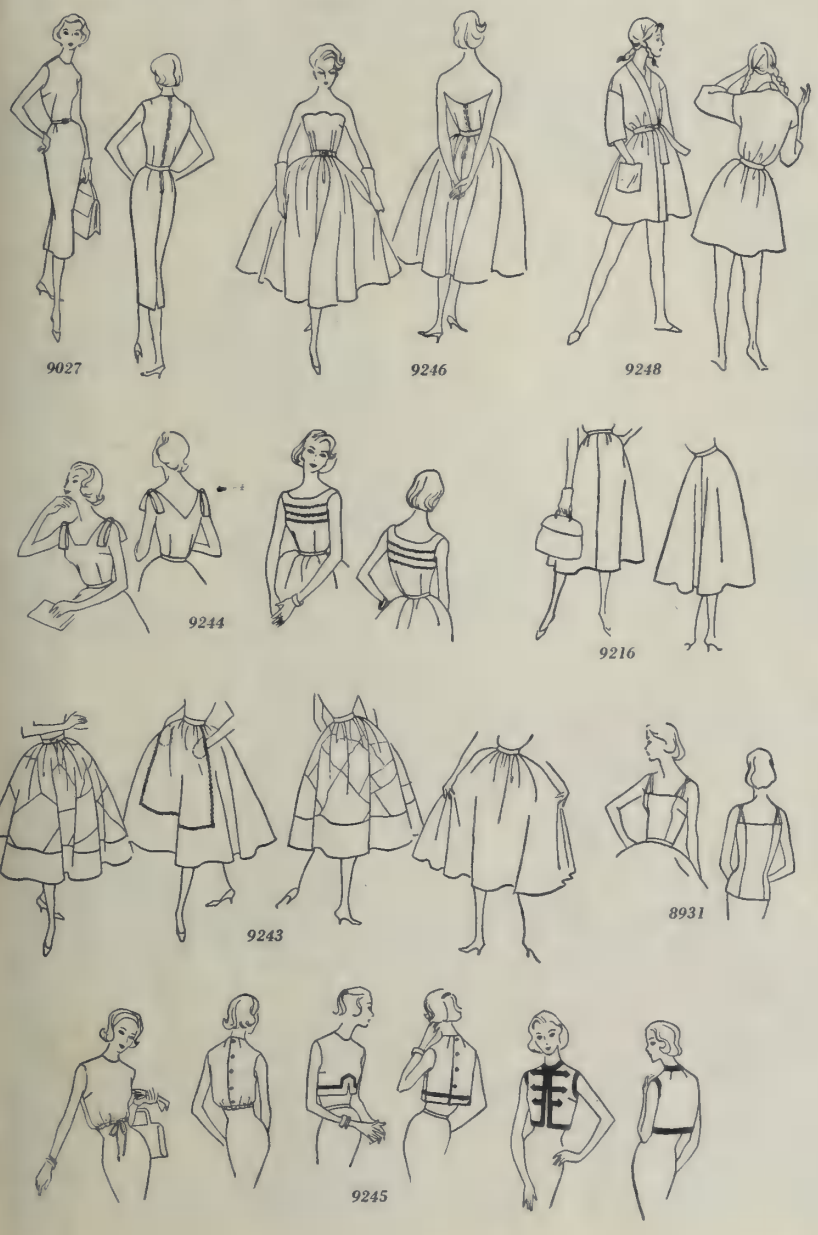
OTHER VIEWS, SIZES AND PRICES OF VOGUE PATTERNS

ON PAGES 58 AND 59

Vogue Design No. 9027. "Very Easy to Make" one-piece dress; 10 to 16 (31 to 36). 60c.

Vogue Design No. 9246. Two-piece dress; 10 to 18 (31 to 38) and 11 to 17 (31½ to 37). 75c.

Vogue Design No. 9248. "Very Easy to Make" robe; Small (31–32), Medium (34–36); Large (38–40); Extra Large (42-44). 75c.



Vogue Design No. 9244. "Easy to Make" Blouses; 10 to 20 (31 to 40). 60c.

Vogue Design No. 9216. "Very Easy to Make" skirt; 24 to 32 waist measure. 60c.

Vogue Design No. 9243. Skirt; 24 to 30 waist measure. 60c.

Vogue Design No. 8931. Blouse; 10 to 18 (31 to 38). 50c.

Vogue Design No. 9245. Boleros; 10 to 18 (31 to 38). 60c.

Pepto-Bismol works where soda and alkalizers fail.

For upset stomach—indigestion, nausea, diarrhea—Pepto-Bismol's special medicinal formula soothes with a gentle coating action. It works both in the stomach and the intestinal tract—where soda and alkalizers never help. For children or adults, this wonderful pink liquid helps control simple diarrhea without constipating.

TAKE HOSPITAL TESTED PEPTO-BISMOL®... AND FEEL GOOD AGAIN!

VARICOSE VEINS

Tired Legs, Leg Cramps Relieved

Dr. Scholl's Super-Sheer ELASTIC STOCKINGS

Nylon, full-footed, full-fashioned. So sheer, they look just like regular nylons—yet give comfortable, uniform support. No overhose needed. In French Nude, White, Black. At Dr. Scholl's Foot Comfort* Shops, Drug, Dept., Surgical Supply Stores. For free booklet, write Dr. Scholl's, Dept. E2, Chicago 10, Ill.

EXTRA MONEY

$50 TO $300 OR MORE
For Yourself or Group
Show Big Value
$1.00 and $1.25 Assortments of
CHRISTMAS AND EVERYDAY
GREETING CARDS
GIFT WRAPPINGS, STATIONERY, GIFTS

Show leading 21 card Christmas, Birthday, Get Well, Religious Assortments, Costume Jewelry, Household Items in full or spare time. No experience needed. Profits to 100%. Bonus. Write for Assortments On Approval, Free Album of Imprinted Christmas Cards, Free Gift Offer.

21 Card Christmas Ass't. $1.00
Mr. and Mrs. Santa Claus Salt & Pepper Set $1.00
Over 250 Fast Sellers
Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping
18 Card All Occasion Ass't. $1.00
FREE ALBUM OF IMPRINTS
FREE GIFT OFFER
$1.25 "Tiny TV" Salt and Pepper Set for PROMPT ACTION!

HEDENKAMP
361 Broadway, Dept. L-12
New York 13, N.Y.

STOP PAIN INSTANTLY
COMBAT INFECTION-PROMOTE HEALING
WITH ANTISEPTIC

Campho-Phenique
(PRONOUNCED CAM-FO-FIN-EEK)

WHEN USED ON MINOR BURNS, CUTS
SCRATCHES, ABRASIONS

Quick! Apply Campho-Phenique at once to minor burns from hot cooking utensils, hot water or steam . . . stops pain instantly, promotes rapid healing. The same thing happens when you use it on minor cuts, scratches and abrasions. Campho-Phenique is highly antiseptic. Wonderful for fever blisters, cold sores, gum boils; to relieve itching and to guard against infecting insect bites. Used on pimples, Campho-Phenique helps prevent their spread and re-infection.

Let trumpet sound,
Let earthquakes boom,
Let Day of Judgment come
I want a doom!

"H'm-m," said Mr. Willing, thoughtfully pulling at his forelock. He was aware of a familiar sensation: the ripple of excitement, the sense of direct communication with the writer that now and then happened to a good editor. One of the young Masseys wrote this, of course—most probably the literary-minded child who had sat next to him at dinner. He decided that she appealed to him most of all of them—perhaps because she was the quietest. What was her name—Amy? No, of course not, Amy was the pretty little one with the strapless formal; Vickie, that was it. For the first time he was conscious of curiosity about Cristine's children—saw them as something more than noisy obstacles by whom Cristine was hedged about as a rose by thorns. They were all personalities that ultimately had to mesh with his. For one, he would have to learn to identify them a little better: it was ridiculous to have to go through this fumbling process of identification every time. The next half hour before falling asleep he applied himself to the task of fixing them as firmly in his mind as if they were his authors.

Nevertheless, when he came down to breakfast next morning, he wasn't quite sure of the identity of the small person in dungarees and oversize shirt who shared his breakfast table.

"Mother had to go shopping," she explained. "She said nobody was to wake you no matter how late you slept. I came down late, too," she continued, leaning her head on her hand, just like Cristine, "I couldn't get to sleep last night—just kept thinking about The Prom. It's tonight, you know."

Then it was Amy after all. Mr. Willing, who had thought it was Vickie, was annoyed at himself. But the fact was that Amy didn't look like herself. With the black curls pinned up in bobby pins, her face looked small and pale with none of last night's flowerlike bloom.

"I even have a psychosomatic stomachache," she added with some pride.

Mr. Willing made a wry face. "Now there's a term I abominate—a horrible little formula with which people dismiss something that might turn out to be serious."

"Serious! Oh, my goodness, Mr. Willing, of course it can't be anything serious," said Amy. "The Prom tonight, remember?" She smiled at him radiantly and flitted away to answer a phone.

Mr. Willing was just finishing his coffee when he heard Cristine's voice in the garden. "No," it was saying emphatically, "no, you can't."

"But mom ——" Two identical boys' voices cracked simultaneously in incredulous expostulation. "But we always have the Experimental Club meeting here on Saturdays!"

"But not this Saturday—don't you remember, boys? I specifically told you. You just never listen to me, that's all!" She sounded harassed. "Why can't you do it in somebody else's house for a change?"

"Aw, mom, we're the only ones with facilities."

"I guess we're the only ones in the whole school who've got a mother who's sport enough to let them use the whole cellar for experiments."

"Well ——" Mr. Willing smiled as he listened. This was strong persuasive stuff and he could sense his darling weakening. "Well, perhaps. . . . No, I won't," she said, rallying. "I'm always letting you have your way; this once I'd like to have mine. We have a guest and I'd like him to spend a quiet weekend without the noise and without the noxious fumes."

"You mean it's on account of him?" There was a definite hostility about the pronoun, Mr. Willing thought apprehensively.

"The trouble with you, mother, is that you're inconsistent." The familiar cool didactic tones enabled Mr. Willing to identify the speaker even without Cristine's resigned, "Oh, Marnie." "First you're totally permissive with them, then you crack down; naturally they feel rejected."

Cristine sighed a little dispiritedly. "I just think that the noise and the smells will be too much for Paul. If I can't ask you children to co-operate in something that happens to be important to me ——"

"What are you talking about? What's so important?" Binkie's cheery bellow joining in.

"Mr. Paul Willing's comfort and welfare," said Marnie acidly. "That seems to be terribly important to mother."

"Oh, really, why?" said Binkie, interested. "Hey, you aren't in love with him by any chance, are you, mother?" She began laughing merrily and stopped. "Mother?!!"

After this Mr. Willing noticed a definite and growing coolness on the part of the young Masseys. Last night he had been just another guest, to be treated with casual friendliness, plus an additional fillip of respect due him as mother's editor; now that they saw him in his true colors as mother's suitor, they seemed to draw themselves together into an inimical wall between him and Cristine.

As the day wore on he couldn't help smiling ruefully at the way they wouldn't let him spend any time alone with her. It wasn't, he perceived, anything like last night's constant but casual claims on Cristine's attention. It was a deliberate chaperonage: the kids stuck like leeches and there was no shaking them.

Eventually Cristine also became aware of these attentions. She looked at her children thoughtfully, a tiny frown ruffling her smooth forehead, and took Mr. Willing to another part of the house, presumably for a better view of the garden with the newly flowering cherry trees.

They weren't there five minutes before Marnie strolled in looking remarkably sharp-eyed for all her gracefully indolent air. Presently the twins were there, too, wooden-faced and grim. Binkie came last, with the golden retriever, a blundering and sentimental chap, who, immediately deciding to renew last night's brief acquaintance, put his red-whiskered chin on Mr. Willing's lap and grinned engagingly.

"Why, he likes you," said Binkie with unflattering astonishment.

Mr. Willing nodded sadly, aware of the familiar ominous tickle in his nose. "They always do," he said and burst into a salvo of sneezes.

Binkie laughed unkindly and Cristine said, "Take him outside," with faint color pinkening her cheeks.

"But, mother, it isn't the poor dog's fault ——"

"Of course not; it's yours. I believe I especially asked you to keep him out of the house. Please put him out immediately."

There was unwonted crispness in her voice, and Binkie removed the dog, making ostentatiously sympathetic noises as they went: "There, poor old Heathcliff, never mind, poor fellow." The remaining Masseys looked silently and steadily at Mr. Willing, whose guilt increased as his sneezes abated.

"Actually," said Marnie in an offhand manner, "nobody has to be allergic in this day and age. Most allergies are a result of unresolved emotional conflicts. Charles used to have ever so many allergies, but he and Doctor Krantz were able to trace most of them down to various traumatic experiences in his childhood and now he's just fine. . . . That's Dr. Peter Krantz," she told him kindly, "an eminent psychiatrist."

"Yes, I know," Mr. Willing answered, mopping at his still streaming eyes. "He's writing an article for us for our June issue, entitled The Ego and the Superego. . . . A very pleasant chap."

"One of the best in his field," said Marnie proudly.

"Well, natch, nothing but the best for Charles Whiting Third," said Binkie, coming back without Heathcliff. "I personally think it's terrible the way he sits outside and honks for you instead of coming in and saying hello like an ordinary human being. Who does he think he is, anyhow, Prince Rainier?"

"Why do you suppose he's going to a psychiatrist?" drawled one of the twins wickedly. "Sure he thinks he's Prince Rainier."

"Or maybe Napoleon."

"Or Captain Video in his atom-drawn superjet automobile."

"Crazy, man, crazy. I mean, real crazy!"

They pursued the theme with gusto.

"Mother!" Marnie's voice was lofty, but her eyes snapped. "I personally don't care, but I really think you ought to explain to the twins for their own sake that being under treatment doesn't mean you're crazy."

"Boys," said Cristine a little wearily, "stop teasing Marnie. . . . Don't pay any attention to them, dear; they're just trying to b funny."

"Well, there's nothing funny about being a alyzed. It's a very important and useful fun tion. In fact, I could name plenty of peop presumably not under treatment who Nee Help." Her eyes dwelt pointedly on Mr. Wil ing, who was at that moment trying to find a antihistamine among the contents of his pil box. The twins followed her gaze and the faces lighted up with unholy glee.

"Man," they breathed joyfully. "Dig thos crazy pills."

They moved in on Mr. Willing, who flinched The handful of pills on his palm sudden seemed to swell as big as a pile of baseball

"Boys," said Cristine warningly, "don pester Paul."

"Just scientific curiosity, mom," they a sured her blandly. "You don't mind if we loo at them, do you, sir? . . . Never seen a mo colorful bunch of pills."

"Those aren't pills, those are capsules."

"Easier to swallow, I suppose."

"Say, that's sly. . . . I like this cute little fe low here, with black and yellow stripes. Re gay. What is it, a goof ball?"

"Boys!"

"Nothing as spectacular as that, I'm afraid Mr. Willing assured them, smiling a litt palely. "Just a phenobarbital."

"And this pretty pink one?"

"That's a sleeping pill." Mr. Willing decid then and there that from now on whatev medicines he had to take would be tak strictly in private. He went on grimly, only t well aware of the diabolical glee that was we ing up under their blandly respectful exteric "An antihistamine—a digestive pill—vitamir That's all, I guess." He snapped his pillb shut under their inquisitive noses.

"Do you have to take all these?"

"What would happen if you didn't?"

"I've read once about a man who stoppe taking his thyroid pills and a couple of week later, there he was ——"

"That'll be all," Cristine interrupted firml shooing them outside, to Mr. Willing's silen relief. Sheepishly he admitted to himself tha he was afraid of the twins—probably becaus there were two of them; it was as if one pe sonality sufficiently disturbing in itself wa doubled: two pairs of identical blue eyes m his opaquely; two wooden Indian faces pr sented an enigmatic exterior to his apprehen sive eye; he had a ridiculous conviction tha two agile and uninhibited brains were plo ting his downfall.

Cristine looked at him thoughtfully and su gested going for a drive. "I'd like to show yo Ellendale—it's so pretty in springtime."

"Just us?" asked Mr. Willing, incredulo but joyful. "Right now?"

"In ten minutes."

Mr. Willing, his spirits considerably im proved by this prospect, wandered out into t garden, where he ran into Amy. He gave her tentative smile which she returned readily. S was the only one of the children who seem to be unaware of his changed status, probab because she was too intent on her own a proaching apotheosis this evening. At an rate, he felt pathetically grateful when, inste of snubbing him, she said to him with an air letting him into a radiant secret:

"Dick is going to bring me that red camelli just as you suggested. His sister is in Binkie class and Binkie told her and she told him, s he's getting it for me. Gee, that'll look keen

"It certainly will," Mr. Willing told h heartily. "I'm glad it all worked out. . . . B the way, how's that stomach-ache of yours?

"My little old psychosomatic stomach ache?" She laughed. "Isn't it sweet of you t ask! Oh, I still have it—I guess I'll have it till go to the Prom. . . . Marnie says all tho things are just psychological, so I'm not pa ing attention to it."

Mr. Willing, who felt very strongly abou these matters, assured her with some heat tha there were sometimes very real ailments tie up with a stomach-ache.

"Appendicitis for one. Where did you say hurt?"

"Well ——" Amy's hand moved tentative toward her right side and froze in mid-air. H

CONTINUED ON PAGE 99

ASK ANY WOMAN

By MARCELENE COX

A man has probably "arrived" when he can afford to miss a train.

After the first child, most parents develop wails resistance.

Probably the most unpredictable thing a woman can do is to act like a woman.

Food that mothers term nutritious,
Children seldom find delicious.

If asked, the average person cannot accurately describe his toothbrush, and knows it only from the slot it occupies in the holder.

Small boy eating large dish of ice cream: "When we get home, mommy, may I have the heating pad?"

Gossip: A free circulating library of lurid fiction.

Raising a child these days calls for such a delicate adjustment between the mixed-up present and what some psychiatrist may say in the future it's a wonder potential parents have the courage to become real ones.

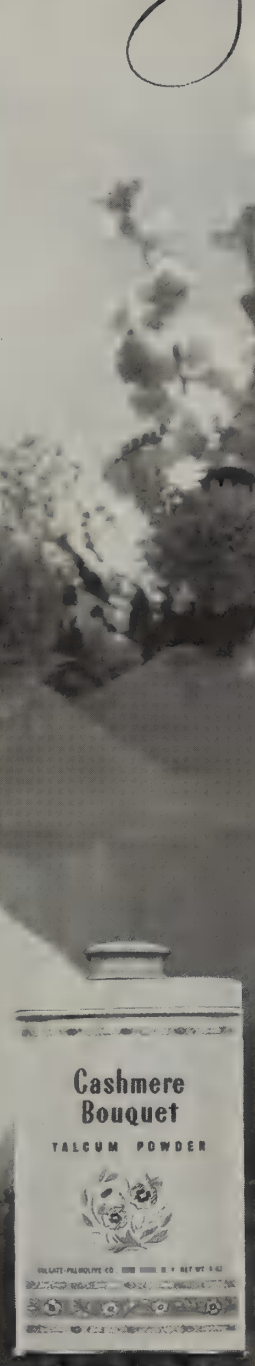
The one thing certain to come to him who waits is an alibi.

Order is for the family, not the family for order.

The best thing a housewife can do about leftovers is not to have any.

One woman says she knows when it is time to go home: her earrings begin to pinch.

Taking care of things
Bought to save her work,
Seems to leave a woman
Little time to shirk.



She had slowly driven her husband to distinction.

One difference between the old days and the new is the number of cameras a family takes on vacation.

A prophecy: In seven years, report cards will be back in style.

Boy's definition: "Hygiene is when you are cleaner than you have to be."

like climbing right into a bouquet

CASHMERE BOUQUET talcum powder

Cashmere Bouquet Talcum Powder pampers every inch of you . . .
with its lilting bouquet, its satin-soft touch. And that exciting fragrance men love lingers on your skin hour after hour . . .
as if you had stepped from your bath right into a bouquet!

CASHMERE BOUQUET COSMETICS... for all your beauty needs

Light refreshment and lovely figures

Look around this summer and see what sensible diet has done to help make the American figure both trimmer and slimmer.

This modern trend toward lighter, less-filling food and drink is clearly reflected in Pepsi-Cola, too. Reduced in calories, today's Pepsi-Cola is the modern, the light refreshment. Always say "Pepsi, please"—and refresh without filling.

Pepsi-Cola

refreshes without filling

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 96

es narrowed on him suspiciously. "Why," e said airily, "nowhere in particular. . . . you'll excuse me now ——" She left him in hurry and Mr. Willing was aware of some easiness as he watched her slight figure run- ng up the steps. Unlike most people with s disabilities, he was not a self-centered and of hypochondriac, concerned solely ith his own twinges. He worried about other ople, too, particularly when it seemed to m that they weren't taking their ailments iously enough.

He sat down on the bench, blinking against e brilliant sunshine, and idly watched the ins playing catch on the lawn. They played , elaborately unaware of him. Their profiles re impassive against the green hedge; the all hard sphere thudded into the gloves with small violent explosion like a rifle shot. esently they began a casual-sounding con- rsation.

"Talk to Mike Pollock lately?" one of em asked.

"Nope—not since they had that fire."

"Tough—having a fire in the middle of the ght."

"Yeah. Had quite a scare too"—thud went e ball—"about their weekend guest."

H'm-m, said Mr. Willing to himself.

"You mean that nice-looking guy? With rly hair?"

"Uh-huh."

"Big toothy smile?"

"Uh-huh."

"So what happened to him?"

"Couldn't find him." The ball went thwack, ominous sound. Mr. Willing strained both rs, fascinated.

"Burned up?"

"Oh, they found him after a while. They oked around and there was this little old an running around ——"

"So?"

"So that was the guest. Couldn't recognize m at first: all that lovely curly hair—gone."

"Scorched off?"

"Nah. Couldn't find his toupee in all the citement. No teeth either."

"How about that!"

"Left them in a glass by his bed. . . . Came an awful shock to the Pollocks, they never ew he was that old."

"Nobody suspected?"

"Well, he was a pretty lively Joe. Life of the party and all that. Only Mike says ——" There was a pause while he recovered the ball and fired it back. Mr. Willing waited. "Mike Pollock says he noticed whenever the guy got tired, he'd suddenly disappear and come out after a while like new."

"A shot in the arm, eh?"

"Maybe." Another pause. "Or maybe just pills."

The punch line was artistically delivered, with perfect timing, and Mr. Willing burst into laughter. Two guileless faces turned to him.

"Oh—didn't notice you, sir. Would you care for a catch?"

"Afraid not," said Mr. Willing, still laughing. It was a sound of pure enjoyment and there was a flicker of uncertainty in their enigmatic faces. "On account of my right arm. False, you know."

"I'm ready to go if you are, Paul," said Cristine quietly behind him. Apparently she had overheard all and wasn't amused: she gave the twins a long and unsmiling look before she turned away.

"Impertinent little monsters," said Cristine. She was referring to her sons and there were angry little sparks in her soft eyes. "I've spoiled them dreadfully, I suppose. But I never could control them. Most of the time I don't know what they're doing and never do I know what they're thinking. What they need is a really strong hand ——" She broke off. Her sidelong glance at him was loving but dubious.

"I wish you hadn't called off their club meeting," said Mr. Willing. "Naturally they're resentful." There had been at least twenty telephone calls and Mr. Willing after a while had begun to feel as guilty as if he had interfered with the annual meeting of an international scientific congress.

"Yes, I know. . . . Except that you have no idea of the noise and the smell. I did want to spare you that." She gave him a small guilty smile. "Tampering with the facts of life with the Masseys. . . . Not very strong-minded of me, was it?"

"Darling Cristine, I love you."

They drove along in companionable silence, enjoying each other's quiet presence and the pleasant pageant of early spring around them. Not a bad town to live in, Mr. Willing thought wistfully. If people would only stop taking pot

REFERENCE LIBRARY

SUMMER FASHIONS FOR TINY TOTS

No. 2613. For a boy, red bandanna shirt, denim pants, stitched in red. Tie neck. Small—Medium—Large. 15c.

No. 2612. For a girl, pink gingham (or one of the new no-iron materials) stitched like smocking. Panties with stitching. Small—Medium—Large. 15c.

Order from Reference Library, LADIES' HOME JOURNAL, Philadelphia 5, Pa.*

*Pennsylvania residents please add sales tax.

it's proven!

Sebb Stops Dandruff

now MAX FACTOR SEBB® SHAMPOO

brings you the joy of hygienically clean hair and scalp

Maybe you and your husband don't wash your hair in a bowl; or maybe you do. But, however you shampoo, your hair never felt so clean as it will now... with sparkling, new liquid Sebb Shampoo that smells like bottled sunshine.

Sebb Shampoo gently washes dandruff and itching scalp out of your life. Regular use frees you of dandruff problems.

Light, quick-foaming, it cannot dry hair. Instead, Sebb Shampoo leaves your hair silky soft, easy to manage, and lustrous with life. Only healthy, hygienically clean hair can be truly beautiful hair. Make Sebb Shampoo your regular family shampoo.

Family-size unbreakable bottle $1.25

For severe dandruff and itching scalp Max Factor also recommends use of Sebb amazing scientific formula between shampoos. Results guaranteed, if used regularly, or money back. 8-oz. bottle $1.50 shots at you. . . . Presently they emerged into a more opulent section on the shore front, with larger, more spectacular grounds and statelier mansions. Cristine stopped the car and leaned back against Mr. Willing's shoulder.

She said after a while, "See this gloomy Victorian edifice? With lions at the gate? That's the Whiting house. Marnie's boy friend lives there all alone, nursing his little neuroses. A detestable boy. At least I detest him."

"You do?" Mr. Willing looked at her with mild wonder. "I can't imagine you detesting anyone."

"Well, I do him. He's not a nice boy. . . . I don't like the effect he's had on Marnie. She's been so different lately. Hard—you know?" Mr. Willing nodded. "Of course that modeling job is all his idea. . . . And the worst of it is, I don't think she even likes him that much. She's just carried away by all that phony glamour. I think I mind that more than anything; it's—it's so . . . oh, unworthy of Marnie."

"But if you mind so much, why do you let her go out with him?"

"Let her?" Cristine gave a forlorn little laugh. "Darling Paul, Marnie is almost nineteen—about as old as I was when I married her father. And she has a job. If I make myself disagreeable, she might just . . . leave. She's not very . . . friendly to me as it is." There was the faintest tremor in her voice, and Mr. Willing was conscious of renewed dislike for her eldest daughter. "All I can do is trust that her good common sense will eventually reassert itself. But meanwhile it's very hard."

She bit her lip and tried to smile. "If I could only take all my children, shake them all up together and see if their qualities could be reapportioned a little more reasonably: shake some of Marnie's social nonsense into Vickie, and some of Vickie's quietness into Binkie, and—wouldn't that be marvelous?"

They were silent together. Mr. Willing pressed his cheek against Cristine's soft black hair, and felt her settling against him with a small sigh. "I love my children terribly," she said. "But sometimes I can't help wishing it were five years from now and they were all away at college so that we could be together just the two of us."

"Five years?" Mr. Willing echoed in dismay. A quick calculation told him that she was right. "But I couldn't wait that long."

"We might have to," Cristine said mournfully.

Mr. Willing pondered this last remark glumly as he loitered disconsolately downstairs after dinner. He was for once quite alone. All the feminine contingent had gone upstairs to help Amy dress, including Cristine, who, pink cheeked and starry-eyed, didn't look much older than her oldest daughter. As for the twins, they had retired to the nether regions in a sinister manner, singing "Just You Wait 'Enry 'Iggins" as they went. Vickie came down very soon, looking, he thought, even more subdued than usual. He tried to start a conversation with her, but she ducked him, in her uncommunicative fashion, and disappeared into the library.

Mr. Willing's spirits drooped under this rebuff. It was obvious that he was doing very badly indeed. He could see stretching before him a vista of unsatisfactory suspended existence, with dreary weekend visits to Ellendale during which he tried desperately but quite in vain to win the affections of Cristine's children. Right now—well, there was no blinking the fact that he had managed to antagonize them all. Even Amy; the good will he had created in that quarter by his happy suggestion about the red camellia was canceled now by his unfortunate solicitude about her stomach ache.

"How is it now?" he had asked her after dinner in a low conspiratorial voice. He knew that from the point of view of good public relations it was sheer folly to pursue this subject, but he couldn't help it. He had watched her during dinner, had seen the way she had ished away her food, her fresh young lips irling a little in disgust, and his forebodings d come back. This lack of appetite was parcularly disquieting when one considered the nount of eating that the young Masseys did; seemed to him that wherever he moved he me across one of them eating something.

hey were constantly in the kitchen, building range and fantastic sandwiches; even the herworldly Vickie munched on something she went her unobtrusive way. The excep-on had been Marnie, for professional rea-ons—and now Amy. "Does it still hurt?" he d persisted anxiously, and had received an asperated look.

"I'm just fine now," she told him politely.
've taken some medicine."

"You have? You know it's not a terribly od idea, when you don't know just exactly hat is bothering you."

Amy's lips had tightened. "Excuse me, but 've got to get dressed." And she had fled ecipitately.

As he mulled this over, Marnie came into e room. She, too, was dressed to go out, premably with the detestable Charles again.
he threw Mr. Willing a cool, "Oh, here you e again" sort of look, but her icy manner awed somewhat when he expressed his adiration. He was not totally sincere in doing : her expertly applied make-up took away r ingenuous youthfulness, gave her a hard d lacquered look he didn't like. In her highyle frock, she looked just like hundreds of rls he had seen flitting febrilely about town, rfectly groomed, their pretty faces hardened to fashionable but meaningless little masks.

"You like?" She twirled expertly, with a ow of startlingly bared back, the chiffon irts whispering about her slim legs. "It's a laggy Lake original. Needless to say, it didn't en rate a look upstairs. Everybody's cooing er Amy, who looks just darling. Poor little haracter, she's been throwing up like mad—on't tell mother, though. I promised."

"Has she, though?" Mr. Willing ran a disacted hand through his hair.

"Well, it's her big night and she's been gibbering with excitement. So has mother, for that matter. Honestly, she might be Amy's age. . . . She identifies so!" The indulgently amused note was back in her voice and it set his teeth on edge.

"Charles says," she resumed complacently, patting her short dark curls, "that most women of mother's generation have never grown up.
Naturally their being able to overidentify with their children is just another symptom of their emotional insecurity. Like my mother: she is too emotionally insecure to be able to live her own life, so she compensates by getting all that vicarious enjoyment out of us."

Mr. Willing reflected grimly that certainly Cristine wasn't getting much pleasure, vicarious or otherwise, out of her oldest daughter.
He wisely forbore to say so, merely remarking with a smile:

"Well, perhaps something can be done about that. As a matter of fact, I myself have plans."

"Yes, I know." Marnie's demeanor grew portentously grave. "And if I may be perfectly frank with you ——"

Mr. Willing groaned inwardly: in his experience, these words were invariably a prelude to disagreeable revelations. Marnie's next words proved him to be right.

"I honestly don't see how you can relate to my mother. Please don't think it's anything personal, you're a very nice man and really quite attractive," she said kindly, "but you aren't a terribly strong person, are you? You'd just be another child for her to mother—in fact, you'd be playing right into each other's neuroses. What she needs, I feel, is someone very strong—someone who can resolve her emotional insecurity, help her grow up. Mother is very immature in many ways—perhaps that's why I'm being so protective about her."

"You're nothing of the sort," said Mr. Willing, suddenly very angry. "What you're being is offensively patronizing, which is a totally different thing, and most unbecoming to a young person. I don't mind your being spoiled or self-centered or—or even frank, but I do mind your being so revoltingly smug."

Marnie stared at him aghast: she might have been faced by a tame rabbit that had suddenly bared its teeth.

"I resent that," she said at last feebly.

"You should."

The commanding bray of the horn cut this unprofitable discussion short. Marnie drew herself up haughtily and flounced out, leaving
Mr. Willing torn between dismay at himself and an unregenerate feeling of satisfaction.

"Do I look all right?"

This time Mr. Willing was able to answer in the affirmative without any inner reservations, as he looked enchanted on the pretty little vision in white, swaying lilylike before him.

"Those ridiculous waists," said Cristine with the tiniest quaver. She joined Mr. Willing on the couch, tucking her pretty legs under her, and surveyed her offspring fondly. "It's the loveliest thing imaginable, having daughters, Paul; you keep reliving your first big moments all the time."

"All we need now is the boy with the camellia," said Binkie, her round face beaming with sisterly pride. "You'll knock them dead, kid. How about a little rouge, though? Don't you think she's a little pale, mother?"

"You think so? I like it, it makes her look so sweet and fragile. . . . Isn't she a dream, Paul? . . . Turn around again, sweetie."

Amy turned obediently. Mr. Willing noticed unhappily that as she turned she held herself a little carefully, bent over to one side. And was it only his imagination, or was there a waxy quality to her pallor?

"Where do you think I ought to wear that camellia?" she asked. "At the waist?"

"Oh, definitely at the waist."

Mr. Willing said to himself that he was probably being perfectly ridiculous, it was all in his head, it would be absolutely criminal to spoil the evening for this radiant child by even a suggestion that anything was wrong. But on the other hand —— He gulped and asked,
"Has Amy ever had her appendix out?"

Cristine looked at him, startled. "No, she hasn't. Why do you ask?"

Mr. Willing told her, not daring to look at Amy.

"A stomach-ache? I'm not surprised a bit," said Cristine, "with all the excitement. I used to get headaches, I remember. . . . But why didn't you tell me, bunny? Imagine going around with a tummy-ache the whole day and never saying a word."

"Oh!" Amy shrugged her slim brown shoulders with studied carelessness. "Oh, my goodness, mother, what was there to tell? Just because I had a little psychosomatic stomach-ache, which is over now ——"

"It's still tender on the right side," said Mr.
Willing, steeling himself. "And she has been throwing up."

Amy gave him a look of cold loathing. "I would thank you to stay out of this," she told him.

"Amy!"

"Well, I don't blame her, mother." Binkie came down heavy-footed on her sister's side.
"Supposing she did have a little stomach-ache? Nobody in their right mind would even dream of paying any attention to it—unless they were just a hydro—a hyper——"

"Hypochondriac is the word you want," said Mr. Willing sadly. "Nevertheless, I think Amy ought to see a doctor before she goes out."

"A doctor?" Amy's voice shrilled upward in horror. "What are you trying to do anyhow?
Ruin my evening? Who do you think you are, snooping and prying and ——"

"Amy!" Cristine's voice was stern. "You're being inexcusably rude. After Paul has been sweet enough to worry about the way you're feeling ——"

"Well, who asked him to? Who does he think he is, my father or something?"

"That'll do," said Cristine coldly. She picked up a phone.

"Mother! What are you ——"

"I'm calling Doctor Bevan."

"But Dick'll be here any minute!" Amy wailed.

"Then that'll be the first time he was ever anywhere on time. Look, baby," she added gently with a quick look at her daughter's horrified face, "Doctor Bevan is right next door to us. It'll take him only a moment to come over and take a quick look at you, and if he finds there's nothing wrong you can go on to the Prom. . . . And I won't have to sit here worrying about you. . . . Just humor me, won't you?"

In the next fifteen minutes Mr. Willing reached the lowest point of his weekend with the Masseys. They were certainly the longest he had ever lived through. As they waited for the doctor in pulsing silence, one young Massey after another stalked into the living room and sat down fixing him with ■ silent resentful stare. Even the hitherto overfriendly Heathcliff gave a low growl as he passed by. "Humor me," Cristine had said in an attempt to take the heat off him. Vain attempt! They all knew exactly who was being humored. To make things worse, Amy's escort, a gangling blond youth, arrived on time, duly bringing a red camellia. Amy pinned it on, bursting into angry tears, just as the doctor came in.

Ten minutes later they were hurtling down the road on their way to the hospital, preceded by a motorcycle cop and a siren. If the time while they waited for the doctor had seemed unnaturally long, it now zipped along at an extravagantly swift pace, like a speeded-up film.

"I don't believe it!" Amy kept wailing incredulously. Her accusing look at Mr. Willing charged him with being responsible for it all. "I don't believe it! Why, I was going to the Prom ——"

"You wouldn't have danced long, honey," the doctor assured her callously, hustling her through the waiting room. In an incredibly short time she was being wheeled into the operating room, a slight white figure, still with that look of incredulous outrage in her eyes. And then time slowed up again unnaturally and they were waiting for the doctor again.

"Caught it just in time," he told them cheerfully after a small eternity. "Brother, was that appendix ripe. Another half hour and it would have ruptured."

Cristine's slim fingers tightened painfully on Mr. Willing's.

Back at the house, Mr. Willing found the young Masseys in the kitchen, putting away a stack of giant sandwiches in a worried manner. They mobbed him, demanding information, and he answered their questions patiently, reassuring them about Amy's condition; as for their mother, she was spending the night at the hospital and would be home sometime the next day.

"You certainly called it," said Binkie with a certain amount of awe. "Nobody else would have even dreamed of it." Her tone, Mr. Willing noted wryly, was not totally admiring; it seemed to indicate that he had that sort of mind. As for the twins, now that they were reassured about their sister, they evinced ■ ghoulish curiosity about clinical detail.

"I only hope the kid'll have the sense to bring the appendix home, so we can pickle it in ■ jar," said one of them.

"Ah, they probably threw it out."

"Plenty of pickin's around the operating room, I bet." There was a dreamy look in his eye. "Appendixes, kidneys, tonsils. . . . Catchup on your sandwich, sir?"

Mr. Willing looked down and found that he was holding ■ twin slab of bread with corned beef, pickle and salami in between. What's more, he had taken a bite out of it. I must be losing my mind, he thought and put it down hastily.

After everybody had retired, Mr. Willing found that he wasn't quite ready to go to sleep in spite of the lateness of the hour. What he needed to relax him, he decided, was a judiciously selected book that would neither overstimulate nor bore, but gently soothe him. He went down to the library in search of such a volume.

The room was dark but not, to his surprise, unoccupied. A small figure crouched by the fireplace feeding a miniature flame with what looked like sheets of paper. Mr. Willing, pausing irresolute at the door, caught what sounded like ■ muffled sob. He came closer. "Anything wrong?"

The small flame leaped and he recognized Vickie sitting forlornly in a welter of typewritten sheets. Her first impulse, he saw, was to escape; but there was the incriminating evidence scattered about and she couldn't leave it. She made a halfhearted attempt to get it together and gave up. Two of the largest tears Mr. Willing had ever seen crept down her sad little face. Mr. Willing fished a wad of tissues out of his dressing-gown pocket and gave it to her.

"You aren't feeling ill, are you?" The dark head moved from side to side. Mr. Willing sat down and watched her worriedly for a while. He said, "Look here, are you upset about your sister? Because you needn't be, she's in great shape."

"I've wanted her to get sick," said Vickie suddenly, as if the words had been wrenched out of her. "So she wouldn't go to that dance—and now ——" She sniffled desperately.

"Well, that's all right," said Mr. Willing soothingly. "Wishes don't mean anything, you know, as long as they aren't implemented by action. And people have awfully complicated feelings about each other. You as a writer ought to know about that."

"As ■ writer." The small figure huddled by the fire gave a wretched little hiccup of a laugh. "Boy, that's a riot." Her husky little voice was freighted with bitterness. "I've always told myself I didn't really mind being a social failure—I suppose that goes with being the only plain

CONTINUED ON PAGE 104

DESIGNER: LON H. PURCELL; PHOTOGRAPHER: ED MOORHEAD

The owner may choose the house, breezeway, porch, carport or garage separately, to fit his property and his building budget.

Prefab House TO BUY IN PARTS

By CAROL L. CRANE

A wide variety of materials, plan variations and architectural treatments gives this factory-built house versatility to satisfy almost every taste, lot and purse. The three-bedroom home above is available with three different roof lines in ■ choice of two materials; three window styles in wood or aluminum sash; and six variations of exterior siding in addition to combinations of siding and masonry. And for further flexibility, the house may be purchased in parts. The house, breezeway and garage are priced separately; the buyer may select from ■ number of different components, including freestanding or attached carports or garages; front, side or rear porches; open or closed breezeways. Details may be varied to please every taste from colonial to contemporary; the buyer has a choice of sixteen different designs for the front door alone.

Built in Ohio, this house cost $20,400 ($14,900 for the house with plumbing and fixtures, heating, wiring, screens, kitchen cabinets; $2000 for the attached two-car garage; $900 for the breezeway; $2600 for the extra-wide overhangs, masonry, fireplace, and redwood and cedar siding). Depending upon variations in shipping and labor costs, it could be built in other areas for $20,000 to $25,000, without land. These costs include a basement; the same plan can be adapted to ■ slab or crawl space. Write to us for further information.

NEW AND WONDERFUL–YOUR LUXURY-SOFT WASH

NuSOFT® FABRIC SOFTENER GIVES WASHABLES A SOFT, FLUFFY FEEL

Just one magic cap-ful!

...the final rinse puts back all the softness today's ...shing agents take out! Towels, blankets, ...dspreads are wonderfully fluffy. Socks and jeans ...ooth, comfortable. Corduroys—wrinkle-free.

Cuts ironing time!

Many pieces are so smooth, no ironing's needed. Others so wrinkle-free your iron flies. Use NuSoft in any machine or hand wash—and no matter how you dry. Economical too—it's concentrated.

REPLACEMENT OR A REFUND OF MONEY
Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping
IF NOT AS ADVERTISED THEREIN

NuSoft is a fabric softener–not a water softener

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 102

one in the family. Oh, yes"—she lifted a palm to forestall his protest—"I am, you know. But I kept saying to myself, 'It doesn't matter as long as I have my writing.' But then Amy got that bid to the Prom—everybody in my class is going to it, except me, and Amy isn't even in the ninth grade—well, I sort of put it to myself: 'Would you rather write the best book in the world or go to that dance with Dick?' and I knew I'd rather go to the dance. . . . So I guess I was just kidding myself."

Mr. Willing sighed. "Vickie," he said, "the trouble with writers is that they feel things more keenly than other people. That's an occupational disease, I'm afraid. You'll always feel things more because that's how you learn to express them."

"But I can't!" The words came on a desolate wail. "That's just the trouble. That's what makes it all so terrible. You see"—she moved closer to him with a confiding movement that touched him—"you see, I have been working on a novel. I've given it all my time—I haven't even worked on any English compositions or anything for the magazine. And it was going to be wonderful and somebody would publish it and—well"—she gulped—"it's no good. It's no darned good at all. In fact, it's terrible. So you see," said Vickie with heartbreaking simplicity, "I don't even have my writing any more. I have nothing."

Mr. Willing looked at the bowed dark head before him and shook his own in wonderment. "You're a writer, all right," he said solemnly. "Yes, Vickie, I can recognize in you all the earmarks of that unhappy tribe; I would even if I hadn't happened to read—and like—a poem of yours. I hope you don't mind."

"No—no, I don't." She sounded surprised at herself.

"Then perhaps you wouldn't mind letting me read your manuscript, before you consign it to the flames. You might be wrong about it, you know. Just as you're wrong about your looks. I personally like them, but then I'm prejudiced, because it seems to me you're the one that looks most like your mother."

"I do?" A shy smile touched her lips and Cristine's dimple hovered shadowy in her cheek. She said in wonder, "I've never talked to anyone this way. It's even made me feel better about this." She spurned the offending manuscript with a small bare foot. "Though I know I'm right about it. I mean I really know. It's really terrible."

"Well, you've got plenty of time to do better," said Mr. Willing. "You've got a tendency to be a little remote, Vickie, something that a writer can't afford. Get closer to people, find out what makes them tick, then you'll be able to write about them."

Vickie thought this over, her cheek propped on her hand. Then she slowly collected the scattered sheets into a neat pile which she handed to him. "I've only had time to burn the first chapter," she said. "You'll give me an honest opinion, won't you?"

"I always give my authors my honest opinion on their work," said Mr. Willing gravely.

The telephone began to ring soon after he had gone to bed prepared to read Vickie's opus. It shrilled its heart out somewhere downstairs with the special urgency characteristic of a telephone ringing at night, and finally Mr. Willing got out of bed and went down to answer it.

"Hello!" said a girl's voice. "Is this the Massey house?"

"Yes?"

"Well—look, Mr. Massey, I hate to disturb you so late at night, but I think you ought to come and get your daughter."

"My ——"

"You see, I've seen Charles flip his lid before and I don't think Marnie ought to be alone with him in his house."

Mr. Willing tried to assemble his whirling wits. "Let me get this straight—you're calling from Charles Whiting's house?"

"Well, no. I'm calling from a drugstore." The voice sounded sheepish. "I guess you know how Charles gets sometimes. He threw everybody out of his house—except Marnie, of course. Everybody else thinks it's a big joke, but gee, I don't know if Marnie can handle him—he can get awfully nasty. Anyhow, I thought I'd better call. Good-by now." She hung up hurriedly.

It was a lucky thing, Mr. Willing thought, as he drove in through the gate with the lions, that Cristine had pointed out the Whiting house to him earlier in the day. The big house blazed with lights from top to bottom, but was suspiciously quiet. Mr. Willing walked in through the open front door and found himself in a huge center hall. It was deserted except for a young man sitting cross-legged on the floor in front of a closed door. He was saying in reasonable tones:

"Look here, honey, you're really being very silly. For one thing, it's ridiculously easy for me to get in any time I want to. All I need do is shoot off the lock."

Mr. Willing, who had drawn nearer, saw with a jolt that indeed the young man had a gun in his hand.

"What stops me," he went on, still in those reasonable tones, "isn't any respect for the ancestral oaks, believe you me. I merely want to give you a chance to show that you love and trust me."

Mr. Willing coughed tactfully and the young man turned around and stared at him owlishly. He was a presentable, almost a handsome young man with reddish hair; that, together with the narrowness of his face, gave him a somewhat vulpine look. He inquired courteously, "What can I do for you?"

"I just came by to pick up Miss Massey," said Mr. Willing. "Er—is that she in there?"

"Indeed it is," said the young man gently. "What's more she's been there for more than an hour and I haven't been able to persuade her to come out. Silly, isn't it?"

"Perhaps that gun is making her uneasy," Mr. Willing suggested.

"Oh, but it shouldn't," said the young man earnestly. "It's merely an aid to my ego. I've got such a darned undeveloped ego. . . . What business is it of yours anyhow? Who the hell are you?"

There was suddenly a snarl in his voice and his face twitched, producing a strange, disagreeable effect of a lack of relationship between its features. Mr. Willing said mildly, "My name is Willing and I am a friend of her mother, who asked me to pick Marnie up."

"Checking up on her, I suppose." The snarl grew more pronounced. "They're all alike: snoopers, meddlers and nags, every one of them. That's what I remember most about mine—the way she used to keep me on a leash when I was a kid. Always checking up. Never trusted me an inch. That's all I ever wanted—just a little bit of trust. You'd think that little tramp hiding in there would trust me, wouldn't you? After all I did for her? Honey," he said, addressing the door again in dulcet tones, "how about coming out now? Here's a friend of yours to take you home." He cocked an attentive ear, looking more than ever like a young fox. "Maybe you'll come out for him if you won't come out for me. . . . You tell her," he said humbly to Mr. Willing.

The latter looked at him reflectively and shook his head. "She can wait," he said calmly, sitting down on the bottom step. "You know, what you said about your mother strikes a sort of sympathetic chord. That sort of thing can play the devil with one's childhood." He fixed the young man with the receptive look with which he had beguiled many an author into relieving his burdened soul. It worked again: there was a brief suspicious silence and then young Mr. Whiting settled down to tell Mr. Willing all about his traumatic childhood.

A harrowing recital though it was, it wasn't too interesting to an objective listener, and though Mr. Willing was able to preserve his expression of sympathetic interest, he was quite relieved when after half an hour of this the front door opened to let in a small bespectacled gent, who came over and said in crisp, no-nonsense tones, "Well, Charles, I see you've been acting out again." His eye fell on the gun and he shook his head. His voice was mildly reproachful. "I did think we were past that. . . . Well, never mind, just give it to me."

To Mr. Willing's vast relief, his interlocutor broke into tears and handed over the gun.

"Thank you," said the small man composedly, pocketing it. "If you'll excuse us," he said politely to Mr. Willing, "Charles and I have got to work on this."

He walked up the stairs, followed by a hangdog but obedient Charles. Mr. Willing got up, a little stiffly, and stretched his cramped limbs.

"All right," he said to the closed door, "you can come out now."

Mr. Willing was back in the Massey kitchen watching Marnie making the mammoth sandwiches in which all the Massey children seemed to specialize. All during the ride home she hadn't said a word; occasionally he could feel her shivering quietly by his side. Shock, he had thought with concern, speeding homeward through the dark streets. Once at home, she had made for the kitchen. There she ate three sandwiches, drank two glasses of milk and finally was able to manage a shaky smile.

"Brother," said Marnie, "was I ever scared!"

Her color was coming back now as the story poured out eagerly through her unloosened lips. She hadn't been frightened at first, she told him. She had thought that she could cope. But then Charles had become . . . "Ugly," Marnie said. A small shiver shook her bare slim shoulders. "Wild. . . . He kept talking how nobody loved or trusted him—in this awful whine, sort of. I think I minded that even more than the gun. I still don't understand how you managed him," she added respectfully, handing him a sandwich. In her rumpled dress, with her make-up ruined and her eyes round with remembered terror, she was a far cry from the brittle young sophisticate of a few hours ago. A milky mustache decorated her upper lip, and she looked about twelve.

"Oh, I didn't manage him," Mr. Willing assured her. "I left that to Doctor Krantz. I gave him a ring before I left here and he must have broken all the traffic rules getting there as fast as he did." He took a meditative bite out of the sandwich she gave him. It was a bizarre but not ill-tasting combination of salami, tomato and Roquefort cheese. "He's a good man Doctor Krantz is. I've got a great respect for him. He'll help your young man, I'm sure."

"He's not my young man." Marnie was vehement. "I—why, I don't even like him. That was the worst of all—suddenly he was just a repulsive stranger." She was silent for a minute. Presently she said in a small wondering voice, "I suppose I couldn't have ever liked him, really, could I? Because if I had—well, you don't stop loving someone just because he's . . . sick, do you? I feel sorry for him, of course, but—oh, Paul, all I want to do is just get away as far from him as I can!"

"Well," said Mr. Willing cautiously, "it mightn't be such a bad idea."

"In fact," said Marnie in an even smaller voice, "it mightn't be a bad idea to go back to college. Much more my speed, I guess." She summoned up a sheepish smile and Mr. Willing decided with considerable pleasure that he did, after all, like Cristine's oldest daughter.

Back in his room, Mr. Willing got back into his pajamas for the second time that night. He stared owlishly at Vickie's typed pages lying on his bed where he had left them, it seemed like years ago. He was engulfed by a fatigue so utter as to drive out sleep. His eyes felt like boiled eggs and the eyelids felt as if they ha

CONTINUED ON PAGE 106

NEXT MONTH

"Keep your eye on Mollie Bourne," Hugh was told the day he went to work for the London Daily Record. "That girl doesn't report the news. she makes it."

It might have given him pause had he known that an eye on Mollie would lead to a three-day captivity in Lodden Castle at the hands of a man who had killed once and was ready to kill again. Read . . .

BEGINNER'S LUCK

By PAUL SOMERS

Complete novel condensed in the August JOURNAL

(See opposite page.)

Lifetime beauty is yours in all five Community patterns

South Seas* (top and opposite page) is daring, different. A striking new idea in silverware design.

(Left to right, above.)

Morning Star* captures the freshness of daybreak. Inspired by a priceless jade carving, sophisticated, modern.

Twilight* has tapered handles, curving tips, shell motif sparkling like a single jewel. Classically elegant, graceful.

Coronation* is rich with the heritage of treasured antiques. Enhances the simplest setting with regal beauty.

White Orchid* is delightfully feminine. Creates a romantic air with your prettiest china, crystal, linens.

Community prices begin with a "Starter Set" (service for 1) at $32.50. Easy budget terms.*

COMMUNITY

THE FINEST SILVERPLATE

*MARKS OF ONEIDA LTD., ONEIDA, N. Y. ©1957 ONEIDA LTD.

ove) "South Seas," original new idea in silverware design. See opposite page for other patterns in the Community collection.

Only fine Silverware reflects truly fine taste

Nothing takes the place of beautiful silverware. The warmth and sparkle of this precious possession can never be duplicated in "make-do" tableware. In silver alone it is possible to achieve the clarity of detail that marks all five famous Community Silverplate patterns. And silver alone holds this brilliant beauty year after satisfying year. This, then, is the essence of Community quality—so appropriate to the new elegance of today's living. The Community* pattern collection is created in the Design Studios of Oneida Ltd. Silversmiths. Choose the one you like best to bring the sparkle of fine silverware to your table . . . at your jeweler's or favorite silverware department.

COMMUNITY

THE FINEST SILVERPLATE

*TRADEMARKS OF ONEIDA LTD., ONEIDA, N. Y. ©1957, ONEIDA LTD.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 104

been propped up by toothpicks and would never close.

Macbeth will never sleep again, he said to himself. Particularly after that sandwich.

He picked up Chapter Two and began reading it. Presently the words went into a mad little saraband and faded out. Mr. Willing, still holding on firmly to the pages, dropped his weary head to the pillow and fell asleep.

He dreamed that he was back in the Army, crouching in a trench with his regiment. The attack was about to begin; he turned to tell them so and was startled to find that their faces were those of the young Masseys. Just then the enemy came marching over the hill, throwing bombs and firing guns, and Mr. Willing could see that they, too, were Cristine's children. . . . The smoke around them grew thicker and more acrid ——

Mr. Willing sat up in bed, sniffing furiously. There was smoke in the room; outside of his room he could hear footsteps running up and down and voices raised in excitement. Mr. Willing shot out of bed and out of his room. As he skidded down the corridor in his pajamas, the twins' wicked parable of the collapsible guest came back to him and a vague suspicion crossed his mind: was he being tested for the durability—or at least easy accessibility—of his teeth and hair? However, the emergency seemed to be genuine: in the dawn's early light he saw the Massey girls crowded near a door to the basement out of which poured a cloud of smoke. Presently the twins came out, coughing and with blackened faces.

"What's wrong?" Mr. Willing demanded. A cloud of smoke billowed out of the basement and he, too, began coughing. "Has anybody called the fire department?"

"We're trying to put it out ourselves," said one of the twins.

"Put it out yourself?" said Mr. Willing in amazement. "Are you crazy?" He made for the telephone and was stopped in the midst of dialing by a blackened paw laid pleadingly on his sleeve.

"Give us a break," said the boy urgently. "Hank and I can get it under control, honest we can."

"It's not as bad as it seems," his brother seconded him. "It's just some rags and balsa wood and—and stuff like that."

Mr. Willing paused with the receiver in his hand. "Precisely what is your objection," he asked curiously, "to the fire department taking a hand in this?"

"They'll take our fire permit away. They said they would the last time."

Mr. Willing's nostrils dilated cautiously. "Sulphur," he said, sniffing. "And saltpeter, I think. . . . What witch's brew were you making down there?" Silence. "Well?"

The answer came reluctantly, drawn out by necessity. "Rockets. Oh, we weren't shooting off a rocket," in answer to his look of horror. "Just trying out a small ignition cartridge."

"That could be bad enough," Mr. Willing commented grimly, putting down the receiver. "Well, come on, let's get going with that fire extinguisher."

"—— so we thought we'd better try it in the morning before everyone got up, and at first all it did was just fizzle. And then—oh, brother! The whole wad shot out and landed way over on the other side where we keep our stuff for the model planes ——"

"Pah-boom!"

"I'll bet." Mr. Willing nodded grimly. They were standing among the wreckage in the basement, now heavily blackened with smoke. The twins had been right: it hadn't been too hard to put out the fire. But the resultant mess was indescribable. Mr. Willing listened to the post-mortem for a while; then he asked:

"What kind of sulphur did you use?"

"Just plain flower of sulphur. Got it at the drugstore. Oh, we used all kinds of precautions," they assured him with some condescension, "we kept mixing it for an hour with saltpeter and charcoal."

"More than an hour—you've got to make sure that this stuff is properly mixed, you know."

Mr. Willing sighed. "Yes, I know. Actually if you want it to perform properly you're supposed to keep mixing it for at least twenty hours in a mechanical mixer. And you don't use flower of sulphur—you take sulphur crystals and pound them to dust in a leather bag with a heavy mallet." He bent down and picked up a blackened brass pipe. "I suppose you just stuffed everything into this? You've got to hammer the powder into the tube, using a wooden setter."

The twins merely goggled at him, their chins hanging down to their chests. "You—you know about rocket building?"

"Not really. But I do know that it's a dangerous thing to play around with. Certainly not for amateurs. I'll tell you what: I'll bring Willy Ley over one weekend and he'll tell you how to go about it; until then no rockets." He eyed them sternly.

"W-Willy Ley?"

"The rocket expert? You—you know him?"

"I edited a book of his," said Mr. Willing. "That's how I've learned about rockets."

"How about that!" They trotted alongside him, as he left the basement, full of subdued reverence.

"Mother's just called," Marnie told them as they came up. "She'll be back at noon. Wanted to know if everything was all right. I said sure, just fine." She glanced at the blackened doorway and gave a low rueful whistle. "Wait till she comes home and gets a load of that."

A pall of gloom descended on the Massey family. "She'll be upset all right," said Binkie. She shook her head bodefully at the twins. "That'll be the end of the experiments in the cellar."

"O.K., you don't have to rub it in."

"Gee, I wish this hadn't happened," said Marnie and for the first time, Mr. Willing thought, she did really sound protective. "Mother's got a real thing about fires. She'll have nightmares for a week."

"Well, we can't have that," said Mr. Willing, galvanized into action at the thought of Cristine's distress. "We'll just have to get to a Touch of Genie-us!

GIVE YOUR SALADS

There's flavor magic in the Wish-Bone bottle! Its "Touch of Genie-us" makes every salad wish come true.

Wish-Bone is prepared from a secret Old World blend of pure oil, vinegar, rare seasonings, and just the right touch of garlic. All you do is shake the bottle till the dressing looks light and creamy . . . then pour.

For marinated steak, let raw meat marinate in Wish-Bone before grilling or broiling. Delicious!

For easy garlic bread, coat both sides of thick slices with Wish-Bone and toast under the broiler.

For garlic-baked potatoes, coat raw potatoes generously with Wish-Bone, wrap in foil, bake!

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

WISH-BONE
Italian Dressing

WISH-BONE PRODUCTS, INC., KANSAS CITY, MISSOURI

ork and eliminate all the traces of the fire. 's mostly smoke, after all. If seven maids ith seven mops ——" He began to roll up is sleeves.

Actually the contingent that turned out to ork was much larger than that. There were a w telephone calls and a sort of orderly andemonium deluged the Massey house. Vith the hordes of teen-agers streaming past im into the cellar, Mr. Willing began to feel ke the sorcerer's apprentice standing by and atching the magic brooms taking over. The oys—apparently the entire Experimental lub had turned up in a body—scrubbed the alls. The girls swept. Binkie cooked flap- cks and made coffee and Vickie kept them oing down to the workers. Mr. Willing oticed that far from being her usual silent lf, she now stopped and talked to the mem- ers of the Experimental Club. He caught her e, giving her an interrogative look; her nswering look and smile seemed to acknowl- lge a shared secret. Her blue eyes held a ely sparkle. Well! thought Mr. Willing, elighted.

The cleanup job was over in a surprisingly ort time. And even more amazingly still, the ssistant cleaner-uppers disappeared, leaving quiet house behind them.

"The cellar looks fine," said Marnie, "but e sure look beat up." She looked at Mr. illing, as dirty and disheveled as the rest of em, and a hysterical little giggle escaped her. Mother said over the phone she hoped we ere taking good care of you. We're certainly oing a great job of that." Her conscience- ricken gaze moved away from him and ardened. "A fine bunch of jerks we are," she id with quiet intensity. "All of us."

A man who puts aside his religion because he is going into society is like one taking off his shoes because he is about to walk upon thorns.

CECIL

"Oh, come now," Mr. Willing remonstrated easily. "The fire was unfortunate, but it was st an accident."

"I don't mean the fire," said Marnie re- ntlessly.

One of the twins who had been pawing the ound guiltily with his sneaker looked up d mumbled, "Yeah, she's right. . . . Look, e're awfully sorry, but I'm afraid we mon- yed with your medicine."

"My medicine?"

"Yeah. Yesterday, while you were out with other, we—well we sort of emptied the cap- les and put something else in them."

"Oh," said Mr. Willing. He looked at their wed heads, smiled uncertainly and queried, Strychnine?"

"Bicarbonate of soda." There was a miser- le silence. "I—gee, I hope it didn't incon- nience you too much."

"Why, no," said Mr. Willing in a strange ice, "I can't say it did." This was perfectly ue, due to the amazing fact that for the past ghteen hours he literally didn't have the time take any of his medicine. And yet, he re- cted, one would have thought that there re plenty of occasions for taking pills. He d rushed about like a maniac, he had slept ss than four hours, he had plunged about in oke, worked like a slave and eaten strange d unhealthy foods at unearthly hours. And t he hadn't even missed his pills. Everything nsidered, except for being dog-tired, he felt markably well. Well, said Mr. Willing to mself in mild wonder how about that!

"It wasn't just the twins," said Marnie un- ppily. "We all knew about it. We thought was a great joke. Well, we don't think so w, do we?" There was a general solemn adshaking. "In fact, we think it's pretty nking." There was a long expectant pause hile five pairs of identical blue eyes gazed him anxiously.

"Er—it's quite all right," said Mr. Willing.

"No, it isn't." Marnie hesitated. Suddenly e blurted out in a singularly awkward, al- ost schoolgirlish manner, "We—I—we hope that this isn't going to make a difference in your plans." They all eyed him anxiously again. "Because," said Marnie in another outburst, "if you give us another chance, we could show you that we don't necessarily have to be pests."

"We don't have to make all that noise all the time." That was Binkie carefully modulating her normally loud voice. "We'd leave you and mother alone whenever you wanted to be left alone."

"Any suggestions you'd care to make," said the twins, speaking alternately as was their custom.

"About rockets ——"

"Or anything ——"

"Gee, we'd be grateful!"

"We'd love," said Marnie, and her eyes were now as soft as her mother's, "to take care of you. In fact, we'll start right now."

Mr. Willing, startled, found himself in the midst of a flying squad which tenderly conducted him to the library. He was carefully deposited in the most comfortable chair; cushions were fluffed up around him; a cup of hot tea was brought in and set next to him; a footstool was put under his feet and blinds were drawn. Hushed voices inquired whether he was comfortable and whether there was anything he needed.

Mr. Willing shook his head. In spite of his aching limbs, he was aware of a sense of inner comfort and peace that he had hitherto associated only with Cristine. He looked at her children, feeling oddly constricted about the throat. Contradictory, exasperating, lovable—they were a part of Cristine and also, it seemed now, a part of him.

"Just remember to wash up," he told them severely. "So your mother doesn't come home to find a bunch of ill-favored little apes."

"Thank you kindly," they chorused with gentle sarcasm, tiptoeing out of the room.

"Never mindly," said Mr. Willing as he settled down to wait for Cristine. END

People use CHI-NET® Plates

in all kinds of places

for all kinds of meals

CHI-NET®

the paper plate everybody likes

Outdoors and indoors . . . for picnics and parties . . . for quick meals and snacks . . . for breakfast, lunch and dinner, CHI-NET molded paper plates are always right for modern, easy living.

CHI-NET paper plates are molded to shape . . . they stay rigid even when piled high with food. And they have such a wonderful smooth, white finish you are proud to use them.

Look for CHI-NET paper plates at leading food or variety stores. Available in three popular round sizes for breakfast, lunch or snacks, compartment round dinner size and Square Meal Trays, especially popular for TV dinners. Look for the CHI-NET oval on the package.

KEYES FIBRE COMPANY
WATERVILLE, MAINE

Be Wise-Buy KEYES MOLDED PRODUCTS

for those who like it HOTTER

Snider's chili-pepper flavor gives food a bright new lift. It heightens your enjoyment but never bites your tongue. Whatever tastes good with catsup tastes better with Snider's. Won't you try it?

© 1957 Snider Foods, Inc., Fullerton, Calif.

Varsity man Steve (with stripes for two years as guard) gave his jacket to Judy. She works part time in State Historical building, found her tenderness dawning "when he used to come into the library all bruised."

Campus Romance

Steve Ambrose and Judy Dorlester, of the University of Wisconsin, will take marriage vows with his bachelor's degree.

STORY AND PHOTOGRAPHS BY ABBOT MILLS

Steve Ambrose headed his father's new car toward home in Whitewater, Wisconsin, early that hot summer morning in 1953. The rugged seventeen-year-old high-school football star was worried. He was going to be late for work. He was still thinking about the girl he was leaving behind in Madison when his car hit a curve doing 75 mph. Moments later there was only the mangled wreckage of the brand-new automobile lying on the curve in the highway where it had careened off a stone wall. Unconscious in the wreck lay Steve with blood pouring from a gash in his knee.

He woke up swearing a blue streak, thinking, "I'll never play football again!" It wasn't a pleasant thought. He had great plans for himself that fall as a freshman at the University of Wisconsin in Madison.

A farmer discovered him before oncoming traffic plowed into the wreck and soon he was returning to Madison in an ambulance doing 110 mph. "Then I was really scared. I thought they were going to kill me!"

He waited nervously in the hospital for the arrival of his father, Dr. Stephen Ambrose. When his father entered the room, he'd already checked and knew that Steve was all right. "Dad just looked at me and said, 'You've got to pay for it!' Then he drove me home without saying a word. My mother was worried stiff about her poor little boy, until she saw I was O.K. Then she hit the roof!"

Later that same day Steve found himself unloading pig iron and coal from railroad cars. "It wasn't till then that the shock started catching up with me," he says. "Then I began shaking like a leaf in the hot sun."

That same fall in 1953, pretty, dark-haired Judy Dorlester decided she would take a Ford Foundation scholarship examination, just for the fun of it. She was fifteen then and lived in Queens, New York, with her younger brother, Mark, and her parents, who both worked. Her father, David Dorlester, is now assistant principal of the Horace Greeley Junior High School in Queens. Her mother, Helen, works for a costume-jewelry firm in the Bronx.

As a junior at the Bayside High School in Queens, Judy was an outstanding student, but not an altogether happy one. She had reached her full height (5′6″) at thirteen and literally found herself looking down on a great number of her classmates. She hoped that just maybe she could win a scholarship—someday—somewhere. Her wish came true with a bang. Shortly after Christmas she was the proud owner of a $500 scholarship to the University of Wisconsin.

Judy's parents were very pleased and not in the least worried about CONTINUED ON PAGE 111

When a girl gets pinned, she gets serenaded. Chi Psi men and Judy's dormitory mates alternate on "sweetheart" songs. Kiss and cheer end ceremony. Steve and Judy were slow to get acquainted. She suggested when he phoned, "I don't like first dates—could we pretend it's our second?" He grunted agreeably, she remembers. Date: December 15, '56. Pin: February 17, '57.

At statue of Lincoln: a talk with history professor Hesseltine. Steve, immersed in Civil War, biked in 1956 to battlegrounds in 4 states. Total equipment: "a hammock, pair of pants and two T shirts."

Study is solemn, social life slap-happy. Almost half of Wisconsin U. students work their way through college.

Philosophy is only class they take together. Here they sit side by side near door, lean forward to hear student Dave Loeffler talk on "Problem of the Artist in Contemporary Society." Both like the idea that "the instructor, Mr. Kaelin, turns the class over to us and makes us think out the material."

While sophomores Jan Elliot and Susan Martin play ukuleles, Arlis Edgington dances in grass skirt and Judy thrums tambourine to pass time before dinner call. Wisconsin U. boasts of its international flavor. The 22,000 enrollment (16,000 on Madison campus) includes students from 60 countries.

Roughhouse for Judy, after getting her pin, includes being dumped in shower with her clothes on. In spring, girls get dunked in Lake Mendota. "It helps to be hardy," she says of campus life and love. Steve so often cuffs her fondly that a friend recently said, "He ought to call her Puppet because he's always punchin' Judy."

Luau, a favorite campus party, calls for little work. Paper on floor holds fruits and meats, calls for occasional threats to barefoot guests. "Keep your feet off the table!" Steve asked Judy to party at Chi Psi Lodge, pointed out ex-girl friends. "I ignored him." Both left dance at 10 P.M. She has to keep her marks up for scholarship aid, he for teaching post.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 109 her going away to start college at the tender age of sixteen. "I had been dating since I was thirteen, usually with boys at least two years older than myself. However," she adds, "my parents were always very strict. I could never go to a party without an adult present and I couldn't stay out to all hours of the night. They also wanted to know exactly where I was going after school and I'm glad they did."

While Judy was completing her junior year at Bayside, anxiously looking forward to the next fall, Steve Ambrose, a boy she would later meet, was already getting a good taste of life as a college freshman at Wisconsin.

Steve was advised to join a fraternity because the pledges lived in the fraternity houses and were made to study. If their grades weren't up, they weren't allowed to become members.

With this in mind, he immediately started accepting bids from fraternities, though he knew his father wanted him to be a Psi Upsilon. "I was so worried I didn't sleep for two weeks and lost ten pounds. Finally three Chi Psi's cornered me after the Marquette game and smooth-talked me into joining their fraternity. It was quite a blow to my father, who wanted to give me his Psi Upsilon pin at initiation," Steve recalls, "and now I know it wouldn't have made that much difference. They're all swell guys, but at the time you think you're signing your life away."

He also went out for freshman football with all the assurance of a 190-pound high-school football captain and star. He soon found he was only one of 180 hopefuls, among whom were many outstanding athletes.

After plugging away on the seventh team, he began to get fed up. He decided to go to one more practice. Then he'd quit. During that practice he gave all he had, and by luck he was spotted by the first-string freshman coach. The next day he was playing in the line on the first squad.

Football season was hardly over when Steve, at seventeen, fell "madly in love" with a twenty-one-year-old Kappa Kappa Gamma. "But she was never interested in me and finally cut me off. I felt so bad," Steve remembers, "that I walked all over the frozen lake that night, half hoping I'd bust through the ice."

Spring came and so did a second love, in May. This time she was a Pi Beta Phi freshman his own age. He drove from Whitewater to visit her while she attended summer school and that fall, the start of his sophomore year, he pinned her.

"But she lived in Elizabeth Waters Hall, at the top of Observatory Hill, a mile and a half from the Chi Psi lodge. After three months of walking a mile and a half to see her every day, I decided the walk was too long and we got unpinned," Steve recalls.

This was also the fall that Judy Dorlester had been waiting for. Skipping her senior year of high school, she came to Madison and lived with four other girls a mile off campus in a private home.

She soon knew this was a mistake. "I found I was missing all kinds of wonderful activities on campus. So my second semester I moved on campus, into Villa Maria, a private dormitory that houses a hundred and twenty girls."

Steve, 21, Judy, 18, plan a summer marriage, a full life ahead to share.

Judy continued to do well with her studies, and because there was still a financial need, the Ford Foundation upped the $250 a semester to $400.

There was still room and board to pay at Villa Maria, however. It cost $980 a year. Judy's parents helped all they could, but more was needed, so she got various jobs through friends and through the campus employment agency. One job was at the State Historical Library checking coats, getting books and taking visitors on tours through the museum. Another was in the dean's office during registration weeks. She also did baby-sitting. The jobs paid from 85 cents to $1 an hour. One 85-cent job had her calculating the heartbeat of hibernating chipmunks for the physiology department.

As a high-school girl, Judy had avoided sororities. "They were against my principles. I didn't like to join exclusive groups and have my friends hand-picked for me." At Wisconsin she got several bids, but again decided against joining. "Out here you can still have a wonderful time without being a sorority girl," she explains.

Unlike Steve, Judy was not smitten by the opposite sex. She now felt dating was "wishy-washy." "I found people were afraid to be themselves. Most of the time you sat around in dark fraternity houses talking platitudes all night. That first year was mostly a matter of weeding out—and they were mostly weeds," she adds dryly.

But during her second semester she started CONTINUED ON PAGE 114

In Whitewater, Steve's mother, "Cee-Cee," shows Judy scrapbooks she has kept on him. Judy loves their home—"full of personal feeling and hobbies"—hopes her own will be like it. Steve warns he's "going to hang pictures of Civil War generals all over the house." Judy's idea for children's room: "White walls kids can paint on."

As term draws to a close, they walk to Vilas Park for tennis—also their favorite spot for skating, hiking or visiting zoo. When Judy saw a mother lion fussing over a sore-pawed father lion she mused, "How universal." Steve whacked her with a tennis racket. After final exams they plan honeymoon in his family's summer cabin on Lake Tripp.

'Cool off with Borden's Buttermilk"... says Elsie, the Borden Cow

ELSIE: What a lovely playpen, Elmer! Now our little twins will get plenty of fresh air and sunshine.

ELMER: I've had plenty already! I'm about to melt.

ELSIE: Have some country-fresh Borden's Buttermilk. It's cooling and non-fattening, because it's low in calories — only about 85 in a big glassful! I'm going to have an Orange Buttermilk Cooler.

ELMER: Woman, are you suggesting I'm overweight? I happen to like my buttermilk straight.

ELSIE: Of course, dear, and it's very good for you. You know Borden's Buttermilk contains all the important proteins and minerals of milk, plus an extra something that tones up the digestive system.

ORANGE BUTTERMILK COOLER

1 cup chilled Borden's Buttermilk
1 large scoop Borden's orange sherbet

Combine buttermilk and sherbet; beat until smooth and creamy. Garnish with orange slice and maraschino cherry. Serve with colorful straw.

Get Borden's Buttermilk at your food store, or from your Borden man. And watch for the Borden twin values at your food store.

See Borden's TV shows, "The People's Choice," and "Fury."

Borden's

Milk • Fine Cheeses
Ice Cream • Starlac

©1957, The Borden Company

For 100 years folks have been saying, "If it's Borden's, it's got to be good!"

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 113

going around with a senior. It didn't work. "He browbeat me with a lot of intellectual stuff, trying to prove how little I knew. This happens to a lot of girls. Anyway, I went home at the end of my freshman year practically a nervous wreck."

That summer Judy worked as a camp counselor in the Adirondacks and earned $100. So far she had never heard of a Wisconsin football player named Steve Ambrose.

While Judy was trying out her freshman wings, Steve was having his share of troubles. "During my sophomore year [1954–55] I became the playboy of the western world. I spent a lot of money, drank too much, and took out lots of girls. I was just generally fouled up," he remembers.

The main trouble seemed to be two premed courses that weren't agreeing with him. At the end of the year he got D's in both, but A's in two history courses. He also dropped his medical ambitions.

However, not all was black that "fouled-up sophomore year." He was a third-string guard on the varsity squad and made all the trips with the team. He organized a highly successful interfraternity track meet, and as a member of the Student Forum Committee was asked to be the producer-director of "Quiz the Professor," a student TV show on Station WHA-TV. He was also elected to MACE, a junior men's honorary society in which he served as secretary-treasurer the next fall.

By far the most important event of the year was a history course he took from Prof. William B. Hesseltine. Steve was so inspired by this teacher that he decided to be a history major, especially concentrating on the Civil War period. "I didn't date or drink all summer between my sophomore and junior years. All I did was read about the Civil War. After a while it really gets you," he says.

When Judy was a sophomore, and Steve a junior, they were both on the Student Forum Committee. This group of about thirty students plans interesting programs and arranges for guest speakers to visit the university.

It was a happy year for Judy and she dated a lot of the boys on the Forum Committee. "They were wonderful and all had something to talk about," she recalls. Somehow Steve was one boy on the committee that she didn't date that year, or even really notice until late that spring.

By then Steve had been pinned and unpinned a second time, had joined the Civil War Round Table in Madison, and was elected by the Wisconsin Alumni Association one of the six outstanding men in the junior class. He was also starting his senior honor thesis on Gen. Henry Wager Halleck, Lincoln's Chief of Staff.

He was working on this thesis when Judy first really noticed him. "I wondered what a good-looking boy like that was doing, working in the library on a Friday night. So when he stepped out of the room for a cigarette, I trotted right out after him and tried to make small talk. But," she sighs, "he was awfully involved in his work and nothing came of it." And nothing did until the following fall.

There is little of moonlight and roses in the story of their romance as they tell it. Current college talk is jovially rough, brusque, impersonal, with heavy overtones of sarcasm and irony. Most of the humor on campus is of the Charles Addams variety, and anybody who so far forgot himself as to utter any faintly tender sentiments—at least in public—would be marked as hopelessly square. So the terms of endearment heard between these two young people, who have decided quite maturely that they love each other and want to spend the rest of their lives together, are likely to be, "Shut up, you stupid chump!" or "Oh, you conceited oaf!" This hardly sounds romantic, but Steve and Judy understand each other, and they are sure. And, in spite of the studied offhandedness of their speech, when you see them look at each other in an unguarded moment, you're sure too.

The school year started as usual last fall with Steve busy playing football, as varsity guard, in the rugged Big Ten schedule. However, he wasn't too busy to think quite a lot about Judy, who often checked his coat at the State Historical Library, where they both worked fifteen hours a week and studied.

"I had some good, solid, irrational hates then," Steve says candidly. "I naturally didn't know what I was talking about, but I was violently anti-Semitic, anti-New Yorkers, and anti-Ford Foundation students—and Judy was all of those! When I met her they sure went up in smoke." Steve says now that anyone with "good, solid, irrational hates" will quickly lose them if he'll just think, "Why?"

One night he saw her studying, and right then and there asked her out. "I'd already planned to study with some friends, so had to turn him down," Judy remembers regretfully. "I know it made him mad. I'd heard he was conceited, though," she adds with a teasing glance at Steve, "so I thought it would be good for him, but I was kind of sorry about it."

Steve was miffed at being turned down in favor of a study session, but recovered in time to ask Judy to the Chi Psi formal in November. Again he failed, this time because he got Judy's roommate, Judy Keller, on the phone by accident. After straightening out the Judys, he gave up until December 15th.

"That day he called and asked me out. He even asked where I'd like to go. I thought it was very considerate of him and suggested we go to the Student Union, where we could play table tennis or bowl. So," says Judy with a conspicuous lack of resignation, "we went to the movies!"

The theater was crowded, so they stopped first for a bite to eat. Judy told Steve about the great American novel she planned to write. "Steve said that Huck Finn was the great American novel. He was also very sweet and told me not to write myself out in my first book as some authors have done. At least it sounded as if he took me halfway seriously." However, Judy was still skeptical about him. "Maybe because he was so polite."

"I thought, 'This gal is sort of screwy,' and wondered if I'd take her out again," Steve claims. But he told her he'd call. Instead, Judy got a note saying that he'd gone home for Christmas vacation early. "I dropped her a Christmas card and wrote her three letters, I never mailed," Steve admits.

"I didn't even send him a card," Judy laughs. "But I did go to Harvard over the vacation and had a ball! I was almost sorry to get back."

The day after Judy returned to school, Steve took her to see All the King's Men. They stopped going out with others, and saw each other every day.

A week later they got into an argument. "Steve said that great men shape events. I argued that social forces shape events," Judy says. "Before we were through, I told him I'd have to think about it. He was sure he had proved his point."

Judy will still tell you that social forces shape events. But that evening Steve proved to some degree, his theory might also be right.

They were standing in the hall of Ville Maria at 10:30 when the bells began to ring and the lights began to blink "abandon ship" for all visiting males. Judy's arms were full of books (that and smoking a cigarette are two favorite "good-night-kiss defenses" used by the girls). Suddenly Steve took away Judy's

NEXT MONTH

Mel Travioli cannot get out of bed, bathe, shave or dress, or eat by himself. His adoring wife and three children worship him. Customer-friends who nightly buy papers call him "First citizen of Beverly Hills."

THE HAPPY MAN

By HELEN ITRIA

HOW AMERICA LIVES in the August JOURNAL

"down east" good eating in your own back yard

When you get the folks together for a real outdoor treat — be sure there's plenty of these genuine New England B&M Brick Oven Baked Beans on hand. Baked in an old fashioned brown sugar sauce, they'll add eating pleasure to everything you serve.

B&M

BRICK OVEN BAKED BEANS

in New England Sauce with Pork

Burnham & Morrill Co., Portland, Maine

ooks and kissed her. Never at a loss for ords, Judy said, "I was wondering when you ere going to get around to that!" She claims er "big, handsome football player" answered amazement, "What d' ya mean, 'get around that!'" Steve maintains loftily that he purosely didn't kiss her the first couple of dates ecause he knew it had her worried.

They went out a lot together after that, but wasn't until Steve took her home, January th, between semesters, that Judy really arted making up her mind about him.

"I've been in a lot of homes," says Judy, ut I've never felt so welcome, or at home, I did at Steve's house. Cee-Cee, Steve's other, treated me like an old friend the moent we were introduced." Judy also disvered that "Steve and his brothers love to retend they have no use for one another. But ey can't hide the warm admiration and ffection beneath all that bluster and bluff," idy says.

Steve's older brother is a marine first lieunant at Quantico, Virginia. Willie, his unger brother, is a freshman at Wisconsin, edging Chi Psi. "After visiting his home, my oubts about Steve vanished and I knew I was lling in love," Judy remembers.

The very next day Steve went to Baton ouge to look over Louisiana State Uniersity, where he now plans to be an assistant acher this fall. Then he stopped at New rleans.

"I was in the Old Absinthe House and I ked Fats Pinchon, a wonderful piano player, autograph one of his records for me. I ked him to write 'To Judy' on it. When he ked who Judy was I heard myself saying, he's the girl I'm going to marry in June,'" ys Steve, still amazed at himself.

Steve called Judy the minute he got back. He came in with a big sun tan and asked me ow I liked it. He's a real romantic, you now," Judy says with a wink. "He would ve ridden in on a white horse if he'd had e. Anyway, I told him I'd love him even if was pale purple. Then I realized I'd told m that I loved him," Judy recalls, equally nazed. "It really shook me up," says Steve th a straight face.

Later he told Judy that he'd been pinned ice, but thought he was "getting a little old r that kind of stuff. I was trying to impress r on how young she was," he adds. Judy reed that being pinned was "kid stuff."

"Anyway," Steve continues, "I left my pin home to protect myself."

On Sunday, February 17th, he called his mother and asked her to send his fraternity pin. "I was going to ask for it anyway," Judy now admits. They studied together in the university library that afternoon. "I kept looking at her—tall and slim, like a young fawn—and the more I watched her, the more I loved her," Steve says in one of his rare serious moments. "Later we left the library and were walking down Langdon Street. Judy was talking too much as usual. So I told her to 'shut up' and pushed her against a wall so she'd listen. Then I told her how much I loved her and explained ——" "He said," Judy interrupts happily, "'Judy, you know I . . . er . . . um . . . ah . . . can't afford it' (long pause) 'so . . . um . . . I want you to understand that the pin is an engagement ring.' I said I understood."

Judy naturally couldn't wait to tell her friends at Villa Maria. They were all delighted but, in dormitory spirit, started ribbing Judy about Steve's pin. "We hear he has his own pearl divers," they said. Or she would hear them mimic Steve's call home: "Mother, will you please send my pin? No, not the one in the medicine chest. No, not the one in my desk drawer. You know, mother, the one in the shoe box in the bottom of my bureau!"

All parents concerned were very happy. The wedding is planned for this summer, to be held in Chicago. Judy's mother is making her dress—a ballerina-length organdy. Steve's brother William is to be best man.

Some friends do worry about their different religious backgrounds. Judy is Jewish and Steve is a Congregationalist. "It is only in their eyes that our difference is a problem," Judy explains. "Neither Steve nor I nor our parents have made an issue out of it. The basic tenets of both our faiths are a belief in God, doing for others as we would have others do unto us, and following the Ten Commandments. These are the things which we believe are most important in religion and which we share. We don't feel that it matters whether we or our children pray in a church or a synagogue, so long as we follow these basic lessons of humanity." Steve and Judy think now that they will bring up their children as Unitarians.

The couple plan a one-week honeymoon at a cabin owned by Steve's parents in Northern Wisconsin. After that they will move into the married couples' dorms on campus, where they will set up house for the summer on money Steve has saved from his athletic scholarships.

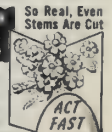
In September they will move to Louisiana State University, where Steve has a teaching

How Steve and Judy plan to make ends meet when they live in Baton Rouge, next fall

They have a nest egg ($1000 in hand now—money saved from Steve's athletic scholarships, etc., plus $300 they expect to save from summer work)	$1300	Steve's income from teaching assistantship . . .	$1100
		Judy's anticipated income from secretarial work (10 months)	2000
		Total Income	$3100

How they think they'll spend the money from September to June (10 months)

Rent (Steve: "We ought to get a furnished apartment for $80 a month")	$ 800	Clothing (Steve: "We'll buy light stuff at end-of-summer sales." Judy: "Mother makes lots of my clothes.")	?
Food (Steve: "Rice and sea food are cheap. We surely can't eat more than $100 a month")	1000	Utilities, telephone (Judy: "I guess we'll need a phone.") .	?
Income taxes (rough estimate on $3100, taken from 1956 tax forms)	300	Furniture, appliances, housewares ("Don't furnished apartments come with cleaning equipment?")	?
Car expenses (Steve's guess, $5 a week)	225	Tuition (His assistantship includes this free)	—
Cigarettes (They figure $150 a year)	125	Recreation (Steve: "I have a lot of records and books." Much campus entertainment is low-cost or free)	?
Dry cleaning, shoe repair, laundry ("We'll have laundry, anyway.")	?	Savings (They plan to save a great deal, in the hope that Judy can finish her A.B., Steve complete work for his Ph.D. in 1958–59)	?
Medical, dental care (Steve's hospital insurance is free. His doctor father suggests Judy procure Blue Cross coverage)	?



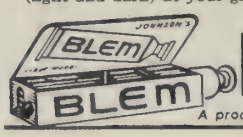
Tweedie Footwear Corporation • Jefferson City, Mo.

PREVENT INSECT BITES WITH Orcopel REPEL-PAPER

Use like cleansing tissue to repel mosquitoes, gnats, chiggers, flies. Guaranteed effective and absolutely safe; non-toxic, non-irritating. At dealers everywhere.
Orchard Paper Co. • St. Louis 15, Mo.
10 Reusable Sheets in Plastic Pouch 25¢

Sell Amazing "Cut Flowers" GREETING CARDS
Make 85¢ on Every $1.25 Box
Earn extra money NOW with outstanding year-round money makers! No experience needed. Show friends FREE Samples of new Christmas Cards from lovely Personal Album; full line new Gift Novelties; best-selling card Assortments. Up to $100 in Gift Bonuses besides big cash profits. Rush name for Samples on approval. $1 Nest Egg Banks free if you act fast!
CREATIVE CARDS, 4401 Cermak, Dept. 134-G, Chicago 23

So Real, Even Stems Are Cut
ACT FAST Get $1 "Golden Nest Egg" FREE



Do You Need EXTRA INCOME?

YOU can profit, ■ do thousands of others, by using our money-making plan. Our subscription commission offer is enthusiastically used by folks in many communities. You can offer and profit from Ladies' Home Journal, The Saturday Evening Post, Holiday, Jack and Jill and many other popular publications. Write today for our easy-to-follow plan and supplies. No obligation. Address your request to

CURTIS CIRCULATION COMPANY
989 Independence Square, Philadelphia 5, Penna.

FIRST AID FOR FURNITURE
RUB OUT BURNS
other scars, scratches no polish can touch

Save costly refinishing! Repair furniture damage at home with BLEM—new professional finish restoring compound. BLEM recompounds the surface, removes charred edges, helps restore color permanently! Effective for "white marks", nail polish, milk, alcohol blemishes. Two shades (light and dark) at your grocer's now.

BLEM
A product of Johnson's Wax

This Clever New "Miniature Mixer"
SALT and PEPPER SET
Yours to keep for only 10¢

REGULAR PRICE $1.25
TOP TILTS BACK; shakers and bowl easily removed.

A SPECIAL INTRODUCTORY OFFER—To Prove How Easily You Can Make $50 to $250 or More with Doehla Christmas Cards!

THIS Offer is made to show how easy it is to make money in spare time showing lovely new Doehla Christmas Cards and Gift Items to your friends and neighbors. No experience needed.

Mail Coupon Now — We'll also send several boxes of cards on approval. Harry Doehla and Associates, Studio L17, Nashua, N. H., or St. Louis 1, Mo., ■ Palo Alto, Calif.

There's a Doehla Associate nearby to serve you.

HARRY DOEHLA and ASSOCIATES, Studio L17,
Nashua, N. H. OR St. Louis 1, Mo. OR Palo Alto, Calif.
(Address office nearest you)

Send "Miniature Mixer" Salt ■ Pepper Set for which I enclose only 10c; also send several boxes of Christmas Cards on approval, with full details of the Doehla "Extra Money" Plan. (Offer limited to one to ■ family.)

Name.....
Address.....
City.....State.....
☐ Check here for Special FUND-RAISING Plan for church, school, club or organization.

JULY GIFT SPECIAL!

For the best iced tea you ever tasted . . .

New PYREX® Instant Coffee and Tea Maker

(with Tea Ball)

8-cup size, regularly $3.95, ONLY $2.88 You save $1.07

12-cup size, regularly $4.95, ONLY $3.88 You save $1.07

An especially good buy any time this July!

- ★ Just in time for iced-tea season!
- ★ Makes finer flavored instant coffee and tea, because smooth, non-porous PYREX ware can't absorb or pass on any other taste.
- ★ Use the attractive tea ball for brewing loose tea, or use handy tea bags.
- ★ Also ideal as smart server for hot chocolate, lemonade, juices, milk, and other beverages.
- ★ Has beautiful 22-kt. gold decorations, capacity markings, stay-cool handle, and wide neck with removable cover for easy cleaning.
- ★ Attractively gift wrapped, so choose yours now—and save—at your nearby housewares store.
- ★ This special offer ends midnight, July 31st, so hurry!

THERE'S ONLY ONE PYREX® BRAND WARE, A PRODUCT OF CORNING GLASS WORKS, CORNING, NEW YORK

VISIT THE CORNING GLASS CENTER, CORNING, N.Y. CORNING MEANS RESEARCH IN GLASS assistantship paying $1100 a year, plus tuition and medical insurance. Judy hopes to work as a secretary, earning about $200 a month, she thinks.

After a year, Steve would like to return to Wisconsin and start on his Ph.D. ("I can help him—type his papers and thesis," says Judy), but Uncle Sam will probably call him first. In that case Judy will probably be a camp wife and Steve hopes to get on an Army football team.

One could never tell by watching that Steve and Judy are a prospective bride and groom. More likely than not, Steve is punching Judy's arm or playfully choking her, "to keep her in shape." You can hear him accuse her of showing her ignorance in philosophy class, or Steve will beef about the library fines he pays for her. "And we're not even married yet," he grumbles. "She could have bought the book for less!"

Judy, not being an avid football fan, will refer to Steve as, "My big handsome football hero," getting as much sarcasm into the words as she can. She is forever calling him "conceited," or a "swell head," and will accuse him of wearing his red jacket because some girl told him that he looked like James Dean in it.

Asked the direct question, "Why did you fall in love with each other?" Judy answers quietly, "I love Steve for his understanding and his honesty, and for his ability to stand up for what he thinks is right." Steve says, "My girl is sweet, sincere and sensible."

A moment later they're back at their current argument over the double-ring ceremony. Steve says teasingly that wearing a ring will tie him down. Judy reminds him of what the Rev. Max Gaebler said when they planned the wedding: "Remember, Steve, the ring is for your finger, not your nose." END

COOLERS Tall and Frosty

Eight new drinks for your "thirst-aid handbook" this summer. They're tall, frosty with a bit of flavor mystery about them. Just enough to pique the curiosity.

MINTED GRAPE SIP. An easy-to-make cooler, perfect for unexpected callers. It's made by simply mixing 1 cup ice-cold water with 2 cups chilled grape juice, 2½ cups chilled orange juice, 2 tablespoons lemon juice, 3 tablespoons sugar and 2 teaspoons mint-and-peppermint extract. Pour into 5 tall, frosted glasses and top with a spoonful of lemon sherbet and a sprig of mint.

ROSEMARY FIZZ. To make this delightfully cool and colorful drink, simmer 2 tablespoons crushed rosemary leaves, 3 tablespoons sugar and a dash of salt in ½ cup water for 2 minutes. Cool and strain. In a tall, chilled pitcher, mix an 18-ounce can apricot nectar with 1 quart ginger ale and ½ cup lime juice. Pour into 8 tall, ice-filled glasses and garnish with twists of lime rind.

HERBED TOMATO COOLER. Children are always calling for refreshing drinks during the hot summer months. A delightful "herby" one, which is incidentally packed with nourishing food, is made by simmering ½ cup tomato juice with 2 tablespoons crushed basil leaves for 3 minutes. Chill and strain. Add the strained juice to 3 cups cold tomato juice mixed with 1 tablespoon lemon juice. Then thoroughly beat in ½ cup commercial sour cream. This makes 4 good servings.

PINEAPPLE FRAPPÉ. Gentle marjoram makes a subtle but pleasing "difference" in this cooling fruit concoction. Mix ¼ cup crushed marjoram leaves with 2 cups pineapple juice in a covered saucepan. Simmer for 3 minutes. Cool. Strain. In a bowl, mix the steeped pineapple juice, 3 tablespoons sugar, 2 tablespoons lime juice, 3 more cups pineapple juice and ½ cup puréed fresh strawberries. Place shaved ice in 9 cocktail glasses. Pour in the herbed pineapple-juice mixture. Garnish with a whole fresh strawberry in each glass and serve with straws.

PEACH COCKTAIL. A quickie appetizer or between-meals cooler is this peach-and-orange combination with its spiking of tarragon. In an electric blender mix 1 cup orange juice, 2 peeled and pitted peaches cut into eighths or ½ cup thawed frozen sliced peaches, ½ cup sugar (if you use fresh peaches; ⅓ cup if you use frozen peaches), 1½ teaspoons crushed tarragon leaves, ⅓ cup lemon juice and 5 ice cubes, crushed. Cover and whiz for about 30 seconds at high speed. Serve immediately in small glasses. This makes 6 good servings

PETER'S PUNCH. Mix together 1 can frozen limeade concentrate and 1 can frozen orange-juice concentrate. Add 5 cans water and ⅓ cup grenadine. Mix well and serve over cracked ice. Makes 4 glasses.

PEACH-GINGER COOLER. Use 1 package frozen sliced peaches that have been thawed. Drain well, and dice. Add ¾ cup sugar, ¼ teaspoon nutmeg, ¼ teaspoon ginger and 2 tablespoons lemon juice. Mash lightly and mix well. When ready to serve, spoon mixture equally into 4 tall glasses. Fill remainder of glasses with 4 small bottles ginger ale. Stir well. Serve it iced. Garnish with orange slices.

CAPTIVE

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 43

guess it's better than starving. We've been hungry for so long."

The sign loomed up then: BOUNDARY NAVAHO RESERVATION. WATCH FOR WAGONS.

From the helicopter, the country looked like the wastelands of the moon, slashed in fantastic shapes, stark and grim.

Joe Barnes slouched at the controls, a balding man in his fifties with a face the texture of elephant skin. "What time you got, Marv?" he asked the younger man who sat beside him, a tall, hard-muscled fellow in his early thirties, with jet hair inclined to curl and brows so prominent they gave his moody eyes the effect of being deep-set.

Joe slid him a sideways glance. Sometimes Marv didn't answer when asked a question. He wasn't much for talking, because he never could seem to get the words out. That's not good for a man, Joe thought.

Marv said, "Ten after."

"We should've picked 'em up before this."

As Joe held the binoculars on the long black ribbon cutting across the land for endless miles, he tried to come to grips with the trouble in his hand. Ten years ago, when he first met Marv down in the Arizona penitentiary at Florence, he'd had the steadiest hand and eye and mind in the business. Marv had said once, "Joe, you old goat, you wouldn't bat an eyelash if they were stringin' you up."

Marv was different. He wasn't one to stretch back with a cigarette and let the smoke drift.

Joe took a deep breath. They'd hit it off well from the first, despite the gap in years between them. So when they got out, Joe had tied up with him because he had a "feeling," and he'd never missed when he had a "feeling."

Only now he wasn't so sure.

"That's the Cameron trading post," Joe said, nodding toward a clot of buildings and cottonwoods.

He continued to scan the country intently, letting the 'copter run itself, its blades cutting the still air with a monotonous rhythm. A few miles farther, he veered the craft to the right, away from Highway 89, following a sandy, corduroy road to Tuba City, which was not a city at all but a gas station, trading post, hospital, and several low Government buildings, all strung out along a quiet road shaded by ging cottonwoods.

"These Navvies don't have any towns," Joe said. "Never have had. Anything they call a settlement was built by the white man."

They were deep into Navaho country now, last frontier that spread over 16,000,000 acres, a "nation" bigger than Connecticut, Massachusetts and New Hampshire combined, inhabited by almost 80,000 Navahos who called themselves Dine, meaning The People.

It was a perfect spot for a setup, Joe had said. It was so remote that there was no railroad, no bus, no power lines, no gas, no television, and the only telephone was a Government line running out of Window Rock on the New Mexico border.

"Why, kid," Joe had said as they sat over beers in a Los Angeles motel planning the operation, "you wouldn't believe there could be anything like it in the United States."

Joe knew this country. He had grown up at Blanding, Utah, the first white town of any size north of the Navaho reservation. "I pulled my first job at Monticello. Blew a feed store and got thirty-six bucks, and you couldn't hold me after that. Struck right off for the Coast, figuring the big money was over there. My old man didn't care. He'd taken up with a Mex and she didn't like me."

As Joe settled the 'copter lower, barely skimming the rutted road, they saw scattered hogans. "See those upside-down bird nests? They live in 'em—sort of log cabins, 'ceptin' they got roofs made of mud and six sides."

Marv yawned, then came suddenly alive. "That's them," he said, indicating a dark car that bounced dangerously as it swayed around a sharp curve over the rough road. A billowing cloud rose behind.

Joe said, "About five miles more."

Marv checked his gun and wiped his dry lips.

Joe continued, "You're thinking it's a three-way split—twenty thousand dollars for each of us and twenty thousand dollars for the setup guy in Flagstaff. And if you could cut old Joe Barnes out, it'd be thirty thousand dollars. One bullet—worth ten thousand bucks."

Marv stared at him, grim. Joe looked amused, never taking his eyes from the car he was stalking He held the 'copter back, following the cloud of dust.

"There isn't a guy breathing doesn't think like that. But you just keep it in your head, kid."

"You're big crazy," Marv said.

The car turned right on a trail barely sketched. Joe lifted the 'copter, took the binoculars from Marv and looked for Navahos. A helicopter was a remarkable invention. It left no cloud of dust hanging in the air to mark it, and a man could take his prey by surprise and then make a fast, clean getaway. But best of all, a man could survey the country for miles to see who was about.

Clay Jackson took the corduroy road fast, finding grim zest in fighting it mile by mile, ducking the potholes and yanking the wheel to dodge sand traps. Outside of Tuba City they left the corduroy behind and flowed over a wide, smooth highway, so new they could smell the tar.

They passed Navahos in pickup trucks, often with their wives and four or five children crowded in the front seat. They roared past the huge funnellike contraptions of the Rare Metals Processing Company, that looked like something a spaceman might have rigged up to mine another planet. Shortly afterward, they turned right, taking a sandy trail over rolling desert land covered sparsely by low stunted growth.

"Don't see many 'copters out this way," Clay commented as the roar grew. And then it seemed the 'copter was almost sitting on them.

Clay slowed and took an upward look out the window. The 'copter sputtered and dropped a few feet.

"That fellow's in trouble," Clay said. He shot the car forward to get out from under, and the wheels skidded dangerously in the soft earth.

Jim Begay pulled his .45 and held it easily, his finger slipping by instinct about the trigger.

Joe said, "O.K., kid, get ready." Marv dropped the window and a sharp whish of air slapped them as he poked the Tommy gun out.

Joe said calmly, "Aim for the tires." He raced the 'copter ahead of the car, and Marv let go with a short burst.

The car below spurted and caromed wildly. As the road dipped low, so low that neither the automobile nor the 'copter could be seen, Joe set the craft astride the trail, dead in front of the car, which lurched to avoid hitting them, spun out of control, and careened with a resounding crash into a boulder.

Marv sat rigid at the window, not moving except to let the Tommy gun slide out of his hands and pick up the revolver.

Joe yelled, "Let's go."

Dropping from the 'copter, they raced for the protection of a rock as shots spattered the ground about them. Then Joe screamed as a bullet ripped into his chest near his shoulder socket. Marv stepped over his body as though it weren't there, and gained the rock.

As Jim Begay came out the car door, Marv's slug caught him at the second step. The Navaho rocked under the impact, struggled to keep his feet, then plunged face downward and never moved.

Swiftly Marv was on his feet, bending low, running, firing as he ran. Clay slumped over the car door, the rifle dropping from his hand.

Marv rose upright and stood tense, listening. He blasted the lock on the rear trunk expertly, and picked up the moneybag. Then he heard the deep, labored breath, and turned. Clay was struggling to lift his head. Marv took ends dull, dry "thirsty" hair—replaces your natural beauty oils so each and every strand shines with new natural color brilliance

Helene Curtis

Lanolin Discovery®

THE NEW HAIRDRESSING IN SPRAY FORM

Unlike ordinary hairdressings which "coat" your hair—make it oily, LANOLIN DISCOVERY Hairdressing is pure greaseless lanolin in a mist so fine it is absorbed by each strand of hair. LANOLIN DISCOVERY replaces your natural hair oils—makes dull, dry, "thirsty" hair disappear. In just seconds you get the same naturally beautiful results as brushing your hair 100 strokes a day.

Used and recommended by beauticians everywhere. Available wherever cosmetics are sold a step closer and fired. Opening the door, he let the body pitch to the ground and searched the clothing, finding only a wallet which he pocketed.

Only then did he turn back to Joe Barnes. He rolled a little as his feet found themselves unaccustomed to the rough, crunchy red earth that seemed firm enough on the surface but powdered at the touch. The acrid smell of bullet fire clung close to the ground, and the sun was suddenly hot. He walked with a pleased look.

Joe had been watching. "Why'd you do that, kid?"

"Whatcha want—a witness in court, stringing us up?" He crouched down, examined the wound and mopped up the blood with his handkerchief. "You got it bad."

He took his shirt off, tore it up and fashioned a crude bandage. Afterward he held the water canteen to Joe's lips.

"I can't make it, kid," Joe said.

"You're making it." Marv helped him to his feet, slipped an arm under his good one, and supported him as he staggered toward the craft.

"If I pass out on you ——"

Marv got him behind the controls, Joe groaning and sitting stock-still a long time, breathing heavily, his eyes glazed with shock.

"O.K., let's get out of here."

Joe spun the motor, which responded instantly and settled down to the old familiar rhythm.

The craft lifted slowly. Marv reached across Joe to pick up the binoculars. He swept the country hurriedly, then scrutinized it mile by mile. He saw a couple of Navahos on horseback in the distance, a child tending sheep on a mesa to the far right, and a couple of hogans to the left.

"We've got to put down, kid," Joe said, half doubled up. "I can't make a hundred miles."

Back in Los Angeles, he had spread out a map of Arizona and pointed to a dot lettered "Chambers" on Highway 66, then moved his finger up a half inch. "We'll hide out a car here—at Wide Ruin—and after we finish the job we'll ditch the helicopter there, pick up our car, and whoosh, we'll be in Albuquerque."

Joe drew his breath in sharply. "Take a look at that gauge." He spoke with effort. "I'm not the only thing around here got plugged." The gauge showed "Empty" and the 'copter was dropping fast.

Marv thought he said it with relief. For a moment frustration grabbed him, blocking out his reason as always, exhorting his body to violence. When the spasm had ebbed, he put the binoculars to his eyes again.

"Look!" He pointed to two trailers parked side by side, about a mile ahead, and a car standing near them. "You gotta make it, Joe. If we can get that car ——" The sweat rose on his forehead.

The trailers squatted on the side of a jagged promontory, overlooking in the distance a turquoise pool in a rock basin. A small marker read: RED MESA TRAILER SCHOOL.

Seventeen children sat inside, lined up behind two rows of desks. The youngest was seven, the oldest twelve. The youngest paid no attention to the two teachers at the far end, being engrossed in drawing a picture to illustrate the word H-o-u-s-e. Painstakingly he was sketching a hogan.

He looked up guiltily as Ruth Madison tapped on the desk. She was tall and slender, in her early twenties, and had a well-scrubbed, wholesome outdoor look. Her sun brown contrasted sharply with her simple white blouse, and Navaho turquoise bits bobbed prettily at her ears as she talked. She had her hair pulled back in a pony tail, since the nearest beauty parlor was seventy-eight miles distant.

She spoke a sentence, and then waited while Mary Toatin, her assistant, translated it into Navaho for those children too young to understand English. She had grown fond of this Navaho girl, who had been her "roomie" since school started. Mary Toatin could have passed for a coed on any campus. She wore a sweater over a straight flannel skirt, bobby socks and saddle oxfords; her jet-black hair was pincurled; and she was collegiate in her talk.

Ruth closed her eyes and listened intently, wanting to learn Navaho. She listened to her vowels, since each vowel had four separate tones, and each tone a meaning in itself. She listened, too, to Mary's quick clutch of breath, the "glottal closure" that also held meaning.

A ten-year-old boy in the back interrupted. "Thirst is killing me," he said, translating his thought literally.

"No, no," Ruth said. "I told you, Chee, don't you remember? You say, 'I am thirsty' or 'I want a drink.'"

This was the most difficult part, breaking the children of Navaho thought patterns. It was always, "Hunger kills me," since such desires as hunger and thirst were outside pressures, not inward ones.

Chee corrected himself, grinning, and she dismissed him.

The alien sound outside that had been growing swelled into a roar, and she stepped to the door as Chee hurried back. "Heelicopter," he said, proud that he knew the word, and pointed straight up.

She moved outside and watched anxiously as she heard the telltale sputtering of the motor and saw the craft settling lower, tipping and definitely off keel. For a harrowing moment she thought it was going to sit on her car, a beaten-up Ford that had cost her three years' savings. The children crowded about, silent and awed by the sight.

A tall, lean man, a little older than herself, dropped with the easy spring of a cougar to the ground, and paced slowly toward them. He was stripped to the waist, and his skin was so white she knew he hadn't been long without a shirt. His gaze moved about over the trailers and her car and at last rested on her.

"You an American?" he asked, and she instantly resented him. Then as he turned his head slightly, she saw the dull red birthmark that spread from his jawline up to his eyes.

Her resentment changed to pity. She said quietly, "We're all Americans here."

He hesitated, uncertain how to take it, then continued, "I got a buddy who's hurt pretty bad. Stopped a bullet." He indicated his left shoulder. "He's bleeding ——"

She moved toward the other trailer that served as a home for her and Mary. "Can you get him over here?"

Without answering, he turned on his heels. She stripped back the covers from her bed, asked Mary to heat water, and quickly located the first-aid kit. She worked swiftly, methodically, her fingers sorting out the contents and arranging them on a low bookshelf by the bed. She slid a corner of her eye toward the 'copter, over the heads of the children crowded about the door, and noted that the wounded man was much older than the other who carried him.

She ordered Chee to take the class to the helicopter. "You tell how it works, Chee. You remember, don't you?"

"Yes, sir."

"Yes, ma'am," she corrected him.

Marv lowered the man to the edge of the bed. "You O.K., Joe?"

Joe shot a glance at the white sheets. "The blood," he mumbled.

"Stretch out," she told him, businesslike, lifting his legs and swinging them onto the bed.

She worked fast, clipping his shirt away, mopping up the blood and cauterizing the wound, and not liking what she saw. She asked, "What happened?"

The younger fellow hurried to answer: "We were out hunting. He shot himself—accidentally."

She glanced up in disbelief, meeting a gaze that dared her to dispute him. For the first time on the reservation, she was suddenly and unreasonably afraid. As she worked, she grew conscious of his steps as he shuffled about, inspecting the trailer.

"You live here by yourself?" he asked.

"Mary and I do."

He looked Mary over. "With an Indian?"

Her fingers stopped their work as Joe said, "Look, Marv, for God's sake ——" She saw Mary turn away to swallow the hurt, and felt instinctively protective toward her.

She answered quietly, "The Navahos are not race-conscious."

He stared at her a moment, his face dark, then shrugged.

"You're pretty good at that," the older man said as she bandaged the wound, fashioning a figure-8 pack. He had scarcely flinched.

"Are you from Window Rock?" she asked, knowing he wasn't.

The younger broke in sharply. "Where's that?"

"East of here, a hundred miles. It's the Government center. I thought maybe ——"

"No," Marv said. "We're from Williams."

Joe struggled to ease himself upright. "Where'd you work, girl? Before you came here?"

She tensed. "What do you mean?"

"Where'd you work as a nurse?"

She tried laughing. "My last patient was a goat. Fractured leg."

As the young fellow's eyes lingered about her, she turned away uncomfortably. He said "What's a pretty doll like you doing out here in this Godforsaken place?"

A pretty doll? It had been a long time since anyone had called her that. Two years. She remembered the last time to a day. It was cit talk. No one in this country was likely to call a woman a doll.

"It's a job." She looked down at Joe. "I've stopped the bleeding—but the bullet's got to come out. There's a hospital at Tuba City. I don't imagine it's more than ten, fifteen minutes by air."

The man called Marv interrupted: "Where's the phone?"

She pegged him then as a stranger and lying about coming from Williams, or he would have known. "Where do you want to call?" she asked, noting the mouth that was full-lipped and sensuous and tormented.

"Flagstaff." He was immediately suspicious. "Why?"

"You'll find a phone at the Tonalea trading post, ten miles from here."

Joe said flatly, "You're not calling anyone kid."

Marv shrugged again. "O.K., play it your way." He turned to her. "Is that your car out there?"

She nodded.

"We've had a breakdown ——"

Joe interrupted: "He means, ma'am, could we borrow it?"

Chee appeared in the doorway. "Miss Madison," he said timidly.

"Yes, Chee?"

"We found a bullet hole, Miss Madison."

The slap cracked against his jaw and his little body hit the earth hard. "Damn dirty little Indian," Marv said.

Everyone froze for a second, Ruth with a thermometer in hand, Mary with her mouth open, Joe with a thrust of pain set on his face and Chee sprawled on his back, too terrified to move. Then Ruth said in a low, angry voice, "Get out of here."

As she started to brush by him to help Chee, he fastened a hand about her wrist, gripped it and turned it with a snap, throwing her to the floor. Mary came for him, fists flailing. He swore, and sent a punch low into her body. She sobbed and doubled up.

He heard the hurried pat of feet on the soft red earth outside, swung about, and saw Chee thirty feet away, running.

Joe shouted, "Hold it, kid!" and aimed a kick at Marv that missed.

Marv fired, and yelled, "I got him," as Chee fell flat. Joe staggered to his feet. "You crazy fool," he said, but Marv didn't hear him. He saw the little form wriggling away toward undergrowth. He raised the .38, but Ruth grabbed for the weapon, sending the shot into the sky. With his left hand he knocked her

CONTINUED ON PAGE 121

NEXT MONTH

"SUDDENLY I FELT MY FLESH CREEP!"

"Again I caught the sound of that cautious, menacing step. I thought of the savage killer who had been at work here so recently. Mollie whispered, 'Get on.'" . . . Two reporters for rival newspapers, on the trail of a murderer, find themselves the pursued instead of the pursuers in "Beginner's Luck," a new mystery novel by Paul Somers, complete in this issue.

HE'S THE HAPPIEST MAN ON WILSHIRE BOULEVARD

Melvin Travioli sells newspapers in Beverly Hills, California, started selling them before he was ten years old. Now he is 50, has a wife, three children and his own home. Mel—everybody calls him Mel—is a spastic. You'll meet the Travioli family in "How America Lives."

"HE SAYS MY FEELINGS ABOUT SEX ARE ALL WRONG"

"My husband is 25. I am 23. After almost a year of marriage our relationship seems to be getting worse instead of better." Dr. Clifford Adams helps a young wife find answers to her problem of who is "right" and who is "wrong" in marriage quarrels.

THE "NO-WILL-POWER" WAY TO A PERFECT FIGURE

Her wedding dress was size 12. When Mallory Baele decided to lose the excess weight she had acquired, she was wearing a size 48 and weighed 245 pounds. With her doctor, she worked out what she calls the No-Will-Power Diet "because it is excuse proof." In ten months she was wearing size 12 again and weighed her present 125 pounds.

WHAT'S COOLER THAN A CUCUMBER?

Cucumber frappé is the answer, one of the most refreshing ways to start a summer meal. "Collector's Items" tells how to prepare it and gives nine new recipes for seasonable, delicious soups.

A SCHOOL WHERE IT DOESN'T COST A CENT TO ENROLL

Every boy and girl at the School of the Ozarks at Point Lookout, Mo., has a job. Here is a school where they may work to pay all expenses. "Life isn't a handout," says M. Graham Clark, president. The Public Affairs Department reports on "High School is Worth Working For."

YOUR FIRST FALL DRESS

The fabrics are new—plaid wool jersey, checks in all sizes, colors to inspire the woman who likes to sew. Nora O'Leary shows in two pages of color photographs how to use matching-fabric bows, buttons, a fur belt to add the "custom made" touch.

And additional pages of fashion news, more recipes and menus, Dr. Spock's page for mothers, a new prefabricated house plan and many other features, all coming

IN THE AUGUST JOURNAL

The Picture of Health for July

by MAXINE DAVIS

"Come on youngsters, I'll do your backs," I tell my son and daughter each morning. I apply UTOL. It hides pimples on their backs as well as on faces. Our children are at the cne age, when a "spot" little larger than a in's head can blot out the summer sun and eem mountainous and malevolent.

So—before they're off to the beach, on goes TOL. You see, this antiseptic antibiotic oint- ent helps relieve the minor irritation and ching that gets them down, and it prevents einfection as well. When blemishes are cov- red up and the discomfort gone they lollup appily as spaniels!

Always valuable, UTOL is a special blessing t vacation time. Girls use it as a foundation nder make-up and know they look their best ven under midday's glare. Boys put it on nd just forget it.

On our family seaside holidays, there has een only one drawback in the past. When e've gone home Dad and I have found our ity clothes have shrunk. Or something!

The gay casual eating, the hot dogs and otato salads, the midmorning soft drinks nd afternoon ice creams didn't seem too erious at the time. And what's the fun of prever counting calories!

After talking to my doctor, I find there is a ainless way to get back in line . . . and stay here. KESSAMIN #14 Tablets, combining essen- al nutritional vitamins and iron, also contain neutral additive that helps make you want ss and feel more satisfied with what you do at! And if you start out overweight, the new ESSAMIN PLAN that comes with the Tablets ill help you to train down into your last ear's sleek swim suit.

No matter how well you feel from July's orts and rest or how slim KESSAMIN helps ou stay, nobody is ever really comfortable ese hot weeks if she perspires a good deal.

You don't object to the perspiration; that's art of the body's built-in cooling system. But erms which inevitably grow in it produce n unlovely smell.

I've just found the best answer to the prob- m of keeping underarms fresh and dainty. t's the New YODORA.

This is a deodorant, the only one com- ounded with an antibiotic that slugs those erms. YODORA is a light delicately-fragrant ream that not only does its main job well but lso soothes and helps heal ordinary surface ritations. And it lasts all day and can last ven through tomorrow!

Your joy in summertime can be clouded you are susceptible to athlete's foot. This is disease of civilization afflicting people who ear shoes. It's worst in hot weather when et perspire. So—you need OCTOFEN.

OCTOFEN LIQUID is designed to stop an tack. OCTOFEN POWDER is an excellent pre- ntive; it's well to use it routinely.

Hospital tests have clinically proved the ffectiveness of OCTOFEN. It is the only medi- tion for athlete's foot approved by the ational Foot Health Council.

TARTAN

AVAILABLE IN CANADA

Pure sun-gold—Tartan's specific sun-screen action lets you stay in the sun 8 times longer without burning! Use Tartan as directed for richer, really flattering tan. No other lotion gives outdoor-loving Americans a better tan than Tartan. Get it in your favorite form. Lotion—Foam—Cream.

TARTAN LIP POMADE

Summer or winter —it relieves "weathered" lips —no chapping, drying, cracking; heals sore lips; does not show.

BETTER . . . by McKESSON ©1957—McKesson & Robbins Inc., New York, N. Y.

Here's the handiest Sheer Look Beauty FRIGIDAIRE has ever made!

Of course, it has all the magic of Sheer Look styling to make your old kitchen look radiantly new now—and keep you in style for the future.

And it has color, too—because Frigidaire now is selling all its color appliances at no extra charge over white.

But above all is the happy fact that here's the handiest food freezer-refrigerator ever to speed your meal-getting routine!

—Two main shelves—with a special big-bottle shelf to boot—roll out, all the way. Every square inch of every corner is usable—with no gadgets to trip your fingers—much more shelf area, model for model, than most other makes.

—The ingenious Plan-A-Door, with interchangeable containers and movable shelves, that lets you be the boss on door storage.

—The freezer section—a real zero-cold freezer—holds 84 pounds—and door dispensers drop cans and packages right into your fingers.

—There are two big Hydrators—a giant Meat Tender (all three porcelain enamel finished), and the finest automatic defrosting system ever invented for the refrigerator section.

—Lady, this is it!—and you'd better act fast. See your Frigidaire dealer—he'll show you it's all true! And the price was NEVER so right!

Model shown is Mayfair Pink—also available in Sherwood Green, Stratford Yellow and the new fashion-wise Charcoal Gray, the color that goes with everything.

Frigidaire Ice-Ejector delivers 27 cubes in 4 seconds flat!

Just pull a lever and the wonderful Frigidaire Ice-Ejector frees the cubes—you don't touch them—keeps them in never-stick cold—stored in a removable bin you can take anywhere!

Look for your Frigidaire Dealer's name in the Yellow Pages of your Classified Telephone Directory under the heading "Electric Appliances."

Frigidaire—Built and Backed by General Motors

'57 FRIGIDAIRE

AMERICA'S HANDIEST REFRIGERATORS

LIVE BETTER ELECTRICALLY

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 118

way, and fired again. But Chee was racing ow, bent low as a man would.

Marv stood a moment, gun in hand, ready o pull the trigger on anyone who moved, his irthmark like a piece of raw flesh. Then the orm ebbed, and as he holstered the .38 his aze went to Ruth's purse. He shook out the ontents and picked up the car keys.

"O.K.," he said, "you're coming with us." he fear quickened, but she stood her ground. oe added, "You'd better do what he says, irl."

"You don't scare me. Neither of you. low—get out of here."

It seemed it was another's voice, and she was stening in amazement.

Again Marv's hand crept for the .38. He said owly, "I'll pick these kids off one at a time."

She hesitated, listening to the words repeat iemselves and hearing that he meant what e said. By rote, she picked up her purse, aking the contents back in with one sweep of er hand. She looked at neither as she passed. he hot breeze was almost cool on her face, nd the crunch of her feet a loud report in the idden quiet. Marv trailed, helping Joe.

"Get in the front seat," Marv said to her; nd to Joe, "You take it easy in the back—but atch her."

She sat very straight, biting her lip. Marv ayed in the helicopter an interminable time. nce Joe said, "Don't cross him, girl. I knew guy who did—a friend of mine."

She braced her feet until she felt the hurt in r leg muscles, as they roared over the nar- w, winding desert road, the brakes screech- g when Marv slammed them on to take a rn, and the tires groaning in the sand with a lf-human sound. She saw the crazed look in s eyes, the way his fingers gripped the wheel.

Gradually her thoughts leveled off, march- g without a tremble to the hard pounding her heart. They would pass Lily Mae's on. She would be sitting outside, weaving a ay rug with red figures and border. But if ly Mae did sense she was in trouble, what uld she do that Chee was not already doing? Chee. He might get a ride, once he reached e main road from Tuba City to Kayenta, hough cars seldom came along.

Suddenly a spring wagon bearing a Navaho uple loomed up before them as they swung er a hump in the rolling land. They lurched ldly as Marv pulled out sharply. He sheared f a wheel of the wagon and momentarily she ard the cry of the woman, and then the wind ew it away. Joe yelled to Marv, but he was af. She glanced back and saw pain deeply ched on the older man's face. A billowing oud of red dust hung across the country e a smoke screen.

They struck a sand trap, spun for a second, d then the car crashed into a prayer cairn, a lon three feet high of stone, wood and bits turquoise and shells, put up by people veling as a petition for a safe journey. She nged at the thought of knocking over a ayer cairn, so much had some of the old avaho beliefs become a part of her.

The cairn stopped them. Joe said, "Whatcha ing to do—kill us off?"

Marv started up the motor.

Joe said sharply, "Pull over and cut it off. here d'you think you're going?"

Marv shut off the ignition and turned back ward him, defiant, an animal that was obey- g but didn't have to. His gaze, as it swung ward Joe, stopped with her, and was a ntipede crawling over her.

Joe said, "Get me the map, kid."

Without taking his eyes from her, Marv ached under his legs and fumbled through box he had brought from the helicopter. nding the map, he spread it across Joe's lap.

Marv said to her, "You're sure a cool num- r."

Unexpectedly, Joe swore at him. "Don't rt that, kid," he warned, and the way he d it sent a new fear creeping through her.

He was turning a sickly gray, and there re long pauses in his speech while he tried absorb the pain. She repeated, "We've got get you to a hospital."

"If I go to a hospital, sister, I go back to son. I'd as soon take my chances out here." He added, "They'll roadblock us if we try to make it to a highway."

Without moving her head, and scarcely her eyes, she scanned the country, but there was only the land, hot and bright and more lonely than she had ever felt it.

Marv said, "What about making it to our car, like we planned? What's wrong with that, huh?"

Joe shook his head. "Nothin' but a lot of Navvy trails, and maybe they're washed out. They'd be looking for us before we got halfway there."

"O.K., you tell me."

"We've got just one out—the Rainbow country." Joe pointed a stubby, gritty finger at the map. "There isn't even so much as a Navvy down there ——"

"—— and there's no road," Ruth finished. If she could stall them long enough, right here ——

She had never seen the Rainbow country, but they said it looked like the place where the earth began, and when God had placed all the mountains and rivers and gorges and tablelands neatly on the face of the earth, this gigantic scramble of Nature was left over. In its wild, majestic midst was perhaps the most magnificent and perfect of all Nature's structures—Rainbow Bridge.

"What's she mean?" Marv asked.

"What she says. We'll leave the car at the head of the trail and get mules ——"

She interrupted again. "The trail's all washed out—and one slip and you're gone," she told them. She felt the tremble in her thigh muscles, where fear always began its insidious work.

"That's about enough out of you, sister," Joe said. He added to Marv, "It's so big you could drop New York City down there and lose it forever. Nobody ever goes down. We'll just disappear and when they've forgotten us—thinkin' we're dead—we'll sneak out."

Marv was growing increasingly irritable. "I don't like the sound of it."

Joe half closed his eyes as he braced himself once more against the agony. He said quietly, "You forget, kid. I'm top dog—as long as I pull a breath."

Marv shrugged.

She chanced one more remark. "It's plain suicide if you get lost down there."

Joe ignored her. "I want the money, kid," he told his partner.

"It's all here." Marv indicated the bag under his feet.

"I'll take it."

Marv stalled. "You're too sick."

"I said I was taking it."

Marv sat razorbacked a moment, then his hands slowly went under his legs and brought the bag out. She saw it bore the marking PUEBLO BANK. "I'm taking mine now," he said.

The quiet stretched tight between them. She glanced apprehensively from one to the other, and saw the dry lips, the dry eyes. Once more she surveyed the country for a wagon, a car, a Navaho on horseback, but nothing moved except the far mesas, shimmering in the heat waves, and the only sound except for the breeze was the movement of her skirts as she shifted uneasily. Then she watched as Marv grudgingly surrendered the bag.

Nothing further was said as he drove on, fitting the speed to the churned trail. When they reached the main road, he turned east. Only then did Joe speak: "We pass a trading post at Tonalea, then something called the Elephant's Feet, and it's a few miles after that we turn left for Inscription House." He added, "What's your name, sister?"

"Ruth Madison. I'm not doing you any good ——"

Marv grunted. "Don't let her hand you a snow job."

A rash of thoughts swept her. If she grabbed the wheel as they passed the Tonalea trading post and threw the car off the road, someone would come running. But these two men would probably kill her and anyone else who interfered, and seize another car. She mustn't panic, but bide her time and plan before she made a move.

"Where you from, Ruth?" Joe asked.

"Los Angeles."

"Nice city. I've got connections there."

"How about you?" she asked.

"Joe's the name."

"I had a boy friend once named Joe. It goes with a man."

"Cut it, doll," Marv said. He was shrewder than she had estimated. She had had pupils, not necessarily bright, who instinctively sensed what others felt and thought.

Joe asked, "What're you doing in this country?"

As she searched for an answer, he continued:

"What'd you do? Fall in love with a married guy and come here to forget him?"

For a moment she was shaken as the question jarred her back two years. Not that she had come to this land to forget a man. No, it wasn't that, although she was trapped, and it was a trap of her own planning. She had rigged it when she left Los Angeles, knowing she was not suited by temperament to teach, and not caring then, but accepting it as the only way out.

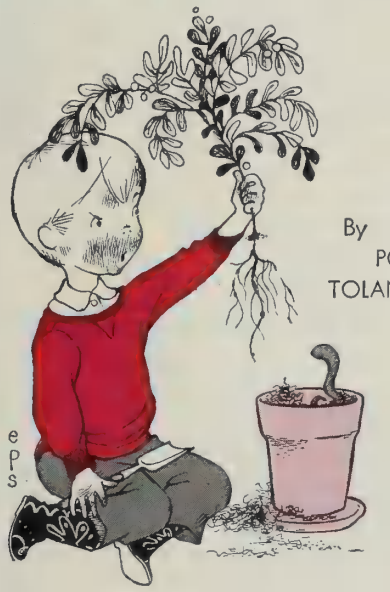
She trembled, seeing Joe double up in pain. "You're going to die—unless ——"

He forced a faint smile. "I had an old dog when I was a kid, sister. Carried a bullet around in his back all his days. Never bothered him at all—'ceptin' when it rained."

"A dog," Marv said, shaking his head. "Did you know, Joe, I picked one up once when I was a kid, I wanted him so bad? But they came after him—and I never did have me a dog."

They sped toward Tonalea, a wind-swept trading post high on a bleak and treeless hill. But the road cut sharply before reaching the store and dipped down into the alkali flats, missing the lonely outpost by a quarter of a mile.

She wondered where Chee was by now, if he had seen them.



When Chee reached the gutted road to Tonalea, his lungs were about to burst. He took one fearful glance backward, thinking the man might be trailing him, then hid behind a rock to wait for the sound of a car.

He rehearsed what he would tell the trader when he asked to use the telephone. No head would turn, but every Navaho in the place would hear and spread the word. Perhaps the trader might give him an all-day sucker. He often did because his father was a good customer, and his father's father.

He heard the car approaching before it was in view, and recognized the motor. It belonged to an ancient one. Any other time Chee would have let him pass by, because the ancient ones knew everything about you without asking a question, and it gave a man pause.

As they raced past Red Lake, Ruth saw the sheep before Marv and let out a gasp. He pushed on the brakes so hard she struck the windshield, and Joe behind her cried out as he was thrown. Still, they plowed into the milling herd, slaughtering a couple. She started out of the car, but Marv grabbed her so roughly that her arm felt torn from the socket.

William makes good

By POLLY TOLAND

"I know I have been bad," says William. "You can punish me."

My heart sinks. "What have you done?"

"Well," says William, firmly clasping his muddy hands, and speaking slowly so I will understand, "I took daddy's flower, and I pulled it up out of its pot."

"Whatever for, William?"

"To see what makes it grow."

"Oh." (What else is there to say?)

"I found its strings down in the ground, and a great big worm too. And now I know, I won't ever have to pull it up again." He puts out his hand. "But you can spank me for this time."

I take his muddy fist in mine, and hand in hand we go into the kitchen for our lunch. (William is so wonderfully sure of what is Wrong, and what is Right. I wish I knew. I wish I could ask his advice.)

Still holding her, he gave the sheep a furious blast of the horn. Cursing, he drove through them, knocking the slow ones aside. She caught a glimpse of the stunned eyes of the shepherdess, a Navaho woman withered with the years, and was sickened and furious. Everything in her wanted to cry out at him, to tell him that this woman might starve next winter because he had killed two sheep, that these were a people so poor they sometimes went for weeks on a meal a day. But she caught the angry words and held them.

"See how Joe is," he ordered. She hesitated, rebellious, and then, leaning over the back seat, examined the wound, which was bleeding again. She had to keep Joe alive. She just had to.

Turning back, she said, "You want him to die, don't you? So that you can get all the money."

"Go on—keep talking, doll."

Joe moaned something unintelligible, and her spirits rose a little. If she could plant a doubt in Joe ——

They passed the Elephant Feet, two giant monoliths as tall as a building. Soon the road grew sandier and narrower, crossed solid outcroppings of rock, and dipped through washes where there were no bridges. Small pines and spruce, sage and rabbit bush dotted the land.

The trail was a lonely one. A herd of Navaho ponies, short-maned, low-slung and hungry-looking, raced before them, and once they passed a Navaho family of seven huddled in a spring wagon.

This was a land of strange names that were mere dots on the map, denoting water holes or buttes or mesas, of lonely miles separating hogans that faced the sun, of howling winds in the winter and thunderstorms in the summer. As the miles raced by, she grew conscious of the first nudgings of panic. She couldn't understand how it was that the human mind refused, ostrichlike, to admit an unexpected crisis, telling itself that this wasn't real, that it would resolve itself. Then slowly, reluctantly, it faced up to the danger. The impossible had happened, was real.

She tried pushing the panic back, and once more set about figuring a way to break free. Every mathematical problem has an answer, she told herself.

Then a pretty Navaho girl ran from a hogan and waved, trying to flag them down. She was in a billowing red skirt, a tight purple blouse and bedecked with silver-and-turquoise necklaces and bracelets. Ruth recognized her as a girl who had been studying until recently at Oregon State.

"What's she want?" Marv asked, gunning the car.

"A ride. You wouldn't give anybody the time of day, would you?"

The birthmark alone betrayed his anger.

The Inscription House trading post emerged unexpectedly from the big sand bumps and piñon trees that flanked the long, low building. She looked about anxiously, and her heart sank. She didn't recognize the scrubby pony tied to the deserted gasoline pump, nor the men squatting by the door.

Marv pulled alongside the pump. "Keep an eye on her," he told Joe, "and if she tries anything ——"

He walked slowly across the dusty road and stepped inside. He saw a store with an old-fashioned counter that ran the length of the room, and the trader behind it, joking and jabbering in Navaho. Marv watched him, but neither the trader nor the Navahos paid more than casual notice to his entrance. He saw a room lined with everything from Pendleton blankets to bloomers. Groceries, hardware and small articles cluttered the shelves, as did rolls of red, blue and bronze velvet, and men's felt hats, black and high-crowned. From the ceiling hung saddles, lanterns, clothing, heavy silver necklaces and belts, silk scarves and dead pawn, almost obscuring the meager light from the small windows.

He moved restlessly, watching a woman dump a roll of goatskins on the food scales, and the trader leave her momentarily while he waited on a young mother carrying a baby in a cradle board on her back.

"Don't you wait on white people in here?"

The room fell quiet, as though deserted.

After a moment the trader said, "I take my customers in turn."

A Navaho in his twenties spoke up in G.I. English: "I'm in no hurry. Take care of the gentleman."

Marv turned on him at the word "gentleman," but the G.I. was reading a notice on the bulletin board. Smoldering, Marv asked for a pair of Levis to fit a woman five feet seven, average weight, and a work shirt for himself. He then set about ordering enough foodstuffs to last a month.

"My buddy and me are on a vacation," he explained. Still the trader made no comment, and in his silence Marv could feel suspicion building. He dropped his right arm and held it taut by his leg. "How's the road up ahead?"

"Bad."

"Know where we can get some mules? My buddy and me thought we'd pack in."

"Up near the lodge you'll find a few Navahos with mules. They might let you have a couple."

Marv paced about, restless. "I don't suppose you get many people up here?"

"Oh, yes, you'd be surprised. Lots of people. Why, last week we had four cars through. Anything else?"

Marv shook his head. The trader added the bill slowly.

"Hurry it, buster."

After he had paid, the trader said, "Is th Miss Madison with you?"

"No."

The trader continued nervously, "Thi I'll say hello to her. I haven't seen h since ——"

"I wouldn't."

The trader saw the gun as the old-sty country phone rang, and rang a second tin before he moved to answer it.

"I wouldn't do that either, mister," Ma said, blocking him. He picked up a pair heavy shears from the counter, still holdi the gun on the Navahos. His eyes found t

Cool Cooking WITH PLUG-INS

By MARGARET DAVIDSON
Homemaking Editor of the Journal

Portable plug-ins make summer cooking deliciously cool and easy in kitchen, on porch or patio. These cool-cooking aids are so compact you can pack your "kitchen" in a car when you go for a long weekend or a summer at the shore.

With today's plug-in appliances you can broil and sauté, cook and stew, steam and bake, braise and roast, fry and brown. Just join the ingredients, dial temperature to order with many of the new models, and the appliances do the work while you wander to a shady spot to invent new recipes. Some sets are made now so a single cord with controls attached fits a number of utensils, to save cost and storage problems. Whichever you own, it will serve you well.

DI PIETRO

This teen's forte: fresh-caught fish, in a summer lakeside cottage.

Some tips on how to keep a cool head electrically

- Today's plug-ins have speed wired in—when used where there is enough current. They will be slowpokes, may blow a fuse and even be unsafe if used on an overloaded electric system.
- Portable cooking appliances use 1000 to 1500 watts (check the name plates). A wall outlet you might have on terrace or porch, or in kitchens wired years ago, will carry 1800 watts safely—and this usually means using these fast cookers one at a time. When wiring is limited, best rotate appliances. Start with long-cooking food; it will stay hot while vegetables steam or coffee brews. Or plug appliances into separate circuits—one in the kitchen, one on the porch, for instance.
- With more modern wiring, appliance circuits may be available. They will handle up to 2400 watts with aplomb, so two or more portables can be teamed together to cook an entire meal.
- Have you heard about the appliance center? It's a single unit, a small powerhouse, in fact, that can be installed in a wall. It has several outlets, cords that reel back into the box, circuit breakers to prevent overload, even built-in timers to make your device automatic. Needs heavy-duty wiring behind it.
- If you are adding new circuits for air conditioning, television or to relieve the electric load, consider separate circuits for the plug-ins (in the kitchen, on the porch or terrace—or even waterproof ones in the garden). Tell the electrician you want them for appliances, and he'll give you a heavier type than used for lights alone.
- New plug-ins are easier to wash. You can immerse some in water up to controls on the handles. Others have master plugs you can take out so the whole utensil can be dunked.
- Today's appliances were born to go to the table. Many models are now available in color.

THE FLAT-TOPS—griddles and grills

For food browned on both sides, these are versatile all through a summer day.

- Cook steak, chops or hamburger on a flat-top. Companion with grilled tomato or pineapple, eggplant or zucchini.
- Hamburgers on a bun, after-swim staples, take on new zest when you mix chopped mushrooms or olives with the meat.
- Pancake bakes are almost no work with mixes. Try corn-meal cakes with honey for breakfast. For lunch, fold ham bits or cheese into a mix. For late-day dessert, serve tiny chocolate-nut cakes topped with ice cream. (For a cup of mix use a square of melted chocolate plus ¼ cup sugar, and ¼ cup chopped nuts.) And here's an impromptu cake for the children: make pancakes ahead of time, cool and stack six or seven with jelly or marmalade between, whipped cream on top.
- Scrambled eggs with bacon or sausages: classic start for a summer morning. For variation try eggs fooyoung. Into beaten eggs fold drained bean sprouts, slivered ham or chicken, green onion and celery. Spoon onto the griddle and brown like patties on both sides.
- As you grill food, try steaming a vegetable in a foil bag with two tablespoons of water, and seasonings. Flatten on the hot surface.

STUART

posed wires tacked to the wall. He cut the nnection.

The sheriff took the turnoff from Highway without pause. His name was Edgar Wal-rs, but he resented people's calling him that. e liked "Walt," which most people in his iliwick of Coconino County thought went ell with his size. He was a big, heavy-set man his fifties who cinched his belt low under a lid stomach, walked with a cowpuncher's ll, and kept his Stetson pushed far back. Like ost of his deputies, he scorned a coat in eather like this, wore his badge pinned to a irt pocket and a Western lariat tie pulled loosely up to a collar that wasn't always buttoned. His left ear was scarred where a desperado's bullet had creased it just seconds before the desperado buckled under for the last time.

Beside him sat a well-built six-footer, an FBI agent newly arrived in Flagstaff named John Ripley, whom the deputies were calling Rip by the second day. Walt hadn't had much chance to size him up until now, and he kept squinting at him sideways.

Walt said, "They expect me to wrangle a county as big as the state of Rhode Island. Eighteen thousand square miles—and do you know how many deputies I got? Thirteen. That's all. Thirteen. And I got 'em scattered all over. Why, I got a substation two hundred and seven miles out of Flagstaff."

Rip covered even more territory as the resident agent at Flagstaff. He counted three counties in his jurisdiction: Coconino, Apache and Navajo.

His view out of the car now encompassed wind-sculptured buff cliffs in the distance, and a turquoise sky laced with white clouds, but his thoughts were with the sheriff. Back in Chicago, where he had worked three years, the detective was a man efficient but often harried by his case load and usually a stickler for the law, even to the technicalities. His relationship with Washington was smooth-functioning, but usually impersonal. But here in this country the camaraderie was closer between the various agencies—Washington, the sheriff, the city police, the highway patrol, the Navahos' Law and Order—because they faced a common danger in small numbers, and their need for one another was often great.

As they sped along Moencopi wash, where the dodge weed was yellow in bloom and the white stalks of the yuccas pointed skyward, the radio began crackling. Rip turned it up louder to blot out the grumble of the tires in the soft earth: "Roadblocks set up at Fredonia and Cameron. Highway patrol notified. Forest Service requested to radio all ranger stations and fire-lookout planes. Game-and-fish service notified. Substations alerted at Fredonia, Sedona, Williams and Grand Canyon. We phoned sheriff's office at Monticello, Utah. That's all. Over."

Walt took the mike. "What's happened to our plane, Jerry?"

The radio squawked in answer, "Plane took off from Williams five minutes ago."

They knew little about the killings. A Navaho Service worker had come upon the bodies and driven into Tuba City to report the homicides to the Navaho police, who in turn had notified the FBI and the sheriff's office.

"Too bad about Clay," Walt said, rumpling up his deeply furrowed face. "He was making good money. Never had it so good."

Walt briefed Rip on Clay, talking along easily. Clay had never amounted to much, but Walt had liked him. He'd come off a ranch up in the Hurricane country, the son of a good pioneer family. Clay never had had much schooling, since the snows were too heavy in the winter for him to walk the five miles. When he was a young sprig, he'd set out on his own, and drifted from one cow spread to the next. He was good enough always to get hired on any time he showed up at a ranch house.

"And then a few months ago his great-uncle—that's old man Wickers at the bank—got this idea about running sort of an automobile branch bank up into this country as a service to the traders and the big outfits that uranium has pulled in."

Rip asked, "What'd they do up here before—for money?"

"Well, the traders would wait till they got two, three thousand dollars together, then they'd watch out for somebody going to Flagstaff. A Navaho or a Government man. They'd send it in with them. If nobody was going, they'd put it in an envelope and mail it." He added, "Mail runs through here couple times a week."

Ahead the land lay so desolate—a gray-brown shell—that a great loneliness fell over them. They said nothing the rest of the way, though they moistened their lips and swallowed occasionally to wash away the dryness.

By the time they arrived Navaho officers had removed the bodies and were taking plaster-of-Paris casts of the footprints, and measuring the distance between prints. A killer might be pegged on the length of his stride.

A stocky but hard-packed Navaho nearing thirty walked over. He rolled a little as he approached, having been born to the saddle. His hair, dark as lava, was crew cut, and he had sharp black eyes, sun-squinted. He was Capt. Hosteen Chuska, who headed No. 4 Police District of Law and Order, a district that stretched 150 miles as the crow flies from Mexican Hat in Utah to Leupp in Arizona. He commanded twelve officers.

"Hello, Hosty," Rip said; and the sheriff nodded: "Mornin', captain."

Hosteen greeted them heartily. He was a warm man to those he knew well, a stoic only with strangers.

"Hello, my friends," he said.

A Navaho considered it impolite to use a person's name in his presence, and a few of the old patterns clung to Hosteen Chuska. From the first Rip had felt a kinship with this quiet, patient man who at sixteen had hitchhiked his way to the Sherman Institute at Riverside, California. He had served with the Signal Corps in the South Pacific, communicating in Navaho with his fellow tribesmen

CONTINUED ON PAGE 125

NEWFANGLED SPIDERS—skillets and frypans

When you want to brown, then cook, or steam and stew, these are your dish. Domed lids add capacity.

- Want to make an upside-down cake in an electric skillet? Pour batter (made from a mix) over pineapple or apple slices, plums or prunes pressed into brown-sugar-and-butter mixture. Dial 275° F. and cook.
- Coffee breads and basic cakes bake well in these skillets, too (especially those with vented lids), but need toppings of color. Spread chocolate bits on hot cakes; when melted, spread for frosting; or combine nuts and brown sugar, sprinkle over top the last 15 minutes for a finishing touch.
- Baked stuffed apples with a new twist call for scooping out centers, chopping apple and combining with bread crumbs and raisins or chopped cranberries, sugar and cinnamon. Top with butter and cook at 350° F., with ½ cup water, for 30 minutes.
- For a whole meal in a dish when a family troops in from the beach: chili con carne. Long, slow cooking is no problem. Combine hamburger, canned or cooked beans and spice, following your favorite recipe.
- At suppertime try shrimp creole. Make with rice, onions and green peppers plus herbs and seasonings. Toss a salad and the meal is made.
- Baked potatoes with no oven heat: cook on rack. For a treat, split and serve with sour cream, garden chives.

HOME AWAY FROM THE RANGE—casseroles and saucepans

Here's another group of summer genies, skilled at the gourmet arts.

- Fried chicken the sweet-sour way is novel for dinner guests. After chicken pieces are browned, add pineapple chunks, green-pepper squares, carrot strips, celery, and pineapple juice plus vinegar or lemon juice. Steam under cover for 30 minutes, until chicken is so tender it almost falls from the bone. Colorful and savory.
- Tiny steamed new potatoes, dressed with mustard butter or chopped fresh dill, are complements to cold meat or chicken plates—and they cook in 20 minutes.
- Pot roast (make it large enough for leftovers) has a new zip with cider replacing half the water. Vegetables, added the last 30 minutes, retain individuality if cooked in foil packets.
- Cheese fondue, sensitive to high temperature, cooks velvety and stays piping hot on "simmer" section of your dial.
- Sautéed shrimp with mushrooms, plus new or frozen peas and 2" lengths of scallions, cooks in 10 minutes. (Add soy sauce for flavor.) It's a dish to be done at the table.
- Vegetables (a whole dinner or just a few to accompany cold meat) will cook together in one pot if you gather each separately in foil and steam with a little water. Julienne beets, carrots, frozen peas, beans and whole-kernel corn stay full-flavored this way.
- Fish chowder to melt a heart: use the fresh-caught trophies a husband or son brings home, add other ingredients from your favorite recipe book.

OUTSIDE COOKING INSIDE—broilers and rotisseries

These excel at campfire-type cooking, protect you from ashes and smoke, have other talents too.

- Any meat or poultry on a revolving spit needs about a quarter less cooking time than ordinarily, because all sides are exposed to heat. Barbecue sauce can be dribbled on with a brush or baster as the feast turns. Shallow pan below catches drip. With lamb roast: broiled peach halves filled with mint sauce; broiled garden tomatoes.
- For holiday hot dogs: split franks, fill with cheese, relish or catchup, wrap in bacon and broil. Buns can be browned on the tray above.
- Capons and small turkeys—or, for red letter days, Cornish hens—are beautifully browned on all sides and exceedingly juicy when turned under the heat.
- For fast-tempo skewered meals: use lamb, chicken chunks or beef cubes sandwiched between your choice of tiny onions, green-pepper slices, pineapple chunks, mushrooms. As these turn and brown, drip sauce over them.
- Brook-trout broil: add a bit of butter, a squeeze of lemon and a sprinkling of chopped fresh herbs or toasted almonds.
- For a mob, toasted sandwiches: for variety try sliced corned beef, lightly mustarded, with cheese. Or open-faced ones of jumbo tomato slices topped with herbed cheese. Satisfying!

STUART

New idea! VINYL in a floor wax

and the beauty of it is – *it's childproof

Never before such a high gloss!

New Simoniz Floor Wax with vinyl in it, gives you higher gloss than you've ever known. On any kind of floor—linoleum, asphalt, rubber, vinyl tile or finished wood! Throughout the house!

No wax easier to apply!

New Simoniz Floor Wax polishes itself. No buffing. No rubbing. It spreads evenly —without streaks—quickly sets to tough, beautiful, vinyl gloss!

Wet spills won't harm gloss!

Splashes and spills—so common with children—won't hurt the tough vinyl surface —or shine. Simply wipe them up. New Simoniz Floor Wax is water-repellent.

Never before such protection!

The miracle of vinyl—and only Simoniz has it—gives you the toughest floor surface. The kids won't scuff it, or harm the gloss with their roughhousing. No doubt about it—it's childproof!

No finish so easy to maintain!

Simoniz Floor Wax with vinyl has a gloss that lasts and lasts. You can even damp mop your floors freely without dulling the shine. Without spoiling the wax finish.

Good news about re-waxing!

Here's the one floor wax you can remove evenly before re-waxing. Simply use your regular household detergent and warm water. The beauty increases with re-waxing. You'll be amazed, once you try it.

Simoniz® Floor Wax

For all floors—linoleum, asphalt, rubber, vinyl tile and finished wood

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 123

er the wires, and that was one "code" the panese never broke. When the war was over, enrolled at the Arizona State College at agstaff, working nights as a cook and a echanic.

"Jim Begay was a good man," Hosteen said nply.

Walt cleared his throat. "I don't figure there is anybody who didn't think he was a fine ficer. We'll find his killer, if we have to go ay to hell and gone to do it."

"The white man was a stranger to me."

"Clay Jackson." Walt looked away. "A lot people are going to be sorry to hear about n."

Hosteen shook off the mood. "They used a licopter. Those men saw it." He indicated o elderly Navahos, sitting poker-faced on ndy mustangs high on a ridge. "They were hour away."

he sheriff gazed at him a moment in disllief, then picked up the mike. "Jerry, they ed a helicopter. Find out what's the cruising nge of one of those egg beaters and notify airports within radius. Keep the roadblocks up. Ask Phoenix for a state-wide alarm and ays to California, Nevada and Utah. Anher thing, Jerry. Get it on KGPH and CLS. Warn everybody out in the country."

Hosteen brought his arm up to wipe away e sweat with his shirt sleeve. His brown face s chiseled in planes, rather than rounded. 'e found the tracks of two men. One was ot—and maybe he got hurt pretty bad." indicated a spot stained with blood. A vaho officer was taking a soil specimen. steen led the way toward the tracks where e 'copter had sat down. "They're losing gas. or Mr. Jackson probably put a bullet in tank."

They turned about as a car came to a stop. o men climbed out and joined them. One s Deputy Sheriff Sam Morales, a blunt, gh-spoken ex-cowpuncher in his middle ties who walked with a limp.

Sam Morales said, "I used to punch cows h Clay—down on the Double J."

Rip turned toward the other man, tall, ny, stooped and not much past thirty. "his is Bill Parkinson," he said to Hosteen. "e's a newspaperman."

Parkinson offered his hand. He was a free ce, a "stringer" representing papers in w York and Chicago at space rates. He d covered the crime beat for newspapers ndianapolis and Detroit, suffered a nervous akdown, and settled in Flagstaff to recuperate. He was as easygoing and affable as an old niel dog, and Flagstaff had taken quickly him.

Hosteen continued, "The men weighed out the same—under two hundred." He icated their foot impressions in the soft earth, then handed Rip a couple of bullets t had spent themselves in the loose earth. m emptied his forty-five. Mr. Jackson got one shot."

"Only one?"

"He was driving," Walt pointed out, and led, "He was a fast man with a gun. If d had half a chance ——"

Hosteen continued, "They searched his kets. His wallet is missing—if he carried ."

Rip asked then, "What about the reservan?"

"We notified Fort Defiance and asked the overnment radio at Window Rock to broadt a warning." Hosteen added, "And all our ions will check the hospitals."

He and Rip left the others then to climb the ge and talk with the Navaho horsemen. ey had watched the helicopter put down; ir ears, tuned to the desert for the whisper brush or the flutter of a bird, had caught crack of gunfire; and they had ridden over.

Afterward, Rip collected the evidence and ged it. He had two bullets, three moulages, igarette butt, two soil specimens scooped from around the footprints, and one soil cimen containing dried blood. He photoghed both the footprints and the helicopter tread marks and measured the "crime ne" and sketched it to scale.

As he moved about, he had a feeling of neness, a feeling he was caught up in an alien world. Back in Chicago, he had trapped kidnapers and extortionists, twice shot it out with wanted men. The job had been to ferret a man out of the millions, to flush him from a packed apartment house or perhaps a miserable hideout in a groveling part of the city. There he had had the peace of familiar surroundings. Here the trail was different, also the crime. A man had to work differently, even think differently.

Rip only half heard the sheriff's radio talking: "Forest ranger near Williams reports seeing 'copter come from that direction about seven-thirty A.M. Fish-and-game inspector verifies. That's about it this end."

Scarcely was the radio stilled, and the silence lay about him again, when the two-way FM job in Hosteen's cruise car began chattering with a report that a ten-year-old boy, Chee Manson, had telephoned from Tonalea. He reported the helicopter down at the Red Mesa trailer school, that a teacher named Ruth Madison had been abducted in her own car.

Eventually the land tamed Marv. He took the trail more slowly as it wound over benches of solid rock. Once the trail disappeared completely, and he wandered over a great slab of

S S S S S S S

TEASE

Whether made by hand or by machinery, cloth requires many operations. As late as the Middle Ages, one of the most irksome jobs was initial straightening of raw materials in preparation for spinning.

From old expressions for an act of tearing or pulling to pieces, a person who wielded a crude wooden comb was said to tease fibers. This was a major responsibility of women and children.

Frequently one member of the family picked at another almost as persistently as though teasing tangles from wool or flax. Hence the household task gave its name to any person who conducts a sustained campaign of annoyance.

WEBB B. GARRISON

S S S S S S S

rock, looking for a way back down into the sandy country. Ruth could have told him. She sat instead, staring at him. His fingers were scrubby and his nails manicured. His arms were white where he had rolled up his sleeves The tattoo of a hula girl moved with his flesh, and partly hid a long white scar.

He said, "I'm giving you ten seconds, baby, to get us back on the road."

"Maybe she doesn't know it," Joe said. His voice was weaker. He was sitting straight, seeking to balance the wounded shoulder. The bandage was soaked.

Marv spotted the trail then, and relaxed, moistening his lips.

She rode in a state of weariness, her face pancaked with dust. She tasted it in her mouth, her lungs hurt with it, and her eyeballs seemed rolled in sand. She felt utterly whipped. Then she knotted her fists, fighting back the weakness of fear.

Long ago, her father had taught her to shut out the kind of thoughts that prey on the mind. "Look, Ruth," he had said one night when they were sitting on a porch stoop, back in Kansas, watching the fireflies, "you've got to learn to discipline your thoughts, to make them work for you. If you don't, they'll run wild and rack you and slowly take you over." He had been a big, energetic man who had lived each day as though it had been whipped up especially for him. She never could remember him angry or sullen or moody. Her mother had been one of those distant persons, even with her family, but her father had been a pal who took her camping and hunting, helped her with her lessons, gave her the car for dates, and bought her her first high heels. She liked to think that she had the resourcefulness that a man close to a woman gives that woman.

Suddenly she was slammed against the door as the car struck the sand. It jerked and swerved and then shuddered, with its wheels spinning frantically. Marv swore and wrestled with the wheel as though he were strangling someone.

"You've got to rock it," she said. "You'll never get out unless you rock it." She added, "I've been in plenty of sand."

He ignored her, then finally came to it, and after several fitful starts that didn't come off, gained firm ground.

Dead ahead, Navajo Mountain took shape unexpectedly, a loaf of deep pine green set against a sky so blue that any other time it would have taken her breath. She would have noticed, too, that the pines were growing taller, and the strong scent of sage was everywhere. But now the sight of Navajo Mountain brought the realization they were near the end of the road and the beginning of the trail.

A desperate plan began shaping in her milling thoughts with the conviction she had to gamble before they started down the trail. Sure, they might elude the law by losing themselves in the maze of canyons, but not knowing the land like the Navaho, they were almost certain to perish of hunger and thirst.

Joe broke in on her thoughts. "What do ya teach those kids?"

"Things that'll help them. How to raise sheep, shop at a trading post, take care of babies."

"How come ya got nothing but a trailer for a school?"

"We move with The People—when their water holes dry up or their pastures go bad they have to find new ones." She added, "You're Western, aren't you?"

"Howja know?"

"It's part of a man."

"Must be a job, getting a bunch of little savages to come to school."

Her hands tightened. "They're children, same as everywhere. They've got the same feelings ——"

"O.K., sister, O.K."

"They want an education. Their folks think it's the only way out for them."

"But you don't?"

"No, I don't. They've got to have three meals a day first. More land, or jobs of some kind. This country never did support them, not even when there were only fifteen thousand in Civil War days. And now there're close to eighty thousand."

Marv cut in sharply: "What's that up ahead?"

The country had smoothed out and in the distance a windmill was limned against a mackerel sky. On the right an ancient crumbling ruin capped a bluff, desolate and alone.

"It's a Navaho place," she said. Her breathing grew more rhythmic. Perhaps if she worked it right ——

Her fingers dug into one another until they hurt, and then she loosened them, knowing nothing escaped this lean, wound-up man who sat beside her.

The trail forked. A small sign indicated the right branch led to the Navajo Mountain trading post and school, the other to Rainbow Lodge.

"Nobody's at the lodge," Joe told Marv. "It burned down several years ago."

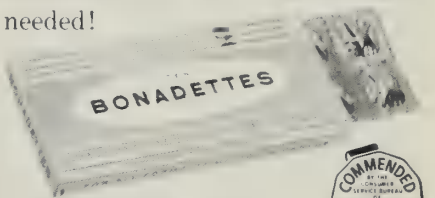
They sped past the windmill, towering above a hogan that looked deserted. She searched for movement, but there was none. The people were out tending sheep, or gathering firewood, or visiting.

Seven miles later they came to the gutted, blackened ruins of Rainbow Lodge, backed up against a great yellow cliff. Marv pulled off the road, stopping near a corral stocked with mules. A hundred yards straight ahead a little girl tended sheep by a sky-blue pool sunken in a natural rock basin.

Marv said, "Don't let her sweet-talk you, Joe." He slammed the door and stood a moment. "It isn't going to be so bad, doll. Not with me along."

As the mules looked him over curiously, pointing up their ears, he paced toward a hogan near the corral.

An old man stooped with the weight of age emerged and stood peering at him out of eyes tightly squeezed against the sun.



BONADETTES®

STOP CAR SICKNESS

nausea, dizziness, vomiting in cars, planes, trains, boats!

Just one dose of delicious, melt-in-your-mouth BONADETTES prevents carsickness, airsickness and seasickness for 24 hours. No water needed!

COMMENDED BY THE CHILDREN'S SERVICE BUREAU OF PARENTS' MAGAZINE

At all drug stores . . .
Get 24-hour relief with
TRAVEL-TESTED BONADETTES

CORNS

also Calluses. Quick, easy, and economical. Just rub on. Invisible. Jars, 35¢, 60¢. At your druggist. Money refunded if not satisfied. Moss Co., Rochester, N. Y.

removed by MOSCO

More Money Easier

with Peerless
DELUXE CHRISTMAS CARDS

Profits come bigger and faster when you show friends these unusual, hard to find Christmas Cards right in the comfort of their own homes. A distinctive and selective group by outstanding artists. Modern and traditional design, appeals to the most discriminating. From $13.25 to $38.50 per 100. Your commission approximately 40%. For added income we have 7 popular priced personal Christmas Card series, Box Assortments, Gift Wraps, Ribbon and Gifts.

Write today for complete details and sample kit on approval

PEERLESS GREETINGS, Dept. C ,316 N. Michigan, Chicago, Ill.

KEEP FREE OF ROACHES

SILVERFISH - WATERBUGS - CRICKETS

Keep your home free of these insects the clean, easy, thrifty way. Get Gator Roach Hives! They're different! No mess, no odor; round-the-clock protection. Longlasting. If your store has none, send $1 for 9 Hives. De Soto Chemical, Dept. 27, Arcadia, Florida.

Money Back Guarantee!

Marv said slowly, "I want four mules."

The old man shook his head.

Indicating the mules, Marv held up four fingers, then took a roll of bills from his pocket. The old man shook his head and raised two fingers.

"Four," Marv said.

The old man held up two fingers again, and then, palms down, waved both hands to indicate he would sell no more than two.

Marv nodded, and they walked toward the corral, the old man limping. He lifted the heavy gate with ease, and then pointed out the animals. But Marv quickly cut out four of his own choosing, and when the Navaho tried to drive two of them back, Marv shoved him aside. He fell, stunned, then got to his feet, and hurried to the gate, shutting it just as Marv reached it with the mules. He jabbered loudly, berating Marv in Navaho.

Marv swore, and yelled at him to open the gate. A second later his hand snaked up, doubled under, and found the weapon. The Navaho started to throw up his arms in an abject gesture. The first shot felled him, and the second, fired at close range, entered his temple.

Looking about, Marv found a crudely built shed. A moment later he emerged struggling under the weight of saddles and other trappings. He saddled three of the mules, leaving the fourth for a pack animal.

As he led the mules toward them, Ruth slipped her hand about the door handle, without moving her body. Marv shouted something to Joe, and in that second she pushed her body up on braced feet, turning swiftly as she rose, and swept the gun out of a hand that held it loosely. Her index finger went homing about the trigger, as it had been taught to do long ago by her father, and the gun set itself, lining Marv up in its sights.

He stopped quite still, measuring her. The gun never wavered as her body twisted through the door. Her peripheral vision stayed with Joe, who had crumpled up. His head was dropped on his chest, and he was groaning.

As if in slow motion, Marv dropped the reins and advanced. His voice walked with him, slow and taunting: "Give me that gun, baby."

Step by slow step, he matched hers as she backed around the headlights, putting the car between them. Any second she expected his right hand to break its tight bound. She heard Joe's breathing growing quieter.

He kept coming. All the strength that was in her struggled to pull the trigger. But his face was changing. It was becoming a boyish blond face from out of the past, and he was in surgery. His left side was blown out.

It was a horrible thing to kill a man, any man.

Marv said something, something about if she didn't do something . . . she didn't know what exactly—she couldn't seem to get the words assorted into meaning.

Suddenly she discovered the little shepherd girl at her side, babbling softly in Navaho. She whispered sharply to her, but the girl stayed, not knowing the meaning of a gun. She said something to her in that tone she used with a recalcitrant pupil, and still the child lingered.

Then Marv lunged, so quick that it was the blow on her wrist she felt first. She brought her left fist up into his stomach, but he side-stepped, and knocked her to the ground, and the next she knew his weight collapsed on her, squashing her. She gasped for air, feeling her lungs being shut off.

Picking up the gun, he got to his feet. As Joe yelled in pain, "No, kid, no," he stared down at her, letting the weapon roll easily in his hand.

Here it comes, she thought, and prayed in a second cut down the middle.

When she opened her eyes, she saw a straight timber of a man. He was running a hand through rumpled hair. "I had a woman like you once. A spitfire. I was going to marry her, only ——" He turned his back on her. "You all right, Joe?" he asked.

She couldn't hear what the older man answered, for the Navaho girl was helping her up, and brushing her, talking. She didn't have to understand the soft words to catch the deep concern and fright of the child. Impulsively she bent down and swept the youngster into her arms, and held her tight. Then she removed a small rhinestone pin from her blouse and slipped it surreptitiously to her. Instantly the girl forgot the world, except for that pin.

Taking his time, Marv transferred the supplies to the pack mule. Once he said, "You wouldn't look good wearing a bullet—but you try a trick like that again and you'll be wearing a couple."

When he finished the packing job, he handed her the Levis. "Put them on," he ordered.

She turned away.

"Do you want some help?" he asked.

"Look, girl ——" Joe started, but never finished. Marv's hand went swiftly into her skirt belt, and as she struggled to break away he gave it a yank, ripping it. She grabbed the skirt as it was falling, and backed away, at the same time taking the Levis. He watched, grimly amused, as she walked to the other side of the car. There, blocked partly from his view, she dropped her skirt and wriggled into the stiff new pants that were like sandpaper on her soft skin.

"Why did you have to kill him?" she blurted.

He paused in tightening a cinch, and the saddle-wise mule drew a deep breath. "Maybe you don't like the way I do business?"

Joe whispered, "Take it easy, kid."

The Levis were so tight she scarcely could button them. She broke a couple of fingernails before she succeeded, and fought back the tears.

"O.K., we're ready," Marv said. "You take that second one, baby."

She hesitated, debating. He took a couple of steps toward her. Abruptly she turned, and before he could help her she was swinging a leg over the mule. The animal turned his head as she sat the saddle. He had a fine Roman nose and philosophical eyes. In honor of the nose, she dubbed him Romeo.

After assisting Joe to mount, Marv led the way down the trail on a jittery little black mule which she could tell was "spooked." He would throw a rider he didn't like. She and Romeo followed next, and then Joe, leaning to the right, seeking to protect the shoulder, his features twisted in such pain he had closed his eyes.

She looked ahead to the mysterious reaches of Cummings Mesa, painted flamboyantly, and to Forbidden Canyon that fanned out into a myriad of wrinkled gorges that lost themselves in space.

She was riding into the end of the world, as someone once called it.

The land was shadowless. Rip asked the time and Hosteen Chuska smiled. Anyone could see it was high noon.

Near the helicopter, a couple of Navahos had tethered their ponies. Not far away three spring wagons stood with their horses' heads drooped against the hot glare. The children themselves hovered quietly, missing nothing. In the background, the routine of the investigation droned on as the sheriff's deputies dusted the helicopter for prints and examined it for leads to determine its origin. Hosteen dispatched two men to trail the tire prints of Ruth Madison's car, clearly impressed in the soft earth. Another Navaho officer talked with the children.

Hosteen brought over the boy Chee, who was caked with dust from his long walk, his hair sandy with the color of the earth. "I draw pictures of the men, ma'am," he said to Rip, handing him two pencil drawings.

A Navaho girl stepped up to correct him. "Sir," she said, and added to Rip, "I'm Miss Madison's assistant—Mary Toatin."

"Hello, Miss Toatin."

"Chee draws very well," she said. "They look much like the men."

He heard the radio in Hosteen's cruise car: "Four-o-one. Four-o-one. Four-twelve in. Proceeding Inscription House."

It was a routine check-in, nothing more. He turned back to Miss Toatin, who continued: "Our children are better at drawing than other kids, because really drawing's our only written language—or was up to a few years ago."

The newspaperman, Bill Parkinson, took a look over his shoulder. "Say," he said, "I've seen that guy around Flagstaff." He indicated the older of the two men.

"Where?"

Parkinson's hands trembled as he held the drawing. He passed it to the sheriff, who shook his head and handed it to Deputy Sam Morales.

Parkinson said, "I don't know. But it may come back. I'm sure ——"

Sam Morales said, "You never saw him." He turned to Rip. "We got a mug shot some time ago of a hitchhike killer. Half the people I showed it to had seen him. Come to find out, he'd never been in the state."

Rip left them and sought out Miss Toatin, standing in the shade of the trailer home. She nodded toward Chee. "He wore his shoes through, poor little guy."

"Get me his size. I'll pick him up a pair in Flagstaff."

"Golly, would you?"

Rip looked down at her. "I didn't know 'golly' was a part of the Navaho language," he said.

She smiled. "You're new, aren't you? Since the war, we've had all the excrescence of the English language, including some words I wouldn't mention."

"I'm a month new." He continued, "I didn't expect to find 'excrescence' on the reservation either."

"Don't use that word, 'reservation.' It sounds . . . like a prison." She added, "Please?"

She repeated then the events of the mor ing. The older man was called Joe, she to him, and the younger, Marv. During the na rative, she fell to talking about Ruth Madiso "We liked her at once. She made herself one us."

Shortly afterward, Rip left, thanking her.

Walt stopped him. "Hot," he said. He to a drink of water out of a canteen and with flick of his wrist jostled out enough to wa off the rim, then passed it to Rip. He conti ued, "The 'copter's clean. No fingerprints nothing to identify them. But we've got go footprints of the younger man—where he c ried the older fellow and the added weight l a deeper impression."

Rip said, "They had to have a contact Flagstaff. Someone who knew about the sh ment of money, who knew the route, t time."

Walt nodded. "Charlie Frazier at the ba always gives us a ring when money's stirrin He hesitated. "Sam Morales took the call this one and told me about it. And then ther Anne Hayes. She always put up coffee Clay. She was sweet on him." He ran a ha over the stubble on his face. "Danged if I li to think anybody I knew set up a holdup and two killings."

They drove into the green oasis of T City with Hosteen at the wheel and Rip side him. They passed a trading post which the old days had been a Mormon fort, a then rolled down the cool, tree-lined str drawing up before a long stone building wi sign that read: LAW ENFORCEMENT—T CITY SUBSTATION. They left the car and tered the building.

Rip stepped into an ancient room with old courthouse smell. At the left a faded ture of George Washington, flanked by tired little flags, looked down on a heavy- officer, seated behind a long counter. He talking with a young mother holding a ba strapped to a cradle board that had a squ rel's tail tied to it, a good-luck omen would protect the child if he fell.

The sheriff and Sam Morales enter stomping the dust from their boots. T drifted to a back room where an officer sa a battered but shipshape desk listening t radio moan spasmodically. Rip called Phoenix field division to report the numb and other identifying data taken from helicopter. Afterward they studied a map satisfy themselves that every road and t had been sealed, so there could be no escap the cities.

Walt said, "These boys've got brains. T 'copter was a smart idea. They could h been in another state by now."

An officer stuck his head in. "Jim Beg wife wants to see you, captain."

She was very young and slender and ol skinned. Grief walked with her, but it wa inscrutable grief of heaviness rather t tears. Perhaps she still did not fully com hend. She carried a cradle board in her a with her baby boy swathed to it.

Hosteen talked low with her in Navaho, once poked playfully at her baby, and she slipped away as unobtrusively as she come.

As he turned back, the radio sputtered intelligibly and then unscrambled itself. T swung about, each man of them, and froze as the words spilled out: "Four-tw in. Four-twelve in. Found Ruth Madison's abandoned head of Rainbow Trail. Two identified men killed Navaho, stole four m One man believed critically wounded. C age eight says victim attempted to escape failed. Party left, taking trail six hours Victim apparently O.K. at that time. Th all."

The radio went still, except for the moan. A quiet fell over the room, each feeling the desperation, almost the futility searching such a vast and rugged country

As they climbed, the trail grew rockier, the mules stumbled and lurched. T wheezed noisily for breath, and Joe groa Ruth glanced back apprehensively. He sagged in the saddle, his head and shoul caved in on his chest. She thought he w

CONTINUED ON PAGE 129

HOME, SWEET (DISASTER-PRONE) HOME

By MARGARET PARTON

For a working mother, as for a working father, the best moment of the day is the one when the home lights gleam in welcome through the twilight and, stepping through the front door, one is greeted by the warm fragrance of dinner cooking and the bear-cub hug of a young child.

● Lately, though, I find my steps dragging slightly, just slightly, on the walk from the commuter's train to that same front door. For at six and a half my son has suddenly discovered the excitement of calamity and the joy of immediate communication. Hat on head, brief case still in hand, I have been welcomed home during the last few days with the following information—all of which turned out to be true:

"Mother, all the bath water I splashed out of the tub upstairs is coming through a crack in the kitchen ceiling!"

"Mother, you have two flat tires on your car."

"Mother, Mrs. George is cooking Brussels sprouts again."

"Mother, school wants you to make three dozen popcorn balls for me to take to the fair tomorrow."

"Mother, the cat's been sick all over the basement."

"Mother, guess what? I can stare straight into the sun for hours, without blinking my eyes!"

In a way, though, it's sort of fun. What will he come up with tonight, I wonder?

A new kind of deodorant ...

ban®

rolls on!

More effective than messy creams, easier to apply than drippy sprays.*

Not a crumbly stick!

Here's a wonderful solution for your perspiration problems. Without mess, drip or smear, that revolving marble in the top of the BAN bottle spreads on just the right amount of quick-acting lotion deodorant. BAN protects you against odor a full 24 hours, won't harm clothes—is perfectly safe for normal skin. Get BAN today!

In a recent survey against the leading cream and spray deodorants, 7 out of 10 prefer* BAN.

Ban
works as no other leading deodorant can!

ANOTHER FINE PRODUCT OF BRISTOL-MYERS. MAKERS OF BUFFERIN AND IPANA

NEW! NORCROSS TRI-ANGLE CARDS

(Greetings with a new slant)

Just out, this month . . . Norcross TRI-angles! Truly different . . . and exclusive with Norcross. Be the first to send these unique, colorful, sparkling greeting cards! They express an original message in such an unusual way.

Sweet and sentimental, or saucy and full of fun, you'll find a TRI-angle to say the things you want to say. The four shown here are typical of dozens that say, "Happy Birthday," "Happy Anniversary," "Congratulations" or "Get Well."

25CN200

25BC568

25SB64

25FR248

N NORCROSS GREETING CARDS

Say the things you want to say

Look for Norcross TRI-angles in their special display at your Norcross dealer. Buy some for now, some for later on! Actual height, 7 inches.

© NORCROSS, INC.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 126

ver make it; and if he didn't, what then uld happen?

Up, up, up they rode until at last they ached the Window, a keyhole cleft in the nt stone wall that rimmed the top of the rld. Romeo paused as if by mutual consent d Ruth looked out over a topsy-turvy pan-ama of sharp buttes, domes in coral and ld, mesas in reds and blues. And in the dis-ce, towering and savage and magnificent, ld Horse Mesa stretched out on the far rizon.

Her fright was pushed aside in the beauty d awe of a moment brief and moving. The vaho country never had been a land that s overpowering, that left her feeling small d insignificant, as it had some. Rather, it s a land to draw strength from, and peace, d beauty.

Marv pulled up to study the country below, rching for stray Navahos. Satisfied, he cked his mule and they gan a steep two-usand-foot descent o a canyon. Her ne rammed into her ll as Romeo often pped both forefeet nce. She leaned back d stood in the stirrups keep from being hed over his head. trail dwindled until as only a ledge along face of the cliff, rcely as wide as the le's body. His hoofs ck loose shale, send-it spraying into ce, but there was no nd of its ever hitting ow.

Then without warn-Marv's mount ked, and he pitched lly, his hands grasp-for the saddle horn missing. He grabbed tically to lock his s about the mule's c, but a rolling pitch owed, and another, l the mule's back a ship's deck in a ricane.

was only a second. saw the sheer thou-d-foot drop, and amed, "Get off!" erward she won-d why she had.

e slid to the ground, mule between him the drop. Scram-g to his feet, he stood dazed, then flailed at the animal, raining his bare fists on its l.

That won't do any good," she said qui-t, "He's spooked. It gets into them some-s. Something happens—and they won't anybody ride them." She glanced back. u'd better take the pack animal," she o him.

How d'ya know so much about mules?" he d, brushing past her. His quick anger had ched to her.

was still a sack dumped in a saddle, but thought his eyes were open a slit. Almost out movement, his hands pushed the eybag, tied to the saddle horn, to the r side as Marv passed on his way to un-the pack animal.

e said, "You learn things out here or you t stay alive."

he rest of the evening they rode in si-e. The only sound was the clinking of hoof ock and an occasional low moan from ight fell so quickly, deep in the canyon, the dark took them unawares. They ped in a thicket of restless aspen that rose e-barked and straight along a silent k.

efore she knew what was happening, v was helping her dismount, his hands be-ing with her hips and sliding along her sides as she slipped to the ground. She wrenched away, but he was quick, blocking her with his body and pushing her so hard against the mule that she felt his hipbone. She twisted desperately, and then the birthmark covered her eyes.

The shot seemed to shake the canyon. The slug creased the air close to her and struck a rock across the stream with a little whacking noise. Marv turned swiftly, releasing her.

Joe held the revolver across a wrist, bracing it on the saddle horn.

"Whatcha mean?" Marv demanded, advancing slowly.

"Give me a hand, girl," Joe said.

She stepped between him and Marv, and helped him dismount. Marv repeated, "Whatcha mean by that?"

Joe stood where he had slid from the mule, held rigid with pain. "You know what you went up for the first time, kid," he said.

Marv stopped cold. "I've told you," he said, his lips tight. "I've told you, Joe, it just happened—that time with the girl."

"Too many things just happen."

"Sure, sure. That's what I've been trying to tell you." He stepped over to Joe's mule. "I'm taking this," he said, untying the moneybag. "You're in no shape ——"

Joe's hand motioned toward his holster. "I hope I don't have to kill you, kid."

Marv tightened his grip about the moneybag, then turned away, but watched Joe over his shoulder.

Joe said to her, "Think you can rustle up some supper?"

"I'd better have a look at you first."

While she went for the first-aid kit, Marv said, "She's playing you against me."

Joe nodded. "But you leave her alone. You understand?"

"Whatcha going to do with her?"

Joe didn't answer.

She called then, having spread a blanket under an aspen. Joe lowered himself on his good arm, struggling to control the pain. She untied his shoes and loosened his belt. In the background, Marv unsaddled the animals. But he kept watch on her.

The wound was angry and festered. She said, "I know a doctor at Kayenta. I'll bring him to you. I won't tell anybody—before God."

Joe shook his head. "I know you mean all right—but the last time a girl told me that, I went up for eight years."

She probed deep, but he only bit hard on his lips and talked to be talking. "I was a 'safe man' in those days. And a good one, before I lost my touch." He held up his right hand to show a joint of a finger missing. "We took some pride in our work, but now the boys just put a shot in—and blow them."

His breathing stepped up, and she checked his pulse. Her face told him nothing. She applied pressure to the area, her fingers holding it for several minutes, until the blood had clotted.

He continued, "I never even packed a rod—until I got into this lousy racket."

He yelled at Marv, "Put that cigarette out, you fool."

Marv gave a mule a kick to move him. "I've got to have a drag."

"Well, get under a bush."

Marv stood defiant. "You're getting jumpy."

"All right—if you want to get our heads shot off. You wanta know how far you can see a cigarette burnin' in this country?"

Marv returned to tethering the mules. "Forget it. They'll never spot us."

"This isn't Korea."

"This is better."

Joe shook his head and shut his eyes as she finished with the figure-8 bandage. He said to Marv, "I've been thinking."

"Yeah?"

"They'll be figuring we're making for the Colorado River. I've been thinking we ought to take the next side canyon. Work up it a way."

Marv shrugged. "I'm taking me a bath." He added, "Want to join me, doll?"

He laughed, and they heard him breaking brush toward the stream, and shortly the splash of water spoke sibilantly in the night's quiet, a stillness so complete that not a bird talked. She watched as the moonlight crept down the cliff wall, at last enveloping them.

Joe asked, "How about taking the slug out tomorrow?"

Her hands fumbled as she opened a can of sausages. "I wouldn't know how."

"Don't give me that. I've been shot up, and I know a nurse when I see one work."

CONTINUED ON PAGE 131

THE BIGGEST THING

By GEORGIE STARBUCK GALBRAITH

When big things are being done,
the fate
Of woman is mostly to watch and wait.
While Ulysses fares on his golden travels,
Penelope sits and knits and ravels.
While Shakespeare grapples with Hamlet's fate,
Anne watches the coals on a
Stratford grate.

But there is a time when nature summons
The strength and courage uniquely woman's
To accomplish the biggest thing of all.
And then, as the clock's hands slowly crawl,
It's man who must pace and wait forlorn
Through helpless hours till a child is born.

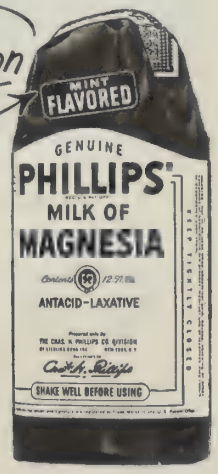
My family's constipation worries are over!



They all use this ALKALIZING LAXATIVE that gives MORE COMPLETE RELIEF!

Phillips' Milk of Magnesia is the ideal family laxative because it does both things you need for complete relief! It gives wonderfully gentle and effective relief from constipation, and—because it's an alkalizing laxative—Phillips' also relieves the acid indigestion that usually accompanies irregularity. Thus, Phillips' gives you more complete relief than you get from any single-purpose preparation!

What's more, two to four tablespoonfuls taken at bedtime work leisurely—without embarrassing urgency. So, when morning comes, you start the day feeling fine. Get Phillips' Milk of Magnesia—the best laxative money can buy.

A NEW addition

Phillips' is now also available in Flavored Form, at the same price as Regular

PHILLIPS' MILK OF MAGNESIA
REGULAR • FLAVORED

only Pacific can Contour® almost any bed

If it isn't Pacific it isn't a Contour sheet . . . because Pacific is the originator of Contour Sheets. Only Pacific Contour Sheets are made to fit almost every type and size of mattress you own...in white and fashion colors...at leading stores...at special low August Sale Prices!

Fits all these mattresses:
Twin, Three-quarter, Double
Innerspring King and Queen
Foam Rubber Crib, Youth,
Extra-firm Extra-long

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

PACIFIC Contour® SHEETS

PACIFIC MILLS DOMESTICS CORP., an affiliate of Wamsutta Mills, Dept. PS20, 1430 Broadway, New York 18, N. Y.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 129

She turned her back to him. "We ought to ave some coffee."

"Sure, go ahead. Build a fire. Let's adver- se. Everybody else does." He added brit- ely, "What about it?"

"What with? A rusty can opener? Besides, 's been two years."

He took the tin she offered. "How come? I ought once a nurse, always a nurse. Like a afe man. Unless something happened."

Two years ago last January, it had been. Only it wasn't two years ago. It was this morn- ng, so sharp in focus were the doctors and the nterns and the other nurses, and so distinct very word that was spoken.

She said softly, "I gave it up."

"Why?" She turned about, startled to find Marv a few feet away, naked, drying himself ith an undershirt.

She looked back to Joe. "I wanted to each."

Marv drawled, "I heard once the only peo- le who come here are tuberculars and guys n the lam. You don't look tubercular to e."

Joe broke in: "That's enough." He added, We'll start rationing the food tomorrow. And ok, kid," he continued to Marv, "we'd bet- r pack all the water we can. We may hit a ry canyon."

Soon afterward they bedded down, sleeping on blankets on the ground. Joe settled between Ruth and Marv, and she was thankful. She couldn't bring herself to stretch out, and half sat, with her head resting against a smooth aspen, and with her hands hugging her knees.

Her gaze followed Marv as he tended the mules, making sure they were hobbled for the night. Seeing them, she wondered if she could crawl to them after everyone was asleep and free them. They would return home then, as mules always did; and without them they would travel slower, and hence give anyone tracking them a break. But after some thought she discarded the idea, knowing a twig would crack explosively as she crawled or a mule would sound off.

She might try slipping away herself, but again she was almost certain to awaken Marv or Joe, and even if she cleared camp she couldn't travel in the dark. If she waited until daybreak, Marv would miss her and overtake her.

She came to with a start to find Marv standing over her. "Don't get any ideas, doll," he said, as though he had heard her thoughts. "I'm going to shoot if I hear anything—and look afterward."

"Come on, turn in," Joe told him, and added, "Get a good night's sleep, girl."

She stared up at the stars, rhinestone bright in a slice of blue night. She thought they moved, and remembered the phosphorescent stars and moon which her father had applied on the ceiling of her bedroom when she was ten.

Strange, that she should think of that ceiling tonight . . . or the panda she wanted so badly but didn't think she would get that Christmas . . . the first time she baby-sat and the first dollar she earned . . . the day she and her brother took the car apart when it broke down and she was so proud she could scarcely wait for her father to come home to see how well it ran . . . the dance her father took her to when her date stood her up . . . graduation night when she made the honor society . . . an evening in the High Sierra when she cooked her first flapjacks and her father said they were the best he ever tasted . . . the morning she entered nursing school and had scarcely noticed it was raining . . . all the little ecstasies stored away in the attic and so seldom unpacked.

She listened to Marv's rhythmic breathing. He had killed and robbed, and was not disturbed. As a nurse, she had encountered others who had committed crimes, and some had been dying, but they were tormented. She didn't understand this man who slept the sleep of the contented.

Joe was awake. He moved restlessly, inching his body into different positions, seeking to extinguish the flame searing his shoulder. He had a rugged, brute kind of courage. She had probed deeper than she would have with most, and he had only set his teeth.

As she wandered in the twilight of sleep, her thoughts slipped back to Corny. She saw an awkward guy, with big hands he never knew what to do with, and Size 11 shoes—a sweet guy, quiet and thoughtful, with eyes that brightened when they met hers, and stirred warmth in her by their very brightness.

His full name was Dr. George Zacharias Cornell, and he had been an intern at the hospital where she worked. They had met one rainy day. It had been two weeks before they could juggle their schedules so they could have a few free hours that coincided.

He had been lean and wiry as a cowpuncher and so hard up that he sometimes sold his blood to the hospital's blood bank. He never had complained. It had been an exciting game with him, this business of becoming an M.D.

She still had his ring, but never wore it. She wondered what he was doing, where he would be when he heard the news—if he would remember, and care.

(To be Concluded)

SUMMER DIET PLATES

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 65

ble to buy nonfat cottage cheese, you'll save n a few calories) add 1 tablespoon finely inced chives or scallion or green-onion tops, teaspoon garlic salt, ½ teaspoon salt, a ood pinch monosodium glutamate, a gener- us dash of paprika and a grinding of pepper om the pepper mill. Add 2 teaspoons lemon ice and ½ cup skimmed buttermilk or non- t milk. Whiz on the blender or beat smooth ith a beater. Makes 1½ cups.

LIME-MINT SHERBET. Pour ⅔ cup boiling wa- r over a good-size bunch of fresh mint, hopped. Cover and simmer until mint is ilted—2 or 3 minutes. Strain the mint. Save e juice and cool it. Beat 2 eggs until very ght and thick, adding ½ cup sugar, a little at time. Then stir in ½ cup light corn syrup, ½ cups skimmed buttermilk, ½ cup strained int juice, a few drops of green food coloring, tablespoons fresh lime juice (1 lime). Taste; not quite minty enough for your taste, add a op or so of mint flavoring. Garden mint has ore flavor than the commercial hothouse- own mint. Pour into a freezing tray. Freeze til almost but not quite firm. Scrape sherbet o a chilled bowl. Beat quickly with a rotary ater or electric blender. Don't let it get too uid again by beating too long. Return to ezing tray and freeze until firm. Makes 6 rvings. (One half cup sherbet—177 calories.)

CHARMER TWO

Though perfect as a solo, this menu has rty manners and could easily be expanded o a glamorous buffet for a small group with e addition of a hot dish (which you would llfully omit from your own plate). There's ifying hot consommé to sip leisurely before e main attraction: an elegantly simple cken-and-pâté aspic—cool and appealing. ong with the chicken there will be fat little l tomatoes scooped out and filled with snip- s of green beans, hard-cooked egg and en pepper in a tangy dressing. Melba toast d raw relishes provide the crunchy nibbles. r dessert: red raspberries—at their perfect t this month—folded into ice-cold yoghurt, ghtly sweetened with sugar substitute and icately flavored with lemon rind. Make up a ig pitcher of iced tea for further cooling off.

CHICKEN BREASTS IN ASPIC. For 4 servings u will need the best of 4 cooked chicken asts. Calories won't permit using whole cken breasts unless they happen to be small es. Some markets sell chicken in parts. Oth- ise you will have to buy 2 chickens. Cook, vered, in canned chicken broth with season- gs until tender. Cool. Remove breasts and ll. (The rest of the chicken can be served ther day another way.) Cut 3 slices off each cken breast. You are allowed ¼ pound for each serving. If you have small chicken breasts, the slices may be thicker. For each serving, put 3 chicken slices together "double-decker sandwich" fashion, using 1 teaspoon liver pâté for each layer of filling. Chill well. Soften 1 envelope unflavored gelatin in 1 can clear chicken broth. (If there is fat on top, remove it before adding gelatin.) Heat until gelatin is dissolved. Chill gelatin until it is slightly thickened and spoon it over chicken breasts, arranged on a platter. Repeat the glazing from time to time until all gelatin is used. Cut away the gelatin around the edges before serving and serve hot another day.

TOMATOES STUFFED WITH GREEN-BEAN SALAD. Peel and scoop out centers of 4 small ripe tomatoes. Drain well. Salt and pepper them on the inside and chill. Cook and shell 1 hard-cooked egg. Press yolk through a sieve. Chop the white and set aside. Mix the sieved yolk with 2 tablespoons skimmed buttermilk. Add 1½ tablespoons vinegar, 1½ tablespoons chili sauce and 1½ teaspoons minced onion. Season well to taste with orégano, salt and pepper. Mix dressing with the chopped whites, ½ cup cooked or canned cut blue lake green beans and 2 tablespoons minced green peppers. Fill tomato cups with this good-tasting mixture and chill. Makes 4 servings.

CHARMER THREE

Though this meal isn't one you'd serve when company comes, it's one the family can enjoy with you without feeling they are on a diet. Outside of making the tomato aspic well in advance, it involves next to no kitchen time on your part. Poaching eggs you're well versed in, but have you ever tried cooking spinach until it is merely wilted—not really cooked at all! It seems to have a fresher, less bitter taste. Season with salt, pepper, nutmeg and finely minced raw onion—no butter. The egg will sauce the spinach. You are allowed one well-drained, crisp bacon curl with it, adding up to only 117 calories per serving for all three.

TOMATO-AND-CUCUMBER ASPIC. Sprinkle 1 envelope unflavored gelatin over ¼ cup cold water. Let stand. Meanwhile, heat 1¾ cups tomato juice, adding a handful of celery leaves, ½ bay leaf, ¾ teaspoon instant minced onion, 2 teaspoons vinegar, 1¼ teaspoons salt and 1 teaspoon sugar. Simmer 10 minutes. Strain. Add softened gelatin to the hot juice and stir until dissolved. Chill until thick and syrupy. Then fold in ½ cup finely chopped peeled cucumber. Pour into 4 molds and chill until firm. Serve each salad on a lettuce leaf with 2 tablespoons cottage-cheese dressing. (Each serving, 55 calories.)

FOR DESSERT. Line dessert dishes with any washed green shrub leaves you may have in the garden. (Grape or rose leaves are good choices.) Leave the stems on strawberries and dip the tips in confectioners' sugar. Serve with a small, thin, crisp sugar cooky or biscuit. Allow ¾ cup strawberries for each serving and 1 tablespoon confectioners' sugar (85 calories), and the cooky will cost you 50 calories.

"Our host is a gourmet and is preparing dinner himself—that means we won't eat till after ten o'clock."

CHARMER FOUR

A hot dinner of substance—meat, vegetables and fruits—is welcome on the warmest of evenings. While we were tailoring and embellishing these menus to fit your 400-calorie limit, we were amazed how many delicious foods and combinations were really low in calories—sweetbreads, the lovely green or yellow squashes, tomatoes and citrus fruits, just to name a few. We've eaten this dinner ourselves many, many times—we have to diet at times, too, you know—and have never tired of its piquancy and flavor.

STARTER. Tomato-juice or vegetable-juice cocktail. Serve well chilled with a parsley sprig or a basil leaf if your garden provides it.

SWEETBREADS WRAPPED WITH BACON. Soak 2 pair medium-sized veal sweetbreads in salted water for 1 hour. Then cook about 20 minutes in more salted water to cover, along with the juice of one lemon. Lift out the sweetbreads and plunge into ice water until very firm. Remove tubes, membrane and any fat (this may be done the day before). Sprinkle sweetbreads with salt and hot pepper sauce. Wrap with 1 slice bacon each and secure with toothpicks. Broil until bacon is crisp. (Each serving, 238 calories.)

CARROTS COOKED IN BOUILLON. Cook 2 cups sliced, scraped carrots (or cut them in julienne strips, as we did) gently in 1 cup bouillon until tender and most of bouillon has been absorbed. You won't need salt. Use very little pepper. The bouillon does the seasoning. Makes 4 servings. (Each serving, 23 calories.)

ZUCCHINI CREOLE. In a saucepan mix together 2⅔ cups sliced zucchini or yellow crookneck squash (pick out the smallest—more tender, fewer and smaller seeds), 4 medium-sized tomatoes, peeled, cored and diced, and 1 cup water. Add teaspoon salt, 1 clove garlic, crushed, ½ teaspoon thyme, ⅛ teaspoon basil and a pinch of pepper. Simmer together until the zucchini is just tender, the tomato is saucy and the flavors have blended beautifully. No butter necessary. Makes 4 servings. (Each serving, 40 calories.)

ORANGE-AND-ONION SALAD. Peel 1 medium seedless orange for each salad. Slice crosswise and arrange on a few leaves of lettuce, romaine or chicory. Slice 2 small peeled onions for 4 salads; separate them into rings and sprinkle casually over the orange slices. Next, sprinkle orégano (that most companionable herb to both fruit and vegetable) over the orange slices and onion rings. Serve 2 tablespoons cottage-cheese dressing with each salad. The calorie total—74, counting the dressing. END

So easy to vary with fruit!*

Light as a bubble!

So fluffy-light... no other pudding is so delightfully different! So easy to digest—never, never heavy.

So nourishing... with fresh eggs 'n milk, but not loaded with calories. Kids love it!

So versatile... for Pineapple Tapioca Fluff stir in 1 cup crushed pineapple, 2 tbsp. sugar before serving. More recipes at your grocer's.

TODAY'S QUICK-AND-EASY

MINUTE TAPIOCA CREAM

A fine product of General Foods

SUMMER Shelf Magic

Ever wanted to try your hand at sorcery? Here are six dishes for the warm-weather cook that (almost) seem to make themselves!

By NANCY CRAWFORD WOOD

July afternoons may find you relaxing deliciously under the shadiest tree, but when dinnertime comes around you're off to the kitchen to conjure up a meal. Tall glasses of iced tea, plumed with sprigs of cool green mint, crisp fresh salads, the first tender vegetables from the garden—one's thoughts turn to these at mealtime, in July. And your kitchen cupboard is next best thing to "abracadabra" when it's time to plan a substantial main dish that will leave you cool as an evening breeze. It might be ripe red tomatoes, stuffed with savory corned-beef hash, bubbling in golden cheese sauce. Serve this with a salad of romaine and water cress, and a buttery batch of brown-and-serve rolls; it's pure delight. BAKED TOMATOES STUFFED WITH CORNED-BEEF HASH: Cut off tops of 8 to 10 small tomatoes. Scoop out the pulp and set aside. Mix the contents of 1 can corned-beef hash with 1 teaspoon salt, ½ teaspoon onion salt and a dash of pepper. Fill the tomatoes. Make a cream sauce, using 2 tablespoons butter and 2 tablespoons flour with 1 cup milk. Season with ½ teaspoon salt, ¼ teaspoon each of marjoram and thyme, and a dash of pepper. When the sauce is smooth, stir in ¾ cup grated Cheddar cheese until melted. Add ½ cup of the tomato pulp. Arrange the hash-filled tomatoes in a casserole and pour the sauce around the tomatoes. Bake in a moderately hot—375° F.—oven for 20 to 30 minutes, or until the tomatoes are tender and heated through. When ready to serve, spoon the sauce over the tops of the tomatoes. Makes 8 to 10 servings.

Summer vegetables mixed with sweet chopped nuts fill ham horns of plenty.

Chilled thin slices of ham, rolled like horns of plenty, filled with a delicious and couldn't-be-easier mixture of vegetables, nut meats and tangily seasoned mayonnaise dressing—it's an ideal summer supper dish, especially if it's prefaced by hot consommé, accompanied by herb-buttered hot rolls, finishing off with a bowl of luscious, cold, sugared raspberries. HAM CORNUCOPIAS: Buy 10 to 12 thin slices of very lean boiled ham. The ham must be lean to roll into cornucopias easily. Roll each slice to form a cornucopia and fasten with toothpicks if they seem stubborn. Cook 2 packages frozen mixed vegetables according to package directions. Drain and chill. Make a dressing with 1 cup mayonnaise, 2 tablespoons wine vinegar, $1\frac{1}{2}$ teaspoons salt, $\frac{1}{2}$ teaspoon onion salt and $\frac{1}{4}$ teaspoon pepper. Add the dressing to the vegetables along with $\frac{1}{2}$ cup chopped walnuts. Chill well. Fill the ham cornucopias with the mixture and serve on a bed of lettuce leaves. Serves 10 to 12.

STUART

Plump tomatoes make perfect cups for mounds of spicy hash, baked in cheese sauce.

Magically easy, and delicious as the scent of summer flowers, is this dish of plump chicken chunks floating in a creamy chicken-and-ripe-olive sauce. Served over slender hot vermicelli noodles, with a crusty, golden coat of grated Parmesan, it cries for a chilled raw-vegetable salad, and lemon or raspberry sherbet for dessert. But you'll see for yourself. CHICKEN TETRAZZINI'S COUSIN: In a large skillet melt 1 tablespoon butter. Stir in 1 small can sliced mushrooms, drained; 1 cup condensed cream-of-chicken soup and ¾ cup light cream. Stir well. Add 3 cups canned boned chicken, 14 or so chopped pitted ripe olives, 2 tablespoons minced parsley, and salt and pepper to taste. While this is heating, cook and drain half an 8-ounce package vermicelli according to package directions. Place the vermicelli in a shallow baking dish and spoon the lovely chicken mixture over all. Sprinkle liberally with grated Parmesan cheese and put under the broiler until hot and bubbly. Serves 4 to 5.

One of the easiest and most delectable summery main dishes combines fresh, tender garden squash and tangy chili con carne. This recipe is equally delicious whether you use small young yellow squash or green zucchini. The coldest salad this side of an ice cube—lettuce tossed in French dressing with a sprinkling of plump fresh blueberries is perfect with the spicy chili. CHILI SQUASH: Wash 1 pound small green zucchini squash and slice thinly. Put in bottom of greased 1½-quart casserole; season with salt and pepper and dot with 2 tablespoons butter or margarine. Break up one 15½-ounce can chili con carne and spread over top. Sprinkle with 3 tablespoons grated Cheddar cheese. Bake in a moderate—350° F.—oven about 45 minutes to 1 hour, or until squash is tender when pierced with a fork. Serves 4.

A big bowl of hearty soup; a loaf of crusty bread, sliced, buttered, sprinkled with grated Parmesan and toasted in the oven—it's anyone's dream of a delicious summer meal. Clam chowder might seem like an ambitious undertaking for a July evening—but not this one. You'll be through almost before you realize you've begun! QUICK MANHATTAN CLAM CHOWDER: Cook 1 cup diced celery in 2 cups salted water about 10 minutes, or until celery is tender. Add 1 package frozen Limas, cooking until tender—about 5 minutes. Cut 3 slices bacon into small pieces. Fry until crisp. Add to vegetable mixture with 2 cups vegetable-juice cocktail or tomato juice, 1 tablespoon chopped onion sautéed in bacon drippings, and two 7½-ounce cans minced clams. Season with ¼ teaspoon thyme, salt and pepper to taste. Simmer about 15 minutes until seasonings are well blended and soup is hot. Makes 1½ quarts.

LOBSTER RISOTTO: Sauté 1 clove garlic, minced, in 2 tablespoons salad oil. Add 3 cans lobster meat from which the bones have been removed, and sauté until golden. Stir in 1 cup water, one 8-ounce can tomato sauce, 1 small can sliced mushrooms, 1 teaspoon lemon juice, ½ teaspoon sugar, ¼ teaspoon each Worcestershire sauce, basil, thyme and marjoram, and add salt and pepper to taste. Cook over low heat until blended. Put 4 cups cooked rice in bottom of a baking dish and cover with lobster mixture. Sprinkle ⅔ cup grated Cheddar cheese over the top and place under broiler until cheese melts and forms a golden topping. Makes 4 to 6 servings.

Speedier shine—more free time—with

New BRILLO soap pads

Polish off pots and pans fast—have time for things you really enjoy

There's special soap with Jeweler's Polish in every pad!

Give pans twice the shine in half the time with New Brillo Soap Pads! Brillo whisks away greasy scorch and burned spots fast! Nothing shines aluminum like New Brillo Soap Pads. Wonderful for cleaning glass ovenware, too! Results guaranteed! A new utensil free if Brillo fails to clean!

Brillo Soap Pads (red box)
Soap-filled metal fiber pads
Brillo Cleanser (green box)
Metal fiber pads plus cake of soap

Brillo Mfg. Co., Inc., Brooklyn, N.Y.

THRIFTIER!
5 and 12 pad boxes!

P.S. to husbands—
Brillo speeds up your clean-ups, too!

NOW

U. S. SAVINGS BONDS

PAY YOU HIGHER INTEREST

FASTER!

If you've always bought U.S. Savings Bonds for their rock-ribbed safety, their guaranteed return, the way they make saving easier—you've got one more reason now!

Every Series E United States Savings Bond you've bought since February 1, 1957 pays you a new, higher interest—3¼% when held to maturity! It reaches maturity faster—in only 8 years and 11 months. And redemption values are higher, too, especially in the earlier years.

About your older Bonds? Easy. Just hold onto them. As you know, the rate of interest a Savings Bond pays increases with each year you own it, until maturity. Therefore, the best idea is to buy the new—and hold the old!

The main thing about E Bonds, of course, is their complete safety. Principal and interest are fully guaranteed. They are loss-proof, fire-proof, theft-proof—because the Treasury will replace them without charge in case of mishap. Your Savings Bonds are as solid as a rock—backed by the full faith and credit of the United States.

Maybe you already know about Savings Bonds—as one of the 40 million Americans who own them today, or as one of the other millions who have used Bond savings to help pay for new homes, cars, or college educations, or to make retirement financially easier. If so, this is familiar territory to you—you know there's no better way to save.

But if you're new to the game, find out about Savings Bonds and what they can do for your future. Ask your banker, or check with your employer about the automatic Payroll Savings Plan that makes saving painless and easy.

PART OF EVERY AMERICAN'S SAVINGS BELONGS IN U.S. SAVINGS BONDS

The U.S. Government does not pay for this advertisement. It is donated by this publication in cooperation with the Advertising Council and the Magazine Publishers of America.

PUBLIC SERVICE ADVERTISING COUNCIL

THE WORLD'S MOST FABULOUS JEWELS

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 47

ntinents; the results of their efforts appear many of the pearl-bedecked portraits of the rewd queen. Others of her ropes of pearls ıce belonged to Mary Queen of Scots, who d no further use for them after she lost her ad on the execution block.

No one knows now what happened to all ese pearls, although two pendants which e said to have been Queen Elizabeth's ear- ıgs now adorn the Imperial State Crown, ıich also bears many other historic jewels great beauty.

From the beginning of English history there s been difficulty in distinguishing between ıte regalia and the monarch's personal easure. During the seventeenth-century volution all the crown and personal jewelry ıs broken up or sold at the order of Crom- ell, and when the monarchy was finally re- ored a whole new set of regalia (crowns, epters, and so on) had to be designed and ade for the coronation of Charles II. At that ne the regalia was first separated from the ng's private treasure, and placed for safe- eping in the Tower of London, where it has nained ever since.

The royal family has, however, added to e regalia from time to time, whenever a vel seems too historic or too valuable for rsonal possession. The famous Stuart ophire, for instance, was a personal posses- n of James II, who took it with him when he d England in 1688. Later it was handed down the Georges, and then to Queen Victoria, ıo had it set in a band of her State Crown. was later moved to the King's State Crown. ıe fabled Koh-i-noor was presented to Queen ctoria as a personal gift in 1850. She wore it a brooch for many years (and used it to orn her neat hairdo during her state visit to lance in 1855), but left it at her death to be into the crowns of England's queens, where s now always used. An ancient Indian leg- d holds that the diamond will bring mis- tune to any man who wears it, and Victoria s taking no chances.

The largest diamond ever found, the Cul- lan, was given to Edward VII on his birth- y in 1907 by the Transvaal Government. ving little personal use for a diamond the proximate size of an ostrich egg, he had the at hunk split and the largest pieces set in e regalia. The great Star of Africa, once rt of the Cullinan, now glitters from the yal Scepter.

Today the members of the royal family sel- m, if ever, buy jewelry for themselves. They e usually given brooches, pins or other orna- nts whenever they visit an aircraft plant, a p christening, review one of their regiments, go on tour. In addition, they inherit, vately, a mass of diamonds, emeralds, ies and other valuables collected by previ- s royalty.

Some of these objects, if they are still ound, are odd although valuable. The rec- ls of Garrard and Co., the three-century- court jewelers, disclose, for instance, that 1760 they repaired two silver kettle drums the Princess of Wales, and that in 1764 y sold a royal male personage "a pair night cloaths earings." In 1788 Queen arlotte, wife of George III, bought two gold thpicks. Later she and her daughter built quite a bill with Garrard's, mostly for jeweled baubles, and often for gold needles.

ther objects of value and beauty are less d, but some of them came to the family in ange ways. The emeralds in Queen Eliza- h's most elaborate tiara—the one she wears ner most recent official portrait—were, for tance, won in a lottery, by her great-great- ndmother, Augusta, Duchess of Cam- dge. What Augusta was doing, taking part a regal gamble in Frankfurt, Germany, in early 1830's is now unknown, and even the ke of Windsor says that the story is lost in mists of family memory. But it must have n a splendid lottery, for the prize was nty-four perfect emeralds, each the size a peach stone.

he tiara itself, in which fifteen of these eralds now hang pendant, was purchased from a Russian grand duchess by Queen Mary, who was a jewel connoisseur. The original design of the tiara is planned to carry fifteen magnificent drop pearls, but George V's queen had it redesigned so that the emeralds and pearls are interchangeable. The emeralds not used in the tiara were worked into an emerald-and-diamond necklace usually worn with it. The necklace includes one of the resplendent stones of the fragmented Cullinan.

Not all the jewelry is of this magnificence, of course. When the present queen, as princess, was photographed at the age of six months, she wore as decoration only two tiny necklaces, one of rosy coral and one of small pearls. The coral necklace has already passed on to her daughter, Princess Anne, who wears it at parties over a dress of white chiffon over satin. Anne has also been left by King George VI two ropes of pearls with earrings to match, some sapphires and a diamond tiara. But she will have to do some growing before she is allowed to wear them.

On her seventh birthday Princess Elizabeth wore a tiny gold chain with a pearl-and-gold pendant. At ten she appeared in public with a double row of small pearls, and both she and Princess Margaret received a small brooch with a pearl drop. The same tenth birthday her father gave her a diamond, but she was thirteen before she wore diamonds in public. On that thirteenth birthday she and her sister Margaret appeared with identical brooches of rubies, sapphires and diamonds pinned to their berets. At fourteen she wore a large three-strand pearl necklace and a small antique bracelet. At fifteen she received and wore a brooch with her father's initials "GR" (George Rex) traced in diamonds. At seventeen there were a gold bracelet and a tiny watch from her parents.

For her parents' coronation in 1937, Elizabeth wore three rows of small pearls. In 1942 she received the first of hundreds of pieces of official gift jewelry, a diamond insigne of the Grenadier Guards, of which she is colonel. At sixteen she was officially photographed wearing three rows of largish pearls—so beautiful that, as with all her Oriental pearls, their luster shines through even badly reproduced photographs.

But the windfall of precious gems didn't really begin until her engagement and marriage. On her engagement day she wore two rows of pearls, a small diamond star on the lapel of her blue dress, and Philip's engagement ring, one diamond with two smaller ones on either side. This ring is one of the less impressive bits of jewelry she owns, but she never takes it off. She rarely wears other rings—perhaps remembering that Victoria, who wore several rings on each finger, sometimes had difficulty in removing her gloves.

INVITATION

By SUSAN MOIRA MOK

Come up unto my hill,
The grass is greener here.
I have a cradle made of rain-soft earth,
A moon-shaped basin
Waits to wash your morning face.
In winter my hilltop house is made of lace,
Spring echoes in my halls,
Autumn paints my walls with gold.
Love, come up unto my hill
And share summer's kisses—if you will.

Her wedding presents were literally worth a king's ransom. Her mother and father, devoted parents, gave a necklace of diamonds and rubies, another of sapphires and diamonds, with matching earrings, and a double string of large pearls. She wore the pearls at her wedding, and also a small tiara of diamond-studded spikes belonging to her mother—perhaps for "something borrowed." Her wedding ring, like those of all royal brides, was of gold from Wales, the only part of Great Britain where gold is found.

From the incredibly wealthy Nizam of Hyderabad (the only prince whose jewels might compete with those of the Windsors) Elizabeth received at the time of her wedding a glowing diamond necklace, and a bandeau-style tiara in a pattern of roses and leaves of diamonds. The City of London gave her a diamond-fringe necklace to match the borrowed tiara. This is probably one of the most important pieces in her collection.

Queen Mary gave her nine pieces of her own jewelry: a diamond tiara and a diamond headband; a double row of diamonds (which the queen often wears); a double row of pearls; bracelets, and eight-inch-high diamond stomacher. This object, worn by queens as a kind of corselet in more flashy days, has since been divided into three sections, any one of which Elizabeth sometimes wears on her shoulder to hold down one of the ribbons of her royal orders.

From over the seas the young bride received from Burma ninety-eight blood-red rubies set in an ornate, almost Victorian, gold setting, and a gold necklace twenty-two centuries old from King Farouk of Egypt. All these were, of course, only the cream of the jewels which poured down in tribute and affection. It is perhaps worth remembering that some of her loyal and humble subjects also sent her such homely items as pot holders and bed socks.

From Queen Mary, Elizabeth has also inherited the pink topaz brooch which, like the emeralds, once belonged to the Duchess of Cambridge; a ruby brooch and pendant which once belonged to the beautiful and fastidious Queen Alexandra; the resplendent diamond tiara in a design of thistles, roses and shamrocks which Queen Victoria had made; and a dozen other diamond and pearl knickknacks, too numerous for anyone to describe or to wear.

Among the magnificent historic jewels belonging to the queen is the Darnley jewel, designed in the sixteenth century by the sorrowing Earl of Lennox's widow to commemorate her husband's death in battle. It is enameled gold in the shape of a heart, and has an enormous cabochon sapphire as its main jewel. Another favorite is the miniature circlet showing emblems of all the British Isles, made for George IV and shown in the portrait of Queen Victoria by Winterhalter.

In addition to receiving inheritances and gifts on specific occasions such as weddings and birthdays, members of the royal family come back from tours loaded down with little mementos of fabulous value. The number of diamond brooches and floral sprays presented to the queen must occasionally inspire small private sighs of familiarity; more rare are gifts like the four pink pearls from the Red Sea (a gift from the Government of Aden), the necklace of ancient gold coins from a visit to Greece, the 54½-carat rose-pink diamond from diamond miner John T. Williamson. Queen Elizabeth herself later designed the spray in which this unbelievable diamond is set.

When the queen and Prince Philip went on a round-the-world tour, the countries of the Commonwealth busied themselves preparing suitable little mementos. The most important of these was probably the brooch, valued at $150,000, presented by the Prime Minister of Australia on behalf of his government. For this brooch world markets were searched for rare yellow diamonds and private collectors were besought for help; the finest Australian craftsmen worked for months reproducing in Makes fashionable pointed toe shoes feel ever so easy on the feet!

Now, you never need suffer pain from wearing smartly styled shoes. Simply apply soft, cushioning, protective Dr. Scholl's Zino-pads wherever shoes rub, press or pinch. Presto! Gone, forgotten is your discomfort. With it you stop one of the commonest causes of aging lines of pain—nagging shoe pressure and friction. You also stop corns, callouses before they start. If you already have corns or callouses, use Zino-pads to remove them. Try them! Sold everywhere.

Dr Scholl's Zino-pads

HOT, TENDER FEET?

Dr. Scholl's Foot Powder quickly relieves hot, tired, tender, perspiring, odorous feet. Eases new or tight shoes. Get a can today!

Dr Scholl's FOOT POWDER

What Do 3 Out of 4 Doctors Recommend to Relieve Pain?

A survey shows 3 out of 4 doctors recommend the famous ingredients of Anacin Tablets to relieve pain of headache, neuritis and neuralgia. Here's why Anacin® gives you better total effect in relieving pain than aspirin or any buffered aspirin:

- ACTS INSTANTLY: Anacin goes to work instantly. Brings fast relief at source of your pain.
- MORE EFFECTIVE: Anacin is like a doctor's prescription. That is, Anacin contains not one but a combination of effective, medically proven ingredients.
- SAFER: Anacin simply not upset your stomach.
- LESSENS TENSION: Anacin also reduces tension, leaves you relaxed, feeling fine after pain goes. Buy Anacin today.

WANT EXTRA CASH?

Let Us Send You 5 Boxes of New CHRISTMAS CARDS & GIFTS

Send no money. Just give us your name, and we'll mail beautiful money-making samples to you. Show to friends and make money in spare time. Keep up to 50c easy $1 sales—up to $1.25 cash profit per item. Get sample kit on approval, Bargain List, FREE Personal Album, $1.25 Gift Offer.

MIDWEST, 1113 Washington, Dept.465-H, St. Louis 1, Mo.

$1.25 Gift FREE on 15-Day Offer

More Comfort Wearing FALSE TEETH

Here is a pleasant way to overcome loose plate discomfort. FASTEETH, an improved powder, sprinkled on upper and lower plates holds them firmer so that they feel more comfortable. No gummy, gooey, pasty taste or feeling. It's alkaline (non-acid). Does not sour. Checks "plate odor" (denture breath). Get FASTEETH today at any drug counter.

SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES

THESE ADVERTISERS WILL BE GLAD TO SEND LITERATURE.
WRITE THEM DIRECT, STATING YOUR SPECIFIC INTERESTS.

LADIES' HOME JOURNAL, 555 FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK 17, NEW YORK

Boys' Schools

RIVERSIDE MILITARY ACADEMY

Health and interest assured by Spring and Fall in Georgia mountains. Winter at Hollywood-by-the-Sea, Florida—two complete school plants, each with all facilities. Outdoor sports year round.
Fully accredited preparation for all colleges. Also Post Graduate Dept. Constant association with selected teachers who live and eat with cadets. Weekly reports. ROTC program. Progress GUARANTEED. Reasonable All-inclusive fee. Outstanding record. Athletics for all. Separate Junior High, grades 7-8. For illustrated catalog, address:
GENERAL SANDY BEAVER, Pres., Box 507-J, Gainesville 5, Georgia
6 MONTHS IN BLUE RIDGE MOUNTAINS • 3 WINTER MONTHS NEAR MIAMI

Rumsey Hall
Junior School for Boys. 80 miles from N.Y.C. Grades 1 thru 8. Small classes. Boys learn to study. Country environment. Well coached team sports. Fishing, Skiing, Skating, Riflery. Mention age & grade. For booklet address:
Mr. David J. Barr, Headmaster, Washington 6, Conn.

Manlius
Founded 1869. For boys. Accredited. Grades 7–12. Complete college preparation. ROTC. Highest U.S. Army rating for over 50 years. 126-acre campus. Remedial reading. Sports. Band. Summer session. Tutorial assistance. Catalog.
Robert A. Weekes, The Manlius School, Manlius, N.Y.

Perkiomen Boys taught how to study. Graduates attend leading colleges, universities. Homelike atmosphere. Grades 7–12. Sports, activities for all. Modern dormitories. Near New York City, Philadelphia. 83rd year. Summer school. Write for catalog.
Stephen A. Roberts, Headmaster, Pennsburg, Penna.

VALLEY FORGE MILITARY ACADEMY
"At the Nation's Shrine" Prepare your boy to enter leading colleges and at the same time be trained for a commission in the Armed Services. Small classes, highest academic standards. Prep, School and Jr. College, fully accredited; ages 12-20. All sports. Arty., Cav., Infantry, Band, Senior Division ROTC. Catalog. Radnor Rd., Wayne, Pa.

Cheshire Academy Junior School. Grades 6 to 8. Thorough grounding in subjects anticipating college preparatory study on same campus. Emphasis on fundamentals. Flexible program for each boy develops good habits of concentration. Separate classes, dormitories, activities. Remedial instruction.
Arthur J. Sheriff, Headmaster, Cheshire, Connecticut

Western Military Academy
Develops a desire to succeed. Emphasis on self-confidence, self-direction, how-to-study. Small classes, guidance. Grades 7–12. Career analysis. Jr.-Sr. R.O.T.C. All athletics: riding, pool. 79th yr. Near St. Louis. Catalog:
Col. Ralph B. Jackson, Supt., Box L-7, Alton, Illinois

Carteret School
Superior College prep. Accredited. 1st Grade to College. Small classes. Proper study habits. Reading Techniques. Shops. Homelike dormitory. Large gym. 40 acres atop Orange Mt. Moderate rate. New York trips 20 miles. Request booklet G-16.
Carteret School, West Orange, N.J.

Judson School in Arizona
A ranch school for boys 6 to 18, in healthful, warm, dry climate. Small classes. Accredited to all colleges. Riding & polo included in tuition. Tennis, swimming, pack trips, fishing, rodeos, riflery, music. 29th yr. For Catalog, write
H. J. Wick, D. M. Ashley, Dirs., Scottsdale, Arizona

PEEKSKILL MILITARY ACADEMY
124th year. Successful College preparation. High Achievement records in College and Life. Non profit. Small classes. Personal interest in each boy. Athletic teams for all, intramural & varsity. Expert coaching. Rifle & Swim Teams. Swimming pool, Band, Glee club, Camera club, etc. Grades 6-12. Summer session. For illustrated catalog write:
Headmaster, Box 407, Peekskill-on-Hudson 4, N.Y.

College

Brenau College
Accredited A.B. Degree and B.S. in El. Ed. Liberal Arts, Journalism, Secretarial, Physical Ed., Home Ec., Nutrition, Music, Art, Drama, Speech, Broadcasting. 1250 ft. elev. Near Atlanta. All Sports. National Sororities. Attendance 40 States.
Address Brenau, Box 503, Gainesville 5, Ga.

Business & Secretarial

katharine gibbs secretarial
BOSTON 16, 21 Marlborough St.
NEW YORK 17, 230 Park Ave.
MONTCLAIR, N.J., 33 Plymouth St.
PROVIDENCE 6, 155 Angell St.
Outstanding training. Three practical courses.
One-Year Secretarial
Liberal Arts-Secretarial (two years)
Special Course for College Women
Catalog: ADMISSIONS DEAN

Vocational

Be a Hotel Hostess

Enjoy Your Work! Fascinating positions in hotels, motels, clubs, apartment house projects as Hostess, Executive Housekeeper, Manager, etc. Celestia Foster writes: "Am Hostess-Housekeeper in a hotel and happy in my work." Write for FREE book, "Your Big Opportunity." Approved for ALL Veteran Training. Lewis Hotel Training School, Sta. CL-501, Washington 7, D. C. 41st Year.

Home Study School

HIGH SCHOOL at HOME
You can still finish High School—at home, in your spare time. No interference with job, or social life. Win more pay, a better job, social recognition. Take only the subjects you need. Complete lesson and answer service. Personalized instruction. Low cost. Diploma to graduates.
I.C.S. is oldest and largest (257 courses). Write today for 3 free books: (1) 36-page "How to Succeed," (2) sample lesson (Math), (3) Career Catalogue—indicate course desired.
INTERNATIONAL CORRESPONDENCE SCHOOLS
SCRANTON 9, PENNA. DEPT. 39112F

Kemper Military School
Rounded educational, military, recreational program. Century-old tradition; modern methods. Accredited. Small classes; personal guidance. 8th Grade, H.S. and Jr. College. Approved ROTC. All sports, pool; flying. 113th yr. Catalog.
Dir. of Admissions, 1677 Third St., Boonville, Mo.

NEW YORK MILITARY ACADEMY
THE SCHOOL OF DISTINCTION
Develops today's Youth for tomorrow's world by building mind, body, character, leadership. Accredited. Member Military Schools Div. R.O.T.C., Dept. of Army. Graduates in all colleges. All sports. Infantry, Cavalry, Artillery. Band scholarships. Grades 1–12. Catalog.
17 Academy Ave., Cornwall-on-Hudson, N. Y.

St. John's Military Academy Where boys become self-confident men. Accredited college preparation under the famous St. John's System. Grades 7–12. Inspired teaching. Small classes, individual attention. Reading Clinic. ROTC. Fireproof dorms. Sports. Summer Camp. Catalog.
Dir. of Admissions, Box 377, Delafield, Wisconsin

Missouri Military Academy and Separate Junior School. 69th year. Grades 4–12. Fully accredited. Senior ROTC. Friendly and inspiring teachers. Small classes. Strong remedial reading and guidance program. All sports. Riding. Golf. 5 athletic fields. 226 acre campus. Catalog.
Col. C. R. Stribling, 177 Main Street, Mexico, Missouri

The Miller School of Albemarle
Military. Grades 5–12. College preparatory plus industrial arts, iron & wood working, auto mechanics, machine shop & electricity. Endowed. Inclusive rate $1000. Sports. New gym. 1500 acres. Near Charlottesville. 79th year. Catalog.
Col. W. Hugh Flannagan, Dept. L, Miller School P.O., Va.

FORK UNION MILITARY ACADEMY

★ Our ONE SUBJECT PLAN of study in Upper School (grades 9–12) has increased honor roll 50%. Develops concentration.
★ Fully accredited ROTC highest rating 17 modern buildings, 4 completely equipped gyms, pool. Splendid environment, excellent health record. Junior School (grades 4–8) has separate buildings, gym, Housemothers. 59th year. For ONE SUBJECT PLAN booklet and catalog write
Dr. J.C. Wicker, Box 867, Fork Union, Va.
★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Augusta Military Academy
"The Friendly School." Distinguished ROTC school in Shenandoah Valley. Jr. & Sr. Divisions. Boys 8–20. Accredited; graduates in leading colleges. All sports—pool, gym. 1400 acres. Family owned since 1742. Rate $1250. Catalog.
Col. Charles S. Roller, Box J, Ft. Defiance, Va.

The Sewanee Military Academy
Division Univ. of the South. Fully accredited. Grades 8–12. Small classes. Individual attention. Boys Taught to Study. ROTC Highest Rating. All sports; gym, indoor pool. 10,000-acre mountain domain. Episcopal. 90th year. Catalog.
Col. Craig Alderman, Supt., Box L, Sewanee, Tennessee

Greenbrier Military School
145th yr. The School of Achievement. 7th & 8th grades & H.S. and P.G. Dept. ROTC. 2300 ft. elev. White Sulphur Springs' golf & swim pool. Modern gym & new Rifle range. Athletics. Band, Glee Club. Summer Camp. For Catalog write
D. T. Moore, Box J-607, Lewisburg 6, W. Va.

Coeducational School

Blue Ridge School Co-ed—49th year Grades 1 thru 12
A moderately priced Episcopal Church Boarding School, in the beautiful Blue Ridge Mountains 23 miles north of Charlottesville and 115 miles southwest of Washington. Gymnasium, sports. Board and tuition $765.
Rev. D. C. Loving, Headmaster, Box J, St. George, Va.

Retailing

Tobé-Coburn School for Fashion Careers
Prepare for a career in buying, advertising, fashion coordination, radio/TV. Field trips, cultural activities, store work with pay. One and Two Year Courses. Lifelong placement service. Begins September 4. Ask for catalog L.
851 Madison Avenue, New York 21, New York

Fine & Applied Arts

Art Institute of Pittsburgh
More jobs offered our graduates than we can fill. 18-month Diploma courses in Commercial Art; Fashion Art; Dress Design; Interior Design. Veteran approved. Co-ed. 35th Year. For King Size Factbook, write
Willis J. Shook, Director, 635 Smithfield St., Pittsburgh 22, Pa.

Ray-Vogue Schools
Commercial Art, Photography, Interior Decoration, Dress Design. Fashion Merchandising with Modeling. Fashion Illustration. Coed. Attractive residence for girls. Enter 1st Mon. each month. Write Registrar, Room 7B. Specify course.
Ray-Vogue Schools, 750 N. Michigan Ave., Chicago 11

Medical Technology

College of Medical Technology
Medical & X-ray Technicians in demand; excellent pay. Free placement service. Intensive 9–12 mo. courses for medical offices, labs. State year H.S. grad. Two leading colleges. Catalog L.
1900 LaSalle Avenue, Minneapolis 4, Minn.
1004 Truxillo, Houston, Texas

Franklin School of Science & Arts
Nationally famous for excellence in training in Medical Technology—12 months; X-Ray Technology—6 months; Medical Secretary—12 months. Top paying positions waiting. Coed. Free Placements. Approved. Founded 1919. Send for Catalog A.
251 S. 22nd St., Phila. 3, Pa.

yellow and blue diamonds the yellow wattle, or mimosa, of Australia and its bluish leaves. In Australia the queen also received a forty-piece necklace of rare Barrier Reef coral, some of them in the shade of lime green which is the queen's favorite. These, of course, are only a small selection from the endless list of precious gifts, graciously bestowed, graciously received.

Princess Margaret's jewel collection is second only to that of her sister. As a little girl, like Elizabeth, she annually received gems of enormous value. On her twenty-first birthday, the king and queen gave her a pair of turquoise bracelets, diamond earrings, and some inevitable heirloom jewelry.

On her official tours Margaret receives the customary presents, in her case more exotic gifts than those of her sister. In Mombasa the leader of the dancing girls placed an ornate gold chain with garlands of intricately fashioned gold flowers around her neck. In Trinidad the children gave her a collection of gold bracelets. Grenada produced a gold nutmeg, symbol of the island's principal crop. At home on public occasions she picks up jeweled regimental badges quite regularly, of course, as well as the usual run of diamond sprays.

Another source of jewelry, at least for the queen, is Prince Philip. Like Prince Albert, who was also married to a queen, Philip likes to design his own presents of jewelry. One of his wife's favorite gifts from her husband was a diamond-and-sapphire bracelet he designed, with a naval crown and linked initials. She often wears this as an evening bracelet, and always used to combine it with the tiny platinum wrist watch (supposed to be the smallest in the world) sent to her by the Republic of France upon the occasion of her parents' visit to that country in 1938. In 1955 she lost the watch while strolling around the grounds at Sandringham, and it was never found despite the activity of half the police of Great Britain. A duplicate was presented to her by the Paris Chamber of Commerce during her recent visit to France.

"Bags of fiery opals, sapphires, amethysts, jacinths, hard topaz, grass-green emeralds, beauteous rubies, sparkling diamonds, and seldseen costly stones of so great price"—all these glowing and priceless gems nestle among velvet in strong rooms of Windsor Castle and Buckingham Palace, rigidly guarded, dark, inviolate, until some member of the royal family remembers, decides and sends for what she wants.

Only on the great and most glittering occasions do the royal ladies send for many of their jewels, or for their most resplendent, for styles in jewel wearing have changed. In a LADIES' HOME JOURNAL issue of 1907 a writer describes how Queen Alexandra looked during an afternoon presentation: she wore "a black veil held down by a diamond tiara, ropes and ropes of pearls and diamond necklaces, diamond bracelets, decorations, and a blazing diamond stomacher." Queen Mary was often pictured in as many as six ropes of pearls, three diamond necklaces and a diamond dog collar. These jewels have been passed on to royal descendants, of course, but they are worn with more caution today. Elizabeth, for instance, removed several of the stones and shortened the necklace made from the lottery emeralds. This reduction in the amount of jewels worn all at once may, of course, be a reflection of growing good taste in the world today. Or it might be that the royal ladies have read and noted an observation made by Sir J. M. Barrie: "Have you ever noticed that many jewels make women either incredibly fat or incredibly thin?"

On the grandest occasions of all, of course, the royal ladies bring out their tiaras. The Queen Mother and Princess Margaret have about a half-dozen each to choose from, while Queen Elizabeth has perhaps eighteen. For the opening of Parliament, one of the grandest of British occasions, the queen wears the diamond tiara made for Queen Victoria in 1838. This has a Maltese Cross and a thistle made of diamonds and pearls. With it, one year, she wore a necklace of three rows of diamonds, two diamond bracelets (one very large), and her small diamond watch. At another Parliament opening she appeared in emerald-and-diamond earrings with the necklace of diamonds and emeralds made from the lottery prize, and a narrow diamond bracelet. Last year, to open Parliament, she wore Victoria's tiara, pearl earrings surrounded by diamonds, and a pearl necklace set in diamonds, with an enormous drop pendant.

For these occasions, as for most of her "splendid" appearances, the queen usually wears a new dress. Although it is true that the queen often wears certain sets of jewelry with certain colors (the emeralds with her favorite pale green, diamonds with pale yellow, pearls with pink), the choice of which set she will wear remains her own. A royal dress designer may make a frock with certain jewels in mind, and suggest that she wear them, but there is no guaranty that she will act on his suggestion.

For instance, Norman Hartnell designed a shimmering silver-lace dress for the queen's spring visit to Paris, and released drawings of

WHAT JEWELS MEAN

Since the beginning of time, precious jewels have fascinated mankind for their beauty, their value, their rarity and for what ancient lore held was their magic power. Here are a few of the old beliefs:

Diamond. This is a magic stone of great power, and "serves to drive away nocturnal specters." The diamond is a symbol of fearlessness and invincibility, and for this reason the devil is a particular enemy of this stone. The Romans called it a "gem of reconciliation," and believed that it enhanced the love of a husband for his wife. But sixteenth-century Italians thought that it made the wearer, particularly a woman, unhappy—for if a woman is fearless and invincible she is not a true woman.

Emerald. This stone is supposed to give the wearer a knowledge of the future. It is a revealer of truth and an enemy of all enchantments and conjurations. It helps to strengthen memory and make the wearer an eloquent speaker. It reveals the truth or falsity of love, but is an enemy of sexual passion. It should never be worn in the marriage bed.

Amethyst. Can cure drunkenness, and has the power to control evil thoughts and to quicken the intelligence.

Ruby. Removes evil thoughts, controls amorous desires, dissipates pestilential vapors and reconciles disputes. It will guard the owner's house, his fruit trees and his vineyards from injury by tempests.

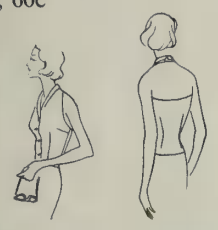
Sapphire. Preserves the wearer from his enemy, and attracts divine favor.

Turquoise. Protects the wearer from injury by falling, especially from horseback.

Coral. The wearer can still tempests and traverse broad rivers in safety. Coral also cures madness and gives wisdom.

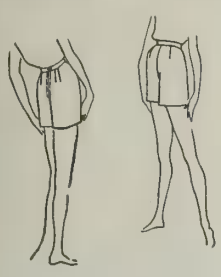
The magic power of the jewels is more powerful if worn on the left (or devil's) side of the body. Perhaps this is why women today usually wear brooches on the left side, although they have forgotten the old lore.

e dress for publication on the day on which was worn. The drawings showed the emer- d necklace, but the queen wore diamonds d pearls.



Whatever the choice of jewels, the effect on ess-up occasions is always magnificent. It is en said that you can see the light from the amonds flashing around a corner before the yal ladies themselves come in sight. And: fter seeing their jewels, I wanted to flush ne down the drain!" exclaimed Ethel erman.

A fashion editor remarked, after the queen's it to Paris: "Of course the queen has no me as a chic woman—her position wouldn't ow her to wear extremely fashionable thes, and sometimes she's even referred to dowdy. But there's nothing dowdy about r jewels—everything she wears is real, and autiful. It can't set fashion, of course, be- use it's way out of the price field of even the ll-to-do woman."



And Women's Wear Daily reported after visit: "Whatever else impressed Paris,

OTHER VIEWS, SIZES AND PRICES OF VOGUE PATTERNS ON PAGE 90

Vogue Design No. 9228. "Very Easy to Make" halter blouse and fichu. Sizes 10–18 (31–38). Price, 60c

Vogue Design No. 9233. "Easy to Make" shorts. Sizes 24 32 waist measure. Price, 50c

e is no question about the queen's elry, despite the fact that some of the crowds apparently expected to see her wearing a own at the evening functions, not appreci- ating the difference between the Crown Jewels, which never leave Britain, and the queen's personal jewelry. Among the latter, the magnifi- cent diamond tiara, triple diamond neck- lace and chandelier earrings certainly im- pressed."

At informal but public events the royal ladies wear, of course, far simpler jewelry, as does any well-dressed Englishwoman. Visiting a hospital or at the races, the queen usually wears a double string of small pearls, single pearl stud earrings (her ears are pierced) and one of her hundreds of diamond clips, or one of the jeweled symbolic badges of a British regiment. At a semiformal occasion, such as the opening of the Ascot races, she will wear more pearls and a larger clip. She usually wears pearls to the theater, and is reported to have twenty sets from which to make her choice.

Whenever the sisters appear together in public Princess Margaret invariably and noticeably wears fewer jewels. Her almost uniform daytime jewelry is a necklace of two strands of pearls along with pearl earrings and a diamond brooch or clip. Margaret originated the fashion of wearing a diamond initial brooch and took a leading part in the revival of spray and brooches—feathers or flowers or ferns made of precious stones. One of her favorites is a diamond rose-spray brooch given by Armstrong Vickers Aircraft when she visited their plant.

In general, Margaret shows great taste and fashion sense. In Edinburgh recently she chose a double gold-and-ruby clip to wear with a coat of bronze shade in heavy shot silk. The clips were worn in a manner she has now made fashionable—high on the front of the coat and one slightly above the other. For her controversial private audience with the Pope, however, her only jewelry was a pair of white earrings. Recently she has been photographed wearing a charm bracelet.

In both public and private appearances, the Queen Mother keeps to a uniform necklace of a triple row of enormous pearls, together with a diamond or sapphire clip pinned to her hat or her coat. Her earrings are usually one of an assortment of pearl studs, surrounded by diamonds.

At home in private the royal ladies wear even quieter jewels, sometimes even the charming semiprecious stones they cannot wear in public. In public their jewels must be precious. They are never imitation or paste. Both the queen and Princess Margaret like to wear turquoises because the pure sky blue matches their eyes. As for Prince Philip, his only jewel is usually a massive gold signet ring, which he says "helps a great deal in shaking hands."

Glittering with diamonds, glowing with pearls, adorned by the rich purple glow of amethysts, the hot fire of rubies or the green flawlessness of perfect emeralds—that is the way the British public likes to see women of the royal family. Jewels are a symbol, and so is the monarchy. Jewels represent a dream, a vision, an illusion which a woman has of herself. More than anything else they seem to say:

"You are beautiful, you are worth great value, you are loved." END

...it's the RelaxAcizor...you read about in VOGUE

PHOTO: PHILIP MARCH L. A.

USE AT HOME... new Relax-A-cizor with fabulous new "Beauty Belts" gives you a prettier, trimmer figure... so quickly... so pleasantly. Look your loveliest! New popularity... new happiness for a new YOU!

REDUCE hips, waist, tummy, in size... No Diet!

NEW—no vibration, no massage; a truly easy NO EFFORT way!

ROMANCE begins with a pretty figure. Now, you can lose excess inches from your hips, waist, tummy, thighs . . . without diet or weight-loss . . . QUICKLY, EASILY . . . while you REST luxuriously at home! Relax-A-cizor slims you with a delightful new kind of reducing exercise that requires NO EFFORT!

Twice as easy to use . . . and the NEW Relax-A-cizor . . . with the fabulous new "Beauty Belts" trims away excess inches from hips, waist, abdomen, and thighs TWICE AS FAST as ever before!

You use your Relax-A-cizor at home while you RELAX and enjoy reading, sewing . . . even SLEEPING . . . and excess inches vanish almost like magic . . . never makes you feel tired like regular beauty exercises.

HUSBANDS use Relax-A-cizor, too... for their waistlines . . . for soothing RELAXING exercise of tired back and feet muscles.

FIRMS...TIGHTENS...TRIMS— Diet may cause sagging and loss from bust, neck and face. Relax-A-cizor does NOT; it, instead, firms and tightens your waist, hips, thighs and abdomen. New FACIAL exercises, lifts, and tightens muscles under EYES and CHIN.

Don't Risk Your Health... this is the safe, sensible, economical HOME method used by more than 150,000 women. Approved by Underwriters' Laboratory.

Beauty Editors Praise... Featured editorially in both "Mademoiselle" and "Charm." (Mail coupon below for reprints.) USERS SAY: "4 inches removed from abdomen."—Mrs. M.F. "3 inches from hips."—M.A. "Dress size was 16, now 12." —C.P. MANY WOMEN LOSE AN INCH OR TWO THE FIRST FEW DAYS! You may lose less—or MORE.

FREE— If you live in or near city listed at right, TELEPHONE for FREE INFORMATION, FREE BOOKLET, FREE TRIAL TREATMENT. No obligation. Representatives in most cities and rural areas. SOLD BY MAIL ON MONEY BACK GUARANTEE where company has no representatives.

TELEPHONE TODAY

NEW YORK CITY, MU 8-4690
NEWARK, MA 3-5313
PHILADELPHIA, LO 4-2566
BOSTON, KE 6-3030
DETROIT, WO 3-3311
CHICAGO, ST 2-5680
CLEVELAND, PR 1-2292
SAN FRANCISCO, SU 1-2682
LOS ANGELES, OL 5-8000
HONOLULU, 9-5276
MEXICO CITY, 14-68-16
LA CRESTA, PANAMA, 3-1899

—FREE...MAIL TODAY—

RELAX-A-CIZOR, Dept. LH-2
980 N. La Cienega, Los Angeles, Calif. OR
665 Fifth Ave., New York City, OR
Suite 800, 17 No. State St., Chicago
Please send in PLAIN envelope FREE information about reducing size of waist, hips, thighs, abdomen. No cost. No salesmen will call. (PLEASE PRINT.)

NAME_____

ADDRESS_____

CITY_____ ZONE___ STATE_____

TELEPHONE_____
Use margin for more writing space LH-2

They DREW their way from "Rags to Riches"

Now they're helping others do the same

By REX TAYLOR

ALBERT DORNE was a kid of the slums who loved to draw. He never got past the seventh grade. Before he was 13, he had to quit school to support his family. But he never gave up his dream of becoming an artist.

Although he was working 12 hours a day, he began to study art at home in his spare time. Soon he discovered that people were willing to pay good money for his drawings. At 19 he was well launched in the field of commercial art. By 22 he was earning $500 a week. Dorne rose higher and higher—until he became probably the most fabulous money-maker in the history of advertising art.

Dorne's "rags to riches" story is not unique. Norman Rockwell left school when he was 15, Steven Dohanos, famous cover artist, drove a truck and worked in a mill before turning to art. Harold Von Schmidt was an orphan at 5. Robert Fawcett, known as the "illustrators' illustrator," left school at 14. Austin Briggs, who struggled to support his family in a cold-water flat when he first broke into art, today lives in a magnificent contemporary home, over 100 feet long.

A plan to help others: Nearly ten years ago, these men gathered in Dorne's luxurious New York studio for a fateful meeting. With them were six other equally famous artists — Al Parker, Jon Whitcomb, Fred Ludekens, Ben Stahl, Peter Helck, John Atherton. Almost all had similar "rags to riches" backgrounds.

Dorne outlined to them a plan for sharing their good fortune with others. Dorne pointed out that artists were needed all over the country. And thousands of men and women wanted very much to become artists. What these people needed most was a convenient and effective way to master the trade secrets and professional know-how that the famous artists themselves had learned only by long, successful experience. "Why can't we," asked Dorne, "develop some way to bring this kind of top-drawer art training to anyone with talent . . . no matter where they live or what their personal schedules may be?"

(Photo by Roy Stevens)

NORMAN ROCKWELL—this best-loved American artist left school at 15.

(Photo by Ferenz Fedor)

ALBERT DORNE—one of the greatest money-makers in commercial art. From the window of his luxurious studio high above New York, Dorne can see the slum tenement where he once lived.

The idea met with great enthusiasm. In fact, the twelve famous artists quickly buckled down to work—taking time off from their busy careers. Looking for a way to explain drawing techniques to students who would be thousands of miles away, they turned to the war-born methods of modern visual training. What better way could you teach the art of making pictures, they reasoned, than through pictures? They made over 5,000 drawings specially for the school's magnificent home study lessons. And after they had covered the fundamentals of art, each man contributed to the course his own special "hallmark" of greatness. For example, Norman Rockwell devised a simple way to explain characterization and the secrets of color. Jon Whitcomb showed how to draw the "glamour girls" for which he is world-famous. Dorne showed step-by-step ways to achieve animation and humor.

Finally, the men spent three years working out a revolutionary, new way to correct a student's work. For each drawing the student sent in, he would receive in return a long personal letter of criticism and advice. Along with the letter, on a transparent "overlay," the instructor would actually draw, in detail, his corrections of the student's work. Thus there could be no misunderstanding. And the student would have a permanent record to refer to as often as he liked.

School is launched; students quickly succeed: Thus was born the Famous Artists Schools — whose campus is the U. S. mail, whose classrooms are the students' own homes and whose faculty is the most fabulous ever assembled in the history of art teaching. The school's activities started in a converted old barn in Westport, Conn. It grew rapidly. Today it occupies its own modern building and has 5,000 active students in 32 countries. The twelve famous artists who started the school as a labor of love still own it, run it, and are fiercely proud of what it has done for its students.

Don Smith is a good example. When he became a student three years ago, Don knew nothing about art, even doubted if he had talent. Today, he is an illustrator with a leading advertising agency in New Orleans.

Harriet Kuzniewski was bored with an "ordinary" job when she enrolled. A year later, she landed a good job as a fashion artist.

Gertrude Vander Poel had never drawn a thing until she enrolled in the School. Now a swank gallery exhibits her paintings for sale.

John Busketta was a pipe-fitter's helper with a big gas company until he enrolled in the School. He still works for the same company — but now he is an artist in the advertising department, at a big increase in pay.

Elizabeth Merriss—busy housewife and mother—now adds to her family's income by designing gift wrapping and greeting cards, and illustrating children's books.

A great-grandmother in Ohio decided to study painting in her spare time. Recently, she had her first "show" where she sold thirty water colors and five oil paintings.

"Where are the famous artists of tomorrow?" Dorne is not surprised at all by the success of his students. "Opportunities open to trained artists today are enormous," he says. "We continually get calls and letters from art buyers all over the U.S. They ask us for practical, well-trained students—not geniuses—who can step into full time or part-time jobs.

"I'm firmly convinced," Dorne goes on, "that many men and women are missing an exciting career in art simply because they hesitate to think that they have talent. Many of them do have talent. These are the people we want to train for success in art . . . if we can only find them."

Unique art talent test: To discover people with talent worth developing, the twelve famous artists created a remarkable, revealing 12-page Talent Test. Originally they charged $1 for the test. But now the school offers it free and grades it free. Men and women who reveal natural talent through the test are eligible for training by the school.

Would you like to know if you have valuable hidden art talent? Simply mail coupon below. The Famous Artists Talent Test will be sent to you without cost or obligation. And it might lead you to become one of the "famous artists of tomorrow."

FAMOUS ARTISTS SCHOOLS
Studio 220, Westport, Conn.

I want to find out if I have art talent worth developing. Please send me—without obligation—your Famous Artists Talent Test.

Mr.
Mrs. _____ Age____
Miss (PLEASE PRINT)

Address_____

City, Zone, State_____

When the menu calls for All-American Flavor, it's

Bean-time, U.S.A.

VAN CAMP'S PORK & BEANS

The secret savory sauce is cooked in...Just heat...eat...enjoy!

Outsells the rest
'cause it tastes the best!

That Ivory Look-so clear...so fresh ...so easily yours

Gentle enough for a baby's skin, pure, mild Ivory is so right for your complexion, too.

A complexion smooth and clear—petal soft and fresh! That's what the magic of Ivory's mildness can give to you. Just make a simple change to regular care with this soap that's mild enough for a baby's skin, and soon your complexion will improve. You'll like the new freshness—the finer texture—the smoother feel. You'll like That Ivory Look!

99 44/100% pure... it floats

More doctors advise Ivory than any other soap

THE MAGAZINE WOMEN BELIEVE IN

JOURNAL

AUGUST
1957 - 35c

New Medication Now Makes
MOTHERHOOD POSSIBLE FOR MANY WOMEN WHO COULD NEVER BEAR A CHIL

By MEDICAL REPORTER ALBERT Q. MAISEL

JUN59 ND
CALIF
SURL INOAME
SURL INOAME PUB LIBR

NOT A WHISPER OF BAD BREATH WITH NEW IPANA

...its distinct taste tells you so

▪ New Ipana® Tooth Paste with germ-killing WD-9 prevents bad breath. Use it regularly. Ipana's distinct taste and refreshing after-taste tell you it cleans your entire mouth.

• Ipana with WD-9 actually has twice the decay-germ killing power of any other leading tooth paste. So it can help your children fight tooth decay effectively, too.

Look for the BIG cap— only on NEW Ipana

Product of Bristol-Myers

You're Prettier than you think you are!

...and you can prove it with a Palmolive bar!

Here's Proof that Mild and Gentle Palmolive Care Cleans Cleaner, Deeper, Prettier!

When you wash with your regular soap—in the ordinary, casual way—you leave hidden dirt behind that hides the prettiness of your complexion. But what a glorious difference after a 60-second Palmolive massage! You'll look fresher, lovelier! And to prove that hidden dirt is gone, rub with a tissue. The tissue will stay snowy-white . . . proof that Palmolive care cleans cleaner, deeper, prettier!

Be Palmolive Sweet and Clean All Over It's Wonderful for the Bath!

Yes—new complexion beauty is yours in just one minute with Palmolive Soap. Because Palmolive care removes beauty-robbing hidden dirt that casual cleansing misses. And only a soap as mild as Palmolive can cleanse so deeply without irritation. Start Palmolive care today, and see your true complexion beauty come through!

Ladies' Home Journal

CONTENTS

VOL. LXXIV NO. 8 AUGUST, 1957

JOURNALITIES

Richard Pratt

When Associate Editor RICHARD PRATT sent us this picture, he suggested, "This might be a salutary occasion to say I'm the anonymous writer of the page called Journal About Town—and I do wish readers wouldn't write in referring to me as her!" Having got that straightened out, we'll add that he joined the JOURNAL the year the Goulds took over as editors—"trying to get a job on the JOURNAL that year was like trying to get in the N.B.C. Orchestra when Toscanini became conductor!"—and, as Architectural and Garden Editor, has written about the oldest and the newest homes of this country. "Appropriately," he says, "my wife Dorothy and I live in an old stone Pennsylvania farmhouse—which has sprouted a most contemporary wing!" Mr. Pratt's JOURNAL contributions are collected in A Treasury of Early American Homes and A Second Treasury of Early American Homes. Last year he published a two-volume Guide to Early American Homes in which are described about 1800 houses—and how, when, where and why to see them.

Helen Itria

HELEN ITRIA is a short (five feet), slight (100 pounds), free-lance writer who has to wage a constant war between surges of nervous energy and long, lovely spells of laziness. Born in Santa Maria, California, she was told on graduating from high school that she would never amount to anything because she laughed too much. However, as a free-lance writer, Miss Itria has published many magazine articles, and is co-author of the book, Devil at my Heels. She lives alone in Beverly Hills, California, enjoys the freedom of working for herself, but worries about self-discipline. "I'll dodge working on any story I don't enjoy or believe in," she says, "but doing the article about the Melvin Traviolis was a wonderfully satisfying experience. These people are rare and very real and extremely generous—they give much more than they get." We hope you'll enjoy reading about the Traviolis (How America Lives, p. 113) as much as Miss Itria liked writing about them.

Paul Somers

The man with the pipe and the nice smile is PAUL SOMERS, whose chief interest besides writing and his family (he's married, has two sons and two daughters) is sailing small boats and exploring deserted islands. Born in Leicester, England, he started his working career on a sedate financial journal, switched to Fleet Street when he found the job too quiet. On the editorial staff of a London daily newspaper he worked, for many years, as reporter, leader writer and foreign correspondent. Knowing this, you won't be surprised to learn that both hero and heroine of his story, Beginner's Luck (p. 42), are newspaper reporters. A delightful pair too.

Condensed Novel Complete in This Issue

BEGINNER'S LUCK, Paul Somers . 42

Stories

REACH FOR THE SUN, Charlotte Edwards . 44
PEACHES IN THE BANK, George Sumner Albee . 48
CAPTIVE (Conclusion), The Gordons . 52

Special Features

MUST SCHOOLS BE PALACES?, Dorothy Thompson . 11
THE FIRST CHILD—AND HIS SPECIAL POSITION, Benjamin Spock, M.D. . 16
HIGH SCHOOL IS WORTH WORKING FOR! . 31
UNTAPPED LEADERSHIP, Margaret Hickey . 31
NEW HOPE FOR CHILDLESS WOMEN, Albert Q. Maisel . 46
THE BEACH AT VILLERVILLE, Painting by Boudin, Description by John Walker . 62
HOW AMERICA LIVES: THE HAPPY MAN, Helen Itria . 113

General Features

OUR READERS WRITE US . 4
DIARY OF DOMESTICITY, Gladys Taber . 24
THERE'S A MAN IN THE HOUSE, Harlan Miller . 28
"HE SAYS MY FEELINGS ABOUT SEX ARE ALL WRONG," Clifford R. Adams, Ph.D. . 36
FIFTY YEARS AGO ▪ JOURNAL ABOUT TOWN . 41
THIS IS A FINICKY FEEDER, Munro Leaf . 76
ASK ANY WOMAN, Marcelene Cox . 132

Fashion and Beauty

BLACK IS THE FASHION, WEAR IT WITH COLOR, Wilhela Cushman . 56
FIRST FALL DRESSES, Nora O'Leary . 60
NO-WILL-POWER DIET, Dawn Crowell Norman . 63
HOW TO DRESS WELL ON PRACTICALLY NOTHING, Bet Hart . 130

Food and Homemaking

CHICKEN, GOLDEN CRISP AND TENDER . 64
COLLECTOR'S ITEMS: SOUP . 66
DOUBLE FEATURE DINNERS . 86

Architecture and Interior Decoration

OUTDOOR ROOMS FOR SUMMER LIVING, Cynthia McAdoo Wheatland . 50
ASPENDALE IN DELAWARE, Richard Pratt . 54
HOUSE AND SETTING PLANNED TOGETHER, Carol L. Crane . 96
SIMPLY BEAUTIFUL, Tina S. Fredericks and Eileen Sharpe . 123

Poems

THE UNPLANTED PRIMROSE, Thomas Hardy . 74
VALUE, Georgie Starbuck Galbraith . 92
AUGUST SONG, Barbara Shook . 105
NOT SO SURE, Margaret Secrist . 108
FIRST-BORN, Beulah Fenderson Smith . 116
FOR I HAVE KNOWN YOUR LOVE, Elizabeth Graham . 121
YOUNG DEMOCRAT, Robert P. Tristram Coffin . 131

Cover: Mark Shaw, Photographer
Tina S. Fredericks, Picture Editor

CHANGE OF ADDRESS

At least [illegible] days before a change is to take effect please send your complete name, new address and a mailing label from a recent issue. If this is not possible, write out your old address and send it with your new address including zone number. Address the Ladies' Home Journal, Independence Square, Philadelphia 5, Pa. The post office will not forward copies unless you provide necessary postage. Duplicate copies cannot be sent.

Ladies' Home Journal, © 1957 The Curtis Publishing Company in U.S. and Great Britain. All rights reserved. Title registered in U.S Patent Office and foreign countries. Published on last Friday of month preceding date by The Curtis Publishing Company, Independence Square, Philadelphia 5, Pa. Entered as Second-Class Matter at the Post Office at Philadelphia, Pa. Entered as Second-Class Matter at the Post Office Department, Ottawa, Canada, by Curtis Distributing Company, Ltd., Toronto, Ont., Canada.

The names of characters in all stories are fictitious. Any resemblance to living persons is a coincidence.

Subscription Prices: U.S., U.S. Possessions and Canada—1 Yr., $3.50; 2 Yrs., $6; 3 Yrs., $8.50; 4 Yrs., $11. Costa Rica, Cuba, Dominican Republic, Guatemala, Haiti, Mexico, Nicaragua, Panama, Republic of Honduras, Salvador, Spain and South America (except the Guianas)—1 Yr., $4. All other countries—1 Yr., $7. Remit by Money Order or Draft on a bank in the U.S. payable in U.S. Funds. All prices subject to change without notice.

Unconditional Guaranty. We agree upon request direct from subscribers to the Philadelphia office, to refund the full amount paid for any copies of Curtis publications not previously mailed.

The Curtis Publishing Company. Robert E. MacNeal, President; Mary Curtis Zimbalist, Sr. Vice Pres.; Cary W. Bok, Sr. Vice Pres.; Benjamin Allen, Sr. Vice Pres. and Director of Circulation; Donald M. Hobart, Sr. Vice Pres. and Director of Research; Edward C. Von Tress, Sr. Vice Pres. and Director of Advertising; Brandon Barringer, Treasurer; Robert Gibbon, Secretary; Richard Ziesing, Jr., Vice Pres. and Advertising Director of Ladies' Home Journal. The Company also publishes The Saturday Evening Post, Jack and Jill, and Holiday.

Happiness has a fragrance ...called TWEED®

TWEED is the one fragrance, above all others, to wear anywhere, anytime. But in the Fall, most of all, you'll love it. Such a happy companion to your Autumn wardrobe. And pure enchantment for your "companion."

Tweed Mist—concentrated Toilet Water—from $2.25

Tweed Bouquet—a cologne to use lavishly—from $1.50

prices plus tax

Lenthéric ...the name that says fragrance

NOW Jell-O Instant Pudding's special magic makes

ICE CREAM PIE

No freezing...keeps firm in your refrigerator!

JELL-O BRAND New INSTANT PUDDING

No Cooking "BUSY-DAY" Dessert

7 FLAVORS

EASY-AS-PIE ICE CREAM PIE

1. Ice Cream.
Blend together lightly in bowl one pint vanilla ice cream and one cup of milk.

2. Jell-O Instant Pudding.
Add package Chocolate Instant Pudding. Beat until just mixed . . . one minute.

3. A baked pie shell.
Pour at once into 9-inch pie shell. Let stand in refrigerator about one hour.

Jell-O Instant Pudding is the magic that makes this ice cream pie smooth and "cut-able." Keeps up to 24 hours in your refrigerator. And how those Jell-O Instant flavors blend with ice cream!

Try these pairs for a beginning. You'll discover other dream pie combinations yourself!

Jell-O Strawberry Instant Pudding with Strawberry Ice Cream!

Jell-O Lemon Instant Pudding with Pineapple Ice Cream!

Jell-O Vanilla Instant Pudding with Pistachio Ice Cream!

Jell-O is a registered trade-mark of General Foods Corporation

OUR READERS WRITE US

Who Are Americans?

Wilton, Maine

Dear Editors: Thank you for the JOURNAL and for printing everyone's point of view. I read the letter on the James family (May JOURNAL) and then turned again to the story in the February issue. I looked at Officer James, of the United States Air Force, and thought of the atomic bomb and the young men of every race, color and creed who stand between the writer of the letter, you and me, and devastation of our way of life, even our very survival. I looked at their faces in church—"Blessed are ye when men shall revile ye and persecute ye"—I remembered the lady with the lamp—"Give me your homeless"—and I thought that the Jameses' ancestors probably received not the gift of America, but came in chains, in the hold of a wooden ship, slaves for a white man. I looked at all the Jameses—clean, nice-looking, intelligent, respectable—at the happy home, the healthy, well-behaved children.

If these are not Americans, if service and dedication to a country whose people have persecuted you for over a hundred years (and still do, in print) do not count; if you have risen from slavery, through years of the back of the bus, the other side of the street, the poorest housing, of being barred from societies, clubs, even from jobs and institutions of learning and have become an officer, have established the greatest institution in the world today—a good home—and maintained your faith and this does not count, what does? If these are not Americans, who, dear God, are the Americans?

Black or white, we commit crime because of environment, conditions in society, lack of training and help in home, school and church. Black or white, we are decent, law-abiding, respectable.

May the writer of that letter remember Christ on the cross, mercy, compassion, humility—"Heal the sick, love thy neighbor, do unto others as ye would that they do unto you"—not just for white Americans but for all humanity.

An American citizen (white),
DOROTHEA VOSE

Our Boy-Meets-Girl Covers

Glen Ridge, New Jersey

Dear Journal: Do the corners of my mouth turn up? Yes, ever since I saw the cover photo on the November issue—and then again in January, March and June. Your photographer and picture editor are just fine.

Sincerely,
MRS. HORACE P. LANTERMAN

▶ And just wait till you see what happens to our couple next year! ED.

Slow But Sure

South Euclid, Ohio

Dear Editors: I guess we must be the All-American freaks of this generation, for we defy what seems to be the basic rule of Young America: Buy now and pay later.

The philosophy that we have lived by for seven years is this: Unless we can pay cash for something, we don't buy. And guess what . . . it works! We may be the only house on our street without storm windows, but we do have a new car, carpeting, a well-fed and -clothed daughter of four, new washer, dryer, range and refrigerator and many more of the "necessary luxuries"—all paid for in cash. Best of all, we have no Installment Plan Blues.

It hasn't always been easy to wait, but slowly but surely, one at a time, we have acquired the "nice things of life."

Most sincerely,
AGNES PARK FAUSNAUGH

Enjoy 'Em While They're Young

Richmond, Virgin

Dear Journal Editors: I read so ma*ny good* articles on raising children, b haven't seen any advice to young mothe about enjoying their "little ones" wh they are little!

Here is a snapshot of my "baby aft forty." We have so much fun togeth

Pamela in furs.

With my first three I was young and such a "stew" all the time. I just didn take time to enjoy them as I have th little one!

Sincerely,
HAZEL S. OWE

The Greatest

Shoemakersville, Pennsylvan

Gentlemen: Our seniors at Perry Tow ship High School are using "Education a Changing World" for our commenc ment theme. I noticed your Who A America's Ten Richest Men? (Ap JOURNAL) and wished you had answer the question "Who are the World's (America's) Greatest Moving Freedo Forward?" We should be happy to ha an answer from you to share with audience.

Sincerely,
REBECCA E. SMIT
Teac

▶ Every teacher who does the best job can.

Every parent who does the best job and he can.

Every citizen who, mindful of our Co stitution and its Bill of Rights, lives to his obligation to uphold them.

Every officeholder who remembers is the servant of the electorate.

Every young man and woman who pr pares himself for the task of taking o the running of his country.

At the moment, Ike is the single Grea est Person (American) doing this, in o opinion. ED.

Why, Oh Why?

Farmington, New Mex

Dear Editors: Why, oh why do magazi story heroines have to be thin and bea tiful? Why can't they be just ordinar looking people—tall or plump or rawbon or knock-kneed—anything but that fas ionably skinny perfection!

You might judge that I am not skin and beautiful, and you're right.

Sincerely,
MRS. GEORGE RASC

▶ We lay all blame on our authors, w apparently see beauty everywhere. ED.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 7

Perfect night for the Light refreshment

MODERN people have little time for yesterday's heavy foods. They pack their picnic baskets with light, less-filling food and drink—and they look and feel better for it.

Pepsi-Cola, too, takes this modern point of view about sensible diet. Never heavy, never too sweet, today's Pepsi-Cola is reduced in calories. Refresh without filling. Have a Pepsi!

Pepsi-Cola

refreshes without filling

A new kind of deodorant ...

ban®

rolls on!

More effective than messy creams, easier to apply than drippy sprays.*
Not a crumbly stick!

Here's a wonderful solution for your perspiration problems. Without mess, drip or smear, that revolving marble in the top of the BAN bottle spreads on just the right amount of quick-acting lotion deodorant. BAN protects you against odor a full 24 hours, won't harm clothes—is perfectly safe for normal skin. Get BAN today!

*In a recent survey against the leading cream and spray deodorants, 7 out of 10 prefer BAN.

Ban works as no other leading deodorant can!

ANOTHER FINE PRODUCT OF BRISTOL-MYERS MAKERS OF BUFFERIN AND IPANA amazing new lotion-moistened super tissue cleans, cools face and hands

anytime, anywhere

The moist cleansing tissue in the neat carry-pak* that washes and cools face and hands—air-dries in seconds!

Package of 10, 49¢; package of 21, $1.00 at drug and cosmetic counters throughout the United States and Canada. For free sample send name and 10¢ for cost of mailing to Wash-'n-Dri, Canaan, Conn.

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

NEVER GET CAUGHT OUT WITHOUT WASH 'N DRI!

©R. R. Williams Inc., Canaan, Conn.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 4

How to Get National Parks Info

Washington, D.C.

Dear Mr. and Mrs. Gould: As a member of the Steering Committee of Keep America Beautiful, Inc., I would like to express warm appreciation for your extraordinarily fine treatment of the litter problem (May JOURNAL).

That same issue invited your readers to write to the National Park Service for Camping Facilities in the National Park System and for what is referred to as a Map of National Parks. The first is a sales publication, offered by the Superintendent of Documents for 15 cents a copy; the map, issued by the National Park Service in 1949, is entitled "Recreational Areas of the United States." Although out-of-date, it may still be purchased for 35 cents, cash or money order, from the Superintendent of Documents.

Sincerely yours,
HERBERT EVISON
Chief of Information
National Park Service

▶ Our error. Readers who wish to obtain publications of the National Park Service should write to the Superintendent of Documents, Government Printing Office, Washington 25, D.C. Price lists of all Government publications are free on request. ED.

That Three-Faced Girl

Washington, Indiana

Dear Editors: I am reading a book that is making quite a stir, The Three Faces of Eve, the case history of a patient who had a triple personality.

Now, years ago the LADIES' HOME JOURNAL published a fictional book, serially, that dealt with this identical subject. Can you search through your records and find it for me? The names of the three personalities were Marie Willet, Rosemary and Billie. I wonder if you might want to revive the story as a pioneer excursion into a field which has since become one of established fact!

Yours,
MRS. B. C. RALEY

▶ Our serial, Which One—the Marvelous Romance of a Triple Girl, by Robert Ames Bennet, began in May, 1912. It was based on the true story of a Miss Beauchamp. ED.

Move Over, Uncle Remus!

Palo Alto, California

Dear Editors: Have you told and retold the story of the Three Bears so often that you want to pull up the covers of the baby's bed and smother Goldilocks once and for all? Something like that started me on my own storytelling.

My husband and I had taken our three-year-old granddaughter and a ten-year-old niece to spend the summer with us at our cabin. I had A Child's Garden of Verses, thinking to read a verse or two to the children at night. But after three weeks of reading the book (and telling all the children's stories I could recall) over and over, I was decidedly bored. If I wanted to continue the storytime and keep my own sanity, I'd have to make up my own tales.

I had no delusions about my ability as a storyteller. All day I wondered what I could talk about. My only hope lay in finding a character to put through a series of adventures. But what character? What would interest both a three-year-old and a ten-year-old?

That evening I took a deep breath. I began a tale about a little boy named Jack who wandered off into the redwood forest to hunt squirrels. When Jack and I got tired, I let him lie down and drop off to sleep. And then, wonder of wonders, a door in the trunk of a huge tree opened, and out swarmed a zillion little men. That ended the night's chapter.

The next night, the children bombarded me with questions. "Tell us what happened to Jack," they begged. That was my first lesson in storytelling for children. You may think those characters are only figments of your imagination, but to the children they are real.

Not all my stories were serials or adventure stories. I soon learned that even the ten-year-old preferred simple, familiar ALERT, INTELLIGENT, THE OLD ENGLISH SHEEP DOG IS TRULY A TRUSTED FRIEND. PAINTING BY DOUGLASS CROCKWELL.

Clear-eyed and alert ...a Friskies-fed dog

—the secret is real meaty nourishment at its balanced best!

How wonderful to look at your dog and see the results of Friskies balanced nourishment. Friskies Meal satisfies your dog's craving for meat...provides in convenient form all the food values of choice steaks, chops, roasts.

VITAMINS, MINERALS. Friskies is rich in meat meal, bone meal, liver protein — contains essential growth vitamins and minerals. Give your dog Friskies Meal—and see the difference!

EASIEST OF ALL TO MIX. Quickest, too. Mixes instantly. Just add water. Ready at once. Won't mush. Feeding bowl rinses clean.

For Variety—Canned Friskies
Fully nourishing. Provides up to twice the nourishment of low quality dog foods. Feed alone, or mix with Friskies Meal.

Carnation quality products

ALBERS MILLING CO., DIV. OF CARNATION COMPANY, LOS ANGELES 65, CALIFORNIA

FOR ALL THE HOURS OF YOUR BUSY DAY

Shelton Stroller
THE CAREFREE FASHION

Meet the dress you need for the busy life you lead. LATE GETTING STARTED? Step into a Shelton Stroller and you're on your way. DRIVING DOWN? You'll arrive fresh and unwrinkled. SHOPPING OR VISITING? Look for compliments on your slim, trim appearance. And day after day, you'll delight in the 100% nylon jersey that washes in the evening, dries in the night, never, never needs an iron in the morning. Here we introduce FOLIAGE print, newest of the carefree Shelton Strollers. Sizes 12 to 20, 12½ to 22½. About $13.

Shelton CASUALS for name of your nearest retailer and FREE FASHION FOLIO, write: Department L-8, 1350 Broadway, New York 18, N. Y.

settings. One favorite was about three ants walking up to a chrysanthemum bush. It was simple. It had no plot. It taught no lesson. I don't think it was even a story. But the three ants were garbed in colorful attire, right down to the handkerchiefs in their hip pockets.

The three-year-old demanded this story again and again until I was ready to call for the ant powder. And when I wasn't telling it to her, she was telling it to herself. All day long she went around muttering, "Three ants were walking up a chrysantenan bush." And therein lay the secret of success. "Chrysanthemum" was a mouthful, and she loved it.

Later I told about the animals in the woods around us. To bring the children into it, I had the animals peering into our lighted windows, wondering what manner of animals we were. Then followed a story about the sea, a little girl named Alice and a sea turtle named Mehitable.

Sometimes I wondered whether I or the children told the stories. Their pertinent questions, excited exclamations, even their attitudes cued me on how to continue. One time I started telling how mamma rabbit took her twin babies to get food. "And did the baby rabbits push the grocery-store cart?" my little one interrupted. I hadn't exactly planned on taking the rabbits to a supermarket, but apparently that was how she saw it. The two girls, on familiar ground, finished the story to suit themselves.

When the summer was over and we had returned home, I began to read a book to my cherubs, bedded down for the night. "We don't want to hear that," they chorused. "You tell us a story." That for me who once thought I couldn't even hold my listeners' attention!

Maybe it's just because children are more polite than their elders. But I think it's because your children like to hear you tell of things you know or imagine. And if they can play a part in the tales, so much the better. I'll start you by giving you the opening sentence that never failed to leave my little listener squirming with anticipation: "Once there was a little girl and, you know, she looked almost like you."

Sincerely,
CLARE BOWMAN

Well, Dig That!

Hollywood, California

Ladies' Home Journal is really the most,
I know it's digged from coast to coast.

The book condensation is really complete;
When you read it you'll think it's neat.

The stories are both weird and romantic;
The rating with me is always gigantic.

The Fashion and Beauty are really the greatest;
They teach you how to be up with the latest.

With the Food and Homemaking you'll be a good wife;
They're useful and practical for the rest of your life.

Architecture, Gardening and Interior Decoration
Are really important for the whole wide nation.

Now you know why I like this magazine:
It's the coolest and craziest I've ever seen.

(Miss) ROBIN DICKEY
Age 13

It Burns Me Up!

Why do pickle factories pack the jars so tight you must tear one pickle all to pieces to get the rest out?

MRS. ROBERT VAN SICKLE
Bonifay, Florida

I wish manufacturers would make luminous keyholes on car ignitions—and on house doors. I'm tired of fumbling!

MRS. D. H. TEMPLE
Elizabeth, New Jersey

Why, oh why do shoe manufacturers put black soles on shoes—and especially on little girls' black patents? They make such bad marks on linoleum and also on hardwood floors.

MRS. JAMES F. HOGAN
Niagara Falls, New York

Spectators at disaster scenes, inhibiting rescue work.

MARIAN FRANK
Hackettstown, New Jersey

American Red Ball
moves your family "treasures" SAFELY

—because it's a
CERTIFIED MOVE!

Now move all your possessions the safest way . . . with American Red Ball, the nation's only van line to offer you a Certificate of Performance . . . the famous written guarantee of complete satisfaction! With this exclusive "plus service" feature, every item you move receives extra-careful handling—from pickup through delivery. Choose American Red Ball for a perfect move—it's Certified in writing!

Excellent storage facilities everywhere.

AMERICAN RED BALL
FOR A FREE WRITTEN ESTIMATE CONTACT YOUR LOCAL AMERICAN RED BALL AGENT—LISTED IN THE YELLOW PAGES OF YOUR DIRECTORY

AMERICAN RED BALL
TRANSIT COMPANY, INC.
1000 Illinois Bldg., Dept. L-8, Indianapolis, Indiana

COOLER CHEST!

THIS aluminum chest will hold a full case of beverages. Equipped with a bottle opener, a drain plug, and removable food tray it is ideal for picnic or traveling enjoyment.

To earn yours send us three 2-year Saturday Evening Post subscriptions at $10 each or five 2-year Ladies' Home Journal subscriptions at $6 each. All subscriptions must be sold outside your home at the full advertised price. Both new and renewals count but not your personal or personal gift subscriptions.

Write your order on plain paper and mail with your own name and address and full remittance to us. Offer good in continental U. S. only, until October 31, 1957. Sorry, no cooler chests may be sold for cash.

CURTIS CIRCULATION COMPANY
202 Independence Square, Phila. 5, Pa.

Love me or leave me your Reed & Barton sterling

What manner of man is this? Anyone who has been anywhere knows that a girl and her Reed & Barton are not easily parted. This is the solid silver that betokens the charmed life. It's the fairest sterling in the land and has been since 1824. Silver Sculpture, Autumn Leaves, Tara. Each per setting, $36.75.

6-piece setting: knife, fork, teaspoon, soup spoon, salad fork, spreader. Prices include tax. For literature of nearest store write Reed & Barton, Dept. LH-87, Taunton, Mass.

That Ivory Look – so clear...so fresh ...so easily yours

What a sweet summer dream—and how That Ivory Look becomes her! A glowing look that can be yours through the magic of Ivory's mildness. Remember, the milder your soap, the prettier your skin—and Ivory has a mildness all its own. A simple change to regular Ivory care leaves your complexion clearer, fresher. You'll have That Ivory Look.

99 44/100% pure®...it floats

Wash your face regularly with pure, mild Ivory. Gentle enough for a baby's skin—so right for your complexion, too.

More doctors advise Ivory than any other soap

MUST SCHOOLS BE PALACES?

BY DOROTHY THOMPSON

WINTER RHYTHM, serigraph (12¼" x 18⅞") by Leonard Pytlak, depicts a scene in Central Park, New York. The artist has won a Guggenheim Fellowship, is represented in several museums, and is now associated with the Adult Education Department of the City College of New York. Courtesy the Weyhe Gallery, New York.

In dealing with the school shortage, I wonder whether we clearly ask ourselves what a school is—or has come to be. At any rate, the financial problem—and burden—is enhanced by demands upon the school that have little or nothing to do with essential education. Communities are being taxed to support properties that often are out of all proportion to the community's needs—or the income of its people.

A new high school has recently gone up in a Northern New England town which I know very well. It has a population of 2500. Although the school serves a number of small adjoining villages, enrollment is under 300 pupils and it is planned to accommodate no more than 350.

The town with the new high school is not industrial. Its people earn their livings as merchants, insurance and real-estate agents, and purveyors of various services to the townspeople, surrounding farmers and a seasonal population of "summer folks."

There are a few solidly well-to-do people in the town, which is famous for its beauty and therefore popular as a resort. These few "leading families" have, however, amassed their wealth elsewhere and most of them are retired. Tourism supports two excellent inns and several smaller ones. But the town has not expanded in decades and is unlikely to do so.

The average family income is modest. Young people, as they grow up, marry former school friends, get jobs in the little businesses of the town or drive to and from work in an industrial center some twenty miles distant or to mills in other centers that the school does not serve. The youth with energy and some family means go to college elsewhere and afterward seek employment where there are greater opportunities. They seldom come back except to visit.

The town has wonderful natural facilities for growing up in. There is a beautiful river in which to fish and swim in summer and on which to skate in winter. There are mountains to climb, woods to explore, and a nearby lake on which many people of modest incomes have little camps. There are Boy Scouts, Girl Scouts, Cub Scouts and Little League baseball, and for the country youth who come into town for school, the admirable 4-H clubs.

Four active churches offer homely old-fashioned festivities. A summer theater, touring from another town, plays once a week at reasonable prices. A little country club offers tennis courts and a golf course for modest fees.

The town has, for its size, an excellent public library. A wealthy townswoman, giving away her fortune in her extreme old age, has built and endowed an exceptionally fine recreation center with outdoor and indoor facilities, including a well-equipped stage and hall for amateur dramatics.

The recreational needs of children and youth are, therefore, one would think, more than adequately provided for by natural environment and the private energies and endowments of public-spirited citizens.

But this town has just built a new high school which, when completed, will certainly cost $650,000. The larger part of this money has gone into a gymnasium (worthy of a fashionable athletic club), very extensive playing fields, home-economics and shop rooms, a superb kitchen with every variety of gadget and laborsaving device in which to prepare noonday meals, handsome classrooms and extensive science laboratories. The gymnasium, planned to be used also as a public hall, has a seating capacity of 1200 people. Yet the population of the whole union district is under 4000, and the already existing town hall is entirely adequate.

The old high school, now being turned into a grade school, was built on two floors, securing twice as much room under one roof and on one foundation, and greatly decreasing building and heating costs in a severe winter climate. But apparently modern teen-agers don't like to climb stairs, and the new one is all on one level. The building must also, therefore, fill double the ground space, and this fact, together with its extensive playing fields occupying 28 acres, made it impossible to build in the town center. The new school is several miles outside and pupils who previously walked to school must now have transportation.

To build and maintain the physical plant alone has required an upping of the tax rate beyond the capacity to pay of the parents of most of the pupils. But it is their own fault, because most of them never showed up at the meetings where the matter was debated and the decisions made. To operate the plant will require a staff of at least five people, the whole teaching staff being only eighteen. And the higher the cost of these physical facilities, the greater the problem of finding (and adequately paying) teachers, who start at $3400 and rise to $4000 only after ten years. From the higher salaries, some 30 per cent is deducted for taxes and old-age security.

There are, of course, people who want such schools—architects and contractors first of all. They are always active in promotion. There is the spirit of "our children deserve the best," without thinking of whether "the best" covers the really important and essential.

For what is important and essential is that these young people should learn basic things under conditions suitable to the standard of living most of them can reasonably anticipate.

Is it really a good idea to bring children up in a school atmosphere of extreme luxury and send them back to very modest little homes at night?

A few of the girls who learn to cook and sew in the glamorous home-ec rooms may take up cooking and sewing later professionally, for institutions. But how many of them do? How many have done so in the past, going for training to special schools, as these will have to do CONTINUED ON PAGE 13

Executive Editor: Mary Bass Special Projects Editor: Laura Lou Brookman
Associate Editors: Hugh MacNair Kahler, Bernardine Kielty, Wilhela Cushman, William E. Fink, Richard Pratt, Louella G. Shouer, Mary Lea Page, Dawn Crowell Norman, Margaret Davidson, Nora O'Leary, Donald Stuart, Tina S. Fredericks, Helen Everitt, Peter Briggs, Anne Einselen, Margaret Parton, Cynthia McAdoo Wheatland
Contributing Editors: Gladys Taber, Gladys Denny Shultz, Margaret Hickey, Ruth Mills Teague, Barbara Benson
Assistant to the Editor: Nelle Keys Perry
Editorial Associates: John Werner, Ruth Mary Packard, Ruth Shapley Matthews, Alice Conkling, Joseph Di Pietro, Elizabeth Goetsch, Nancy Crawford Wood, Jean Todd Freeman, Eileen Sharpe, Betty Coe Spicer
Assistant Editors: Victoria Harris, Alice Kastberg, Virginia Price, Dorothy Anne Robinson, Albert Serwazi, June Schwartz, Carol Crane, Liane Waite, Joyce Posson, Neal Gilkyson Stuart, Ruth Imler, Elizabeth Hart
Editorial Assistants: Lee Stowell Cullen, Patricia Martin, Flora Casparian, Alberte Wright, Simone Smith, Hazel Owen, Laura Date, Patricia Corrigan, Corinna Wildman, Isabel Blythe, Helen Olchvary, Olivia Donovan, Abbot Mills, Sally Platt, Marley Marseilles

Cheese Pleaser—that's French's Mustard. Zips up the mild, adds tanginess to racy ones, brings out the best in any cheese!

On food

In food

Complete Salad Meal with French's new Sauce Superb—see easy recipes below.

no other mustard has FRENCH'S Light and Lively flavor

Just as you have recipe secrets, so has French's. The fabulous formula for French's Mustard! It calls for spices and flavorings from around the world . . . specially grown mustard seeds. All combining to give you the unique tang that makes French's the mustard more women choose and use than any other. Its light and lively flavor enhances all you use it on or in—won't fade out in cooking. Make your mustard French's!

SALAD MEAL

2 lbs. cold boiled beef brisket, corned beef or lamb
6 medium potatoes, cooked 6 hard-cooked eggs
3 large tomatoes, peeled 1 large onion, sliced
1 large head lettuce and 2 bunches watercress

SALAD SAUCE SUPERB

1 cup mayonnaise ¼ cup evaporated milk
3 tbsps. French's Mustard
1 tbsp. French's Worcestershire
1 tbsp. lemon juice ½ tsp. French's Pepper
½ tsp. French's Garlic Salt

Mix sauce ingredients and chill. Arrange thinly sliced boiled potatoes (previously marinated in ¼ cup oil, ¼ cup vinegar, 1 tsp. French's Seasoning Salt, parsley), sliced meat, eggs and tomatoes on greens as shown. Add onion rings and sauce. Serves 8-10.

F R E N C H ' S M U S T A R D

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 11

before they will be able to command institutional positions? Only a handful.

Most of them will marry young men of modest means shortly after they leave high school. They will have neither the space nor the money to install $2000 kitchens. The home economics they need to learn is how to shop, bake a good pie, cook cheaper cuts of meat tastily, organize the daily routine of housework, and keep their children busy and entertained and their husbands cozy and satisfied. They will not learn this in high schools, but what they (and their future husbands) can learn in high school (if enough time is devoted to it) is to appreciate a good book, understand something of the history and culture they inherit and pass on, have respect for the lives of great and illustrious people, think before they pass judgments, develop a capacity for concentrated industriousness and inner resources of interest and satisfaction.

Organized recreation is essential for children and youth confined in the brick-and-mortar prisons of great cities. But the most delightful and creative recreation is what children and youth think up for themselves or enjoy with their families: the camp in the woods built with their own hands of old boards and bricks salvaged from dump heaps or discarded by carpenters; the swimming hole built by the beavers, not the taxpayers; the botanical collection garnered in fields and waysides with the aid of a simple book on wild flowers; the string of fish brought home for the family supper; the family picnic with the children broiling hamburgers on a fireplace improvised of a ring of stones; the baseball match on a vacant lot; the trapeze rigged up in a barn. These are the perennial joys of the small-town and country child. Small towns such as we are discussing deprive children of imagination, initiative and the capacity to amuse themselves by too much organized recreation, while overemphasis on school playing facilities prejudices them against education as such.

But the parents who support such schools and "rec centers" really want their children off their hands, not only during school hours but for most of the time they are awake. This greatly increases the break between generations and leads to an increasingly collectivized society, whose members are not happy except in large groups all doing the same things.

The school I have described is not exceptional. It is part of a developing pattern. Within an area of 50 square miles I know of five other new small-town or rural schools, crushingly expensive in physical plant and its maintenance, the bulk of the money going into facilities for sport, recreation, kitchens, and courses for things children once learned at home, but still with poorly paid and overburdened teachers trying to do everything except teach.

It is high time that the one-room rural schools, which still exist in Northern New England, should disappear. But the school I have described is not the only "union school" where physical facilities for sport and recreation are out of all proportion—or so it seems to me.

In a much smaller town—actually a tiny village—a new primary school has been built combining the pupils of two one-room schools. The town still feels it cannot afford space and a teacher for each of the eight classes. Two grades are taught in one room. Toilet facilities leave much to be desired. To save plumbing costs, lavatories for girls and boys are next to each other, so girls and boys are likely to enter and leave simultaneously. But, again, the gymnasium is "out of this world"—eating up for both building and maintenance an entirely disproportionate part of the budget.

Thinking of these schools, I thought of one I saw this past winter in Morocco—also an American school.

"The American School" is in Tangier—and it is not operated by the American taxpayers.

Tangier, since a little over a year ago, when the French protectorate ended in the rest of Morocco, has been an integral part of that country. Before that, and since the end of the eighteenth century, it had been an international area. Back in the early eighteen hundreds Tangier was the only safe place in Northern Africa where foreigners could live. The city and its area is fifteen miles across the water from Gibraltar, on both the Atlantic and the Mediterranean, and in a most salubrious climate. The International Diplomatic Corps established a sanitary commission that later became, de facto, the government of the small province.

The oldest continually occupied American building abroad is in Tangier. The Sultan of Morocco was one of the first rulers to recognize the infant American republic and the United States paid tribute to him for protection against the Barbary pirates who preyed on American and other shipping. When the French took over the rest of Morocco in 1912, except for the smaller part held by Spain, Britain, Spain and the United States did not want to see France gain control of this critical seaway area, nor did France want to see Spain have it. So after World War I a statute internationalizing the area and providing for its administration by eight powers—France, Great Britain, Italy, Belgium, Spain, the Netherlands, Portugal and the United States—was adopted.

That status officially ended with the establishment of Moroccan independence. But Tangier remains a largely international city and free port and money market, attracting merchants and businessmen from all over the world, though how long that status will last is speculative.

Education is one of the chief concerns of all the world's new or reborn states, and Morocco is no exception.

And with the rise of American world power and influence since World War II there is increasing attraction toward American education, although French education, rivaled in Tangier by Spanish, is naturally predominant.

Some enterprising Americans with a long interest in Tangier, spurred on by encouragement from the local population, recently founded "The American School." They had no money to erect any building whatever, and rented a private house with room enough for nine classrooms. These are bright, airy and delightfully furnished. The administration office is housed on a glassed veranda. There is no assembly hall—pupils congregate in the front hall and on the wide stairs that ascend from it. There is no gymnasium, just the large yard of the villa where the children play their games during recesses.

The school has nearly 200 pupils of 17 nationalities—Americans, Moroccans, East Asians and Europeans.

Getting teachers is difficult at the very low salaries that the school can afford to pay. But the cost of living is low by American standards, too, and so far the school has found fine teachers, willing to undertake a tour of duty out of interest in the cause and for the opportunity to see and live in a beautiful country familiar to few people—teachers who like the challenge involved.

And the challenge is great. Although all the instruction is in English, many pupils enter the school knowing no English at all, and often not in the primary grade but in the fourth or fifth where they must receive supplementary language instruction to permit them to catch up with their class. But they get it and learn surprisingly quickly. The problem of racial adjustments hardly seems to exist. The teachers themselves have various racial backgrounds—one of the most successful and respected is a colored American. Boys and girls as blond as their Viking ancestors sit side by side with Moroccan,

CONTINUED ON PAGE 88

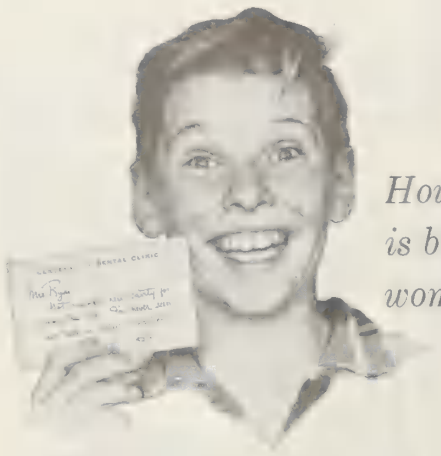
X X X X X

Man can do everything with himself, but he must not attempt to do too much with others.

WILHELM VON HUMBOLDT

X X X X X

No other rice is this easy!



Pour Minute Rice in!

Pour perfect rice out!

Another favorite from General Foods

Minute Rice is already cooked – just boil water... add Minute Rice... cover... remove from heat! No cooking! No steaming!

Only Minute Rice is perfect every time

How a stannous fluoride toothpaste is bringing new hope to every man, woman and child in America

One Billion Unfilled Cavities Must Be Wrong!

BY MARGUERITE HIGGINS
Noted Journalist and Pulitzer Prize Winner

TOOTH DECAY has three notorious distinctions which, taken together, qualify it for the title of "Public Health Enemy Number One."

1. It is the most widespread of all chronic diseases, striking 95 out of every 100 people.
2. To date, it is a literally incurable disease—which must be prevented if it is to be conquered at all.
3. Unlike other diseases, most of which have been brought under control, tooth decay continues steadily to increase.

For every cavity a dentist fills, six are left unfilled through failure to visit a dentist. It is estimated that there are now one billion unfilled cavities in the mouths of Americans—which, unless cared for, can result in the eventual loss of the teeth involved.

FLUORIDE FOR ALL THE FAMILY

It is plain that unless a sharp reversal takes place in the tide of decay, the dentists—and all of us—will soon be in a difficult position. Fortunately, help has arrived in the form of a stannous fluoride toothpaste called Crest.

What Crest does is to give teeth fluoride they need—the only way for adults and older children to get proven fluoride protection. Crest's fluoride strengthens the tooth enamel against decay, so that acid can't dissolve it as readily—thus preventing cavities. The stannous fluoride formula that makes this possible has been given the trademark Fluoristan.

Most important, Crest's protective effect is concentrated in the very parts of the teeth that need it most—the weak places where cavities usually begin. These "soft spots" are danger areas which your dentist notes with special care. Before the development of Crest, there was no toothpaste which could prevent soft spots from turning into cavities.

UNMATCHED PROOF OF DECAY PREVENTION

Over a 4-year period, thousands of adults and children took part in repeated tests of Crest—the greatest "in-use" testing program ever made on a toothpaste. The results, published in leading dental journals, proved that on the average, Crest means far less new decay for both grownups and children. No other toothpaste has ever matched this proof of decay prevention.

For many people the use of Crest resulted in no new cavities. Norman Rockwell has dramatized this happy result on the opposite page.

Incidentally, Crest's refreshing flavor has won it many friends, particularly among children. And everyone appreciates Crest's unsurpassed ability to clean teeth and stop mouth odor.

Answers to your questions about CREST

Please address your questions to: Director, Division of Dental Research, Procter & Gamble, Box 182, Cincinnati 1, Ohio.

How can Crest harden tooth enamel? This seems difficult to believe— Mrs. Ewing Brown, Los Angeles, California

Our teeth have a natural "liking" for fluoride—in fact, all teeth contain some fluoride. When you brush with Crest, the tooth enamel takes up some of the fluoride in the toothpaste. To get the general idea, you might think of a sponge taking up water.

The added fluoride then makes the tooth enamel less soluble in decay acids—a property fluoride has long been known to possess. This is accompanied by an actual hardening of the enamel.

Is the Fluoristan in Crest the same as fluoride?—Mrs. John Kruk, Buffalo, New York.

Fluoristan is a fluoride formula especially developed for Crest Toothpaste. And—this is really important—Crest with Fluoristan can prevent decay for both grownups and children!

Crest is not a substitute for fluoride in drinking water. Fluoridation of water supplies is the only practical way of strengthening teeth against decay before they "come through" in childhood—while they are still being formed in the gums.

A DENTAL HEALTH MESSAGE FROM PROCTER & GAMBLE, MAKERS OF CREST TOOTHPASTE

"Look, Mom—no cavities!"

Crest Toothpaste stops soft spots from turning into cavities—means far less decay for grownups and children.

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

Fluoristan is a trademark for Procter & Gamble's exclusive fluoride tooth decay fighter.

1957, The Procter & Gamble Co.

FROM PHOTOGRAPHIC SUPPLIES TO STEEPLE JACKS whatever you need
Find It Fast In The Yellow Pages
Ads with this emblem make your shopping easier

The first child—and his special position.

By BENJAMIN SPOCK, M.D.

LANA HOBAN

Derring-do brings self-confidence and independence.

DR. SPOCK

"I don't think there is any magical way to bring up a first child with the relaxation you will probably achieve with a second or third. Worry seems to go along with anything new."

Many parents by the time they have several children comment on how much more independent the others are, compared with the first. They say, for instance, that the first has always had more trouble getting acquainted with outsiders and learning to enjoy rough-and-tumble play or that he is timid in the face of new situations or that he has always clung to the parents and demanded a lot of attention from them or that he is spoiled. Of course this comparison is not true of all families, or of even a majority. Sometimes it's the second or third child who is the most dependent, or there may be no such tendency in any of them. But it's safe to say that if overdependence shows up in any child in a family, it is more apt to be in the first.

When overdependency is developing in a child, the process is usually so gradual that the parents don't see it at the time. If he is the first in the family, they may become aware of it only after they have a second child, who is so independent by comparison.

There are two kinds of feelings in us parents which commonly make us hover over a first child and thus tie him more closely to us. (In severe cases there are other feelings, too, but that's another story.) The first is anxiety. Most of us are so inexperienced when we start with our first baby that we are anxious about everything: his hiccups, his temperature, his weight, his breathing. His first fall frightens us and overwhelms us with guilt. When he has his first nose cold, it seems like a major illness. Our overconcern shows in our faces, our voices, the speed with which we respond to his cry. Some of this anxiety rubs off onto him. Our fears about his physical safety usually tone down as the months go by. The same can't be said of our anxieties about his behavior and about our ability to control it. These worries become worse during the second year, when a baby ceases to be just a cute and compliant doll. He starts to show a whole collection of characteristics that we have been taught to view with concern—willfulness, obstinacy, defiance, temper, hostility, timidity. The interesting thing is that when a mother and child get into frequent wrangles with each other—about eating, toileting, doing all the other things he's meant to do or not doing all the things he's not meant to do—it ties them more tightly to each other, despite their antagonism.

How do a majority of us parents manage to take minor misbehavior so much more casually in our later children? I suppose that part of the answer is that we have eventually learned with our first that we can control him somehow, by hook or by crook. With this assurance, we approach the second more calmly and therefore more effectively. At the very least we don't go looking for trouble—in the disciplinary sense. We assume everything is under control until proved wrong. So a lot of the possible issues never arise. As a result, the child is in a less touchy mood when we do have to interfere.

Just as important as our anxious feelings in tying a child to us are the feelings of delight we're apt to experience so very strongly in bringing up our first. When he smiles his first real smile, we are greedy for more. It's hard not to tickle him too much when we've heard his first belly laugh. We intimately share with him his discovery of his toes, his accomplishment in pat-a-cake, his pride in walking, his amazement at hearing his father's voice coming out of the telephone, his fascination with the first dog or cat he meets. As he becomes a little older, we can't wait to show him the zoo, the circus, a steam shovel in operation. The father is apt to buy electric trains about two years too soon and to get into enthusiastic demonstrations that would be more appropriate five years later.

All parents get down to the level of each of their children, occasionally, to play with them and to show them the wonders of the world. They wouldn't be ideal parents if they couldn't. This is good for parents and good for children.

But the problem of most of us, as we approach parenthood for the first time, is that we have such an accumulation of pent-up feelings—anxious uncertainty and joyful anticipation—that they come tumbling out in a flood to greet the first. Another way to say it is that to a certain extent we feel as though we are about to lead our lives all over again through our first child, with all the worries we developed while we were growing up (about our inadequacies and our naughtiness), and with all the hopes and ambitions we did realize and didn't realize in ourselves. Our first child is ourselves. We can't take him casually any more than we can take ourselves casually. No wonder it's something of a strain. (At its worst it's something like repeating an examination for a driver's license after you failed part of it the first time.)

So far, this has been all theoretical discussion and not much practical help. I don't think there is any magical way to bring up a first child with the relaxation you will probably achieve with a second or third. Worry seems to go along with learning anything new. We've never found a way to teach medical students without their becoming anxious at one stage or another, and it must be the same with students of law, divinity, aviation, watchmaking, schoolteaching and all the rest. Probably the most comfortable way to learn anything is in small doses from childhood on. This may be the main reason why farmers' sons follow in their fathers' footsteps more often than the sons of any other occupational group. To grow up in a pleasant family with a number of younger children is much the best way to learn child care, but it can't always be arranged.

However, I do think there are a number of practical steps that new parents can keep in mind that will lessen the chances of the baby's becoming too dependent. Fortunately, in the first three months of life babies are least aware of whether their parents are nervous or not. They're too preoccupied with their inner feelings—of hunger or sleepiness or colic.

From about three months on, they seem much more interested in the outside world. Colic is usually about over, thank goodness, and it shouldn't be necessary for the parents to be carrying the baby all evening. If he has developed the habit of expecting this, it can always be broken by letting him cry briefly for a couple of nights. It rarely takes longer than twenty minutes the first night and five minutes

CONTINUED ON PAGE 20

IMPORTANT SKIN DISCOVERY FROM JOHNSON & JOHNSON

The first truly effective Medicated Powder

FOR BABY...AND ALL THE FAMILY

For diaper rash, chafing, urine scald

Only powder that clears up and prevents even "problem" diaper rash

New, exclusive Johnson's formula stops not only ordinary diaper rash caused by wet-diaper friction—but sore, difficult ammonia dermatitis.

Clears up rashes completely—prevents their return. Ends ammonia diaper odor, too. No other powder can give your baby this sure, soothing protection.

For heat rash, bites, minor skin irritations

Stops more kinds of skin irritations than any other medicated powder

The special formula contains two antiseptics...clears up really stubborn rashes as well as simple chafing.

And you can feel completely at ease when you use this medicated powder on the baby or children. For it has been hospital-tested, hospital-proved completely safe for the most sensitive skin.

For girdle chafe, feet, underarms

Exclusive absorbent action keeps skin cool, dry—in hottest weather

The moment you smooth on Johnson's Medicated Powder, your skin will feel cooler, more comfortable. Its thirsty absorbing agents dry up moisture fast.

And it's the pleasantest medicated powder you can use. Silky-soft, never gritty—clings gently—smells fresh and clean. Get a can for your family today!

4 ounces, 49¢

NEW Johnson's Medicated Powder

The 26th in a Series of Advertisements Presented by New York Life to Help Guide America's Children to a Better Future

Should your child be an Engineer?

Against the backdrop of the NACA transonic wind tunnel at Langley Field, Virginia, stand two young engineers. The abstract patterns seem to symbolize the dramatic role played by today's engineer in the never-ending drive toward technological progress. It is he who translates dreaming into doing . . . he to whom the future promises its greatest challenge.

by T. Keith Glennan

President of Case Institute of Technology, Cleveland, Ohio

(As told to OSCAR SCHISGALL)

HUNDREDS OF THEM, all engineers, had gathered for their fifth annual alumni reunion. There was the usual exuberance of shoulder-thumping and hand-shaking, with everybody saying to everybody else, "You old so-and-so, what are you doing these days?"

I wandered from one cheerful group to another, and here are some of the answers I caught:

"I'm out on the desert. Missile testing outfit."

"I'm laying out a shoe factory in Binghamton."

"I'm down in Maracaibo. Drilling for oil under the sea."

"I'm in the research lab of an Ohio plastics plant."

"I'm with a dredging outfit. Widening a river channel."

"I'm with a TV company. Working on color."

"I'm in construction. We're putting up two Park Avenue skyscrapers in New York."

"I'm in air conditioning."

"I'm in ceramics. Developing new kinds of building materials."

So it went: never the same answer twice. And this was revealing.

Only a few years ago the question, "Should your child be an engineer?" would evoke the image of a young man signaling from a tripod in mid-street, or perhaps of an older man supervising the construction of a bridge. I suppose these visualizations are still valid. But if you plan to consider the work of an engineer in our time, you will have to picture him in hundreds of different roles. For the word "engineer" has come to mean almost as many different occupations as there are industries.

Certainly the engineer who works on aircraft design is hardly the same fellow who, as an industrial engineer, builds a vast new conveyor system into an automotive plant; nor has he much in common with the chemical engineer, the nuclear engineer, or any of the other scores upon scores of engineering specialists I could name.

Believe it or not, there are more than 150 different organizations of American engineers, each devoted to its own specialized interest!

So when we ask today, "Should your child be an engineer?" we are really asking whether he should be a trained expert in some aspect of modern technology.

The scientists and engineers have become key figures in our modern industrial society. And this is only the dawn of their heyday. Scientific progress is constantly opening up new horizons, bringing new needs, new opportunities. In this era of mass production there is virtually no industry which does not require the skills and services of engineers.

Food? The growth of the frozen food business, as an example, has created countless demands for engineering know-how. Better methods of refrigeration in transit, better ways of storing and freezing at home—these and other improvements all depend on the ingenuity of engineers.

Clothing? The development of synthetic fabrics has brought new challenges and new opportunities to chemical engineers. Chemistry has, in fact, become one of the most important factors in the giant textile industry, producing countless new plants and thousands of new jobs.

Homes? Modern techniques not only in building and in architecture, but in heating, in air conditioning, in every aspect of electrification—all these call for the skill of engineers.

Communications? Without engineers there would be no television, no radio, no telephones, no telegraph lines, no cables.

"In this era of technology," I have heard it said, "engineering furnishes the basic training for almost any industrial career you can mention." And that is emphatically true.

People often ask me what is included in an academic program leading to a degree in engineering. They ask, "Isn't an engineering course basically a narrow one?" The answer, of course, is that the modern engineering curricula are so constructed as to provide an excellent and quite broad preparation for an effective life in a technological society such as ours.

Mathematics, physics, and chemistry are still the bedrock courses for the future engineer; without them he cannot go very far. The more of them he can get during his high school and college years, the better. But these must be regarded only as a begininng.

The fact that future engineers will enter every walk of life makes it necessary for these students to have, in addition to concentration in the natural sciences and the art and practice of engineering, a fine liberal education in the humanities. I am happy to say that most of our great institutes of technology and engineering colleges have recognized this. They have broadened their curricula to include substantial blocks of time for studies in the humanities and social sciences.

Naturally, what most young people want to know about engineering is this: Is it a good profession? Does it pay well? Does it offer wide opportunities for creative activity and for responsible leadership?

Frankly, I know of no profession that offers more today.

Look at the advertisements in our metropolitan newspapers. I do not mean only the classified help-wanted columns; I mean the big display ads inserted by countless firms that employ engineers. They plead with engineering students to come for interviews and conferences. They hang out the inducements of good pay (including such fringe benefits as retirement plans and group insurance), and good living conditions. Never before, as far back as I can remember, has industry competed so militantly for the services of young engineers.

As a result of this demand, no matter what branch of work the graduate of an engineering college may enter, he can count on earning at least $5,000 a year to start. Some men who are trained in specialties or who are willing to travel will command even higher salaries.

Moreover, the man with a master's degree can begin at $7,500; and a Ph.D can easily earn $9,000.

And what is the limit on earnings? There is no limit except ability and willingness to accept responsibility. Increasingly, in this age of technology, the engineer is being called on to assume top supervisory and managerial jobs in his own and allied fields. When he reaches executive levels, the engineer can go to any figure—salaries of $35,000 and more are no longer uncommon.

Another point to remember: Though I have no wish to be an alarmist, I must emphasize the fact that our country is competing against communist Russia for leadership, not only in such areas as aviation, atomic weapon development, and guided missiles, but also in almost every type of commercial production, including the peaceful use of the atom. So our national future may well depend on the quality and the number of our engineers. And Russian schools are reported to be graduating approximately double the number of new engineers that ours are.

This is a point to ponder soberly when thinking of a career. We in America need every engineer we can produce.

That brings up the question of women in the profession. Until now women have played a quiet role in engineering. For the most part they have served as laboratory technicians and research assistants. But I believe this is bound to change.

Probably no single field offers a broader choice of occupation than engineering. Every industry from steelmaking to papermaking, every locale from offshore drilling rig to city skyscraper can hold an assignment for the graduate engineer.

Recently the National Society of Professional Engineers queried several hundred leading firms on their attitude toward employing women engineers. The replies indicated that 65% of the firms would gladly hire women if they were available; and 23% of them already have women on their staffs.

Perhaps the future is brighter than women realize.

How long will the present demand for engineers continue? The need will go on, I believe, for generations. Our population is constantly increasing. By the end of the century we will probably be a nation of over 200,000,000. This growth, especially in a technological era which almost daily provides new ideas and new machines, will require more and more engineers. They are the most widely needed servants of such an age.

Also, our defense program seems destined to continue indefinitely. This means a great number of engineers must devote their time to research, planning, and development in connection with our military arsenal. As a result, there will continue to be a scarcity of engineering talent to meet the demands of private industry.

So when one asks, "Should my child be an engineer?" one can be sure that engineers are needed today and that their opportunities will be widespread and alluring.

What must be considered is not so much the attractions of the profession—these exist in abundance—but rather the skills, the aptitudes, the likes of the child.

If a youngster's great love is music, for example, one need hardly argue the point that he should follow a musical career; it would be worse than futile to reshape the child's temperament, forcing him into engineering or any other calling. The first criterion to consider is:

Does the child have a natural aptitude for the sciences?

Does he love to cope with the challenge that a scientific problem tosses at his imagination?

Is he skillful in mathematics, physics, chemistry?

Is the science department of his school the one to which he naturally gravitates?

Are his extra-curricular activities apt to lie with science clubs and similar experimental groups?

Does he love to read about scientific advances?

These are the considerations to be weighed. If a child meets the test of such questions with affirmatives on the side of science, then the chances are he will find engineering a satisfying, rewarding and always adventurous career.

nylic

HOW TO HELP YOUR CHILD HAVE THE CAREER HE WANTS

Many factors will enter into your child's choice of a career: his interests, his ambitions, his abilities, the counsel he receives from teachers, friends and family. But, most of all, it will depend on his opportunities to get the training he needs to enter the field of his choice.

Even though his college days are still years away, it's never too soon to start making sure that your child will have the opportunity to continue his education when the time comes.

Your New York Life agent has chosen as his career the business of helping families plan for the future—for education, for retirement, for all the things which life insurance helps make possible. Through training and experience he has become a highly qualified specialist. You'll find him both able and willing to help you.

Booklets available on many careers

This article on Engineering is one of a continuing series on career opportunities for young men and women. Thus far, similar articles have been prepared on Newspapering, Law, Medicine, Accounting, Teaching, Architecture, Aeronautical Engineering, Electronic Engineering, Public Service, Farming, Chemistry, Selling, Nursing, Starting a Business of Your Own, Pharmacy, Dentistry, Banking, Printing, Home Economics, the Mineral Industry, Personnel Work, Retailing, Atomic Science, Librarianship and the Armed Forces. Each is available in booklet form and will be sent to you on request. You'll also find additional help in our free booklet, "The Cost of Four Years at College." Just drop a postcard to:

NEW YORK LIFE
Insurance Company
51 Madison Ave., Dept. 26-J, New York 10, N. Y.

The New York Life Agent in Your Community is a Good Man to Know
Copyright 1957, New York Life Insurance Company

"There's a new Tonette!
It's really care-free!
Less work for Mommy!
More fun for me!"

Look! A Double-Easy Applicator with New Care-Free Tonette! It's made just for little girls. No skips! No drips! Tonette waves so carefully, so neatly . . . curls stay care-free for months and months . . . without pincurls every day! It's the one children's home permanent that's completely care-free! Give your little girl a New Care-Free Tonette, too!

Special Introductory Offer!

$1.50 value New Care-Free Tonette
$1.00 value Double-Easy Applicator
$2.50 value . . . Now only $1.79

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping
COMMENDED by the CONSUMER SERVICE BUREAU of PARENTS' MAGAZINE

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 16

the second. This is painful for the parents to carry out, but when they see how well it works, they are convinced it is right. This successful experience in separation teaches the baby that he doesn't need to be so dependent on his mother and father and it emancipates them from their own overprotectiveness.

My own preference is that a baby should be on a fairly regular feeding schedule, at least by three months of age, and in practically all cases a mother can gently educate her baby's digestion to this by waking him up if necessary when the hour arrives and by steadily stretching the interval to four hours if he was a frequent feeder to start with. I don't mean at all that an irregular, frequent schedule will always lead to dependence. What matters is the mother's state of mind. I do think that an insecure mother who hurries to the baby each time he stirs not only keeps him trained to frequency and irregularity, but she teaches him that he needs her quickly whenever he's the least bit uncomfortable. She keeps her protectiveness at a high pitch for many months. This helps to explain why some babies are still waking for a couple of night feedings in the latter part of the first year, which is certainly not necessary from a nutritional point of view. When a baby and mother are accustomed to a regular schedule by two or three months, each has developed a trust in the other's dependability and a certain independence in himself.

I think that a very crucial period for fostering either independence or dependence is the last half of the first year. Now a baby is able to sit up and, a little later, to creep and to stand. His natural interest runs to handling objects all his waking hours: rattles, strings of beads, kitchen utensils, woolly toys, magazines. His wakeful periods have increased to several hours a day and he will keep himself busy and happy most of this time exploring around or, if he is in the playpen, putting toys out through the slats and retrieving them. He passes things from hand to hand, tastes them, chews on them. He has a moderate appreciation of company, especially his mother's, and tends to crawl back, from time to time, to the room she is in, as if to replenish his security. It's common for a mother of a first child to complain toward the end of the year that he cries each time she leaves the room, and this suggests how easily a small child picks up a bit of overconcern in a parent and matches it with a bit of overdependence.

D D D D D D

As we grow better we meet better people. ELBERT HUBBARD

D D D D D D

A few parents get into quite a jam with the first baby in this six-to-twelve-month period if they are too unsure of themselves to be able to resist his demands for attention—night or day—or can't resist the temptation to play with him most of his waking hours.

Some babies who previously have been sleeping soundly all through the night begin to be wakeful around the middle of the first year. This may start with a bad cold or ear infection which alarms the parents and makes them quick to run in to pick him up on subsequent nights, if he whimpers or stirs. Sometimes it seems to be just teething that causes the waking. But if a baby learns that by crying he can always get picked up and given a bottle and a sociable time, and if he finds that by increasing his demands he can always bully his parents into prolonging the midnight party, he may eventually have his parents up for an hour and a half, two or three times each night. This is exhausting for everybody. The sequence here is that the baby's discomfort or illness stirs up the parents' anxiety. The parents' anxiety, expressed in hurrying in to pick him up, convinces him that he is really in desperate need of being rescued from his lonely bed. The parents' submissiveness feeds his demandingness. It doesn't take long for the parents to become resentful of the hard life he's giving them, but they don't know

CONTINUED ON PAGE 23

"My doctor prefers St. Joseph Aspirin for Children's accurate dosage" says MRS. A. D. STEINTHAL, New York

St. Joseph Aspirin For Children is approved by more doctors than any other brand. Mothers trust its safe, gentle action, children like its pure orange flavor. This specialized tablet is America's mother-and-child favorite! Only the best is good enough for your child. Look for the trusted "St. Joseph" name.

World's Largest Selling Aspirin For Children

"...for adult needs, I insist on St. Joseph Aspirin"

200 Tablets 79c • 100 Tablets 49c • 12 Tablets 12c

New 1957 4-STYLE CHRISTMAS ASSORTMENT OF 24 CARDS

FREE SAMPLES Name Imprinted Christmas Cards

Make $50, $75, $100 Extra Money
Start a GREETING CARD & GIFT SHOP at home

Show friends New Ideas in Christmas, All Occasion greeting card assortments, gift wrappings, home and gift items. It's easy — it's fun! Profits to $1.00 per box. Bonus. Write for Free Trial Outfit of Feature boxes on approval. Free Catalog, Selling Guide, all details and Sensational Free Offer.

NEW ENGLAND ART PUBLISHERS
North Abington 867, Mass.

DISCOURAGE THUMB SUCKING NAIL BITING

THUM TRADE MARK

Just Paint on Fingertips
60c at your drug store

TUMS for ACID INDIGESTION-HEARTBURN
10¢
QUICK RELIEF
Always carry Tums for top-speed relief of acid distress. No mixing, no waiting. Take Tums anywhere.

HAT BY JOHN FREDERICS

You'll wish you could wear them . . .

the fabulous Wamsutta Heritage "400". . . haute couture of the towel world. Wamsutta "400's" are superbly soft and deep, woven of fine combed cotton. You'll treasure these magnificent towels for years. See them in your favorite linen department in Siamese pink, pink carnation, aqua, yellow, rose, blue, grey, cinnamon, charcoal, light green or white.

August White Sale Priced $2.98, regularly $4.98. You save $2 each (bath size) on the most luxurious towels you can own.

Wamsutta® HERITAGE TOWELS

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping — Replacement or Refund of Money if Not as Advertised Therein

WAMSUTTA MILLS, Linens and Domestics, Dept. T20, 1430 Broadway, New York 18, N.Y. Division of M. Lowenstein & Sons, Inc.

By the makers of famous Wamsutta Supercale® and Debucale® by Wamsutta sheets and pillowcases.

Fragile ... handle with Johnson's

YOUR BABY'S DELICATE SKIN needs the safe, lasting protection of Johnson's Baby Powder. It's the powder that Chafe-Guards baby's skin—even when wet. Purest, most trusted baby powder in the world.

THAT PRECIOUS SKIN NEEDS gentle cleansing, too—with Johnson's Baby Oil. It's the purest oil of all, specially blended with lanolin to soothe and soften baby's skin. Favorite with mothers everywhere.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 20

ust what to blame him for. They feel ashamed f their angriness and submit further.

This nightly waking can be cured in a cou- le of nights if the parents can be convinced hat it's no better for the baby than it is for hem. They must stop going in to him, even nce. After a few minutes of loud crying he ealizes there's nothing to be gained and falls sleep. He will also be reassured by the non- ppearance of his parents that they must be- eve there is nothing to be afraid of after all.

Daytime dependence on the part of a baby an creep up on a mother who is either too elighted to play with him constantly or too nsure of herself to refuse. The first type is pt to turn into the second in a few weeks or nonths. Soon after the baby wakes in mid- fternoon the mother gets involved in games ike "This is the way the farmer rides" or eekaboo or pat-a-cake or dancing to music r just carrying him around in her arms. here's almost continuous conversation. After few weeks of this, a baby is apt to lose most f his ability to amuse himself. When his nother, tired out, tries to set him down, he himpers immediately and stretches out his rms. If she can never resist the appeal, it's s if she were saying to him, "You're right, 's lonely and perhaps dangerous to be any- here else than in your mother's arms." I hink, too, that the resentment that's ac- umulating inside her—at having to be a lave—probably gets through to him. It makes im uneasy, but it also challenges him to bully er again.

Naturally a mother wants to play with her aby at times, and to talk to him as she goes bout her activities. But it generally works etter to save most of the play together until he end of the wakeful period. And when she as played with him at other times, she needs o have enough assurance to get back to her ork or her reading without apology. If he ries, she should remind herself that there is o realistic cause for her to feel anxious or uilty, and cheerfully tell him off.

When a baby has become intensely de- endent, the process of mutual emancipation ay be quite painful and drawn out—but it hould be undertaken. The mother may need upport from a psychiatrist or a family agency. he'll have to develop strong nerves to ignore he wails while she insists on going about her usiness. A practical point, when she does ave time for play, is to sit down on the floor vith the baby. Then if he ever becomes bored vith standing in her lap, he can crawl away. But if she picks him up, there'll always be rouble when she sets him down again.

In the second year the child is even more at fork in the road as between independence nd dependence. He can walk now and he has he urge to explore in ever-widening circles. He is much more interested in other people nd children as separate personalities. He will vant to approach them and make friends, in a simple fashion. (He holds things out to them and then takes them back, or he piles countless objects in their laps.) On the other hand, he becomes even more aware of his dependence on his mother for his security and rushes to her when hurt or frightened. In regard to strangers, he must have time to size them up before he approaches them. If they crowd him too soon, it pushes him back to his mother's skirts.

It is certainly important for the development of his independence that he and his mother not become involved in feeding problems, toilet-training struggles and disciplinary issues. In conflicts in these areas the child and mother get tightly tied to each other with bonds which are partly hostile, partly anxious and partly guilty. They can't get along together, but they can't forget each other or leave each other alone. These are complicated, special problems which I have discussed separately at other times.

At a more simple level there are two procedures that a mother can keep in mind, especially if she senses a tendency to overprotectiveness in herself. The first is to resist the impulse to jump to the child's rescue whenever he gets himself involved in mildly dangerous maneuvers like climbing up on chairs or crawling into cupboards. If left to himself, he can usually solve these problems. If the mother anxiously rushes to his rescue, it convinces him that there are dangers all about and that he needs a mother's constant attention to survive.

The other method is to take him daily, if possible, where other small children play. Then he can learn how many kinds there are in the human race, that children are noisy and rough and often mean compared with adults, but that despite this they are the most fun of all to be with. Here again the protective mother may find herself watching him constantly and springing to his protection if he appears to be menaced by another child. Of course she should interfere if the danger is real or if he is being increasingly intimidated by a bully. She may even have to pick another playground. But first she should give him a reasonable opportunity to learn how to defend himself in minor squabbles. This is what she will see other mothers doing and will come more naturally to her when she has her second.

I think that a majority of us will continue to tend to make our first-born somewhat dependent, because that's the way we're made, but that by being aware of the more common pitfalls we can hold this to a reasonable minimum. It's also comforting to remember that though mild overdependence in a child may make his adjustment to life a little more difficult, it may well develop special types of sensitiveness and understanding in him which will be valuable to the world.

Dr. Spock regrets that it is impossible for him to answer letters personally. However, he is delighted to receive suggestions of topics of truly general interest.—Ed.

"But in school we used dolls—not wiggly babies!"

hints collected by Mrs. Dan Gerber, mother of five bringing up baby®

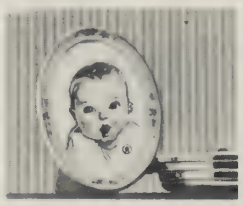
new protein cereal for baby

Because babies grow so very fast, they need 3 to 4 times as much protein per pound of body weight as adults. The new Gerber High Protein Cereal provides a pleasant way to give baby extra protein in easy-to-digest form. The total protein (35%) is derived from oats, wheat, soy beans and yeast. In combination, these proteins provide truly effective "growing tools" for your active little one. And like all Gerber Cereals it's enriched with iron, calcium and B-vitamins.

Gerber High Protein Cereal has a toasted, nut-like flavor that is well accepted by babies and especially interesting to toddlers. It also provides appetizing variety when rotated with the 4 regular Gerber Cereals. And of course, it's pre-cooked and ready to serve with milk, formula or other liquids.

psychology dept. Another baby on the way? Here's one mother's solution for relieving those bound-to-be jealousy pangs. She bought her 2-year-old girl a new doll complete with miniature baby-care accessories: bath table, bottles, diapers, etc. A week or so before the new baby was due, she helped teach her daughter "baby care" for the doll. When the new baby arrived, the toddler was an accomplished little mother and took care of her "baby," while Mom tended to hers.

a water matter



Even though "dog days" are unbearably hot, cold water is not the answer for baby's sponge baths. Tepid water will leave him much more refreshed. A shade warmer than room temperature is just about right for tiny tykes.

refreshment unlimited A delightful pair for baby's sipping pleasure—Gerber Strained Apple Juice and Gerber Strained Orange Juice. The Apple Juice is sparkling clear, mildly sweet and delicate in flavor. Vitamin C has been added to make it a good nutritional alternate to Gerber Strained Orange Juice. The Orange Juice is made from tree-ripened fruit, specially selected for mild flavor and high vitamin-C content. Both are pasteurized and carefully strained for easy feeding.

sweet scent-iments Two fragrant tricks for sticky days; (1) Splash a bit of baby's oil into your tepid bath. It satinizes your skin . . . delicate scent is delightful. (2) Borrow a bit of baby's powder to ease on your girdle. Scent is nice and not too heavy for sticky days.

strong points "Meat for strength, and the building of all body structures" say the experts on infant nutrition. Gerber Strained and Junior Meats provide the vital, body-building proteins so necessary for baby's growth and development. Made from juicy, selected Armour cuts they're specially pressure cooked to preserve true-meat flavor and fine Armour quality. Special processing removes most of the fat and the coarse tissue for easy digestibility. 7 Strained varieties. 4 Junior Meats.

ARMOUR

babies are our business . . . our only business!

Gerber® BABY FOODS

FREMONT, MICH.

5 CEREALS • OVER 75 STRAINED & JUNIOR FOODS, INCLUDING MEATS

take it easy!
make it easy!

3 SURE
WAYS
TO MAKE
ICED COFFEE

a QUICK METHOD. Make extra-strength coffee by using ½ measuring cup (4 fluid ounces) of water for each Standard Measure (2 level tblsps.) of coffee — pour hot over ice cubes.

b PRE-COOLED. Make coffee: 1 Standard Measure (2 level tblsps.) to each 6-oz. cup of water. Cool in covered non-metal container. For freshest taste, serve within three hours. Pour over ice cubes.

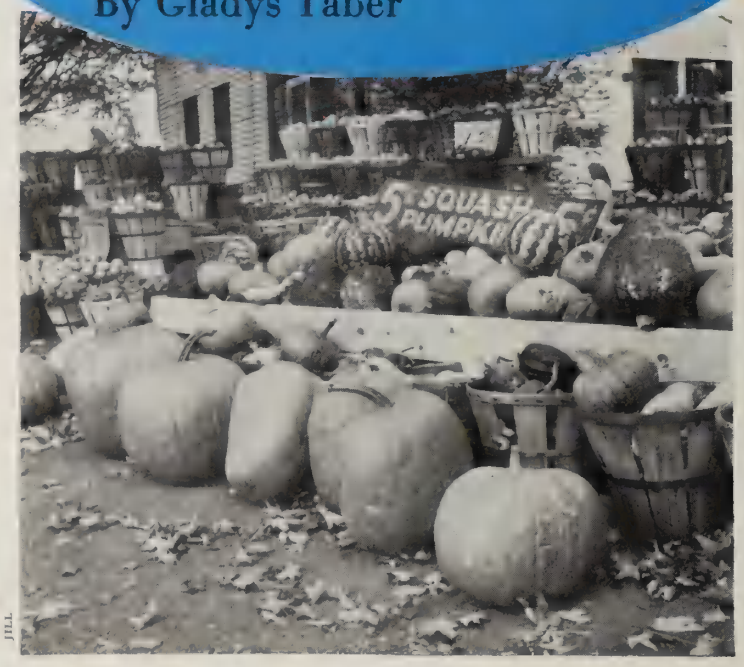
c INSTANT. Mix twice the usual amount of instant coffee with a little water (hot or cold, according to brand) — add ice cubes, fill glass with cold water.

HINT In refrigerator trays, freeze regular strength coffee into cubes — pour fresh coffee over them. Delicious — and no dilution!

NEW ZEST FOR SUMMER!

Iced Coffee Nectar

Take 2¼ cups strong cold coffee,
1 tblsp. Angostura bitters,
1 pint coffee ice cream
— beat together in bowl or electric blender until smooth and creamy.
Serves 3 or 4.



PAN-AMERICAN COFFEE BUREAU
120 WALL STREET, NEW YORK 5, N. Y.
Brazil • Colombia • Costa Rica • Cuba • Dominican Republic
Ecuador • El Salvador • Guatemala • Honduras • Mexico • Venezuela

© 1957, Pan American Coffee Bureau

DIARY of DOMESTICITY

By Gladys Taber

JILL

The abundance of August arrives at Stillmeadow.

Now the turning wheel of the seasons rolls slowly. The air is dreamy, people walk without hurry. Even the haying lacks the feverish haste of early summer, for the barns are nearly full. Pumpkins and squash are comfortable in the hot sun, corn silk darkens. The song of summer, which is the music of the cicadas, sounds all night long.

This is a hiatus between the hard work of June and July and the brisk autumn days packed with chores to do before the first snow. Nature and man both move on a light rein these slow, lazy days. It is for both a restoring time.

The garden takes less weeding, the lawn less mowing, the dogs less shampooing (no mud in August!).

I wonder whether the fact that most vacations come now is because of the heat or because it is the natural time to relax, to look at one's life, reflect on what we have done, what we might do. And to dream. I have read that energy is highest on the brisk days of October, and for me this is true. I am full of projects in autumn—many of them unnecessary, to be sure, but all requiring bustling about. Now I am satisfied to take a cool swim, bake briefly on the bank of the pond, and swim again. It does not, now, seem vital that I wash windows.

Jill remarks that the kennel latches must be repaired, but she puts it off. For one thing, she has to finish reading The Tudor Wench, which Elswyth Thane sent us.

Summer reading is supposed to be light, but I think it is the time for solid fare. I take my light reading when I have to jump up and down every twenty minutes, and save the serious books for the days when we can sit under the old apple trees an hour or more at a time. For me, Winston Churchill is August enjoyment.

This is salad time supreme. By planting lettuce in succession, we have the makings of a crisp salad bowl all summer long. Oak Leaf is a fine variety, my choice. You can't buy it in a market, as it is perishable to the nth degree. Bibb is a standard. Jill likes Prize Head. She plants every two weeks, and thins as needed. We eat the tiny leaves of the plants she thins out too. If it is dry, she soaks the ground thoroughly before putting in the new planting.

Store lettuce we consider edible when it is snowing. But the flavor of market stuff is not comparable at all to freshly picked home-grown lettuce, and this is nobody's fault. Lettuce is just one of those things, like sweet corn, that do not take to sitting around.

We tried inland cress a few years, but it was not like real water cress. We tried for years to "catch" water cress in our pond, in the brook. Jill planted seeds, planted plants, went upstream in the ferny woods to where the flow was light. Went downstream below the dam. Set the cress in wire cages to keep floods from washing it away. Weighed some down with stones, just barely at the water's edge. But nothing ever came of it. Either its feet got too dry or it got washed down and took off for the Sound, which is probably where our water eventually goes.

It is a wise gardener who knows when he or she is licked. "Water cress," said Jill finally, "is not for us."

There is no reason, for Steve and Olive have to clear it from their brook with rakes when it takes over. And their brook is just about like ours. But either the fall of the land is steeper in ours, or maybe we were just not meant to raise water cress.

We were telling this to Cliff Hirsch as we sat around drinking coffee one morning. "My goodness," said Cliff, "you want water cress?" The next morning he came with a whole pailful, fresh and succulent. "I got tons of it up the hill," he said, "a spring and brook. Grows all over." He promised to keep us in cress. Said he might as well get two pailfuls when he got one!

A nice change from tossed salads is a molded one, and this makes a nice main dish for a buffet supper on a hot Sunday night. It is eggs in aspic, and it is easy, but elegant. It calls for 2 envelopes unflavored gelatin, ½ cup cold water, 4 cups chicken broth, 8 eggs, 1 tablespoon tarragon (fresh or dried; if dried, use a bit more), ½ cup deviled ham or 1

CONTINUED ON PAGE 26

When it's picnic time...it's

Bean-time, U.S.A.

Every family picnic should include

VAN CAMP'S PORK & BEANS

The secret savory sauce is cooked in...Just heat...eat...enjoy!

Outsells the rest 'cause it tastes the best!

Now... you'll fly through housework!

Women clean house new way—without water!

Does away with pail, powder, water, soap, mess!
Hands don't even get wet!

Kitchen by Beautycraft

Spray on lacy white froth—dirt wipes right off... metal, painted woodwork, windows, porcelain

In the kitchen, in the bathroom...all through the house—Jet Bon Ami is a whiz for cleaning glass, glossy and painted surfaces! Simply spray! Wipe with a dry cloth! No water, powder or mess! No job at all! Windows, woodwork, chrome, tile—everything you clean sparkles and shines so much easier. A stingy bit of froth cleans better than a lot...spreads as you clean...wipes dry faster...very economical.

New Jet Bon Ami

© 1957, The Bon Ami Company—an affiliate of United Dye & Chemical Corporation

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 24

medium-sized can, mayonnaise. To make it, you soften the gelatin in the cold water, and then dissolve it in the boiling broth and cool. When it begins to set, put half of it in a flat glass baking dish (8½" x 11") or in 8 individual custard cups. Sprinkle the tarragon over. Poach the eggs until quite firm, trim the edges and let them cool. When the gelatin is slightly firm in the dish or cups, place the eggs in, and spread lightly with the deviled ham. Pour over the rest of the gelatin, and set in the refrigerator until firm. Turn out on a bed of salad greens. Season the mayonnaise with dry mustard and a pinch of chili powder.

This is supposed to serve eight, but when Cicely was here for the weekend it served only four. The chicken broth should be strong, because when it is jellied it tends to become more bland. If you use canned chicken consommé, spark it with a dash of Worcestershire or your favorite herbs. Water cress does no harm as a garnish. If you use this as a main dish for a summer buffet, serve cold sliced boiled ham and liverwurst with it on a separate platter (they take kindly to chicken and eggs). Mix enough mustard in the mayonnaise to give it a real punch. And have a good bowl of it for ladling. For company we serve tiny hot buttermilk biscuits with honey butter or our own grape jelly (I make it more tart than is usual).

The nice thing about this salad is that you make it the day before and let it rest in the refrigerator so you can rest the next day except for slicing the cold meat and doing the biscuits. There will not be a morsel for the cockers and Irish to lick, but Jonquil thankfully eats the extra bits of lettuce with that delectable mustard mayonnaise.

The phrase "apple-pie order" originated with the practices of a Puritan housewife, Hepzibah Merton, who used to bake three dozen apple pies to last the family through the week. She placed them on pantry shelves, labeling each pie according to the day on which it was to be eaten. Her pantry, so arranged, was said to be "in apple-pie order."

In any season, dusk is my special hour. I like the feeling that most of the day's work is over. And in the country, dusk is usually a still and lovely time. The cockers and Irish have been busy all day on their various rabbit deals and mole diggings, or in winter tracking everything that can be tracked. They doze comfortably, Sister snoring and Holly making those whiffling noises. Teddy lies like a frog, back legs flat out. Linda, who is a peripatetic person, has settled for a snooze on the terrace. Even Tiki has given up barking at the barn cats across the road, because the cats have gone to bed. Jonquil is wagging in her sleep. I always plan to sneak out at 1 A.M. and see if she is still wagging, but I am never awake to find out.

The ancient house breathes quietly. Jill is breathing heavily on the charcoal grill to get it glowing before the broilers go on (marinated in plain store-bought French dressing all afternoon).

"I suppose you never travel far," said a recent visitor.

I thought it over. Well, we do not travel far in a way. No far islands. But I travel as far as my mind can reach, any day, any time. I pick up my book, which is now Hal Borland's beautiful This Hill, This Valley. Many of his experiences as a countryman in Connecticut I share, but his horizon reaches into philosophy, history, science.

The night air is cool, and a small whisper of wind lifts my ruffled curtains. The smell of fresh-cut hay is vibrant. The cicadas sing. The moon will be up when we get the dishes washed, and the world will be a dream of silver.

And as the faint coolness overlays the heat of the day, I send my good night to whoever is around to hear it! END gives cottons that smart like-new look

LINIT® STARCH

Adds the finishing touch to dresses, shirts, curtains ...makes ironing easier, too!

"WHERE'LL I GET THE CASH?"

HOW many times have you asked yourself that question when you are faced with household expenses that have to be met? We would like to suggest an answer that can mean increased income for you.

By selling magazine subscriptions, you can earn generous commissions. Many of our representatives earn more than $1.50 an hour in their spare time—and you can do the same! Just send us your name and address on a postal, and you will receive our offer and easy-to-follow instructions.

CURTIS CIRCULATION COMPANY
999 Independence Square, Philadelphia 5, Pennsylvania

You must try it!

Jack and Jill® GELATIN DESSERT
■ New Taste Thrill!
M-m-m — so delicious! So different! Just like eating plump, fresh fruit. Instantly prepared. Positive setting. 6 mouth-watering flavors: Strawberry, Raspberry, Cherry, Orange, Lemon, Lime.
AT YOUR GROCERS

Always Ask for JACK and JILL GELATIN, the Aristocrat of All Gelatin Desserts.
Write for FREE SAMPLE and EXCITING NEW RECIPES
WILSON CHEMICAL COMPANY
Dept. L-8, Tyrone, Penna.

Slick trick for picnickers...

PACKABANANA!

Bananas...wholesome—and then some!

ckyard special: Kebababanana! For a sizzling good at, alternate chunks of banana on skewer with pieces of sweet and green pepper and meatballs wrapped in bacon. Grill.

Barbecue idea: Roastabanana! Remove strip of peel; brush fruit with butter. Place on grill and roast until peel is black and glossy, and the fruit tender — easily pierced with a fork.

It isn't a picnic without bananas — Nature's built-in convenience food!

- ...wrapped in Nature's own dust-proof, ant-proof package!
- ...no openers needed — just zip the peel and eat!
- ...a well-rounded supply of vitamins and minerals in every bite!
- ...everybody likes them 'cause they taste so good!

UNITED FRUIT COMPANY

Brush
Your Teeth with Colgate's...
Brush
Bad Breath Away!

And Colgate's with GARDOL
Fights Decay All Day, Too!

Colgate Dental Cream with Gardol stops mouth odor all day for most people . . . with just one brushing! Gives you that fresh-clean feeling that comes from brushing your teeth with Colgate Dental Cream.

And unlike other leading toothpastes,* Colgate Dental Cream contains Gardol to form an invisible, protective shield around your teeth that fights tooth decay all day . . . with just one brushing!

Gardol's invisible shield fights tooth decay all day . . . with just one brushing.

*THE TOP THREE BRANDS AFTER COLGATE'S.

Colgate's with GARDOL
CLEANS YOUR BREATH
WHILE IT CLEANS YOUR TEETH

THERE'S A MAN IN THE HOUSE

By HARLAN MILLER

MARTHA BLANCHARD

"I just added a bay leaf, paprika, a touch of garlic salt, some capers, a tiny bit of chili powder . . . and threw it out."

Do pretty girls ever get bored with their beauty? I notice a few in our town contrive to disguise it with frizzled angularity for the sake of that gaunt, offbeat "fashionable" look.

I salute the teen-age couple which manages somehow to appear worldly, blasé and sophisticated when walking along Main Street holding hands.

Once upon a time I was a baby myself. Maybe that's why I'm anguished when I see doting admirers breathe into a helpless baby's nose and mouth. If it could only punch them with a baby fist!

While I watched our Air Force's drenching display of fire power, an odd notion tickled me: Will the Russians ever erect in Red Square a statue to the American airman, because he deterred them from triggering a foolish war?

At the summer resorts I observe an axiom I wish the womenfolk might whisper to their beauticians: "The richer or more desirable a woman's man, the simpler her hairdo."

"I'm often relaxed when I discuss children with other mothers," murmurs Betty Comfort, giving her potted pink geraniums a pill. "I discover to my surprise that our kids are no worse than others."

As substitute for the vanishing guest room, I hope our married children will someday install, far in the rear of their back yards, the water, sewer and electricity connections for a "mother-in-law" house trailer. (Only for short visits, of course.)

My insurance salesman assures me men enjoy more longevity than ever before. Yet this rosier life expectancy doesn't prevent us from beginning to worry about dying twenty or twenty-five years earlier than gramp did.

In our crowd, conversation seems to improve when in a group of four, each person talks only one fifth of the time. (The other fifth might come in handy for meditation and silence.) But alas, each of us tends to talk one third of the time.

I've found a jewel of a plastics man who helps me contrive all sorts of brave-new-world gadgets. Irked for years by an opaque steel lamp shade in my Dream Girl's bedroom, I replaced it with a translucent ivory shade with gold stars. Her old one (with his help) is now a wastebasket.

Our neighbor's son wants to split his college education three ways—two years each in an Eastern, a Midwestern and a Far Western university. Wonderful, as long as dad's dough holds out: I wish I could have done that.

How the family gangs up on pa! It's a splendid modern American tradition. Keeps him on his mettle, unsmug. A few men have low moments when they fear it'd be O.K. with their families if they'd mail their salaries home.

We rarely admit it to our wives, but mature men on planes and trains confide to each other how influential in their careers was luck. (Biggest stroke of luck, of course: when we married our wives.) Half a career is the way the ball bounces.

My neighbor in the brick colonial is helping his son-in-law buy carpet for their new house. "I think a thousand dollars in their twenties," he philosophizes, "means more than a cool ten thousand in their forties."

"I'm bored by drunks," confides Peter Comfort, stowing a case of empties from a party in his station wagon. "They're a pain, seldom witty, never gay. Apparently they regain some wit and gaiety when they join AA."

A savant in New Orleans sent me a list of 560 musical compositions restful or soothing, from Brahms to Bartok. Maybe we moderns don't need any more the 100-piece musical thunder and cannonade that relieved the tedium of Wagner's heyday.

On a deep summer night one of life's memorable adventures is to lie on your back on the grass for an hour, gazing up at a starry sky, till the stars seem only treetop high.

How often I've found a $7000 colonel the equal of a $35,000 executive, or a $10,000 general as brilliant as a $50,000 tycoon! My answer is like John Marquand's: Military men unconsciously care less for money, more for glory.

I'm baffled by what a high-school girl calls a "date." If a girl "goes steady" (exclusively) with a boy, and dates no other boy, yet spends six or seven hours with another boy, she doesn't call that a date. If not, then what is it, an endurance test?

"How can I compete," asked the boy next door, "with the supermen, the big brains, for the top jobs?"

"Huh?" I exclaimed. "Those jobs are filled with men who used to ask themselves the same question."

For years our town's more solvent people have argued whether a winter vacation is better than a summer vacation. They can't quite make up their minds, so they take both.

Let your hair down; dinner-table chatter can be fascinating. The enchanting creature at my left confessed she recently conked her husband on the head with a long-handled bath brush. The ravishing gumdrop on my right recalled she once struck her husband with a loaded picnic basket.

Fate has surrounded me with family and friends who all seem to like their meat raw, rare or medium rare. I like it well done. Imagine my glee, on a tour of airbases, to learn that 80 per cent plus of all enlisted men prefer meat well done.

I'm the type who can't remember any funny story except the last one I've heard. So it delights me when I catch our town's most gifted storyteller dishing at a cocktail party an anecdote fresh from Bennett Cerf's third-from-the-last joke book.

At country-club dances this summer a man can't be too careful. The college girls are cultivating a Madame Bovary look and the maturer matrons act more like Françoise Sagan, a drippy nineteen.

I know a neighborhood merchant who's sure to win: he cheats a little on the weight, charges a few cents more, and invariably makes mistakes in arithmetic in favor of the house. A triple-threat man.

. . . When the whole family bursts into a salvo of laughter at one of my tales,

. . . Or my wife forgives my follies as if I were a blood relative,

. . . And a friend tells me of Junior's singular sense of responsibility,

. . . And my son-in-law writes me a two-page single-spaced letter,

. . . And I even get a word of approval from my youngest son and severest critic,

. . . Then my cup overfloweth and I tell myself, "Senior, you've got 'em fooled."

CANNON PERCALES are different—three important ways:

Easier bedmaking! Prettier beds! Longer wear!

Cannon Percales are Combspun! No other percales are. You see the difference in their unusual beauty, feel it in their luxuriously soft texture. And year after year you notice the difference Combspun makes in long, long wear.

Cannon fitted sheets have Ezy-matic Corners! No other fitted sheets do. They slip easily over all four corners without mattress lifting, stay comfortably smooth, wrinkle-free—never need retucking.

Cannon Percales come in such lovely variety! Combine white or colorful pastels with gay woven stripes or exquisite flower prints. All are certified colorfast by the American Institute of Laundering.

Good news! Cannon Combspun Percales are sale-priced now at department stores

Cannon Mills, Inc., 70 Worth Street, New York 13, N. Y. • Towels • Sheets • Bedspreads • Draperies • Stockings • Terry Cloth

TRADE MARK REG. U.S.A. CANNON

CYD CHARISSE co-starring in "SILK STOCKINGS"

AN ARTHUR FREED PRODUCTION FOR MGM RELEASE IN CINEMASCOPE AND METROCOLOR

Every time you walk into a room you're on stage!

That's true for Cyd Charisse and every girl. That's why a soft lovely complexion is a must. That's why she uses Lux and that's why you should, too!

Your audience is waiting—and don't you know it! So you always look wonderful, with a complexion that's soft and smooth . . . a Lux Complexion. Lux, with its rich Cosmetic lather, its mild and gentle ways, can do as much for you as it does for any Hollywood star. And the Lux fragrance, best-liked soap perfume in the world, is sure to please you, too.

Lever Brothers unconditionally guarantees that you'll decide Lux Soap is perfect for you, or you can have your money back. For a complexion you'll love—and he'll love, too—use Lux.

Now Lux comes in 4 lovely pastels, as well as pure white. Buy new color Lux by the color of its foil wrapper.

9 out of 10 Hollywood stars depend on LUX

HIGH SCHOOL IS WORTH WORKING FOR! ... Ozarks, Missouri

ROLAND PATTERSON

John and Lillian grew up, next-door neighbors, in a tiny Arkansas town. Now, making sacrifices to get an education, they look to a bright future.

Untapped Leadership

By MARGARET HICKEY

Colleges and universities will welcome some three and one half million students to their campuses this fall. Yet, because their ability and interests were not developed during their high-school years, many of the ablest young people will never go to college.

"These individuals, capable of more education than they are receiving, are a serious wastage of the nation's talent," the Educational Policies Commission points out in a new report, Higher Education in a Decade of Decision.

What can be done to change this situation? The Educational Testing Service suggests a nationwide testing program for eighth- and ninth-graders to discover hidden talent. One such program already is under way in Junior High School 43 in New York City, where students who have scored low on current tests largely because of their social and economic backgrounds are given new experimental tests to show their actual potential. This potential then is developed through special courses, intensive guidance and stimulation. Other communities now can get consultation and technical assistance to help gifted youth from underprivileged homes—regardless of race, creed or sex—through the new community self-service in talent-searching program of the National Scholarship Service and Fund for Negro Students.

Chicago's Bryn Mawr School, which organized a first-grade class of 30 high-I.Q. youngsters, reports that within two years the group was doing advanced fourth-grade work, plus additional library research and individual projects, taking tours and getting piano lessons.

How can gifted children be identified when they are young? Dr. Paul A. Witty, director of the Psycho-Educational Clinic, Northwestern University, suggests the following yardsticks: early and accurate use of a large vocabulary; keen observation and retention of facts; interest in calendars and in telling time; unusual ability to give sustained attention; curiosity about the cause of everything—and its effect; competence in drawing, painting, singing; proficiency in reading and a great liking for books.

When a child shows special talent, Doctor Witty counsels, parents and teachers should make every effort to guide and encourage him. Many potential leaders are in our classrooms today—they should not be neglected or overlooked. END

From the doorway of a two-room house on the crest of a mountain a thirteen-year-old boy looks out over miles of Ozark hills and ravines. It's a long hike across creeks and through brambles to the bus line which carries children to the public high school in the town thirty miles away. In the little grade school dampened clothing, disheveled hair and muddy shoes, even bare feet, were taken for granted. But that faraway high school is part of another world. What can this eighth-grade youngster, who cannot afford new clothes or books or school lunches, make of his life now?

Resolutely the boy turns back into the house, sits down at a table cut from rough boards and painstakingly scratches out a note, addresses it simply to: "School of the Ozarks, Point Lookout, Missouri."

This school, founded in 1906, for bright, ambitious hill children who might otherwise never get a high-school education, has opened its doors to thousands of such youngsters. Though they arrive without a cent, without a change of clothes and often in need of a balanced diet, all bring with them the determination to get an education. For here is a school—financed solely through voluntary contributions, without state or Federal aid—where they can work to pay all their expenses through high school and a new junior college.

Fifteen-year-old Elizabeth B——, one of the prettiest girls on campus, is the only one of an Arkansas farm family of sixteen children who had the chance to go to high school. Elizabeth's parents, who have neither electricity nor telephone in their home, could not afford to buy books or even the 25-cent daily lunch in the regular public school. But Elizabeth's eldest brother, determined that she should have an opportunity the others never had, persuaded his parents to let him take her to the School of the Ozarks. Though timid about leaving home for the first time, Elizabeth eagerly packed her few belongings, including sheets and pillowcases made from feed sacks, into two cardboard cartons and set off with her brother in the family truck for Point Lookout.

At the school Elizabeth found she was eligible for a $200 scholarship to cover a year's tuition—but that she must work 540 hours during the summer in return. To pay for her room and meals, she would be assigned 16 work hours a week during the school term. Extra hours could be put in for clothing and pin money.

The School of the Ozarks, according to its president, M. Graham Clark, puts into practice the theories that life is not a handout and that a busy child is a good child. Mr. Clark, a medium-tall man with graying wavy hair and the manner of a Southern gentleman, like many of the school's faculty members gave up more lucrative work elsewhere—he was a business executive in Atlanta—to accept the challenge offered at this school. Since coming to the school in 1946 he has been ordained a Presbyterian minister.

For most of the youngsters who enroll, hard work is nothing new. Dark-haired Margaret, seventeen, now in the school's junior college and on her way to becoming a mathematics teacher, got up at four every morning at home, helped milk twenty-six cows before boarding the bus for a ten-mile trip to her local school. After class there was little time for homework, with household chores and five brothers and sisters to look after. When her family lost its crops—corn, hay and alfalfa—in the drought that plagued the region for four years, the School of the Ozarks was her only opportunity for an education. Her scholarship paid by a kindergarten teacher at Jefferson City, Missouri, bent on encouraging a future teacher, she worked 540 hours making fruitcake for the school's annual cake sale. For her board and room she started, as do all freshman girls, by helping in the kitchen and dining hall, later waxed floors in the girls' dorm, now works as a file clerk in the guidance office. In addition she carries sixteen hours of school work in chemistry, algebra, history, rhetoric and geometry.

The school gives many other children a home, with emphasis on spiritual and moral training through required Bible study and church attendance. There are death, divorce, desertion and parental delinquency in the Ozarks too. When relatives are unable to take in a homeless child, department-of-welfare authorities more often than not turn to the School of the Ozarks. And many girls, because it is the only real home they have ever known, come back to be married in their dormitory living room or in the school chapel.

The school grew out of an appeal by a young CONTINUED ON PAGE 33

PRODUCT OF BRISTOL-MYERS

New MUM DEODORANT stops odor...without irritation

So gentle for any normal skin you can use it every day

If you've ever worried about underarm stinging or burning from using a deodorant daily—or right after shaving or a hot bath—you can set your mind at ease. New Mum Cream is so gentle for normal skin, you can use it whenever you please.

Mum Cream gives you the kind of protection you can't possibly get from any other leading deodorant—because it works a completely different way. Mum Cream is the only leading deodorant that works entirely by stopping odor . . . contains no astringent aluminum salts.

And it keeps on working actively to stop odor 24 hours a day with M-3—Mum's wonderful hexachlorophene that destroys both odor and odor-causing bacteria! When Mum is so effective—yet so safe—isn't it the deodorant for you? Try new Mum Cream today.

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

AMERICAN INSTITUTE OF LAUNDERING CERTIFIED

MUM® contains M-3 (bacteria-destroying hexachlorophene)

...stops odor 24 hours a da

3 TIMES MORE BRISTLES protect your gum line!

Gum troubles cause over ONE-THIRD of all tooth loss. But an Oral B carefully guards these sensitive tissues and cleans teeth effectively, too.

More than 2,500 smooth-top bristles of slender nylon make the difference. Let the gentle-action Oral B give you gum-line protection!

AT THE DRUG COUNTER . . . IN 3 SIZES FOR ALL THE FAMILY

Oral B TOOTHBRUSH

© ORAL B COMPANY
San Jose, California

CROOKED TOES?

his highly effective device soft, flexible rubber— r. Scholl's TOE-FLEX—tends to gradually raighten crooked or overlapping toes by exerting even outward pressure. Worn invisibly. Very com-rtable. Sizes, Small, Medium, Large. Only 75¢ each.

EXTRA MONEY

$50 TO $300 OR MORE
For Yourself or Group
Show Big Value
$1.00 and $1.25 Assortments of
CHRISTMAS AND EVERYDAY
GREETING CARDS
GIFT WRAPPINGS, STATIONERY, GIFTS

Show leading 21 card Christmas, Birthday, Get Well, Religious Assortments, Costume Jewelry, Household Items in full or spare time. No experience needed. Profits to 100%. Bonus. Write for Assortments On Approval, Free Album of Imprinted Christmas Cards, Free Gift Offer.

HEDENKAMP
361 Broadway, Dept. L-13
New York 13, N.Y.

21 Card Christmas $1.00
18 Card All Occasion Asst'l $1.00
FREE ALBUM OF IMPRINTS
Over 250 Best Sellers
Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping
FREE GIFT OFFER
$1.25 "Tiny TV" Salt and Pepper Set for PROMPT ACTION!

Tense, Nervous Headaches Need This Relief survey shows 3 out of 4 doctors recommend the mous ingredients of Anacin to relieve pain. Here's ny Anacin® gives better total effect in pain relief an aspirin or any buffered aspirin:

- ACTS INSTANTLY: Anacin goes to work instantly. Brings fast relief to source of your pain.
- MORE EFFECTIVE: Anacin is like a doctor's prescription. That is, Anacin contains not one, but a combination of medically proven ingredients.
- SAFER: Anacin simply can not upset your stomach.
- LESSENS TENSION: Anacin also reduces nervous tension, leaves you relaxed, feeling fine after pain goes. Buy Anacin Tablets today!

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 31

Presbyterian minister, the Rev. J. F. Forsythe, to the Missouri synod of his church in 1906. A home missionary in the Ozarks, Mr. Forsythe was impressed by the keen native intelligence of the people, and particularly the plight of the children with no education, no hope, no future. The church had no money to establish a school, but managed to obtain enough voluntary contributions from farmers and townspeople of Taney County to put up a single big stone building to serve as dormitories, classrooms, kitchen and dining room. The first year's enrollment was 35.

Since then word of the school's "earn and learn" policy has been carried back into the rugged Ozark country to youngsters eager to go to high school, and beyond the hills as well. With help from people all over the country, the School of the Ozarks has grown to a large community of some 80 buildings on a 1500-acre campus and an enrollment of 300. The school's daily operating expenses of approximately $700 are met by gifts from friends of the school—ranging from large sums to the "widow's mite." Some donors have given entire buildings. J. M. McDonald, vice president of the school's board of trustees, gave the hospital in memory of his wife, a nurse; Ralph L. Smith, president of a lumber company in Kansas City, gave the boys' dormitory; and the insurance of a lonely soldier who died in Korea paid for a staff cottage. Mrs. Annie Lee Parry, of Kansas City, pays for the operation of the home-economics department, and each autumn a

The young man who has not wept is a savage, and the old man who will not laugh is a fool.
GEORGE SANTAYANA

truckload of vegetables comes as a gift from a farmer in Minnesota. Many business people and teachers and clubs contribute tuition money for one or more students. Others send gifts of clothing or fabrics.

The school is located on the banks of the White River, just off the twisting, curving highway south from Springfield. Except in the little towns, the homes are few and far apart, set in deep valleys or perched off sloping trails. Money has always been scarce in this region. Extra jobs for the farmers who grow little patches of corn and other vegetables are few. One farmer, for example, goes to Utah each summer to cut timber to help feed the family. His daughter, a quiet-spoken, pale blond lass of fifteen who wants more than anything else to be a missionary nurse, wonders how she can possibly manage the tuition at college after she graduates from the School of the Ozarks. Right now she is earning her way through high school making beautiful heirloom place mats on the looms in the school's weaving room.

But somehow, someway, the graduates of the school seem to make out well. Colleges, always on the lookout for outstanding students for scholarships, keep in close touch with the school. Former Pres. John Spraggins, of Arkansas College, in Batesville, said he found School of the Ozarks students more resourceful than any others.

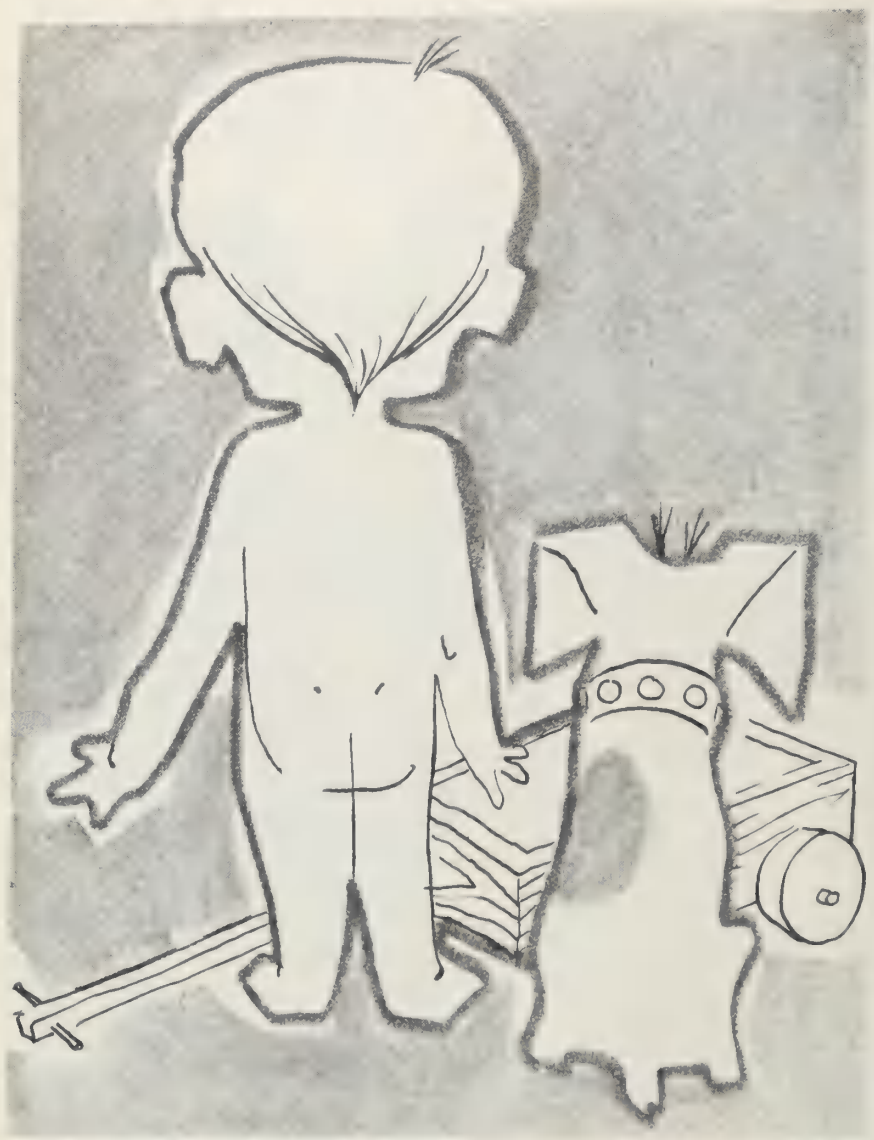
The school's alumni roster contains scores of accountants, lawyers, doctors, dentists, teachers, successful businessmen. One lad who arrived at the school not many years ago carrying his only belongings in a handkerchief tied to a stick today is a minister.

But the school is not able to admit all who want to come. "Those who have the least and need us most" are the first to be accepted, according to Mr. Clark. A recent visitor to the school, looking across the campus at the boys in overalls trimming lawns and a group of girls headed for noontime duty in the dining hall, turned to his young redheaded guide with a smile. "That wire fence around the grounds," he asked, "is that to keep the boys and girls in?"

"Certainly not," the girl answered with a proud look. "It's to keep them out."

now MAX FACTOR
SEBB® SHAMPOO
brings you the joy of hygienically clean hair and scalp

Maybe you and your husband don't wash your hair in a bowl; or maybe you do. But, however you shampoo, your hair never felt so clean as it will now... with sparkling, new liquid Sebb Shampoo that smells like bottled sunshine.



Sebb Shampoo gently washes dandruff and itching scalp out of your life. Regular use frees you of dandruff problems.

Light, quick-foaming, it cannot dry hair. Instead, Sebb Shampoo leaves your hair silky soft, easy to manage, and lustrous with life. Only healthy, hygienically clean hair can be truly beautiful hair. Make Sebb Shampoo your regular family shampoo.

Family-size unbreakable bottle $1.25

For severe dandruff and itching scalp Max Factor also recommends use of Sebb amazing scientific formula between shampoos. Results guaranteed, if used regularly, or money back. 8-oz. bottle $1.50

Mr. Clark estimates that approximately one in twenty applicants is accepted. Applications come from far parts of the nation, from foreign countries and from rich families as well as poor families. But the hill children of Missouri, Kansas, Arkansas and Oklahoma, with their background of self-reliance, dignity and independence, always seem to fit in best, he says. Those who don't want to work or obey the rules are the first to leave.

Last winter the seventeen-year-old son of a mathematics teacher in a small Arkansas town wrote that he had no money for college tuition, board or room and his only spending money would come from the sale of the milk of his two cows, which his father would tend for him in his absence. As customary, the letter went into the stack of junior-college applications to be answered later. But within a few days, other letters came from two neighbors of the boy, recommending him highly. The following week, more letters arrived from other residents of the town. Finally, Mr. Clark sent the boy notice of acceptance and received an immediate reply: "I count your letter my most precious gift at this Christmas season."

There is much to be done around the school. One thousand meals are prepared and served every day by busy young cooks and dishwashers working in the kitchen under an experienced dietitian. Mountains of towels and sheets for both staff and students are washed in the steamy basement of the cannery building, with coeds manning the washers and dryers and mangles. At this school students are the janitors, and a corps of young custodians keeps the hallways and grounds clean. At four A.M. the dairy boys go on duty, caring for and milking the herd of Jerseys which provides the school with its fresh milk, cream and butter. The boys in the power plant take turns at around-the-clock duty operating tubular boilers, steam-turbine and diesel generators that provide electricity for the school. And there is always a hum of building activity on campus. A sixteen-year-old boy operates a bulldozer in the quarry of Ozark stone from which many of the campus buildings were erected. Another puts up a stone wall between the campus museum and the boys' dormitory. Teams of four working early and late put in a new gymnasium floor. Other boys unload hay, coal, cement, potatoes.

"Not everyone starts out with good work habits, but they all soon learn they save a lot of time by doing a job right the first time," A. R. Mottesheard, conservation instructor, tells a visitor. "And what better training for employment later on?" he wants to know.

As in real life, students frequently find themselves doing work they don't like. But eventually they get work they do like. The disliked work, school leaders feel, pays off by building character and by giving the student experience he otherwise would not have had. The school's records show that not one student ever has been on relief rolls after graduation.

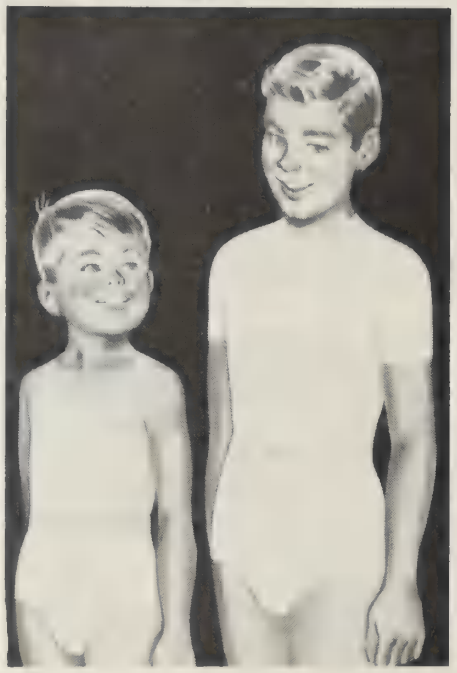
Visitors comment on the well-groomed appearance of the students, and upon their orderly behavior on the campus and in the dining room, in the businesslike attention they pay to the classroom lecture as they take notes, college style. "It might have been Groton School in Massachusetts," Publisher Bennett Cerf remarked after touring the campus. Boys and girls frequently tell their teachers they'd rather come here because they learn more. There is a wider variety of subjects, they feel, particularly in the music department, than in many rural schools, and less emphasis on athletics.

They learn things city youngsters never do. In conservation class they practice casting a line and shooting a rifle—in the interests of safety first in fishing and hunting. In sewing class girls learn how to make pretty dresses out of colorful feed sacks, as well as from beautiful fabrics.

Though lights must be out by 9:30 P.M., there is still time after the work day for campus activities and getting acquainted. The shyness of a newcomer soon vanishes after she gets a haircut and home permanent in the home-economics department, a new outfit from the clothing room, and makes friends in the mixed choir or in the lively dramatics workshop. After working hours, students can look forward to movie nights and shopping days in nearby Branson, Sunday-afternoon social hours, baseball and basketball games. For the home-nursing girls the long-awaited graduation tea is a very special occasion—even though the capping ceremony is carried out with caps made from paper napkins held together by toothpicks. All winter long the sewing class prepares for the spring style show, one of the big campus events. Mrs. Angie Murphy, the instructor, says she has only two worries: one, that the pretty dresses may not be finished in time; two, that the garments may be finished and worn out before the big date.

The youngsters find time for romance too. Mrs. Nixon, the boys' dorm mother, is bombarded by questions from both boys and girls, ranging from "How do I get a girl to like me?" to "Is my picture still on his dresser?" But among the busy boys and girls at the School of the Ozarks, teachers feel, there is less of the coyness and giggling self-consciousness so evident at other schools. Scores of young people who first met on campus now are married, and there are a number of second-generation students at the school—developing, as did their parents before them, the good work habits and the respect for enduring values that are part of School of the Ozarks tradition. END

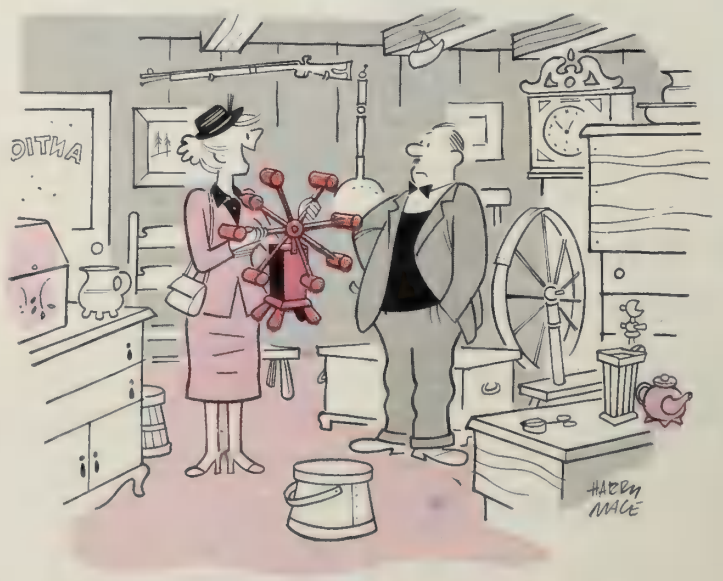
Let's start from scratch with



Jockey Jr.® BRAND underwear

made only by Coopers®

Today's the day. He's off to climb trees, ride bikes, chase "Indians" —and now he's ready for Jockey Jr. underwear!



Sitting, walking or running there's no gap, bind or chafe. That's because they're tailored to fit a boy's figure and give him coverage like no other underwear. Jockey Jr. features the same long-lasting elastic waistbands and leg openings that have made Jockey underwear so popular with men.

So, give your lad a break, and introduce him now to the comfort of Jockey Jr. underwear!

Boys' Sizes 2-12 Prep Sizes 14-20

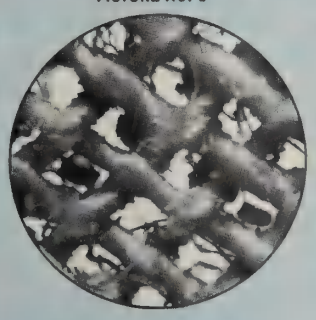
known the world over by this symbol ® Cooper's, Incorporated—Kenosha, Wis. Licensees and registered users: Canada: J. R. Moodie Company, Limited; Australia: Speedo Knitting Mills; British Isles: Lyle & Scott; New Zealand: Lane, Walker, Rudkin; Switzerland: Vollmoeller; France: Verdier; Colombia: Textiles, Ego; Italy: Sanit; Denmark: Taco; South Africa: Ninian & Lester; Germany: Volma; Austria: Josef Huber's Erben; Ireland: Dublin Shirt & Collar Company; Mexico: Rinbros, S.A.; Venezuela: HRH; Spain: Nerva.

"It's adorable! I must have it. . . . What is it?"

CLEAN CLEAR THROUGH

—and Deodorized Too!

THAT'S A FAB WASH!



Microscope, magnifying fabric 100 times, shows the amazing difference between FAB-washed clothes and others washed with less effective products. FAB (see Picture No. 2) gets clothes clean clear through, not just surface clean . . . not just bleached white or blued white. Millions of women use washday products (see Picture No. 1) that let soil and scum pile up in clothes. Do you? Dirt can cause odor! No such problem with FAB-washed clothes. They're really clean, yes, clean clear through—and deodorized, too!

PICTURE NO. 1

Millions use washday products that leave hidden dirt in clothes. Dirt can cause odor . . .

PICTURE NO. 2

Clothes washed with modern FAB are clean clear through— and deodorized, too . . .

FAB Is The Hard-Working, Heavy-Duty Detergent For The Whole Family Wash... And Dishes, Of Course!

"He says my feelings about sex are all wrong."

By CLIFFORD R. ADAMS, Ph.D.
Pennsylvania State University, Department of Psychology

SEX ATTITUDES IN YOUNG MARRIAGES

"My husband is twenty-five, I am twenty-three; we are both college graduates, and I think fairly sophisticated. After almost a year of marriage, he says my feelings and attitudes about sex are all wrong. Our relationship has never been satisfactory to me and seems to be getting worse instead of better. Could it be because we don't think alike? What are the right attitudes for a young husband and wife toward sex?"

Many of the difficulties in marriage, whatever their nature, stem from the fact that a couple do not think alike and therefore cannot feel alike. It is the combination of thinking and feeling that makes up an attitude. When attitudes are in conflict, so are actions and behavior.

For example, money is second only to sex as a source of conflict in early marriage. Yet quarrels seldom concern the amount of money available, or the facts of the financial situation. The real problem arises when the couple cannot agree on what they want their money to provide. Until they succeed in balancing their values (attitudes), they cannot balance their budget satisfactorily (as discussed more fully elsewhere on this page).

Neither can they achieve mutually satisfactory sexual adjustment until they reach some common understanding of the values of sex and so develop attitudes acceptable to both. The basic criterion of adjustment should not be that both mates achieve a climactic release, but rather that each experiences the feeling of being wanted, of being loved and of being appreciated.

Returning to the young wife's question, let us consider attitudes as favorable or unfavorable to sexual adjustment, rather than as "right" or "wrong."

- Each—husband as well as wife—has the right to assume that the other will take an interest in sex, as in all other privileges and obligations of marriage. To demand that each sex act be preceded by an elaborate romantic ritual is unrealistic if not egotistical.

- Sex fulfills one need at one time, another at another. On one occasion it may be creative, on another recreative. It may result from the need to relieve tension, or the desire to express tenderness and affection. It may be anticipated or spontaneous, but should always be generous and co-operative.

- Love and sex cannot be bartered. Some husbands and wives virtually put a price on sex, granting it as a reward, withholding it as a threat or punishment. To do so degrades love and cheapens human dignity. Neither mate should exact or refuse sex for extraneous reasons.

- Sex depends on sharing. Both mates should believe that each not only has an equal right to sexual satisfaction but also that each can acquire the ability to enhance the enjoyment of the other. Individual differences should be recognized and compromised, not ignored or deprecated.

- Sex is a real need, both physical and psychological. A husband may be more direct in expression of his physical needs than his wife, but this emphasis is part of his normal inheritance. She should not allow her lack of familiarity with natural male responses to make her critical of her husband.

- Responsiveness can be cultivated. To try to set arbitrary limits on the physical expression of love in respect to method, frequency or intensity would be selfish, unrealistic and unwholesome. Only through yielding to their natural impulses can husband and wife develop the deep mutuality that underlies responsiveness and a satisfactory adjustment.

As love matures, so can sex. The superficial excitement of courtship is gradually replaced by a steady, dependable relationship of trust, understanding and devotion. By the same token, sex evolves from an overwhelming but short-lived impulse to an enduring tie and solace. For many couples, the satisfactions of sex have deeper meaning in middle age than in youth. Regardless of the responsibilities of earning a living, making a home and rearing a family, physical intimacy should never lose its significance.

WHERE DOES THE MONEY GO?

"How does one ever learn to manage money? Although we have been married three years and have both worked full time, we haven't a penny in the bank. Worse yet, we quarrel about money all the time. I blame Ted, he blames me. I suppose both of us are at fault. Our combined pay, after taxes, totals $502 a month. Apartment rent with all utilities but telephone is $130 a month, and our furniture and TV installments are $85. The car payment is $107. We have to eat lunch out and, with occasional dinners, this probably runs about $90–$100. This leaves us too little, and we are running deeper and deeper into debt even though each of us got a raise the first of the year. What should we do?"

This letter illustrates four specific types of mismanagement of money. If you can identify them now, you don't need to read this article. If you can't, perhaps you will be able to when you have finished—and you may also find some clues as to why your budget stays unbalanced.

Especially in the early years of marriage, money is one of the commonest subjects of quarrels between husband and wife. Genuine poverty may cause suffering and unhappiness, but—ironically—is seldom a subject of quarrels. For when there is barely enough money to satisfy the absolute needs of existence, there is nothing left over to quarrel about.

It follows, then, that it is less the amount of money than the management of money that causes trouble. Whatever the size of the income, it must be managed so as to cover the actual needs and if possible satisfy some of the wants of both husband and wife.

Quarrels occur when husband and wife cannot agree on the relative importance of various needs, or whether a particular expenditure covers an actual need or merely a wish, desirable but avoidable. If the monthly budget will cover either repairs to the roof or new tires for the car but not both, which comes first? Is membership in the country club actually necessary in the husband's business, or merely a desirable convenience? Is the wife's purchase of a sale dress really an economy, as she claims, or a personal indulgence?

Questions like these will continue to cause friction until husband and wife can evolve a system or framework to govern their spending. This means agreement on the standard of living their income will support, apportionment of expenditures for which each will be responsible, allocation of a definite amount or proportion to cover personal expenses of each, and provision for the future through savings or insurance.

If satisfactory decisions can be reached and observed on these fundamental issues, specific problems will tend to solve themselves. If the wife's funds for personal expenses are already exhausted, she won't buy the sale dress.

Some couples prefer to operate within a rigid budget, others manage equally well on a more flexible system. But in either case, certain principles should govern spending and not spending.

Rent should not exceed a maximum of 20 per cent of take-home pay, nor should the purchase price of a home be more than two and a half times annual income.

Health-and-hospitalization insurance is a must. Life insurance should be included for protection when funds are limited; as income increases, it can be converted to the investment type.

Savings may mean self-denial, but reserve funds should be accumulated as soon and as regularly as possible in case of illness, loss of job or other emergency.

Installment buying and charge accounts, though convenient, may encourage overspending. It's safer to operate on a cash basis, at least until savings are substantial.

All these suggestions are means to an end—the end of keeping outgo less than income. Until and unless you do that, you can and will go bankrupt, no matter what your income.

These are the errors illustrated in the letter:

They are overspending on rent: 20 per cent of $502, even with an allowance for utilities, is considerably less than $130.

They are overextended on installment buying.

In their present circumstances, they cannot afford a car at all.

They will either have to find less expensive places for lunch, or cut down on the "occasional" dinners out.

When they have corrected these errors, they will be solving a fifth—no money in the bank.

DO YOU AGREE?

What is the average income?

The typical family income in 1956 was about $5000.

ASK YOURSELF: Is Money Our Real Problem?

For you to profit from this quiz, you must be completely truthful and honest in answering "Yes" or "No." If you are seriously doubtful about any question, do not answer it.

Do You:

1. Quarrel with your husband about money?
2. Often borrow small amounts from friends?
3. Think 10 per cent more income would prevent arguments?
4. Have credit accounts at the best stores?
5. Get mixed up about your bank balance?
6. Regularly buy on the installment plan?
7. Occasionally have a check bounce?
8. Often pay interest exceeding a 6 per cent rate?
9. Run out of money before payday?
10. Buy a new car every year or two?
11. Let bills go unpaid for two or three months?
12. Sacrifice on other things to buy clothes?
13. Usually buy for credit rather than cash?
14. Have any problems other than money?

Credit yourself with two points for each "No" answer and one point for each unanswered question or doubtful answer. If your total score is 23 or more, you probably have no money problem, or at most one that should be easily resolved. Scores of 15 to 22 are average for couples married only two or three years. But scores of 14 or less indicate a serious problem that requires immediate attention. Your "Yes" answers are danger signals that should not be ignored.

All the joys of naturally curly hair

And every curl is trained to stay with Helene Curtis Spray Net®

Not only makes lovely, natural curls, but trains them to stay!

Not only holds your hair softly in place, but trains it to stay!

Lots of hair sprays promise curls. But do they last? Only Helene Curtis SPRAY NET, with its fabulous "control" ingredient, gives you beautiful curls—and trains those curls to stay, like naturally curly hair. Only SPRAY NET holds your hair softly in place and, at the same time, trains it to remember its place. Even in damp weather, SPRAY NET will train your curls to stay springy . . . bouncy . . . curly. (When they muss—just comb them right back in place!) Back of every silky spray are years of research in the Helene Curtis laboratories, years of use by professional hairdressers. No wonder where other sprays promise, SPRAY NET performs! Never flaky, never drying, only SPRAY NET gives you glorious . . . shining . . . carefree curls—trained to stay curled, like naturally curly hair!

Be sure to ask your hairdresser to use SPRAY NET on your hair.

Choose the formula that's right for your hair.

▲ SUPER SOFT, without lacquer, for gentle control.

▲ REGULAR, for hair harder to manage.

69¢, LARGE $1.25, GIANT ECONOMY $1.89 plus tax.

Wonderful news for every Pepperell's terrific August

ed in your home—
heet Sale is now on!

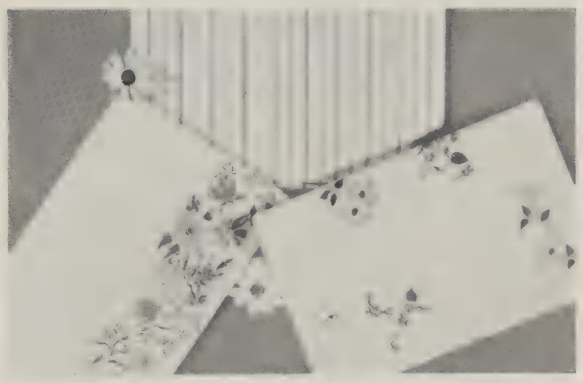
Here's a White Sale to rave about! Pepperell now brings you every kind of sheet for every kind of bed—and each and every one the very latest in fashion. Percales, prints, patterns, muslins, regular or Slip-On®—now waiting for you at your favorite store!

hat wonderful buys! Now I can afford stock up on everything!"

and so can you! 'Cause there's a right Pepperell for every bed in your home. urious percales, superfine muslins, fine, ty muslins – just take your choice. Each every one will wear and wear and wear!

"Aren't these pastels delicious? Especially Turquoise, Pepperell's latest!"

New – exclusive – and oh so smart, you'll adore the new delicate shade of Turquoise! Other flower-fresh, Vat-dyed colors are Rose, Blue, Pink, Spring Green, Maize, and Orchid. At these low, low prices, why not get them all?



"How I love Pepperell's Slip-On corners! They make bedmaking so much easier!"

Now you can end mattress tugging forever! Pepperell's Slip-On corners go on in a jiffy . . . last longer because they're ⅓ stronger . . . and are reversible. Now yours in colors, white, and patterns at substantial reductions!

"My Pepperell Nylons are such a joy! They never have to be ironed!"

What a boon to every homemaker! Pepperell's wonderful woven nylons wash like a hankie – dry like a flash – and need no ironing. Longest-wearing sheet made. Your choice of fitted or regular in dreamy pastel Vat-dyed colors.

"And I couldn't resist a few prints from the exciting designer collection!"

Always fashion's leader, Pepperell brings you its widest collection ever! Here are just a few of the dainty border prints, gay Multi-Stripes, and all-over florals. They're all a delight, and at such wonderful prices!

-our best buy in August—and always!

Lady Pepperell Sheets – percales and muslins

PEPPERELL FABRICS

Look for the Pepperell name on blankets, sportswear, and work clothes, too!

New and lavish PINK CAMAY

scented like perfume from Paris that would cost you $25.00 an ounce blended with pink cold cream

Probably the most lavish soap
that ever pampered your skin
(yet costs no more than ordinary soaps)

Kept fresh and fragrant in Pink Pearl foil

© The Procter & Gamble Co.

Journal ABOUT TOWN

Gossip about people you know,
editors you like,
and what goes on in New York

FIFTY YEARS AGO IN THE JOURNAL

In August, 1907, a nearly completed bridge over the St. Lawrence River near Quebec collapsed, killing eighty. Richard Mansfield, often called America's greatest actor, died, and Broadway produced two new tunes called "I'm a Yiddish Cowboy" and "How Do You Like Your Oysters? Raw, Raw, Raw!"

"Has the woman whose husband feeds, shelters and clothes her everything she needs?" asks The Plain Country Woman in the August, 1907, JOURNAL. "Women have said 'no' to this question and the one item in a long list they think they need is always 'a little spending money.'"

"Is it proper for girls to cross their knees when sitting down?" a reader asks Mrs. Kingsland. "Most inelegant and more to be deprecated because abroad they call it American."

Care of the sickroom after chicken pox: "Formalin candles are burned in the room, then floor, furniture and basework washed with carbolic-acid solution, and beds, mattresses and rug aired outdoors for an entire day."

"To embroider when your hands are rough: Rub the hands with the finest sandpaper and embroidery silks will not stick to the fingers."

"The pocket slits are the main difficulty," says the writer of Cutting Over a Man's Coat for a Child, "but a man's size 38 will make a boy's size 6 coat."

Pin money for the country girl: "In season she gathers clover, hops, balsam, pine needles, milkweed, down from cattails and chicken feathers and makes them into pillows on winter evenings."

Other pin-money ideas: placing cut flowers on graves for 25 cents, playing chess at $1 an hour with elderly shut-ins, hanging curtains and pictures for housewives exhausted from spring cleaning.

"At a church wedding, what becomes of the bridegroom's hat?" worries a male reader. Mrs. Kingsland reassures him that it is left in the vestry room and recovered by the best man.

"Should a girl accept a man's proposal the first time?" Answer: "Assuredly, if she wishes to accept. Most men would never dream of repeating it."

JOSEPH DI PIETRO

Lowell Thomas, Bet Hart and the hat from Hunza.

The hat that Lowell Thomas has just placed on Bet Hart's head, up in the Workshop's Entertainment Room, is from the tiny principality of Hunza, high in the Himalayas, surrounded by Pakistan, India, Afghanistan, China and Russia. "A real Shangri-La," said Lowell in that voice familiar to millions. "No jails, and no criminals to occupy any. People there live to be a hundred."

We'd lassoed Lowell, so to speak, to hear about his new Cinerama picture, called Search for Paradise, whose sensational three-dimensional sound and screen take you bodily to shoot the boiling white rapids of the upper Indus, to bask among the floating gardens in the Vale of Kashmir, and to ride the royal elephant at the crowning of the King of Nepal—all more breathlessly real than anything we've ever looked at in a theater.

"Was that your idea of Paradise, Lowell?" asked Bet. "Mine's right here at home," said Lowell. "And how would you like to have that Hunza hat?"

In New York you get the correct time by dialing N-E-R-V-O-U-S.

The Goulds, who were in England this summer, report that they found the utmost kindness there—that the English, normally hospitable and friendly people (though for some reason building up the myth that they are cold and reserved) were even more than usually friendly as though saying, "Don't mind what our crackpot papers say about you. We like you and want your friendship."

Lunching one day with a charming young couple, the Goulds found them exactly at odds—one condemning Eden's action of intervention, one defending it. True to the British tradition, it was the young wife, Mrs. Gould noted, who made an excuse and withdrew from the argument, leaving the field to her husband. Which, together with other observations at the races, at country houses, led Bruce Gould to a philosophy: "In England I would rather be a man, a horse, a dog, or a woman, in that order. In America I think the order would be reversed."

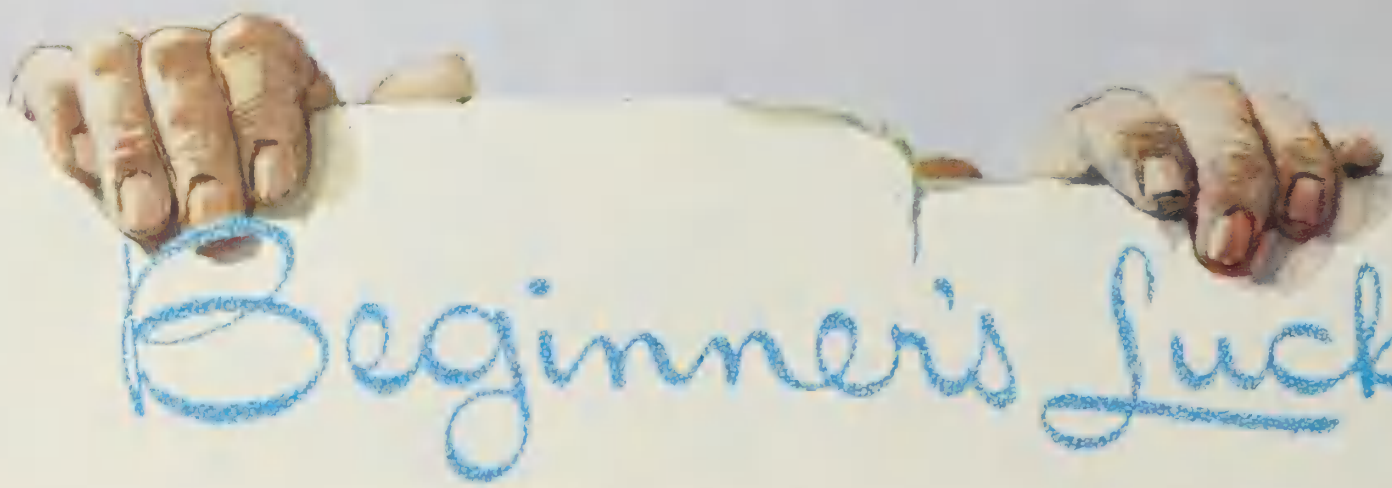
ABBOT MILLS

Mary Lea Page presents an Amigos Siempre—"Friends Always"—pin to Madame de Barros as Eleanor Roosevelt and Senhor de Barros look on.

He spoke pretending I was much younger and gayer than I am; made gentle fun of me, yet gave me much occasion for pride. Could not give direct quotes for all France was in that afternoon and it was not translatable. That is why we have to go there." . . . But a few of M. Brisson's phrases do translate: "The most original nuance of your humor is audacity. Nothing can scare you, nothing can take you unaware. You are not afraid of saying what you think." . . . The JOURNAL is proud to have Rebecca West as an author, and as a friend.

Ever since the luncheon fifteen years ago in Washington when Bruce Gould presented the wives of the South American diplomats with the JOURNAL Amigos Siempre pin, signifying friendship in the Western Hemisphere, these colorful flag-bedecked pieces of costume jewelry have been collectors' items. Now, finally, they don't have to be borrowed. They can be bought. At her office opposite the U.N., Eleanor Roosevelt pinned the first of the new ones on her cornflower-blue dress the other day. "I still wear the first of the first ones," she told Mary Lea Page, who then gave the second of the new ones to the wife of the deputy of the Brazilian delegation to the U.N., Madame Jayme de Barros. If you write, we'll let you know how to get one for yourself. They're around $5.

At least 50 per cent of the people they talked to had some reservation about Suez, considerable respect for the American position.



When we received from Paris this picture of Rebecca West receiving the medal of the Legion of Honor from Pierre Brisson, we asked the celebrated author of The Fountain Overflows to cable us from England what the occasion was like, which she did: "Brisson had just given me medal in newspaper Figaro office which had rose-colored Aubusson carpet under foot, view of chestnut trees through windows and much champagne.

Rebecca West, Legion-of-Honored by Pierre Brisson.

LE FIGARO

Interim report from Poetry Department: One fourth of the 900 verses we receive a week on an average are from men. The most popular last-name initials of poetry writers are S and M. This month all the U's were men, all the I's were women. Poems came from places as poetic-sounding as Lovely, Kentucky, and Paradise, Pennsylvania July's a trickle (too hot?). March is a flood (thoughts of spring?). Things happen that puzzle the poetry people here. In one week six separate poems came in about Lot's wife turning into a pillar of salt.

Beginner's Luck

All the reporters warned,
"Keep your eye on Mollie!"
Hugh found this a pleasant occupation—and a very dangerous one.

By PAUL SOMERS

The day I started work on the London Daily Record was my first as a newspaperman anywhere, and I felt pretty scared as well as excited. But I needn't have worried. Blair, the news editor, couldn't have been more friendly. He introduced me to one or two other members of the staff and then he put me in the charge of an elderly reporter named Furnival, a man with a slow drawl and charming Edwardian manners, who would "show me the ropes." We were to go out to Hampshire together and do a story about the drought, which was supposed to be bad there.

The first thing that happened was that Furnival drew ten pounds from the cashier. We took a cab to his home in Putney, where he introduced me to his wife and showed me round his garden. About three, he got out an ancient car and we set off at a leisurely pace for Hampshire. We went to the village that Blair had mentioned and called on a small holder and a couple of cottagers, and Furnival asked if there was a drought. They said there was a bit of a water shortage and Furnival listened with attentive sympathy for a few moments and then said we'd have to be getting back. He dropped me off at an Underground station, and said I needn't bother to do anything about the story as he'd phone it from home. Next morning there was a quarter of a column in the Record about the Hampshire drought. I couldn't think where he got it all from, and decided that I couldn't have been listening properly.

The second day I was given my first solo assignment—a ladies' archery tournament in Kent. I drove down in my Riley and arrived at the field in good time for the start. The competitors were picturesquely costumed and there was a lot of greensward and dappled shade and everything looked most attractive. The secretary of the club welcomed me with enthusiasm—and gave me all the information I wanted. I watched the tournament and afterward composed a careful descriptive piece and phoned it. When I opened the Record next morning, I found it hadn't been used.

The third day I was on the four-o'clock turn, and for the first time I met the night news editor, named Hatcher. He was thin, grizzled and fiftyish. He barked, "Who are you?" and snorted when I told him, and said that if he wanted me he'd let me know. For the next four hours I sat doing nothing. I was just beginning to feel very hungry when Hatcher rushed out of the news room yelling, "Curtis! Fire! Whitechapel High Street!" I got a taxi to Whitechapel High Street. As far as I could make out, the fire was in an upper floor of a block of shops. There were a lot of fire engines and police cars and ambulances, and hundreds of people standing around watching. The smoke was thick in the street. I waved my press pass at a policeman and tried to get nearer, but he told me to stand back. I tackled a sergeant, but he wouldn't let me through either. From where I was I couldn't see a thing because of the smoke. I started to question some of the bystanders, and presently found a man in a house opposite who said the fire was in a furrier's shop and the furrier had been taken to the hospital with bad burns. I got the name of the furrier, wrote out the story and phoned it, and went back to the office. Hatcher greeted me with "You're a fine reporter!" and thrust a bit of agency copy at me. The agency said that the fire had been at a pawnbroker's and that three small children had been rescued by fire escape. "Couldn't even get the place right!" Hatcher said disgustedly. "Do you realize if your story had gone into the paper, that furrier would have been after us for damages?" He tore my copy into small pieces, threw them on the floor, barked "Good night!"

I was in a pretty dejected frame of mind when I got to the office next morning, half expecting to find a memo giving me a week's notice. With relief, I saw that my pigeonhole was empty. However, my blunder of the previous night hadn't passed without comment. It was the custom among the Record's reporters to use the woodwork around the pigeonholes for making topical cracks about one another. The technique was to snip suitable words from newspaper headlines and paste them together. Until now, the space around my pigeonhole had been bare. Now it wasn't. Someone had pasted up MAN SUED BY ANGRY FURRIER.

I reported to Blair, who glanced up from a sea of papers, grunted, and returned immediately to his work. I went back into the reporters' room. The only occupant was a man named Martin, who was going through the morning papers with a blue pencil, marking stories that might be worth following up. He was a quiet, studious-looking man with thick horn-rimmed glasses. He gave me a friendly smile. "I hear you had your baptism of fire last night."

"I fell flat on my face," I said ruefully.

"Well, it's a position we've all been in."

After a few moments two more reporters came in: a woman named Mabel Learoyd, gray, spinsterish, very much the "old hand"; and Jack Lawson, a slim, pallid man of thirty or so with a rather knowing air. He was followed almost at once by a stranger to me, who turned out to be the chief reporter, Fred Hunt. He'd been away on an out-of-town story.

Martin said, "Fred, meet the new boy—Hugh Curtis."

Hunt gave me a shrewd look and nodded. He was a dark, handsome, immaculately dressed man, exuding vitality and CONTINUED ON PAGE 88

Mollie was sitting on a chunk of fallen masonry,
a small folding easel in front of her.
"What happened to your story?" she asked.
"They didn't use it, did they?"

THE JOURNALS
COMPLETE-IN-ONE-ISSUE
CONDENSED NOVEL

©1957 by Paul Somers
BEGINNER'S LUCK
is soon to be published in book form
by Harper & Brothers

How do you know when a first love is also the final love?

Reach for the Sun

By CHARLOTTE EDWARDS

A week ago Wednesday morning my brother's wife, Sara, called me. She sounded troubled. It's a condition she indulges in a little too frequently for my taste. But sometimes she has reason to sound that way.

"Frieda," she said a little breathlessly, a little mournfully, "Mike and I simply have to turn to you. We need your help."

I braced myself.

I suppose every fairly large family has somebody like me. I'm the one who made the "good" marriage. It brought with it a dependable man with a great talent for making money, a large house with pillars, and several acres of carefully tended ground. Trailing behind these three important factors were all the smaller luxuries which loom large to the average eyes. Cars and new refrigerators and garbage grinders and a full-time maid.

The money made me the center of the relatives, I guess. That, and the fact that I'm tall and dark (or was, before the gray began to creep into my long hair) and everybody has always thought of me as regal.

They also, let's face it, have thought of me as a bank charging no interest, a Lady Bountiful, or—let's face that too—a downright sucker on occasion.

That doesn't mean I'm bitter. I love my brothers and sisters, and all of them started out with me in the simplest rural fashion imaginable. All of them have done well. But there have been times when they needed help. Those times they remembered very quickly that my husband Jed gives me a shockingly big allowance to do with as I please, and that one of my whims is to spread it around a little.

I never figured out exactly what I thought. I helped where I could, without endangering their self-respect and independence. It was Jed's money, after all. There was more where it came from. It reflected no particular credit on me that I was known as sympathetic, understanding and generous.

With Sara, however, I braced myself.

Just as there is one like me in every large family, there is also one like Sara. A perfectly good woman, but not averse to whining a little and implying that her husband will never amount to very much. Not in the least reluctant to hint for that pretty hat, or flatter that new dress, until you feel that you can't get the first wear off fast enough, so that Sara may inherit it.

But otherwise I like her, I really do. Still, I braced myself.

"I'm sorry," I said.

It was the regal way of saying it; quite simple, really, if you've had money all your married life.

I waited, not asking what the trouble was. This time, I told myself, I'm not going to "invest" a cent. Mike does all right. He's my favorite brother, with a great deal of charm, and he's knocked himself out for Sara trying to climb up into the sort of success Jed has without trying. He'll never make it. He just doesn't love money enough, or power either. He's good and warm, and Sara has no right to humiliate him by contrast, the way she does so often.

I waited. I could hear Sara breathe on the other end of the line, hoping that I'd at least ask, "What is it?"

She gave up after a few humming moments of silence. "It's Bets," she said at last.

"What's the matter?" I cried quickly. "Is she ill? Is she in trouble? What can I do?"

Those hurried questions showed how I stand, I guess.

I have two sons, one in prep school, and one a freshman at Harvard. They are terrific boys; and were fun to bring up. But they are replicas of their father. Tall, lean boys with flashing smiles, imperturbable eyes, easy manners, and something aloof, hidden inside them. I have enjoyed them, as I have enjoyed their father for many years. I have never known any of the three of them—nor they me.

But Mike's girl Bets, that's a different thing entirely. She is me.

She's tall and dark and regal. She's full of poetry and odd, suddenly sparked dreams, and a love of people that upsets her balance time and again. Since she was small she has liked to come to our big house. She has loved to sleep in the little room in the attic. She has spent hours with me on those long walks I've always taken, which do so much to keep me restored. She's sat with me beside the big fireplace when Jed was away (which is, of course, most of the time, and not surprising to anybody who knows the holding of money, power and success).

And I have loved her so much that she has never seen the slightest flicker of it, in my eyes or my touch or the fairly sharp disciplinary way I've helped train her.

Bets is, after all, Sara's girl. She is Sara's power over me. Quite literally, I would have been alone in the world of my marriage and my luxuries, if it hadn't been for Sara's generosity in sharing Bets.

I'm quite sure Sara never thought of it as generous. If I were bitter or cynical, I should say that Sara encouraged her only child to butter up to me. To come to the advantages of our home

CONTINUED ON PAGE 131

"Some days you wake up so happy
you try to bring the sky down near enough to touch," Bets said.
"Other times being young is all through you like fog.
Either way, it hurts."

New medication has been developed to make motherhood possible for many women who could never have borne a child.

NEW HOPE FOR CHILDLESS WOMEN

By MEDICAL REPORTER ALBERT Q. MAISEL

THE SEARCH

For more than fifty years, in hospitals and research laboratories all over the world, hundreds of physicians and scientists have been searching for methods of overcoming the infertility which in this country alone prevents more than 600,000 couples who desperately want children from achieving parenthood.

Hundreds of other researchers—especially within the last decade—have been struggling to develop a means for limiting fertility so safe, so simple and so inexpensive that it might be used effectively by even the most poverty-stricken and least educated of women in such countries as India, Egypt, Japan and Indonesia, where uncontrolled fertility keeps countless millions always upon the ragged edge of starvation.

Seemingly, these two vast research efforts have been aimed in diametrically opposite directions.

But it hasn't worked out that way.

Instead, over the last five years, a group of outstanding biochemists, endocrinologists and gynecologists have developed and extensively tested a new synthetic hormone that may prove to be not only the means of restoring the ability to bear children to hundreds of thousands of once hopelessly barren women, but also—paradoxically—a means of inhibiting fertility.

This is the story of that group's brilliant and painstaking research. It is deliberately labeled a "Progress Report" because the full range of its uses as a weapon against infertility will not be completely clear until many more clinical trials have been conducted and evaluated. Further extensive tests will also be necessary before anyone can say for certain that the new hormone preparation is fully ready for widespread and long-term use as a method of controlling fertility in the lands where it is most desperately needed.

THE ACHIEVEMENT TO DATE

But this much is already sure. In a series of startlingly successful field tests, the new preparation has:

1. Helped women to achieve pregnancy after all conventional forms of medical or surgical treatment had failed to relieve their infertility.

2. Helped to relieve a number of women suffering from painful and often sterility-producing endometriosis.

3. Effectively overcome excessive and prolonged menstrual bleeding in other groups of women.

4. Demonstrated its ability to relieve both premenstrual tension and painful menstruation for the women in still other experimental study groups, and

5. Inhibited further pregnancies for more than a hundred mothers for as long as they swallowed one of these little white pills once a day.

THE SCIENTISTS AND THEIR RESEARCH

Thousands of laboratory animals, hundreds of volunteer human guinea pigs and more than two score scientists have all contributed toward these dramatic achievements. But the man most directly responsible for this great advance—in our ability both to enhance and to limit human fertility—is a modest researcher named Gregory Pincus.

He has devoted more than thirty years to the unraveling of the mysteries of the infinitely intricate processes of reproduction. Long recognized as one of the world's foremost biologists, soft-spoken "Goody" Pincus has served as a professor at Harvard, Clark, Tufts and Boston Universities. For fourteen years his colleagues have re-elected him chairman of their Laurentian Hormone Conference and editor of the definitive annual, Progress in Hormone Research. And, since its establish-nent in 1944, he has been co-director of the famed Worcester Foundation for Experimental Biology, unique research center which has produced many of the most fundamental advances of recent years in science's unending battles against cancer, mental illness, arthritis, muscular dystrophy and the complex disorders of the reproductive organs.

With such a background, it was all but inevitable that the Planned Parenthood Federation should turn to Doctor Pincus when, in 1951, through small grants-in-aid to a number of scientists, it sought to stimulate research for more effective birth-control methods. A number of the other grants were devoted to attempts to improve the mechanical or chemical means of preventing fertilization upon which birth control had long depended. But, analyzing the problem, Pincus rejected this approach. Instead, he decided to work toward some method of controlling fertility by inhibiting the ovulation process through which all mature women normally produce an ovum—or fertilizable egg cell—at the mid-point of their monthly cycle. (When no ovum has been released, there is no life and consequently no destruction of life.)

To be widely useful—especially to the poverty-plagued millions in the world's overpopulated regions—such a method would have to be simple, foolproof and cheap. It must be absolutely safe, even in the hands of the utterly uneducated. Most important of all, it would have to be only temporary in its effect, so that all who used it would find their normal fertility unimpaired when they again wished to bear a child.

Such temporary inhibition of ovulation, of course, occurs naturally in every normal pregnancy. For as soon as a fertilized ovum begins its growth in the womb, Nature steps up its output of one of the female sex hormones—progesterone. And this chemical messenger, in turn, causes the ovaries to cease maturing and releasing additional ova throughout the entire period of pregnancy. Once the baby has been delivered, progesterone output falls and, with ovulation no longer inhibited, the ovaries resume their normal cyclic release of a fertilizable egg cell every 28 days or so.

Progesterone, Pincus knew, was nontoxic and therefore safe to use as a drug. In fact, physicians had been using it, in massive injections, for more than twenty years, as a means of preventing threatened miscarriages among women who were so-called "habitual aborters." From the reports of earlier investigators, Pincus also knew that progesterone injections would indeed suppress ovulation, at least in rabbits.

But injections would never do—the method must be simple, foolproof and cheap. Thus, the first key experiments, at the Worcester Laboratories, were designed to determine whether progesterone would retain its ovulation-inhibiting power if it were administered by mouth.

At the start, female rabbits were given oral doses of varying amounts of the hormone and—twenty-four hours later—placed with males in mating cages. Those that received less than two milligrams of progesterone continued to multiply like rabbits, producing large, normal litters. Among those that got slightly larger doses, only a few became pregnant. And when the oral dose exceeded five milligrams—still barely enough to cover the head of a pin—ovulation was completely halted and not one of these female rabbits became pregnant.

From rabbits, Pincus and his co-worker, Dr. M. C. Chang, turned to laboratory rats, which normally ovulate in cycles similar to—though shorter than—those of humans. First they studied some five dozen untreated females, placed in mating cages with provenly fertile male rats. On the average, the females became pregnant within slightly less than five days.

Then a second group of five dozen more females went through the same routine, but only after they had been fed five to fifty milligrams of progesterone—about as much as half a pinch of salt. This time, mating had to be allowed to proceed for more than ten days—on the average—before pregnancy occurred. The single tiny dose of progesterone was sufficient to suppress ovulation for at least one full cyclic period.

A TOTALLY DIFFERENT PROBLEM

While these rat and rabbit experiments were being carried out in Worcester, another gifted researcher was independently tackling a totally different fertility problem, only forty miles away. At the Free Hospital for Women in the Boston suburb of Brookline, Harvard's professor of gynecology, tall, white-maned John Rock, had long been director of one of this country's best and busiest fertility clinics. Like others of the small, skilled band of fertility specialists, Rock had succeeded in relieving the barrenness of an increasing percentage of women whose failure to bear children could be diagnosed and identified with a specific cause. But—again like all the rest of his colleagues—he was stymied in case after case where no single cause of infertility could be identified and indicted. To these anxious supplicants, he could offer only the tissue-thin hope that trial-and-error treatments might fortuitously come to a happy end with pregnancy.

Studying the detailed records of hundreds of such patients, early in 1952, Rock noted that a large proportion of them seemed to be victims of hypoplasia—an underdevelopment of the ovarian tubes or the uterus. He knew that in normal women the start of pregnancy—and the resulting sharp rise in the output of the female sex hormones, estrogen and progesterone—produced a marked increase in the size of both the tubes and the uterus. "In the absence of real pregnancy," Doctor Rock asked himself, "might not the administration of these hormones bring about a pseudopregnancy that would stimulate the growth of the tubes and the womb, correcting their disfunction and making fertilization and pregnancy possible?"

To one after another of his inexplicably infertile patients, John Rock explained both his theory and the fact that it was only a theory. Previous widespread use of both hormones, for the relief of other conditions, had demonstrated that what he proposed to do would almost surely be harmless. But the treatments, he emphasized, would be completely experimental. He could promise nothing except the shadow of a hope that they might just possibly prove helpful.

Despite the doctor's deliberate and calculated pessimism, 80 frustrated but valiantly adventuresome women—all of whom had been futilely seeking motherhood for from two to six years—volunteered to co-operate in the experiments. Daily, for three months, they swallowed increasingly larger doses of the synthetic estrogen, diethylstilbestrol, and similarly increasing doses of progesterone. Just as Doctor Rock had warned them, they developed pseudopregnancies that seemed all too real. They suffered nausea indistinguishable from the morning sickness of the pregnant. Their breasts became enlarged and tender; their nipples tingled and became pigmented. They missed first one menstrual period and then another. Their husbands, though warned that all these false signs of pregnancy would probably appear, had to be reminded frequently that they were not becoming fathers and reassured that their wives were not being injured by the treatments.

Over a period of eighteen months, as one woman after another completed her three-month course of hormone taking, these reassurances were confirmed by the prompt return of these women to their normal menstrual cycles. In 67 cases, in fact, that was all that happened.

But in 13 other instances—several times as many as could possibly be accounted for by chance—the women became pregnant within four months or less after treatment had been discontinued. Rock's inspired guess that a "rebound reaction" might occur had brought the all-but-despaired-of happiness of parenthood to these 13 "hopeless" cases.

But the emotional shock that both wives and husbands seemed to suffer when the treatments suppressed menstruation convinced Rock that the time had come to discontinue his bold experiment and search for some less drastic way of accomplishing the same end.

Fortunately, just at this time, chance brought the two old friends, Pincus and Rock, together at a scientific conference. Between sessions, they exchanged with each other details of what each had been doing since last they met. And thus, at Pincus' suggestion, Rock embarked upon a new attempt to evoke the rebound reaction. But now he used progesterone alone. And to avoid the possibility of the objectionable suppression of menstruation, he instructed his patients to interrupt their medication after the twenty-fifth day of each treated cycle and not to resume taking the progesterone pills until the fifth day after their menstrual periods began.

This time, 29 barren women, who had been infertile for more than two years, volunteered for the treatments. For a month, during which she took no medication, each woman was kept under close medical observation at Doctor Rock's newly established Reproductive Study Center across the street from the Free Hospital. A study of temperature curves, uterine biopsies and vaginal smears proved that each ovulated in normal fashion.

Only when this fact was thoroughly established did the various patients begin their oral dosing with progesterone, starting on the fifth day after the beginning of their menstrual period. During the month, each patient again reported for the various tests. But now these tests indicated that almost all of them had ceased to ovulate. Yet none of these women experienced the symptoms of pseudopregnancy, as their predecessors had. And when treatment was withdrawn after twenty days of taking the hormone, each volunteer human guinea pig promptly underwent an otherwise normal menstrual period.

In this manner, 13 of the women went through two months of treatment and 16 others continued the experiment for three full cycles while Rock waited anxiously to see whether the new and far less emotionally disturbing regimen would again produce the hoped-for rebound reaction.

Considering the low fertility potential of all the women in this group, the occurrence among them of even a single pregnancy would have been something to crow about. But within four months after the end of medication, John Rock found himself the prospective godfather not of one baby but of four! And Doctor Pincus—with proof that progesterone could inhibit ovulation in humans as well as in laboratory animals—was able to plan ahead on further steps in his hunt for an effective oral fertility inhibitor.

Despite the success of this second fertility-fostering experiment, neither Doctor Rock nor Doctor Pincus was fully satisfied with the performance of progesterone. From Rock's viewpoint, as a fertility specialist, progesterone suffered from the great disadvantage of CONTINUED ON PAGE 85

PEACHES IN THE

His money—all 10 million dollars of it—was enough to go to any woman's head.
But it all went to Lou-Ella's heart and that made it even harder.

By GEORGE SUMNER ALBEE

Romance is a rainbow. There it is up in the sky, the colors richer than any we glimpse on earth because they're made of purest light itself—but the end of that arch of glory falls, always and ever, far away across a plowed field, or behind a barn so distant it's no more than a postage stamp against a ridge, or plunging into a misty hill. . . . As we grow older we resign ourselves, as we do to dishes that must be washed, to the knowledge that those glowing bands of violet and yellow and rose will never strike into our own dooryard. But not so long ago, here in our peach country, they did, they really did.

Sunrise is a queer time for romance to begin, but that was when it found Lou-Ella. Summer sun gets up early, this far south, and so does Lou-Ella. She had the tractor out of her old mule barn, working on the motor. A car stopped, and two men came around the side of the house.

"Ma'am, allow me to introduce myself," said the tall one. "And grant me the honor and pleasure of shaking your hand."

They stood there in the dawn, the three of them, with Lou-Ella's peach trees rank on rank behind them in their green capes like one of those choirs you see on television singing carols at Christmastime. The tall, rangy man was forty-one or forty-two, with a tanned lean face and lips that were long and thin but formed as nicely as a woman's, with a fine, strong, manly nose with a curve to it. Lou-Ella noticed his hair. The barbers he went to (it turned out later he had a barber of his own, on salary the year around, but Lou-Ella couldn't know that at the time) had better sense than to clip a straight line across his neck, but even so it was a country haircut, close on the sides and bushy on top, and wavy as a permanent from being newly washed. He had his hat in his hand; one of the hats Texans call ten-gallons.

"My name," he went on, making a bow, "is John Cartwright Ransom, ma'am."

"Mine is Mrs. Temple," said Lou-Ella, her own hand oily from the wrench she was holding. Until the time her husband Thompson died, Lou-Ella was the prettiest girl in Pineywood. But no woman born of woman can be very pretty at 5:40 A.M. in dungarees and old tennis shoes with tractor oil on them.

"I know who you are, ma'am," said Mr. Ransom. "That's why I'm here. I couldn't begin my day without paying my deepest respects to a lady who offers such an inspiring example, not only to the South, but to our entire nation." He thrust out his hand.

Lou-Ella thought he was crazy sure enough, but she was too well-mannered to drip tractor oil on a hundred-dollar ranch suit and a pair of embroidered boots, all roses and stars, that looked as if they had cost another hundred. "Here, you can shake my shoulder," she said.

The second man, the secretary, was a young fellow in a suit the color of maple sugar, with maple-sugar shoes—suède. He had on a wrist watch with a gold strap so wide it made Lou-Ella think of the heavenly streets. "I beg your pardon, Mrs. Temple," he said, "but are you aware of Mr. Ransom's activities?"

"I'm afraid I'm not," said Lou-Ella.

The sun was up. The east looked like a watermelon sliced down the middle, pink and sugary.

The secretary turned to Mr. Ransom. "Let me explain, John," he said. "Mrs. Temple wants to get on with her plowing."

"Spraying," Lou-Ella set him straight.

"No, you'll make me sound fancy, Bruce," objected Mr. Ransom. "I'm just a red-neck cotton farmer, Mrs. Temple, born not far from here in Culpepper County. But when I was a tad I drifted out to Texas and struck oil. Today I have some other interests."

"Quite a few," added the secretary. He went on to say that Mr. Ransom was financing a cellophane plant to give the Carolinas a market for their cotton linters. But more than he was a financier, he explained, Mr. Ransom was a philosopher of free enterprise. He was impressed by the piece in our Pineywood Needle, about Mrs. Temple operating a peach plantation with nobody to help her, and he wanted to carry her story to the nation in his newspapers and over his television stations.

"Gracious, I don't operate without help because I like it," said Lou-Ella. "I do it because I have three young ones to feed, and every time I hire a hand he burns out my tractor. But thank you just the same, and if you like collards drop in for supper any time you're passing by."

Our Pineywood Needle comes out on Tuesdays and Fridays. That was why we hadn't known John Cartwright Ransom was visiting us. On Friday he filled all four pages of the paper. That afternoon it was Orabelle Gensel's turn to have the Ladies' Literary and Cultural Club. Naturally the the subject of Mr. Ransom

CONTINUED ON PAGE 119

"Well then, I'll tell y said Lou-Ella. "When a m with ten million dollars goes around telling other fo what a fine healthy thing it is to be poor,
I think he sounds a bit fool

BANK

HAROLD FOWLER

This "room" is formed by two sides of the house, "ceiling" is canvas awning supported by two poles. Black iron furniture, white-and-blue covers are enlivened by bright pillows, potted plants in white tubs. There's plenty of seating and dining space; serving table stands against wall to left.

GARDEN ARRANGEMENT BY ROBERT ROYSTON

FRED LYON PHOTO

A garden sectioned off, partly paved and walled with railroad ties (you can get old ties from your railway maintenance department—they're glad to get rid of them) blooms with colorful petunias, zinnias, marigolds. Water lilies grow in galvanized tubs sunk in raised beds of sandy soil.

In California an Oriental serenity marks this cool garden seclusion. A slatted fence screens off the rest of the garden and the house. Blocks of wood inserted between the uprights of this screen make a ribbon pattern, give a pleasing design. Clump of feathery bamboo walls in one side.

Outdoor

The country ove garden nooks, terraces, sun porches summer flowers, rich green foliage, gay canvas trapping

By CYNTHIA McADOO WHEATLAN
Interior Decoration Editor of the Jour

GARDEN ARRANGEMENT BY DOROTHY PRATT

HAANEL CASSIDY PHOTO

This little pavilion is designed for enjoying house plants outdoors in summer (here, all types of begonias). Roofing is of flat plastic sheets, floor is cement. Roll-up blind provides light control, sun or shade as needed for the plants; reed fence is inexpensive, comes in a roll.

BY RICHARD PRATT

GARDEN ARRANGEMENT BY ETHELBERT FURLONG

Rooms for Summer Living corners for dining, sunning, conversing are at hand in er shady trees. From north to south they invite your leisure with

A pretty sunny-weather place to relax, dine, sip a cool drink can range from tropical glamour to the old-fashioned glassed-in side porch. With a little imagination and not so much money, a truly gay and entertaining spot can be made in a small, unprepossessing space. Outdoor furniture is handsome and practical, doubling for extra indoor seating. Tough, heavy cottons and plastics make cheerful awnings, shades, pillows, seat cushions and table coverings. All these are just accessories to the outdoors, to the flower borders, green shrubs, feathery trees and to the sun and blue skies. On these pages, we picture five completely different, charming ways to take advantage of summer airs; they range from a garden inspired by railroad ties to a canopied, glamorous outdoor living room. Adaptable for any part of the country, they are filled with ideas for good planning and pretty gardens.

HAROLD FOWLER

A hot, glary sun porch is transformed by gay and ingenious window shades into a cool, private retreat. Striped cotton makes ordinary roller blinds, double hung for more light control. Equipped with a radiator and a drain in the tile floor, this will be an excellent place for plants in the winter.

How much longer could she hide
the terror she felt?

While the search widened, the country waited for news of the helpless girl who was hostage to hunted killers in a wild and deadly land.

CAPTIVE

By THE GORDONS

SYNOPSIS OF PART I "You're coming with us!" the escaping killer ordered. He had a gun. For the stolen $60,000 he carried he had already killed twice. Because the gun and the crazed look in his eyes threatened death to the children of the isolated Indian school where she taught—children she had come to love—pretty young Ruth Madison obeyed killer Marvin's orders. She bandaged the bullet wound of Marvin's companion, Joe. Joe had planned the robbery, but Joe had not planned murder. Joe was grateful to Ruth, but he was badly wounded and he knew, as she knew, that his control over the wild young killer was ebbing as his strength ebbed. Ruth realized desperately that she had to keep Joe alive. The men knew that their one chance of escaping an ever-tightening police net was to push deeper into the wild, remote canyon country of Northern Arizona. It was country so slashed and broken that it had been called "the place where the world began." Country where death from hunger and thirst stalked the outlander as surely as Indian scouts—and deputies, forest rangers, Air Force planes, the FBI—now stalked the killers, clinging to a waning hope that they might reach Ruth Madison in time. Again and again Ruth attempted escape, only to have the attempts frustrated by Marvin. "You're a pretty doll and I like a girl with spirit, but you'll die, next time," he warned her at last. Now, shivering in the chill darkness of a fear-ridden night, Ruth searched her memories of the past to keep alive her courage and her will to survive. She thought of the young doctor she had loved—and run away from, as she had run away from her job as a hospital nurse. Would he hear news of what had happened to her? Would he remember, and care?

CONCLUSION

A late snow fell lazily on the San Francisco peaks that night and Flagstaff, nestled high in its mountain cup, felt the chill breath. The smoke from the lumber mills was whiter in the blue-black night, the heavy breathing of the trains after the long climb from the wastelands was more pronounced.

Hurriedly Rip left the deputy's car, and took the sidewalk in long strides, past a low building, until he gained the door of the sheriff's office. He entered a narrow gray room with stacks of "wanted" notices on one wall, and on the other photographs of the sheriff and his deputies riding horseback in a July Fourth parade. At a counter sat a young, open-shirted fellow by a garrulous radio: "Can't find anyone around the Brinkmeyer place, although there are fresh tracks. What do you want us to do?"

"Come back in," the young fellow said into a mike; and to Rip, "What's holding you up? You've had six hours to crack the case."

Rip smiled and turned right to the sheriff's office, which was a stuffy cubicle with a beat-up desk, a tractor-ad calendar on a flat-painted wall, and some files. Walt was tilted back in a swivel chair, his face sober and dogged. Sam Morales, the deputy, hunched on a window sill, opening and shutting a pocketknife. Bill Parkinson, the newspaperman, leaned against a far wall, hands in his pockets. Other officers lounged about.

Hosteen Chuska stood before a large topographical map of the Rainbow country. "They have only one way out if they keep dead ahead—the Colorado River. But someone would have to come down for them in a boat from Mexican Hat."

He pointed to Mexican Hat, a pioneer settlement in Utah. Not far from the settlement the San Juan River cut a serpentine groove to the Colorado.

The sheriff interrupted: "That river's a bad actor up there. Lots of rapids and rocks. No one could make it but a man who knows the river."

Hosteen agreed. "We've placed a twenty-four-hour watch on the river below Mexican Hat."

The inexorable grindings of the investigation had begun some hours before. Hosteen had dispatched two Navaho officers down the Rainbow Trail by muleback. They were Far Wind and Adrian Lopez, both seasoned men. By the time they left, they had less than an hour of daylight. They had orders to locate the desperadoes, and then to radio back for further instructions. They were to forgo any attempt to apprehend them, for fear of endangering the victim's life.

The three—Rip, Walt and Hosteen—had decided against the use of bloodhounds. The trail was rocky and hard-baked, and would not hold a scent.

Hosteen continued, "This is the trail. They can turn off into these canyons, and these branch off into others."

Rip said, "We're going to be stymied nights, and that means we've got to make the most of the daylight hours. I thought if we started at sunrise ——"

Tersely he reported he had requested a check on the helicopter by every field office in the West and that this information had been developed: the Los Angeles office advised that two unidentified men three days prior had rented a helicopter from an agency located near an airport. One had submitted a pilot's license which subsequent investigation disclosed had been stolen. The rental agency had requested no flight plan and none had been offered. The two men had put down at Needles, California, to refuel, and then at Williams, Arizona, thirty-four miles west of Flagstaff. Rip conjectured that they had taken off from Williams directly for the scene of the holdup killing.

That reminded a deputy who said, "I was asked to tell you boys the funeral services for old Clay will be held day after tomorrow. Two o'clock, if any of you were thinking of going."

Walt said, "I think we all ought to be there if we've got this roped up by then." He added, "God help us, if we haven't."

Shortly afterward they broke up, and as the others drifted out Rip informed Walt that Washington was working on the identification of the killers. "When and if they find out who the subjects are, they'll start backtracking on them, and maybe find someone in their history who lives in Flagstaff and could have been the setup man. I figure it this way," he continued. "Whoever in Flagstaff set this up thought he was only fingering a holdup. Probably the idea of a killing never entered his mind." CONTINUED ON PAGE 68

The complete novel is soon to be published by Doubleday & Co., Inc.

© 1957 by Mildred and Gordon Gordon

RESTORATION BY THE OWNER: DONALD V. D. DOWNS

PHOTOGRAPHS BY EZRA STOLLER

Aspendale
IN DELAWARE

The wisteria woodwork and oyster walls of the master bedroom have color counterpart combinations elsewhere in the house of light grape and brown, strawberry and pearl, blush green and gray—all original!

In this attic room the fireplace is less than one foot square. The equally miniature tongs were a token of esteem to Aspendale's owner from the great Americana collector, Henry du Pont, of nearby Winterthur.

By RICHARD PRATT
Architectural Editor of the Journal

The gentle Delaware landscape is dotted with an aristocracy of brick houses whose original leaden roofs were all undoubtedly melted down like Aspendale's into balls for Revolutionary muskets. But there are many other similarities among them, chiefly concerned with visual enchantments, most of which Aspendale possesses, as will be seen. Anyhow, here is an outstandingly attractive country cousin of the early town houses that give distinction and delight to Dover, Odessa and New Castle. Delaware houses in the old days did not go in for grandeur and nobility. They were more likely to be minor masterpieces, of which Aspendale is a major exhibit, and quite a personal tour de force of restoration. For you must keep in mind as you look at the pictures that the paintwork everywhere on the walls and woodwork is the first, only and original coat put on in the 1770's, a miracle of care and cleaning.

The Flemish bond brickwork and solid Georgian symmetry are true Delaware traits.

present dining room, formerly the kitchen, takes in the e lower part of the wing except the lean-to. The ladder once the only communication with the servants' quarters.

The living room occupies the whole left-hand end of the first floor from front to back. Notice the restraint with which it is being furnished, and how beautifully this restraint points up the purity of the paneling on the fireplace wall, the warm rich patina of the old cherry floor boards, and the lines and color of the pieces of furniture themselves.

Red pump boasts a satin bow—black satin slipper a gay stripe. Pencil-slim envelope, white kid gloves. Pin and earrings by Eleanora Garnett.

BLACK

is the fashion

This black rayon-and-acetate crepe with an easy skirt and short sleeves is an inexpensive lifesaver of a dress to wear from now on, by Jack Horwitz. Tangerine hat from Lilly Daché's young collection. Calfskin bag by Gucci. Crystal pin by Robert Zentall.

Black jersey with a garnet-red cut-velvet top and waist-length jacket by Hannah Troy—jacket lin with the velvet. Rayon velvet beret by Alice Marl Royal-blue velvet evening slipper with emerald-green bag by Morris Moskowitz. A short green glove by Viola Weinberger. Topaz-tone pin by Edgar Roedelheimer.

STILL-LIFE DRAWINGS BY RICHARD HANLEY

Every woman loves black, and practically every man. This year there's emphasis on black with vibrant blues—wonderful new indigo and ink tones, cobalt and sapphire in hats, bags, lavish necklaces. Try also the agate and moss greens, honey and amber tones, the bright yellow and orange of fall marigolds, the reds of red roses and garnets. Once more black contains the forecast—silks and crepes to wear from now on, wool jerseys with cropped jackets, the softer look of dresses with blouse backs, bias skirts and overblouses, black coats with an overplaid of color.

By WILHELA CUSHMAN
Fashion Editor of the Journal

wear it with COLOR

Forecast of a new shoe silhouette by Christian Dior—tapered square toe, square throat, squared off heel—bracelet by Hattie Carnegie.

The certainty of black—a suit to wear anywhere in basket-weave wool with a slim skirt, lightly fitted jacket, off-the-neckline collar, by Ben Reig. Green faille beret and scarf by Mr. John. The calfskin bag by Lederer.

PHOTOGRAPHS BY WILHELA CUSHMAN

Afternoon silk with easy skirt, rose at waistline by Larry Aldrich.

Jersey dress and jacket lined with satin, Ben Barrack; hat, Miss Alice.

A putty-colored sling pump with a buckle; honey-tone scarf and gloves. Pin and bracelet by Hattie Carnegie.

The black-and-blue tweed coat is a forerunner of fall, with new-shaped collar and sleeves, roomy but not bulky lines, by Monte Sano and Pruzan. A good coat for a black-and-blue wardrobe. The blue stitched taffeta hat is by Mr. John, the slim jersey dress by Ben Barrack.

The black wool suit, belted in front, free in the back, an important silhouette by Nettie Rosenstein. Nasturtium jersey beret by Hattie Carnegie, calfskin bag by Richard Koret.

BLACK

is the fashion,

wear it with

COLOR

The wide-beltline dress, in black crepe, Jerry Greenwald

Bow-waistline dress, Mollie Parnis. Bow hat, Irene of New York.

Blouse-back silhouette, Adele Simpson. Gucci bag, Irene hat.

Black silk peau d'ange with a tremendous patch-pocket skirt for dinner and evening by Nettie Rosenstein. Five-strand blue necklace by Joseph Bobley.

WILHELA CUSHMAN

Sailor-collar dress, easy silhouette in rayon by Jeanne Campbell.

Embroidered satin belt, the pale flowerlike pins from Lilly Daché. With purple pumps, gloves perhaps just a shade lighter. The bag, a focal point, in deeper purple, by Koret.

Ruby Venetian and rose glass beads by Joseph Bobley. Choose between sculptured velvet and jewel-trimmed pumps. Garnet bag with crushed velvet bow by Greta.

The fashions on all these pages are presented to you because they show you the trends of the season and serve as a guide as you shop. You will find many of them in stores throughout the nation. However, if you do not find identical styles in your local shops, we believe similar ones will be available.

First Fall Dresses . . .

Your first fall dress might be a novelty-plaid wool jersey with a fringed stole. Or a crisp wool crepe with a pleated skirt. These lovely fabrics are sheer inspiration to a woman who loves to sew. Matching-fabric bows, brass buttons, a fur belt are just a few of the "custom made" touches you will want to add. The colors are like an artist's palette and there is a becoming shade for everyone.

By NORA O'LEARY
Pattern Editor of the Journal

A lovely red dress is at home in every wardrobe. This basic design lends itself to many neckline changes. It would be pretty, too, in a bright wool challis or a pastel. Vogue Design No. S-4813, 10–18.

A bright dress gives a lift on the first cool day. Later, it goes prettily under a fur or cloth coat. Our turquoise shetland is accented with brass buttons, a fur belt. Vogue Design No. 9236, 12–42.

Other Views, Sizes and Prices of Vogue Patterns on Page 100. Buy Vogue Patterns at the store which sells them in your city. Or order by mail, enclosing check or money order,* from Vogue Pattern Service, Putnam Ave., Greenwich, Conn.; or in Canada from 198 Spadina Ave., Toronto, Ont. Some prices slightly higher in Canada. (*Conn. residents please add sales tax.) These patterns will be sent third-class mail. If you desire shipment first-class mail, please include 5c additional for each pattern ordered.

Plaid wool jersey makes news for fall. This basic dress in deep blues and greens has a stole with fringe. Vogue Design No. 9259, 9–16.

Crisp wool crepe pleats to perfection. This two-piece overblouse makes an important fashion. Vogue Design No. 9256, 9–16.

This glen-plaid featherweight worsted has a bias-cut skirt and a bias fold at the neckline. Vogue Design No. 9254, 10–18.

© VOGUE

LEOMBRUNO-BODI

Checks will be seen in all sizes, all colors this fall. Ours has bias-cut sleeves and cummerbund. Vogue Design No. 9255, 10–18.

Beautiful basket-weave wool in a heavenly blue. Note the deep pleat and stand-away neckline. Vogue Design No. 9253, 10–20.

BELTS BY BEN KING
GOLD CHAINS BY EDGAR ROEDELHEIMER

FROM THE CHESTER DALE COLLECTION

The Beach at Villerville

EUGÈNE BOUDIN (1824–98)

In a short autobiographical piece Boudin stated, to the consternation of his admirers, that his principal object had been for many years "to please the sovereign public." During the 1860's he discovered a genre which did just that: seascapes of fashionable bathing places adorned with a frieze of small, modishly dressed figures. One of the finest of these is reproduced, The Beach at Villerville. Few canvases so evoke the past. It is a late-summer day in 1864 and a group of men and women, who seem to have stepped without change of apparel from boulevard to beach, stroll about or sit in their stiff chairs. They have wrapped themselves in coats and capes, for the days are drawing in and there is a cool breeze sweeping in from the sea. Charming as we find this diminutive society, to Boudin the artist it was merely a means to an end, a way by which he could make his marvelous renderings of sea and sky more palatable to the public.

Air and water were Boudin's real interests. He often annotated his earlier pastels with meteorological exactness, as for example, "8th October, noon, wind from northeast." Baudelaire among critics was especially entranced by such skyscapes. Their clouds of fantastic and luminous form, their effects of mist and broken light, had for him, as he wrote, "all the eloquence of opium." But as a friend the poet also gave the painter some practical advice. He said that though he himself had not regretted the absence of human beings in these studies, if Boudin "wanted a little popularity, he should realize that the public had not arrived at an equal enthusiasm for solitude."

It was pleasant to be dubbed by Corot "the King of the Skies"; but Boudin, with a dependent wife and mother, needed more than that, needed "a little popularity." An idea occurred to him. The son of a pilot, he had known the coast of Normandy from childhood, and he had noted its extraordinary transformation. Resorts had sprung up all along the beaches. Deauville, Trouville, Villerville were beginning to attract visitors from the rising middle class and the not-yet-impoverished aristocracy. These were the harbingers of the society Proust was to describe a few decades later in À l'ombre des jeunes filles en fleurs. Boudin sketched them repeatedly in ink and water color until his pictures, having become mirrors of fashion, attained a sudden vogue. "My little ladies on the seashore," he wrote a friend in 1863, "are very popular. Some people even think there is a vein of gold in these subjects ready to be exploited."

But Boudin came to despise himself for its exploitation. The turning point was a trip to Brittany in 1867 to visit his wife's relations. On his return he wrote the same friend, "Having just passed a month among people who on black bread and water devote their lives to rude labor in the fields, one feels . . . ashamed to paint these idlers, this band of gilded parasites, who seem to have such a triumphant air." Though he continued to depict an occasional beach scene, his heart was not in it, and after 1870 he abandoned his "gilded parasites" altogether and devoted the rest of his life to views of harbors and shipping.

Unfortunately, when Boudin exchanged the idlers of the seashore for the toilers of the sea, he lost his vein of gold. The treasure he had found, though he did not realize it, had been aesthetic as well as commercial. For the poetry, the evocation, in a canvas like The Beach at Villerville lies in the very incongruity of these fashionable people seen against the majestic setting of sea and sky. They suggest an audience come to the edge of the world to watch a drama of cosmic splendor, which in the end bores them with its magnificence. But our sympathies are touched, our hearts moved by these spectators. The infinite radiance of sky, streaked by the setting sun and hung with ominous clouds, lends a melancholy poetry to their transience.

Baudelaire with his feeling for ironic contrast could not have suggested figures more appropriate. The tragedy is that the painter himself saw only "a hideous masquerade" where in reality he had expressed the poignancy of the transitory, the pathos of the evanescent. Boudin was a victim of social consciousness, perhaps the first but certainly not the last in the history of art.

—JOHN WALKER,
Director, National Gallery of Art.

I weighed 241 pounds and wore a size 48 when these pictures were taken. People ask why I wore horizontal stripes! Well, I just didn't care how I looked. In those days, a dress was only something to keep me covered. I hadn't started my diet then, I was just posing for a friend who wanted to test her new camera. It's a wonder I didn't break it! Believe it or not, it took more than the sight of these to make me reduce!

No-Will-Power Diet

She ate six times a day—and dieted 116 pounds away!

By DAWN CROWELL NORMAN
Beauty Editor of the Journal

ROGER PRIGENT

Today, at 125 pounds and in a size 12, I'm one of the most clothes-conscious women I know! My reducing diet has brought me better health, happiness, a lovely new outlook on life. No marshmallow-fudge sundae will ever take this away from me!

Here are the ups (241 pounds) and downs (125 pounds) of Mallory Baele's diet story, as she told them to us.

Long on appetite, short on will power—that's me in a nutshell. Or, rather, in a marshmallow-fudge sundae. Preferably, a double marshmallow-fudge sundae smothered beneath an avalanche of buttery golden toasted almonds and mountainous snowslides of pure whipped cream.

I am only 5'2" tall, but I gorged myself up from a normal weight of 125 pounds to a Gargantuan 241. As the pounds piled on my pint-size frame, I saved my sapping energy for just one task—preparing food.

Until my husband, Steff, and I were married, I had never had a weight problem. My wedding dress was a trim size 12. Soon after our marriage, Steff's invalid father came to live with us and within weeks his arthritic condition worsened to a stage where he required constant attention. Steff and I couldn't afford a nurse. We had no relatives to whom we could turn. It meant that I had to give up my job—a job I loved—to stay home and cook and clean and care for this elderly gentleman whom I barely knew. Naturally, I felt sorry for him and wanted to help. But at the same time, I was deeply disappointed in this turn of events. I couldn't help feeling that it was the last straw in a series of mishaps which had plagued me all my life.

When I was five years old my father died, leaving me alone with a pampered, pretty mother who couldn't hide her disappointment in such a plain-looking daughter. No matter how I tried, I felt I was never able to please mother or to win her affection. We were both relieved when it came time for me to leave home for college.

Six weeks after I entered the University of Wisconsin, a message from mother told me we had lost all our money and if I wanted to continue my schooling, I would have to work my way. Because as a girl I had never been taught to lift a finger for myself, it was an emotional as well as a physical strain to keep up with my studies while I worked for my living. But college seemed the first real home I ever had. In order to stay, I washed and ironed in a laundry, waited on tables, even got a job picking flowers in a nursery.

College life ended for me in the summer of my sophomore year. I was returning home from a dance, riding with my beau in his old jalopy, when the accident occurred. I remember the glaring lights of an oncoming truck, the shattering crash of glass and steel, unbelievable pain. My date was fortunate to escape with slight injuries. My next year was spent in a hospital where, after five operations on my neck, face and eyes, I was told I was lucky to be alive.

I was eking out a living writing, and doing part-time office work, when I met Harry, my first husband. Harry was a young architectural engineer. "Brilliant" and "promising" were words most often used to describe him. In the first year of our marriage, I was shocked to discover Harry was an excessive drinker. I wanted with all my heart to help him. And I believed I could. After all, I had licked plenty of my own problems! But Harry was incurable. He died, an alcoholic, in the sixth year of our marriage.

When Steff came along, I felt sure that at last my heartbreaks were behind me. With this gentle, understanding man at my side, a happy future seemed inevitable. This dream died with the arrival of Steff's sick father. It was then that I reached my limit of endurance and became what I call a "foodoholic."

Three big meals a day weren't enough to drown out the pity and frustration I felt for myself. In the middle of the mornings, I'd start in on peanut-butter-

CONTINUED ON PAGE 125

Menu
CUCUMBER STICKS WITH DIP
IMPERIAL CHICKEN
SUMMER PEAS AND CORN
GARDEN SLAW
SALT STICKS
PEPPERMINT ICE-CREAM CAKE
ICED COFFEE
(Planned for 6)

STUART-FOWLER

Warm from the oven and aromatic of cheese. . . . Come and get it!

August is the month of fulfillment. Every sense is touched by this moment of absolute bloom. Our appetite for satisfying food is at its peak. Grownups and children alike troop into the kitchen after swims to revel in the smells of wonderful cooking that scent the air.

A great platter of chicken encrusted with Parmesan cheese and crumbs; garden corn and peas, a spicy slaw—could any meal be a more appealing climax to a flawless summer's day? And as a prelude, frosty cucumber sticks to dip in sour cream flavored with tarragon.

CUCUMBER STICKS WITH DIP. Peel 4 large cucumbers. Cut into pencil-thin strips and slice off the seedy portion. Crisp them in a bowl of ice water. They should be so crisp they crackle when you bite into them. For the dip: mix together 1 pint commercial sour cream, 1 tablespoon plus 1 teaspoon prepared horse-radish, 1 tablespoon paprika, 1 tablespoon minced chives, 1 teaspoon each salt and tarragon (that tangy herb that does so much for so many foods), ¼ teaspoon each garlic salt and monosodium glutamate, a generous sprinkling of coarsely ground pepper and 1 clove garlic, crushed. Chill in the refrigerator about an hour to let the flavors mingle. Serve the dip set in a small bowl within a larger bowl filled with crushed ice. Drain the cucumber sticks and stick them down in the ice so they'll stay crisp and cold for each guest to dip into the refreshing cream. Instead of tarragon, sometime try minced fresh dill in the sauce.

Chicken at its best: There are so many good ways of cooking chicken that entire cookbooks are given over to the subject. Oven-baked under a crisp, flavorful coating of crumbs, parsley, garlic and Parmesan cheese, it beats fried chicken any day. No

CONTINUED ON PAGE 124

Chicken, golden crisp and tender

Flower-bordered sterling silver and a centerpiece of pink geraniums—gay and inviting with bright summer pottery.

Soup COLLECTOR'S ITEMS from the Journal Kitchen

First course for a terrace buffet: chilled jellied gaspacho is served in glass bowls, nested in a wooden salad bowl, in a bed of crushed ice.

August is waiting, just outside your door; the appetite craves delicious soups, both hot and cold; it's a time when beautiful bowls of aromatic clam bisque steam toward the table, prelude to a shimmering cold tongue in aspic, eaten under the stars. Cups of delectable cold jellied gaspacho whet the appetite for an herb-seasoned, tender roast of veal. A big vacuum jug of buttermilk consommé, put together in two minutes flat, goes along at lunchtime on a beach picnic, with roast-beef sandwiches and deviled eggs. This last one hardly needs a recipe, but just in case —

BUTTERMILK CONSOMMÉ: Mix together equal parts buttermilk and consommé. Stir in a dash—which means to taste, naturally—of grated onion, and chill very cold. Mix in a tablespoon or two of chopped chives. That's all there is to this one, but the result is more than delicious.

Jellied gaspacho—it's a new twist on an old favorite. Furthermore, this soup, served in chilled avocado halves, on a ruffle of crisp lettuce, makes a perfect luncheon dish for hot weather.

JELLIED GASPACHO: Mix together 2 envelopes unflavored gelatin and 1 No. 2 can tomato juice. Heat, stirring constantly until gelatin is dissolved. Set aside to cool. Chop coarsely 4 rosy-red tomatoes which have been peeled and 1 small peeled and seeded cucumber. Seed and dice ½ green pepper and mince ¼ cup onion. Add the vegetables to the tomato juice along with ¼ cup olive oil and ¼ cup wine vinegar. Season with ¾ teaspoon salt, 8 drops hot pepper sauce and a dash of freshly ground black pepper. Crush a clove of garlic and add to soup. Chill for about 6 hours. Makes 6–7 cups.

Summer-squash soup: a delicate blending of golden squash, chicken broth and fresh herb seasonings. Serve in heated bowls, garnished with thin yellow squash rings.

Another soup, a hot one this time, that makes a perfect summer luncheon is this Michigan bean soup. With a cucumber-and-water-cress sandwich, it's filling and refreshing. You might end with cold cantaloupe halves filled with fresh raspberries.

MICHIGAN BEAN SOUP: Mix together in a saucepan one 10½-ounce can condensed black-bean soup, one 10½-ounce can beef consommé and 2 cups water. Add a peeled onion, studded with 6 cloves. Heat to the simmering point. Then add 3 tablespoons lemon juice—or, if you like, white wine. Ladle at once into bowls and float a thin slice of lemon on top of each serving, or pass a dish of chopped hard-cooked eggs. Makes 4–6 servings.

It's been said that he who lays a good fire makes a good home—but in summer, if you know your way to the makings of a good cold soup, you've far outclassed the fire builder. Here's a chilled fruit soup, tart and fresh, and of such enticing color and fragrance that no one, young, middling or ancient, can resist dipping in his spoon.

COLD CHERRY SOUP: Drain one 1-pound-1-ounce can pitted sour red cherries. Save the cherries. Place syrup in saucepan. Blend 1½ teaspoons cornstarch into ½ cup cold water. Pour into cherry syrup. Heat to boiling point and boil, stirring constantly, for 5 minutes. Add 1 tablespoon sugar and 2 tablespoons lemon juice. Remove from heat, chill. When syrup is cool, blend in 1 cup commercial sour cream. Add the drained cherries. Chill very well. Serve in chilled soup cups. Makes 4 servings.

The best of our classic American dishes come from places where one or two things are plentiful and cheap. From green Northern orchards, tart apples were folded between fragile crusts, becoming apple pie. Along the wild coasts of New England, our fishing forefathers developed chowders and other delicious fish soups. This clam bisque is subtly seasoned, slightly sophisticated, but hearty. Serve it as first course for that well-loved summer institution, the "shore dinner."

CLAM BISQUE: Place in saucepan ½ cup finely chopped green onions or scallions, and 2 cups milk. Scald the mixture and set aside. In another saucepan, make a roux with 2 tablespoons butter, 2 tablespoons flour and ⅛ teaspoon curry powder. Slowly add 2 cups heavy cream and the scalded milk. Bring to a boil. Add 1½ pints clams that have been drained well and finely chopped. Bring the mixture once again to a boil. Season with salt and pepper to taste and 2 or 3 drops hot pepper sauce. Makes about 5 cups bisque.

The lavish yield from summer's vegetable gardens finds its way into luscious summer soups. Try, for instance, this SUMMER-SQUASH SOUP: Scrub 3 medium summer squash. Without peeling, cut about 12 paper-thin slices from the narrow ends. Place the slices in cold water to crisp. Seed the rest of the squash and cut into small chunks to make about 5 to 6 cups. Sauté very slowly in 2 tablespoons butter with 1½ teaspoons garlic salt, ½ teaspoon salt, ¼ teaspoon pepper and ⅛ teaspoon rosemary. Keep pan tightly covered and do not allow squash to brown. Add 1 or 2 tablespoons water if necessary. When squash is softened, process mixture in electric blender. This makes about 3 cups squash purée. Return purée to pan and add one 6-ounce can boned chicken, ½ cup chicken broth and ½ cup water. Heat until flavors are well blended. Makes about 1 quart. Garnish with the crisp, thin squash slices.

This icy-cold cucumber frappé is cooler than the cucumbers it's made of, the most refreshing beginning imaginable for a meal on a blistering day.

CUCUMBER FRAPPÉ: In an electric blender place ¾ cup commercial sour cream and ¼ cup milk. Add ¼ cup water-cress leaves and 1 large cucumber, peeled and cut into small pieces. Season with 2 teaspoons lemon juice and ¾ teaspoon onion salt. Run the blender until all ingredients are well blended. Pour into freezer tray and freeze for about ½ hour, or until partially frozen. Pour back into blender and run for a minute. Add salt and pepper to taste. Pile into cold soup cups. Garnish with sprig of water cress and a dab of sour cream. Makes 4 servings.

Here is some sleight of hand—a quick soup, with some substance to it, that can be put together in ten minutes. It's hearty enough to be the basis of a luncheon menu.

WELSH SOUP: Mix together in a saucepan one 10½-ounce can cream-of-celery soup, ½ cup evaporated milk, ½ cup chicken bouillon, 1 tablespoon minced onion, 1 tablespoon minced parsley and ¾ cup grated process cheese. Heat, stirring until cheese melts and is smooth. Bring to a simmer and serve at once. Makes 3 servings.

TOMATO SOUP À LA McADOO: Put 1 large can (3½ cups) tomatoes through a sieve. In a bowl, add to the tomatoes 3 medium cooked potatoes, riced, and 1 medium onion, minced. Season with 1 teaspoon salt, ¼ teaspoon monosodium glutamate and a good dash of pepper. Mix well. Chill for 2–3 hours. While soup is chilling, beat together 3 tablespoons mayonnaise and 1 tablespoon heavy cream. Add 1 teaspoon chopped chives, 1 teaspoon chopped parsley and ½ teaspoon curry powder. Chill. When ready to serve, place a spoonful on top of each cup of soup. Makes 6 servings.

4-Minute Meal  M'm, M'm, good!

Here's a new way, a great way — to have soup at its very best! Campbell's Vegetable Soup — so fine and nourishing — brought right to the table from the stove in its own cook-and-serve pot. That's soup as it should be — when it's hot and most delicious — 15 garden vegetables and brown beef broth ready to eat at the precise moment of best flavor and goodness. Stove-to-table soup takes just 4 minutes, from heating to eating!

Company coming? On the table there's a basketful of soup — Campbell's Vegetable Soup heated in an oven-glass dish, then placed in a table-protecting basket for serving.

Ladle out your Vegetable Soup course right from the casserole, and ladle it generously! Everyone likes vegetables this way — 15 of the garden's best, flavored with fine beef broth.

OUPS SUPPLY BASIC NUTRITIONAL NEEDS: Vitamins, Minerals and Liquids—for neral well-being • Proteins—for upkeep and growth • Carbohydrates—for energy Once a day... every day... SOUP!

CAPTIVE

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 53

"Might even be a friend of Clay Jackson's," Walt agreed.

He watched Rip walk out the door, tall and hard-packed, fitting himself in with this rugged crowd. He shook his head. He'd been hanging around this office for thirty-two years, twenty of them as a deputy and twelve as the sheriff. Because this was his life, he wanted four more years of it. He'd be going down to Mary's one of these days, his daughter's spread near Cottonwood. He'd sit on that long porch of hers and rehash a few of his exciting cases for her boys.

As Rip entered the outer office, the young fellow on the desk looked up from booking a girl who had been "working the lumber camps."

"Mr. Frazier's been waiting for you. He's the teller at the Pueblo Bank." He indicated a man reading the wanted notices, his back to them.

Rip walked over. "Mr. Frazier? I'm John Ripley."

Frazier turned about, startled. He offered a soft hand. "I'm glad to meet you, Mr. Ripley." He was in a dark suit with matching tie and white shirt, and was freshly shaven. "The sheriff said you wanted ——"

Rip took the list he offered.

Frazier continued, "We only keep the serial numbers on the bigger bills."

"Thanks for bringing them over."

"No trouble at all. If there's anything else ——"

"One thing. What'd Clay Jackson talk about this morning?"

"Nothing much." He sketched the conversation in detail, recalling the words with meticulous care, a man as precise in his conversation as his dress. He continued, "If there's nothing else, would you excuse me? I promised my girls I'd take them to a P.T.A. affair at the high school. Their mother's ill—been ill a long time."

Rip asked about his family, and learned he had two daughters, Angela, fifteen, and Grace, sixteen, and that his wife was a cancer victim.

He started to leave, then turned. "I may go up to Kanab this weekend, if there's nothing —— I've got some uranium holdings ——"

Walt had said, "He spends every cent he makes staking a couple of guys up there. He's got the fever along with the rest of the country."

Frazier's eye caught the prostitute's briefly, and Rip intercepted the exchange. There was recognition but no acknowledgment. Frazier glanced away hastily, obviously startled, but the girl continued to watch him from beneath drooping eyelids as she was fingerprinted.

Anne Hayes said, "Hello, Rip," in a quiet way, a mistiness in her eyes. "Coffee?"

"Put a piece of pie with it. Apple, if you've got it."

"I've got it."

Even as subdued as she was tonight, she had an earthiness that brought the place alive. A record player as gaudy as a Christmas tree ground out noise that neither heard. Navaho rugs and Mexican gourds hung from the walls, a string of Hopi Kachina dolls marched across the pie case, and a box for tourist mail was by the cash register. The counter seats themselves silently spoke of another era. They were placed farther apart than usual, to accommodate boots and spurs.

A 300-pounder in a heavy jacket clumped in. Anne said, "Hello, Tiny."

"Coffee—as hot as my eyes when I look at you, honey, and as black as my heart." He struck the counter a blow that rattled the tableware.

She brought the coffee.

When Tiny was gone, and there was no one about, she said wistfully, "We were going to a dance down at Sedona Saturday night."

Rip finished the pie. "I'm sorry about Clay."

She looked up. "I know you are; because you're a nice guy, Rip."

She put the coffee cups through the dip. "You want to know about Clay and me, don'cha? The sheriff's boys were around 'bout an hour ago, asking all kinds of questions." She shrugged. "Well, that's all it was between him and me, just a good time, until the other night we got to talking sorta serious-like." She looked away. "I don't know whether anything ever would've come of it, seeing that he'd never settled down—and me neither." Her voice dropped. "Clay always said I was like a filly he once had. Nothing he could do but what that filly would get out of pasture and the next he knew she'd be flying over the sage, mane blowing in the wind. That's what he said, and I kinda liked it."

He walked in thought down the darkened street, past Babbitt's and the Monte Vista Hotel, turned toward a low building and pushed through a door into a telephone exchange.

He showed his credentials to a motherly looking woman. "Could you tell me if any calls were placed from the Flagstaff area to the Williams airport between six and seven this morning?"

She thumbed through a stack of messag slips, and extracted one. "Yes, at six-fort seven," she told him. "Collect to Mr. Wi liam Leacock. They didn't talk more tha three minutes. It was placed from an ou side phone booth near Anne Hayes' coffe shop."

Wearily, he dropped into a chair behind barren desk in a small barren office. From a inside coat pocket he took the snapshot Ruth Madison that her Navaho assistan Mary Toatin, had furnished him.

"It was taken when she got her first schoo north of Ganado," Miss Toatin had said.

Ruth Madison was kneeling by a Navah child, holding her tightly. She had a youn loveliness in her smile, and he had the momen tary feeling he had seen her before. Eventuall he decided it was because she was like s many girls on so many campuses.

He was disturbed as he dropped the snap shot into a file. He needed it for only or reason—for identification, if they found h body.

He took a deep breath, then picked up handful of reports from a drawer. His ca load was growing heavier: seven stolen moto vehicles, two thefts from interstate shipmen one national stolen property, eight crimes Government reservations, one fraud again the Government, one impersonation and o cattle theft.

He pulled up his coat collar. The roo seemed cold and unfriendly. He had a theory that violence and death change a influence the lives of everyone they bru against. So he wondered about himself, abo those around him, and about this girl, Ru Madison.

He marched faces before him, faces he seen that day and evening. He matched voic to the faces and movements, scrutinizing the for something off key. Eventually he snappe himself out of his deep thought.

Next he pushed aside the reports and place flat on the desk the drawings of the killers th Chee, the ten-year-old at the trailer schoo had given him. From a file he took a bul ledger of wanted notices. He leafed throug them carefully.

He came at last to a photograph that bore resemblance to one of the drawings. The blac type leaped out: "Wanted for flight to avo prosecution for murder." The name under th picture was, "Joseph Zanislaus Barnes, ali Joe Barnes, alias Frank Roscoe Newto alias William O. Leacock." A notation heavy black print read: "WARNING: TH MAN IS HEAVILY ARMED AND DANGEROUS."

The restlessness of the mules as they stirr in the predawn broke into her sleep. S turned and the ache of her bones nudged h From a far distance she heard Joe call Ma In one moment there was the good feeling awakening as she had a thousand mornin and the next the realization of where she w the sensation that it couldn't be, a fleeti hope denied the next instant by the call Joe's voice once more.

Marv groaned, but Joe prodded him until rose. "Damn you, Joe, the sun isn't even up Noisily he cleared his throat, then took time shoving his shirttail in. As he left to sa dle the mules, his steps were awkward a lumbering.

Joe turned next to her. "Come on, gi Rustle up some breakfast."

"Why should I?" she blurted.

"You're not exactly a guest here." After pause he added, "You've got guts, girl—b we're all in this together, and we'd better g along the best we can."

She shook out her hair, pushed her blou back into the Levis, and tried to stretch sor of the tightness out of them.

As she bent over him, she caught the sten of the wound, and her hand went to his pul The beat was weak but steady. His eyes que tioned her as she turned to the banda "You're going to be all right," she said. she dressed the wound with the last of t gauze, she searched deep into her memory f details of gunshot cases she had handled the hospital.

She said, "I've got to have coffee ——"

Mrs. V. E. P. of Rhode Island writes: "I found her a poor abandoned kitten. Now she is gorgeous and in wonderful condition—thanks to her diet of Puss 'n Boots."

"Let's go fishing!" For 8" x 10" print in full color of this original photo by Walter Chandoha, send 25¢ and one Puss 'n Boots label to Cat Pictures, Department J-47, Box 6856, Chicago 77, Illinois.

"Gorgeous...and in wonderful condition!"

...the result of feeding Puss 'n Boots regularly!

Put your pet on a regular Puss 'n Boots diet and in three weeks or less, you'll be wanting to write us a glowing letter, too ...like Mrs. V. E. P.'s above. You'll find there's no substitute for good nutrition.

Puss 'n Boots is made from whole fish ...including the high quality proteins of the costly fish fillets...the precious vitamins and minerals of the liver and glands. And to complete the nutritional balance of Puss 'n Boots, tasty cereals and extra Vitamin B_1 are added for appetite, energy and sound, healthy nerves.

So for health, beauty—and fun to own —put your cat on Puss 'n Boots today. Puss 'n Boots adds the plus!

The Difference in Proteins Diagrammed

High Quality Proteins from fish fillets show a full count of essential amino acids (red blocks). Every essential amino acid is there in sufficient quantity. Other colors represent less important amino acids.

Low Quality Proteins, from the mere fish "frames", lack the full count of essential amino acids (red blocks). Part-empty blocks indicate essential amino acids that are wholly or partly missing.

The Natural Life Balance of WHOLE FISH is Retained in Puss 'n Boots Costly Fillets, rich in essential, high-quality proteins. Usually reserved for human consumption, but retained in Puss 'n Boots.

Liver and Glands, for minerals and vitamins. Vital for health. Often extracted for medicinal use, but retained in Puss 'n Boots.

Bone Structure, for valuable calcium and phosphorus. Made soft, crumbly and digestible, and retained in Puss 'n Boots.

PUSS'n BOOTS is good nutrition

Available in 8 oz. and 15 oz. sizes

Coast Fisheries, Division of Quaker Oats Co., Chicago 54, Ill.

America's largest selling cat food...adds the plus in health, beauty, vigor

He stiffened. "Look, girl, you might as well et it through your head. Nobody's building ny fires."

She rose swiftly, angered at his tone, and ft to wash in the brook. By now the morning as graying up, and she saw in the mirror of ie wafer-thin compact Corny had given her iat her eyes were reflecting the ordeal. She ad dozed fitfully, awakening every few min-tes, forcing herself to lie there while every-ing inside her cried out to run.

Some of the time, too, she had wondered out Corny, where he was, what he was do-g. She remembered every word he had said, nd a hundred little glances that repeated over nd over that he loved her. He was such a veet guy. She wished they had run away to ijuana that night they both wanted to, and een married. "Let's wait, Hypo, and do it up ght, the way you've always dreamed of doing ," he had said finally, and she had thought it st too. But wasn't it better sometimes to do hat one felt, rather than to think everything ut analytically, as though life were a problem electronics?

Marv's voice startled her. "You making up r the birds—or me?"

She ran blindly and burst into the clearing ut of breath. Joe lifted his eyes, but she of-red no explanation, and set about preparing breakfast of sorts. She opened a can of pears, vided them into three portions and dumped rn flakes over them.

When she thought that Joe was dozing she pped the shiny pear-can lid into her blouse. plan had come to her in the night.

Marv gave her a spank he passed. She turned anger, then caught her-lf. "You've sure got a fig-e for jeans," he said.

"Cut it," Joe said.

Marv gulped down the ars and breakfast food. ou're getting old, Joe. A l likes you to notice her ure. Don't she, baby?"

Joe nagged at them to hurry. By now the sun d flooded the sky, painting the clouds pink, d soon would begin to slide down the can-n walls.

A time or two when she glanced at him, he emed to be listening, his head tilted slightly, s eyes far away. When Marv finished sad-ng the mules Joe somehow managed to ise himself to his feet, doing it in slow, short ages.

"You're not as dead as I thought you re," Marv said.

Joe smiled faintly in the way of a man who lds an ace. She steadied him as he walked to e mule and he leaned against her as he got a ot up to the stirrup.

He played his ace then. "I divvied up the oney," he told Marv.

Marv came taut. His eyes held on Joe as a nd groped for the moneybag tied to his gun lt. He brought it around, opened it, and only en did his gaze drop. He counted the money th the slowness of a person not sure of his thematics, pushed it roughly back into the g, and turned in the saddle. He gave the ule a starting kick.

The morning smelled fresh and spiced with aint dash of sage, a heavier pinch of pine, a eet toss of wild flowers in bloom—a desert potpourri. And the little brook, sturdier now, rted playfully back and forth across the il.

Yesterday there had been panic, but even ock could hold a peak only so long. Now r had become something to live with, like a oken bone or tuberculosis.

They began climbing a long rise and the ly heat presaged a brutal day. "Where're u from?" she asked Marv.

He turned slightly in the saddle to look ck. "Oklahoma."

"Did you like it there?"

"What're you playing at—a social worker? ly off it, do you hear?"

"I was just ——"

"All right." Then after a while, "My father s a drunk. My mother was on snow. My ndma raised me. That satisfy you?"

When they reached the crest, he scanned the ntry in all directions, began the descent.

Then it was that she heard the far-off, subdued roar of the plane. Marv heard it in the same breath, and dropped to the ground. Yelling to Joe, he began beating the mules, giving Romeo a whack that caused him to jump. Just in time, she dug in with her knees to stay in the pitching saddle.

The pounding of the motors swelled by the second, magnified by the stillness. The plane was skimming low.

She thought of sliding into the brush and scrambling for a clearing, but Marv stayed close. In a matter of seconds they gained the protection of a long low rock ledge that jutted out like a balcony. Marv drove the mules under it, swearing at them.

Joe moaned then, and she swung about to see him fall and twist up on the ground with the whimper of a hurt dog. Her foot caught briefly in the stirrup, and as she hurried to him Marv got in her way, perhaps accidentally, or perhaps intentionally. She shoved him roughly aside.

The roar swelled over them and as quickly was muted.

Joe's pulse beat was erratic but still fairly strong, and within minutes he was wanting to sit up.

"He's too tough to die," Marv said. He moved away to tighten a saddle cinch. "I'm for hiding out days and making time nights. In Korea ——"

"How many times do I have to tell you this isn't Korea? You travel nights and you make a mistake, and there won't be enough of you left to bury." He nodded upward to a mesa rim. "Howja like to fall off that?"

She drifted away, as though she were restless. When she had gone as far as she dared, she stooped low, her back to them, and took the shiny can lid from her blouse. Her fingers shook as a faint hum once again came from far out on the periphery of sound. Carefully she set the lid on a rock, at such an angle that it caught the sun's reflection and beamed it back into the sky.

The faint, far sound became a low drone and then rolled into a steady wave of thunder. She rose with deliberation, praying neither Joe nor Marv had noticed. She stood so she hid the tin. She was suddenly conscious of the weakness in her legs, the shortness of breath.

Another ten seconds. They had to see it, they simply had to see it!

The outcry behind her tore up and down every nerve, and a force struck her with such impact that her body had no weight until it squashed on a rock. Her hands shot out by instinct and grabbed wildly, but nothing held. The crash of a foot hitting the tin was in her ear, blotting out all other sound. She struggled to rise and crumpled up, but a hand reached out to grab her about the shoulder.

She heard Joe yell, "Stop it, kid. Stop it!"

Marv let her drop and turned about.

She managed to get to her feet and stood a long time, struggling with her thoughts, and trying to still her breathing. Joe was talking, but his words never took shape with her until after a time when they wavered and faded away. Turning, she saw him stretched out prostrate.

The hurt in her own body was blotted out by the shock of seeing him there. Something wrenched her into sudden activity. Dropping by his side, she saw his eyes rolled white and the slight foam on his lips. Frantically she searched for his pulse, and eventually found it and was frightened. She unhooked the canteen from the nearest saddle, barely conscious that Marv was standing motionless, watching.

Raising Joe's head, she held the canteen to his lips, and the body mechanism, as by habit, felt the trickle of water and swallowed a little. Then a strange thing was happening inside her. The fright and the panic dropped away, and she was a nurse again. The tremble ran out of her hands and her mind took over.

She rose determinedly. "Get a fire going," she ordered, "and some water boiling. I'm taking the bullet out."

Marv never moved.

There is no passion in the human heart that promises so much and pays so little as revenge. H. W. SHAW

Are you ready for emergencies like these?

Now is the time to check your first-aid cabinet . . . for more accidents occur in the summer than in any other season of the year.

In fact, during the summer months there is a daily average of 280 accidental deaths . . . to say nothing of the almost endless number of burns, cuts, bruises and other injuries associated with outdoor activities.

Regardless of how well equipped your first-aid cabinet is, it will not do you much good unless you really know how to give first-aid treatment properly.

For example, it is important to know what to do and what not to do in situations ranging from minor scratches or cuts to more serious injuries such as broken bones.

To treat minor cuts: most cuts heal quickly if cared for promptly, but can become serious if infection develops. The first and most important thing to do is to wash the cut under warm running water. Then apply a mild antiseptic and sterile compress to the injury.

If iodine is used, remember that it becomes stronger with age and old solutions should not be applied.

To treat more serious injuries: falls cause many serious injuries, especially among young children and people age 65 and over. If you suspect a fall has caused a broken bone, do not move the victim unless absolutely necessary. Keep the patient as warm and comfortable as possible and get medical care promptly.

If an accident occurs and you cannot determine its extent or seriousness, call a doctor. Describe the injury, tell him where the victim is, what you have done and the victim's apparent condition.

With your description, the doctor can offer suggestions, decide how urgently he is needed and foresee what equipment he should bring.

To help you give the right care at the right time, Metropolitan offers its new first-aid chart. It tells what to do for many common emergencies—burns, cuts, fainting, poisoning and others. It also features, with illustrations, the new method of life-saving to apply when someone is nearly drowned.

This handy first-aid chart may help you keep a minor injury from becoming serious —and perhaps even save a life. For your free copy, just clip and mail the coupon below.

COPYRIGHT 1957—METROPOLITAN LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY

Metropolitan Life Insurance Company (A MUTUAL COMPANY)

1 MADISON AVENUE, NEW YORK 10, N. Y.

Metropolitan Life Insurance Company
1 Madison Ave., New York 10, N. Y.

Please mail me a free copy of your "First-Aid Chart," 8-57-J.

Name_____

Street_____

City_____ State_____

She walked toward him, feeling no fear. "I don't know what this man means to you, if anything—I don't suppose anybody means anything to you ——"

She used Marv's pocketknife. She never had cut before, but she had watched surgeons a hundred times, as she stood immaculate in white, in a sterile white operating room. If she ever had thought that one hot day, on the sun-scorched earth of a lost land in Arizona, she would have a patient stretched prone, his hands clenching rocks in lieu of an anesthetic, his face contorted with a pain he never spoke—well, it would have seemed a mad dream.

She held the flesh apart with the fingers of her left hand. She talked low, never knowing afterward what she said, but talking because of the animal comfort it might give this man who was a killer, who might still turn on her if it would serve some purpose of his own.

She probed, and the metal of the knife touched other metal. She probed still more to locate the slug fully, so she would know exactly where it lay.

Joe was drawing every breath as though it would be his last. Swiftly she eased the knife under the slug. The knife slipped, and then she started the process over again. O God, she prayed, O God. He was scarcely breathing.

The slug came out, followed by a rush of blood. She mopped it up the best she could, and once more pressured the area, knowing the pain must be greater than any she could have stood. At last the bleeding stopped.

Taking his pulse, she noted the slowness, and then while she held it new life was pumped into his arteries without reason, as though something deep within him had taken hold, and where he had been passive he was struggling to live.

When she had done all she could, she dropped the knife in the water on the coals, and walked away. She stood a long moment, shaken to the core and staring unseeingly into the sun-flooded canyon.

The quiet was a thing alive until Marv said hoarsely, "I'd better look at the mules."

The day crawled along on its hands and knees, the air heavy with heat. She sat on the hard earth at the far back wall under the ledge, where the rock strata still held vestiges of the night's coolness. Desert swifts scampered about in the cracks, and near her the mules stomped nervously.

On the other side of the animals Marv sprawled, cleaning a .38 with concentration. Joe lay a few feet away, his chest rising and falling laboriously.

She poured water from her canteen on a handkerchief, and bathed his forehead. She dribbled a few drops through his parched and cracked lips.

Marv said, "Don't go wastin' that water, doll. We're ——"

He listened. The deep drum roll of motors was swelling again from far out, swelling until the roar was deafening as the plane cruised over them and down the long canyon. She sat straighter, hope surging.

They're hunting me. Men I've never seen. Doing it because a human being was in trouble. When this was all over, if it ever was, she would tell them what it was like to hear the roar of a plane. It was a brief, tenuous strand with a world she had been grabbed out of not quite twenty-four hours ago.

Going to the pack mule, she found a few slices of bread, dried and hard, and opened a can of meat. She spread a thin coating of preserves over the bread. When she handed Marv his helping, he said, "Some birthday party!"

"This your birthday?" she asked.

"Yeah." He crunched down a mouthful of bread. "I guess so. Grannie never knew for sure."

As she knelt by Joe to feed him, she noticed the weapon in his right hand, clutched close to his body. Somehow he had slipped it out of its holster.

"You figuring on a killing?" Marv asked. He stopped eating.

"Maybe," Joe whispered.

Her hand stopped in mid-air as she looked from one to the other. Marv said, "I don't know how you lived so long, Joe."

She had to say something, anything. "What was your grandmother like?" she asked too abruptly.

With effort, Marv pulled his attention from Joe. "Old." He stared at his left hand. The wrist was crooked, where it had been broken and never set. "She gave me this—for Christmas once."

She waited, rocking back on her heels.

"Me and some other kids slugged a guy in an alley and rolled him. We got fifty cents apiece."

He turned the hand about, idly studying it. "But I showed her. I beat her until she couldn't get out of bed for a week."

He shook off the mood. "Maybe you think I don't know what you're doing—asking your sneaky questions. Maybe I got some to ask. Yeah—maybe I have. Like maybe I want to know if you've got a man."

She nodded. "I've got one."

The lie unexpectedly warmed her cheeks. But she and Corny would have been married by now, if everything had gone right. After she had disappeared from Los Angeles, he had got her address from a friend and written. She never had answered. She wished now she had. Not that it could have meant anything, but it would have been the right thing to do.

Marv broke her reverie. "I betcha you haven't got a man. I betcha thirty thousand bucks."

He tossed the moneybag on the ground and spilled the bills out. "You beautiful, beautiful stuff." He ran his fingers through it. "You know what, Joe? I'm going to get me a dozen suits. And a dozen shirts—with pleats yet. And one of them ten-thousand-dollar Mercedes-Benz cars, and a couple of dolls, and I'm going to hit the crap table at Las Vegas."

He stuffed the money back and looked at Joe. "What're you getting, Joe? A gold coffin?"

Shock lay a club to her neck. Her lips trembled and she said quietly, "He may outlive you."

The smile slipped from Marv's face. He stared at her, then got to his feet.

She heard him breaking brush, and she slipped to a point where she could watch. He was climbing the canyon side, bending low, keeping under cover. He passed from sight behind a boulder, but she continued to hear the shale break and roll. He would be glancing back often, and if she ventured into the open he would kill her. He would be thinking that she and Joe were too much baggage to carry. Without them, he might make it to the four corners where Arizona, Utah, Colorado and New Mexico square off, and up to Monticello where he could catch a bus. She wandered over to Joe. He was resting easier and smiled faintly.

"You ever worked a gun, girl?"

She nodded. During duck hunts with her father, he had taught her to break a gun down and clean it.

Joe said, "I want you to take this, if anything happens to me."

"Nothing's going to happen." His forehead was cooler, and his pulse stronger.

She stood staring at the weapon in the palm of his hand. She wondered if she could bring herself to kill any man unless she were about to be destroyed herself.

Then she heard the roll and pitch of rock sliding down the canyon, and the weight of a man crashing through brush. Marv emerged, losing his footing the last few steps, then scrambling to his feet.

"Some men are up there—coming down the trail."

"You can't move him," she said flatly.

"How many?" Joe asked.

"I don't know. I spotted two and then high-tailed it. I saw a canyon west of here. The country's mostly shale ——"

"He's got to stay quiet," she said.

Marv said, "Tell her, Joe."

Joe took a deep breath. "Get the mules saddled up."

That night in Flagstaff Rip wandered past the Chamber of Commerce and down the main street which glowed like Christmas as the service stations and motels bade for the tourist trade. At the sheriff's office he placed a call to the Phoenix field division, and set forth the telephonic lead, a request for assistance to the commanding officer of the U.S. Air Force at Litchfield Park, near Phoenix. He asked the C.O. to clear the request as an emergency matter. As he talked, he toyed with a pencil that broke in his tense fingers. Afterward Phoenix reported back and he listened for twenty-two minutes, making careful notes.

MARRIED BY PROXY

■ She was married to a man she had never seen who lived in a country where she had never been. Julia Maire is the bride who, twenty-four hours after her marriage, standing beside a proxy bridegroom, sails for the East Indies to meet her unknown husband.

SCENT OF CLOVES
the new novel by Norah Lofts begins in the
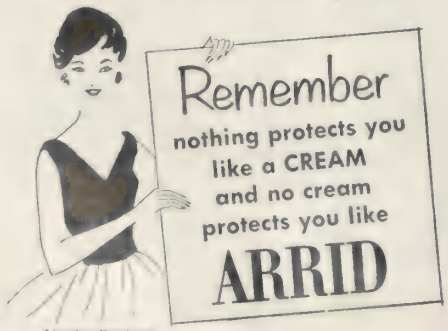
SEPTEMBER JOURNAL

STOP PERSPIRATION STAINS
before they ruin your dress and cause embarrassing odor

New ARRID with Perstop*
Penetrates deep into pores to Stop Perspiration Stains–Stop Odor

ARRID with Perstop* was rubbed into this woman's forehead. Then she was put in a steambath at 104°. 15 minutes later . . .



. . . she was dripping with perspiration—but ARRID kept her forehead dry. ARRID will do the same for your underarms, too.

Just rub ARRID in—rub perspiration and odor out. When the cream vanishes you know you're safe, even on hot, sticky days.

ARRID with Perstop*, when used daily, keeps your clothes safe from ugly stains, keeps your underarms dry, soft and sweet.

*Carter Products trademark for sulfonated hydrocarbon surfactants.

43¢ plus tax

Proved 1½ Times as Effective

Doctors have proved in laboratory tests that ARRID with Perstop* is 1½ times as effective as all leading deodorants tested against perspiration and odor.

He was hanging up when Walt walked in. he old sheriff looked bushed.

"I think I'm coming down with the preeth-rs," he said.

"The preethers?"

"Haven't you heard of the preethers, son? irst off you get them, and then you get the emokus, and after that comes the salvatoris, nd then you die. They're old Texas diseases. ledical science don't know much about iem."

Rip smiled, then turned sober. "We think e've identified the subject with Joe Barnes," e said.

"That so?"

"Washington's got a nickname file—about hundred and fifty thousand of them. They arched it and came up with about a hundred larvs. One was a Robert Marvin—who atches the description we have from the chil-en at the trailer school. He was in the Arizona enitentiary at the same time Joe Barnes was." ip referred to his notes. "He's worked as an uto mechanic, a truck driver and a welder's elper. He's got a three-inch birthmark on his ft cheek, a shrapnel scar on the back of the ft calf and a tattoo of a hula girl on his right rearm."

"What's he done?" Walt asked, sagging into chair.

"Statutory rape, armed robbery, prison es-pe and murder. He slugged a man to rob m when he was eighteen, and the man died. e killed a prison guard about a year ago dur-g a break."

"Nice fellow." Walt was thinking about his ughter, down on the ranch near Cotton-ood, and how he would feel if this fellow had ducted her.

Rip continued, "If we can find a third per-n tied in with their background who lives in agstaff ——"

"Fourteen thousand people are a lot to go rough."

"We went through thirty thousand once—a kidnaping."

Walt hefted himself to his feet. He stopped the door and turned. "You know that fel-w over at the bank—Charlie Frazier?"

Rip nodded.

"Thought maybe you ought to know, he's t a Mexican girl he's keeping. A real looker. e clerks over at the White House." He ook his head. "Charlie's wife hasn't really en a wife to him for a long time. Been ailing r years. Still, I don't see what gets into a an. His wife's a good woman, a fine woman." e added, "Well, I guess we're doing every-ing we can," and walked off.

Joe sat hunched up, his hand locked about e saddle horn, his eyes closed. His body lled precariously with the mule's.

Marv hadn't spoken in the last hour, and e feared his silence more than his words. nce when he turned to check on them, she w the dark, heavy scowl, the set lips, the gged look. His beard was growing prom-nt, changing his face, giving him somehow more respectable appearance as it hid the akness in his fading jawline and covered e birthmark.

They breasted the summit of a low mesa, arv blazing the way more by guess than by ing up a pinnacle or dome in the distance guide them. The limitations of the country t him little choice.

ey picked their way tediously down into long, thin canyon whose tall sheer walls sed even narrower as they rode. They fol-ved a meandering arroyo that carried off e flood waters in spring. When she saw the ss ahead, a bare crevice, an old fright dug o her. It was unreasoning, this fear of a k, closed room or tunnel or basement. But r panic refused to be talked out of it.

Her heart throbbed as they rode through t pass, which was a half city block long. In e spot she had to pull her legs up to keep t walls from scraping them.

A blessed relief swept through her as they erged from the smothering cliffs into the ar sunlight of a canyon dotted with minia-e spires and domes, delicate in their color-i.

The enchantment was brief. Her insides enched as Joe slumped prostrate over the neck of his mule. As she hastened back, Marv pulled his mount to a halt and turned.

As Marv came alongside, Joe said in a half whisper, "I can't make it, kid. You go on. We'll follow."

Marv studied him coolly. "Come on, buck up. We got only another hour's ride."

Joe didn't answer, and his eye when she pulled the closed lid back was sightless. His arms hung limp about the mule's neck.

"Is he gone?" Marv asked.

She shook her head. The pulse was unbelievably strong.

Marv gave his animal a hard swat on the rump that brought it even with Joe's. He reached over and dug into Joe's pocket and pulled out the bills. A few floated to the ground, but he paid no attention. He stuffed the others in the moneybag, then gave Joe's mule a kick in the ribs, starting it up the wash. He fell in behind and she followed, churning with anger but not speaking, because nothing she could say would change his course.

Rip sauntered by Anne Hayes' a couple of times, but waited until the big trailer trucks that built a Roman wall about the place at the rush hour had lumbered on.

A middle-aged tourist couple was finishing dinner at a table in a far corner, and Bill Parkinson, the newspaperman, was seated at the counter with a girl Rip had not seen before.

"Hello, Rip," Bill called. "Do you know Jeanne Morrison? . . . This is Mr. Ripley. You know, the fellow I've been telling you about."

"How do you do, Mr. Ripley."

Rip seated himself a few chairs away. Anne Hayes swung up with a glass of water and set it down.

Bill rose and reached for the check. Anne made change, and they drifted out with Bill saying, "See you in the morning," and Jeanne adding, "I'm glad to have met you, Mr. Ripley."

Now! Wash away "new perm" frizz and odor!

NEW! Quick! The prettiest wave in the world leaves your hair instantly shampoo-fresh!

Takes ½ the time, ½ the work!

New! The only wave you dare wash at once!
Only Richard Hudnut's new Quick has Crystal Clear Lanolized Lotion. A lotion so pure yet penetrating, you can wave without washing first—and shampoo right after you wave! So easy! When your wave is finished, you shampoo instead of rinsing. No need to wait a week to wash away "new perm" frizz and odor. No fear you'll wash out or weaken your wave. It's locked right in with Crystal Clear Lotion!

So quick! Wave and wash with ½ the work!
Quick's the quickest! Only Quick's exclusive Crystal Clear Lotion penetrates so fast it lets you wrap more hair on each curler and still get a firm curl to the tips of your hair. So you get a complete new-style wave with just 20 curlers—½ the winding time—½ the waving work! Shampoo instead of rinsing and, from the first minute, your new Quick wave is lanolin-soft, sweet to be near. Use Quick today—be shampoo-fresh tonight!

2 new-style waves for the price of 1
Crystal Clear Lotion can be recapped. Use ½—Save ½.
$2.00 plus tax. 1 wave size, $1.25 plus tax.

© 1957 Lambert-Hudnut Division, Warner-Lambert Pharmaceutical Co.

Anne's gaze followed them. "She's a sweet kid." She poured Rip a cup of coffee.

"Apple pie," he said.

"It's fresh. Made it myself."

She cut him a piece and pushed the pie toward him.

A Mexican girl with smooth olive skin and dark hair that was shoulder length came through the door and took a seat on the far side of the counter.

"Hiya, honey," Anne said.

"Hello, Anne," the Mexican girl said. "Coffee. Strong."

"That kind of a day, huh?"

The girl nodded.

The tourists began stirring, preparatory to leaving. Anne hit the cash-register keys with a vengeance, dropped the couple's change on the counter and turned back. She began filling the sugar bowls. "I'd hate to see Jeanne marry Bill Parkinson."

"What's wrong with him?"

"Nothing much. I don't know whether he can settle down in a small town like this—or anywhere else."

"Like Clay Jackson?"

She paused. "Yes—like Clay. Didja see the notice on the door? I'm closing for his funeral." She looked away. "Clay never was one to hold a job long. It didn't pay enough or he got into a fight with his boss or something. But you know—it was about a week ago—we were coming back from a dance and he got to talking. He said he was hankering to settle down and how would I like it, a nice home and a couple kids and a car?"

"What'd you say?"

She tossed her hair, flustered. "I told him he never need ask a woman that, 'cause that's what every woman wants, only some of us sure go round the barn about it." She stared out the window. "We were going to a movie a couple nights ago, and I was going to tell him I sorta liked that talk about a couple kids, and all, but then he had to go over to Chambers suddenlike on business and I never got to tell him."

The Mexican girl dropped a dime by the cash register and called, "See you, Anne," and was gone.

Anne tossed the dime in the proper compartment. "That's Rosita Higueroa—Charlie Frazier's girl. You know, the fellow over at the bank."

"I thought he was married."

"He is." She began folding napkins. "She works over at the White House. Charlie got her the job. Seems like an awful nice girl. Sorta shy."

"How long's that been going on?"

"A few months, I guess. She's Frank Higueroa's daughter. Nobody's ever told Frank because he'd blow his top."

Rip paid, said good night and sauntered down the deserted street. The sky was milky white with stars. He never could understand why there were so many in Arizona and so few in Chicago.

Rosita Higueroa glanced uneasily about in the dark before tapping on the back door to the bank. When Charlie Frazier expected her, he turned off the overhead light. She pulled a black stole about her shoulders as she heard keys touching the lock.

"Hello, dear," he said, turning back and leaving her to trail him in. "I'll be about ten minutes yet."

He hadn't balanced the cash for the day. For years he had balanced to the penny, but these days he couldn't seem to count, and it was getting worse.

She dropped gracefully into the swivel chair while he returned to his cage. She began humming Golondrina.

The phone rang. Before he picked up the receiver, he knew it would be his wife. He told her he would be home in about two hours, that the bank examiner ——

She knew about Rosita. He didn't have any idea how she had found out, but she had. She had said, "No one can take the first ten years from us—and they're all that counts with me, Charlie. I've been dead now a long time."

He hung up and stood lost in thought. Rosita asked, "How is she, Charlie?"

"Not good—not good at all." He wished she hadn't asked.

"I'm sorry."

He glanced up. He knew she meant it.

She said, "I think you ought to go home." She was hurt as deeply by this as he was. He had betrayed not only his wife but this girl as well.

"You don't mind?"

"I've told you, Charlie." She rose, misty-eyed. "I wished I'd met you . . . before."

Shortly after Joe lost consciousness, they started climbing. She rode bareback behind him to hold him in the saddle and thought her muscles would tear apart. She had to dig her knees into the animal to stay on, and they, too, cried with hurt.

Marv led the way up over a stark, denuded land of rock and shale where they left no trail. The climb was so steep that the mules would place a foreleg on the next step, test it out, and then jump their hind legs up. Once she pleaded with him to halt, but nothing could hold him.

At last he chose a shallow cavelike recess beneath a great overhanging ledge, high up on the side of a canyon. It was a cavity in a soft spot of a rock wall, worn deep by the rains and winds and sands of a million years.

As she placed a saddlebag under Joe's head, her ears caught a faint sound in the dark depths. It was a soft murmur, as though someone had been disturbed in his sleep. And yet i was not that. It was a sound she had neve heard before.

Marv left, mumbling about tethering th mules in a clearing a short distance down th canyon. Anxiously, she bathed Joe's forehea and forced a few sips of water through hi swollen lips. His pulse was weaker, but hi fever had broken. He rallied slowly until at las he was fully conscious.

Later, after Marv returned, she attempted t spoon-feed Joe, but he couldn't take food Marv said, "You made it, Joe." He said i softly as though he might mean it. But he sti had the money, all of it.

The next moment he was asking, "Hov long can he live if he doesn't eat?"

She turned away without answering.

After another cold meal of canned mea and dried bread, washed down by water tha was hot from the canteens, she moved abou quietly, putting the supper things away. Jo had come around again. He was talking, an the sound of his voice was comforting.

She walked away from them, and stoo gazing out over the canyon. She heard Jo say, "I remember the first time I ever put eye on you. You weren't more than eighteen—an scared." His words fell uneven. "But you ha guts, kid, and that's what counted with m Everyone thought I was off my rocker cuttin you in on the Masterson job. But you've faile me, kid."

"What d'ya mean?"

Joe's words came slowly. "In my book, killer's a scared rabbit or he's not got th brains to do the job any other way." H sucked deeply for breath. "I'm trying to sa kid, I want you to smarten up."

"O.K., Joe."

"I mean it."

"I know you do."

Joe dropped his voice. "Another thing—I don't want you hurting her. I want you to se she gets back all right."

"O.K."

"It's the last thing I'm asking you."

Marv moved uneasily. "You'll pull through You always have."

She turned swiftly in alarm. Joe was cough ing. But he broke off almost immediately. H said slowly, "I don't think I'm going to ro my point this time."

"Come seven," Marv said. He got to h feet.

Joe said, "Yeah, come seven." He raised h head, looking her way. "Whatcha thinkin 'bout, girl?"

She sat beside him and wiped his fac "Nothing."

Marv wandered away. "Better take a loo at them mules," he said, and shortly th heard the stones rolling as he made his w down.

"Like what?" Joe asked.

She straightened the saddlebag under h head. "Well," she began, talking easily as s might to a hospital patient, "I was thinkin this was Saturday, and wondering if The Pe ple came around to the trailer to listen to th radio."

She held his head, touching the cup of wat to his lips. He took only enough to wet h throat. His breathing was becoming mo difficult. "The kind of job you did on me—yo shouldn't've given it up."

She leaned back, where he couldn't see he and it was almost as though she were talkin to herself. "A boy died in Los Angeles in th hospital. They said I killed him, and maybe did. I don't know, for sure. A little, towheade kid. He was only seven."

She hesitated, returning to the scene, seein the people clearly and hearing their voices. picked up the bottle. I thought I read the lab right, but if I did, someone had filled it wron I don't know."

For a moment there was only the sound the mules moving about. Then Joe said, "S you pull a booboo, girl. That's no reason f quitting."

No reason for quitting? But a person cou take only so much without breaking.

He was like the others. He didn't know th nights you awakened in the dark to see th boy smiling up from the hospital bed, telli you about the bicycle his folks had promis

This plus in his diet proves you care

➔ Only French's, the clean, dependable Parakeet Seed, has the big plus in every package—an exclusive pep-up biscuit that actually promotes vigor, sharpens appetites, aids digestion! French's Parakeet Seed, with Biscuit, is one of the "Basic Five" foods of the Natural Feeding Diet, shown below, the only scientifically prepared diet that provides all the benefits of the foods that wild birds enjoy.

French's®
NATURAL FEEDING DIET
KEEPS YOUR PARAKEET
HAPPY AND HEALTHY

m and asking if he could have a second helpg of ice cream. He didn't know about the ening you walked into the room for a roue check and there he lay motionless, his lit body twisted up in the last agonizing asm wrought by the poison.

"We all pull booboos," he was saying. "Me, never was much and it didn't matter. But arv, he had somethin'—if he'd stood up it."

Stood up to it? That was what Corny had d, that you had to face up to it, admit that was done and over, and go on living. Go on ing as though it had never happened? A boy d and you go on living as though it never ppened?

She turned quickly as Joe's words took on moan of a nightmare, bottled up in a oat tightening and cords no longer respondg. She slipped her arm about his head and ld him. Someone had to care—had to care ether he lived or died. His struggle eased a oment at her touch, as though his slipping nd reached out and found comfort.

He shook as he got the words out. "Come ven," he whispered.

A spasm racked him, and then the heavy eathing eased and grew quieter, until it was ne. She continued holding him a moment, mb with shock, then withdrew her arm, letg his head come to rest on the saddlebag. embling, she reached over his body to the lster. It was empty.

She walked to the edge of the recess. The oon was fading on the distant battlements, d the sweet, heavy, punnt smell of sage rose about r.

She felt a peace that had en a long time in coming. e never had thought she uld again nurse someone, d have him die, and in her llure experience the contment of knowing this s the way of life.

She stood a long time, mesmerized by her oughts. She wondered what crimes Joe had nmitted, if he ever had married and had ldren, if there were anyone who would like know of his passing, or would they rather be reminded of him. To die like this, flee, a hunted man ——

Marv's soft footfall thrust her sharply back o reality. As he came up, she said, "Joe's ad."

He stopped and shuffled, and ran a hand ough his hair. He passed without comment.

She lay on her back, stretched out on a sadd blanket, staring into the moon-bright sky. casionally she shifted to ease the hurt in her nes where they pressed against the ungiving ound.

Nearby Marv swore as he struggled to dig a llow grave with only a sharp rock and his nds. He went about it like a creature possed, fighting the process as though the th itself were an enemy to be destroyed by ack and curses.

She moistened her lips for the hundredth e, and struggled against the compulsion to n. Her reasoning told her that if she could it until near dawn, she might have a chance. the last of the darkness she would pick her y cautiously toward the mules, transfer d from the pack animal and saddle Romeo. he could get an hour's start before Marv akened, she would have time to retrace the l through the narrow pass between the fs. Once on the other side, she would push meo toward open country where she would seen if the plane came over again.

It didn't —— She refused to consider such ossibility. It was a plan weighted with hazds, and one she had rejected as long as Joe s alive. Now she had no alternative.

Below her, the fierce, incessant hacking of ground ended, then followed the shuffling eet, a long grunt as though a weight were ng lifted, and the unmistakable pushing of th in and over. A long minute passed, and other, then his footsteps echoed raggedly, ring her. His panting was that of an old dog pulled himself up into the recess. By will he, she slowed her breathing until it fell o the pattern of sleep.

His feet dragged until they were alongside her, then they stood perfectly still, inches away. A foot poked at her, and something hard struck the ground by her head. She jerked involuntarily and looked up to see the glowing cigarette, the bearded face, the burned-out eyes.

"Looking for this?" he asked, touching Joe's weapon with a foot. He enjoyed her consternation, before turning away. As he moved about, spreading a blanket on the ground and dropping his dead weight on it, she sagged with relief.

He finished the cigarette, turned on his side to face her, and soon was wheezing asthmatically in the restless sleep of a cat that would spring at the slightest alien sound.

She pushed Joe's gun away, knowing it was unloaded, then changed her thinking, and picked it up. She shoved it into her belt, to use as a club if she needed one.

As the chill grew more penetrating, she pulled the blanket close about her. A soft, lulling breeze rose, and sleep took her unawares. She knew nothing until the low throb of whirring wings aroused her, as the web-winged creatures swarmed overhead. She never stirred, though she sensed they had awakened Marv.

For minutes that seemed endless, she remained motionless. Then, certain he was sleeping soundly again, she freed herself from the blanket. Rising to her feet, she took anxious steps to the outer edge of the recess, where she hesitated, sizing up a three-foot drop. She eased her body over until her feet touched the smooth rock surface beneath, then slowly rested her weight.

She bent low and took a cautious step at a time, careful not to set stones rolling. A danger she had not foreseen loomed when she neared the clump of gnarled trees where the mules were hobbled. When they caught wind of her, they might grow restless or call out.

She crossed a rocky gully, and was lowering herself from a boulder when the shot exploded like a grenade in the stillness. Instantly, she threw herself spread-eagled on the ground. Then she wrenched herself into action and squirmed toward the protective cover of the clump of trees. The second slug spattered inches from her among stones that shot out under the impact.

She lay still, thinking perhaps he was firing at movement alone in the tricky light of early morning. Only he needn't. He could see her outlined on the ground, for the sun had come up with a rush over the mountain.

His footsteps crunched noisily, bearing down on her. They struck the earth with the weight of a man determined on a course.

Once the footfall paused, but only the slightest second, to permit a third shot to be fired. Again the slug ripped close, struck a rock and ricocheted, digging into the ground by her right shoulder. As she turned, a hand grabbed her by an arm. His scar was angry through his black stubble beard, his hair matted and his eyes bloodshot.

"Where you think you're going?" he yelled, and yanked her toward him.

Bringing up Joe's gun, she swung the butt for his head, but he was quicker, striking her wrist a blow that caused the weapon to spring from her hand.

"Don't you like my company?" he shouted.

She struggled, beating a fist against him. His arms encased her then until she was clutched so tightly she couldn't move. He felt the soft, yielding flesh against his hard muscle. His mouth bent her head back and pressed hard, and then he tensed, listening.

Slowly his arms relaxed, and the gun hand slipped for the weapon which he pressed into her. Indicating the clump of trees, he shoved her roughly toward them. Once there, he warned her to stand perfectly still.

The jet roar swelled quickly until its thunder pounded in waves on the canyon walls.

The craft was marked: U. S. Air Force.

The trail was so steep the two Navaho officers stood bolt upright in their saddles as the jet streaked over them. Through binoculars they studied the country spread below. Law and Order had advised them a half hour before that the plane would be coming over, and instructed them to climb to an elevation and watch for any sudden movement as the jet passed.

They looked for a flyspeck on the land, or for dust that might still float in the tree branches. But not a leaf breathed in the stillness. Only the distant shadows edged deeper into the canyons as the sun climbed into a sky daubed with white puffs.

Even though the fugitives had taken to a dry arroyo bed and later stayed with rocky country as much as they could, the trail was not difficult for the officers to follow. But the searching and the constant cutbacks consumed time.

Not too long after sunrise, they had discovered a bit of glazed paper, torn from a can wrapper, and knew the girl was marking the trail for them. Soon they found that she dropped the paper only when the trail turned. They rode faster now, kneeing and kicking the mules when they poked.

As they rode, the older talked occasionally into the mike. Several times the jet roared over them as the plane plowed the sky in furrows, like a farmer his land.

S S S S S

To fear love is to fear life, and those who fear life are already three parts dead.

BERTRAND RUSSELL

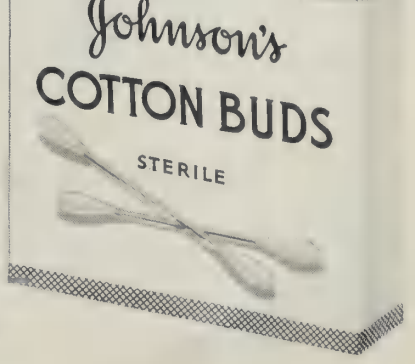
S S S S S

Let BUDS do it!

Baby care . . . Use 100% Sterile BUDS for baby's most delicate cleansing. BUDS are just the right size for baby's tiny needs.

Colds . . . Use 100% Sterile BUDS to cleanse nostrils, apply drops or ointment. The softest, finest cotton is used . . . safe for nose and ears.

Small cuts . . . Use 100% Sterile BUDS to cleanse small cuts and scrapes safely, to apply medication. Tight-spun BUDS won't "fuzz up."



Tender gums . . . Use 100% Sterile BUDS to massage or treat tender gums. They're so gentle, so safe . . . handy for bedroom, bath, nursery.

100% STERILE

Made by the most trusted name in surgical products

Johnson & Johnson

Eventually, the binoculars circled a carrion bird wheeling lazily in the distant sky. He might be scouring the country as they were, or hopefully stalking a living creature. They knew it was the latter when the trail led them directly toward the floating bird.

At last they reached the narrow defile between the cliff faces. They paused, talking low in Navaho and scanning the rims of the cliffs.

They decided to chance it, not because they were reckless or brave, but because there was no other way to follow the trail. They slowed their mounts as they rode through the pass, their legs drawn up to clear the jagged walls.

Marv lay prone on the floor of the recess, staring below with fixed concentration. He was waiting, and had been for three hours. She sat behind him, where he had put her, so deep in the cavern she could not see below.

She knew now he had seen her marking the trail, and had let her. That was why he had pressed so hard yesterday. He had been searching for a setup such as this where he could pick the men off one by one.

And now they waited. The morning pursued its old, familiar routine. The sun warmed the cool air and slowly erased shadows still lurking in the canyon crevasses.

For a time she watched the carrion bird as it bobbed and floated. There was something hypnotic about it.

Marv talked about the plane. He figured they planned to drop parachuters if they located them. He was amused and proud of his importance. "The whole blasted Air Force!"

He was unworried. "I was sitting deep in brush on this hillside in Korea—and this plane was coming over—and here these four Reds come dropping down smack in front of me. I never moved. Popped 'em off one by one."

He paused, remembering. "I tell you, baby, I was a big guy with my outfit—except for a shrimp of a sergeant who told me to go to hell for working beyond our lines."

After a second, he added, "He never chewed me out again. They found him the next day—with a bullet dead on target in his back."

He said then, "You're like a girl I had ——"

"You told me. You really loved her, didn't you?"

He thought that over. "Yeah."

"Why didn't you marry her?"

"I dunno. It just didn't happen. Her folks were great ones to talk—me not good enough. Why, her old man never had a hundred bucks in his life."

"Maybe they weren't thinking about that," she told him.

"Whatdayamean?"

"Nothing."

"I don't like dames who don't mean nothing when they mean something. You hear?"

He added shortly, "Your hair's a mess—and do something to your face."

She was filing her grubby, cracked nails when she heard the first faint click of a mule's hoof striking rock. He covered the gun with his left hand so there would be no reflection. She tensed, and rose noiselessly until she could see the trail.

The click, click grew. A mule's nose came into sight. She struggled to cry out, but nothing filtered from a throat garroted by fear.

Marv waited. He was listening for their own mules, which might betray them.

The Navahos looked up as they rode out of the pass, and that second she got the scream out as Marv fired two quick shots. But her warning had been in time. Far Wind rolled off his mule and into a depression. The older fell behind his mount, using it as a shield. Marv dropped the animal almost instantly, and the Navaho sprinted for a boulder, part way up the canyon side. Marv held his fire, waiting.

The younger called, "We're the Navaho police. Come out with your hands up and we'll hold our fire."

The older was only a flash of movement between two rocks as he scrambled higher up the canyon wall. Still Marv waited. They were splitting his vision, the older man veering to the left, and the other, he was sure, would come up on the right behind a ridge that would hide him until he gained higher ground and could look across into the cavern.

It wasn't working out as he had figured.

The radio on their pack mule squawked, "Come in, Far Wind, come in. What's happened to you? Come in if you can."

Marv waited uneasily. The older one was going to sit there, behind that rock, until the younger had slipped into position across the way, up on the ridge. He couldn't have that.

He called out, "O.K., you down there—you win." He shouted to Ruth, "Get out in the open where they can see you."

She hesitated. He swore at her until she walked unsteadily to the edge and stood, clenching her hands to press the tremble from them. As he rose behind her, he tossed the weapon to the ground and raised his arms.

The older officer's voice called to her, "Where is the other man?"

"He's dead," she answered.

Still the older one didn't show himself. "Step away from the man, miss."

She moved several feet to one side, leaving Marv exposed. The officer emerged into the open, gun in hand. He squinted to shut out the harsh light that reflected upward from the white rocky ground.

"Come down here," he ordered Marv, "and keep your hands up."

In a fluid movement, so swift the eye could scarcely have caught it, Marv dropped flat, his hand slithering the same second for the weapon, which cracked as his body touched the ground. The Navaho crumpled without a word or moan, and was still. Ruth sagged to the ground.

After watching the prostrate form a few seconds, Marv shifted to scan the ridge to his right. He showed himself then briefly, rising and dropping in the same instant. As he expected, he drew fire. The slug shattered rock above his head. His eyes marked the spot where the officer lay concealed, and he answered with a shot triggered at random, intended only to pin the Navaho down.

He slipped behind Ruth and said, "Get up." He pushed her ahead of him, synchronizing his movements with hers, so that he was never exposed. She stumbled as she dropped from the ledge and he stumbled with her. His left arm went about her middle and squeezed her tight against him. As he shoved her toward the ridge where the Navaho lay, his legs walked with hers.

Far Wind contained them in his sights, biding his time until that split second when she would wrench free. He didn't permit himself to think of his friend, dead a few yards distant. He thought only of this killer advancing toward him with the girl blanketing his body.

The radio called anxiously, "Come in, Far Wind," a voice from out of nowhere repeating words as though it knew there would be no answer.

Stoically Far Wind waited. Foot by foot they climbed above him to higher ground. He couldn't wait much longer. Step by step the killer was moving into a position where he could pick him off with the ease of shooting a lizard playing dead.

He sent a stone skimming over the ground that struck shale behind the fugitive. But the ruse failed to divert the man.

He shouted to the girl, "Get out of the way, miss. Get out of the way."

She responded instinctively, but Marv only pinned her tighter.

Stooping low and half sliding, Far Wind scrambled frantically down the ridge. The earth swirled and rocked as he plunged for the cover of his mule.

Marv held him in his sights for a second, lining up a straight shot, then fired. It was as simple as the time he knocked a bobcat off a ledge.

He warned Ruth to shut up, and listened, and heard the brief death groan. He holstered his weapon as she slumped to the ground.

The operation hadn't gone as planned. But a man needn't worry if he could think as quick as he could shoot.

He raced down the canyon side, falling and sliding and picking himself up and running again, propelled by the exhilaration pounding through him.

Picking up the mike, he said, "Hello."

"Come in, come in," the voice repeated.

"You tell that boss man of yours his two boys won't be coming back—and if he sends any more cops down here, I'm going to kill the girl. Do you get that?"

He picked up the radio and pitched it to the ground and kicked it silent.

The day cooled perceptibly as dark storm clouds puffed themselves up in the west. They retraced yesterday's ride through the narrow defile, across the bald mountain and then down into a restful canyon of dark green, turning finally toward Rainbow Bridge.

She rocked along on Romeo in a daze, struggling to draw up a plan, but her mind sat like one of the great boulders they passed, immovable.

Marv said little. After destroying the radio, he had gone swiftly about the business of saddling the mules. He was a man in a desperate hurry.

He was sitting the saddle straight, lean and hard-packed. He looked always up, scanning the canyon walls and the cliffs, fearful of the same ambush he himself had set up. His right hand rode easily on his leg, near the holster.

At Redbud Pass he let the animal nibble at tender leaves. Swinging half around in the saddle, he said, "We're going to be together a long time, doll. We might as well come to some sort of working arrangement."

She busied herself straightening out a stirrup, feeling the blood rush through her. She couldn't wait much longer. She had to make a break, even if he killed her in the attempt.

His faint smile slipped, and he rammed his mount. Ploddingly they began the sharp rough ascent. In minutes they were through the pass. He pulled his mount up to let it catch its wind, and sat a moment, his gaze resting on her.

Once more the blast of a plane bore into their hearing, and again hope tugged at her apathy. Marv beat the mules and soon they were hidden in the thick foliage of a grove of stunted trees.

He waited a few minutes, then led the way back to the trail. His usual unreadable expression had given way to a pleased-with-himself look. He was beginning to enjoy the situation. He had outshot and outwitted the searchers; he had the $60,000 and her, and no immediate worries.

She heard a dog bark and swung around. Marv, too, looked back startled. A scrawny, half-starved mongrel raced out of the brush and snapped at the mules. Marv's hand slid for the holster as he let out a curse that sent the dog backtracking with its tail between its legs.

He pulled up the mule and sat perfectly still, reconnoitering. She wondered if he knew, as she did, that a dog indicated a hogan nearby.

"You ride ahead," he said. She nudged Romeo and passed him with the pack mule following.

He trailed close behind her, and slightly to one side, so he could again use her body as a shield. The tinkle of sheep bells came over and then a hundred yards or so off the trail a flimsy Navaho shelter took shape. Romeo slowed at the sight of a habitation, and Ruth touched her heels to his flanks. There must be no change of pace, not the slightest hesitation Marv would figure that she would try for a break.

Romeo's steps clattered in the stillness. The dog was yapping near the hogan, giving the alarm. They rode along a dry arroyo bed that wound through brush shoulder high. On the horizon, a rainbow curved in myriad colors about a dark mesa, and a yellow light she had never seen before fell over the land.

She scanned the hogan out of the corner of her eyes. Still there was no life, not even with the alarm given by the dog. But there had to be someone or there wouldn't be a dog.

She tensed and bent forward, pretending to pet Romeo. As she did, she freed her feet from the stirrups. Then she heard Marv's mule stumble behind her. In that second she dropped to the ground and plunged for the brush, gaining it as the shot exploded on her heels.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 76

THE UNPLANTED PRIMROSE

By THOMAS HARDY

"A pink primrose from the plant he knows
Let me send him in his far spot,
From the root I brought to his garden-knot
When he dwelt herefrom but a little mile;
A root I had reared at that time of love,
And of all my stock the best that throve,
Which he took with so warm a smile."

Such she sang and said, and aflush she sped
To her love's old home hard by
Ere he left that nook for the wider sky
Of a southern country unassayed.
And she crept to the border of early stocks,
Of pansies, pinks, and hollyhocks,
Where their vows and the gift were made.

"It has not bloomed!" And her glances gloomed
As she missed the expected hue.
"Yet the rest are in blow the border through;
Nor is leaf or bud of it evident.
Ah, can it have died of an over-care
In its tendance, sprung of his charge to spare
No pains for its nourishment?"

She turned her round from the wrong ones found
To the seat where a year before
She had brought it him as the best of her store,
And lo, on a ledge of the wall she neared,
Lay its withered skeleton, dry and brown,
Untouched since there he had laid it down
When she waved and disappeared.

1865–1867 Westbourne Park Villas

© Trustees of the Hardy Estate. This poem, discovered by Miss Evelyn Hardy among the unpublished papers of Thomas Hardy, is printed by permission of the Trustees.

"Shades of Rome...tempting ravioli ready in minutes"

SET YOUR TABLE the way Italians do—with heaping plates of ravioli . . . real Italian-style ravioli . . . Chef Boy-Ar-Dee Ravioli. You'll think you're dining in Rome!

You can serve a real Italian meal right in your home with Chef Boy-Ar-Dee Italian-style Ravioli! It may not have the atmosphere of the Colosseum by moonlight . . . but it will have all the savory, satisfying flavor of this famous Italian dish.

It's been prepared for you by a master Italian chef, Chef Boy-Ar-Dee. His recipe captures the tantalizing taste and aroma of the finest ravioli—as it's served in Italy.

These miniature macaroni pies are filled with juicy beef . . . then simmered slowly in a rich tomato sauce that's full of meat . . . spiced to perfection the true Italian way.

You'll find guests appreciate the appeal of a dish so different. And you'll appreciate the speed and ease with which it's ready. Just open the can, heat and serve . . . and watch it disappear, at lunch, at dinner or as an evening snack.

And, most important when you're watching your budget, Chef Boy-Ar-Dee Ravioli costs just about 14¢ a serving.

real Italian-style

CHEF BOY-AR-DEE®

Ravioli

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 74

Stooping low, she kept herself hidden as she fought her way through a thicket that clawed at her face and tore her clothes. She heard brush being trampled behind her and Marv shouting as he forced his mule down the trail she was breaking. She drove herself harder as he gained on her. A branch ripped her blouse and another caught in her hair.

Relief surged through her then as she emerged into a clearing and mistily saw human forms. She brushed her sleeve across her eyes, still running headlong, and two Navaho men, a woman and a little boy sharpened into focus. They were staring at her, and a little behind them the dog raced crazily.

The woman was big and broad and in her fifties. Coin-silver buttons sparkled on a velveteen blouse that was a bright red. As Ruth hurried up to her, Marv rode into the clearing.

Gasping, Ruth said, "This man's holding me prisoner. He killed two policemen this morning."

The woman continued staring, then glanced questioningly at the men.

Ruth turned to the men. "Have you a gun? Please—you've got to help me." She fought back the sob beginning to rack her. She had to make them understand.

The woman spoke in quick Navaho, and comprehension stole over Ruth, cold and wrecking. They understood no English.

Marv dropped slowly from the saddle, contemplating them one by one. "Just stay where you are," he said. He added to her, "Get on the mule."

She tried to recall the few Navaho expressions she knew. Into her mind flashed words for the phrase, "He is my enemy." She spoke them quickly to the woman.

Marv seized her wrist in a tight hold. "Shut up, damn you, or I'll pistol-whip you until you'll never see again."

The woman's puzzled look remained unchanged. And Ruth knew she hadn't given the words the right tonal quality, that they weren't understandable.

It came to Marv then that they knew no English. He indicated by pointing to her, and then to himself, that she was his wife. She screamed:

"No—it's not true. I'm not."

The men nodded and turned away. They wanted no part of a white man's quarrel with his spouse. The woman, pity in her dark eyes, turned too.

Marv grinned down at her. He broke into a laugh that boomed around the canyon and came reverberating back. Sobbing, she let him lead her without struggle to the mule.

He had broken her.

When Anne Hayes served up the roast beef with French fries and squash that night, she lingered before Rip a moment, taking longer than she needed to write the check. Her eyes looked bruised in a face that had faded these last days.

"He was laid out real nice. Looked like he did when I took him his coffee that morning, excepting some of the fellows had bought him a dark suit." She shook her head. "I sorta wish they hadn't, because I never saw Clay in a suit. He never owned one." She went on: "Seems like a long time ago—day before yesterday."

She hurried away to wait on a couple of truckers. When she returned, she asked, "Know anything?"

He looked up. "Nothing yet."

"People are talking sweet about Miss Madison—like she was dead. They say she sure was devoted to those Navvy kids."

"That's what they tell me."

They both turned as the door screeched. Charlie Frazier stood there, looking as though he had gone several nights without sleep. He glanced awkwardly about.

"Hello, Mr. Frazier," Rip said. "How about some coffee?"

"No, thank you," he mumbled and left like a cat surprised by a dog.

Anne said, "I could've told him Rosita hasn't been in tonight. But he doesn't think I know. He doesn't think anybody knows."

Charlie Frazier hurried across the street from Anne's and lost himself in the blackness of the alley behind the bank. He stepped up to the back door, his hand quivering as he searched his pockets for the key chain.

"Hello, Charlie," Rosita said, and he jumped. He couldn't see her, but he caught the scent of her perfume.

"I've been looking for you," he said.

"I know. I saw you."

"Come on in."

"No, Charlie." She cleared her throat. "I've got a job in Gallup—in a curio store. I'm taking the bus at eleven."

"But why?"

"You've got two swell daughters, Charlie." She handed him something. An envelope. She kissed him quickly, whispered, "Vaya con Dios," and was gone.

He stood in a daze. Vaya con Dios. Go with God. Another night he might have stopped her. He would have pleaded with her. But Clay's death—and his wife's going so soon ——

Inside the bank, he opened the envelope and counted the bills. A hundred dollars. He hadn't thought anyone had known he needed money so desperately.

He fell into a swivel chair. Two women had come into his life, each wonderful in her way, each loving him.

And both were leaving.

Slowly, as though counting them, Rip climbed the stairs to his dingy office. Switching on the overhead light, he closed the window to shut out the cold of the night, and then sank into the creaky chair behind the desk. As he did so, his eyes fell on the snapshot of Ruth Madison. By now, she had been gone fifty-four hours.

He loosened his tie, ran a hand through his hair and penciled some notes. Joe Barnes' car had been located by the Navaho police at Wide Ruin. Obviously the fugitives had planned to desert the helicopter, pick up the car and drive east, perhaps to Albuquerque. There they would have holed in and waited to divide the loot with the setup man.

He jotted down other notes: The state bank examiner reported that a preliminary check of the bank's books indicated no shortages. A financial and credit check run on several people revealed that none was in excessive debt, although all were living on slim margins. The Federal Communications Commission, which had sent equipment into Flagstaff to search for an illegal broadcasting set, reported none found. A study of every telephone call and telegram in a two-month period to Southern California cities frequented by Barnes and Marvin failed to develop any lead.

He picked up the phone on the first ring to hear Deputy Sam Morales' voice. Morales reported Rosita Higueroa was leaving town on the eleven-o'clock bus. "We haven't any reason to hold her. How about you?"

Rip told him no, hung up, and swung back in the swivel.

The steps on the stairs were cat-light and he called, "Come in" before Hosteen pushed through.

"You're part Navaho," Hosteen said, closing the door behind him. "You have ears that travel far."

Rip smiled. "Your men did a good job—finding Joe Barnes' car."

Hosteen shrugged. "This is our country. We know where to look."

The clamor of the phone cut in. He leaned forward as Rip talked a moment, then reported, "They're ready with the briefing."

They stood about a long table, the sheriff and Sam Morales and the other deputies, with Maj. Robert Downes of the U. S. Air Force at one end. He was a low-spoken, confident man in his mid-thirties.

They crowded closer to make space for Hosteen and Rip. Smoke floated in strata across the small tight office. The blurred chatter of the radio came from the outer room, and from far away the rumble of trucks.

"We might as well get goin'," Walt said. "The boys are all here."

The major indicated the strip photograph spread lengthwise on the table, and matched correctly section by section until a good pa of the Rainbow country lay before them. looked on fire, as though this were forest lan and a conflagration were raging.

He began easily, "We used infrared film— and you can see for yourselves what it doe The film causes chlorophyll, which is the sub stance that gives green to all foliage, to ap pear red. The result is this: every dark objec stands out prominently."

Picking up a magnification viewer, he ran across one strip. "The captain"—he indicate Hosteen—"has informed me that he sent tw men down to recover the bodies and that the would be at about this point at the time of ou last flight." He indicated two dark objects easily discernible as men on muleback.

"And here you will note what may be Navaho hogan. We're not sure about that— but you can see either a man or woman a shor distance away."

He moved the viewer farther. "I had th area blown up—which is on the trail to Rain bow Bridge. I would estimate within two mile of the bridge itself."

The natural arch was so clearly discernib that the detail of its rock facing stood out.

He picked up another photographic prin "Here on this blowup you can see the mule Two have riders, although you can't determi the sex from this altitude. We caught them they were trying to hide out in these trees

Walt turned to Rip. "What time do w move?"

"How about four o'clock?"

Walt nodded. He hoped to heaven th breaks would be with them, for no matter ho many hours a man put into planning maneuver, the breaks could decide it.

Ruth's gaze rode with the ground, and wit Romeo's steps. What she did was by rote— hands that without thinking pulled the tor blouse about her, fumbling to piece it togethe to cover her, and then ran unsteadily throug her tangled hair. Vaguely she knew when Mar swung about in the saddle, and sat for wha must have been several minutes studying he out of squinted eyes.

She straightened, and as she did she saw th expression that said he wanted to break he but not crush her, that he wanted a little fir left in her, so that when he grabbed her sh would give him the fight he enjoyed from woman. He wanted nothing by peaceful means, whether it was a woman or the loo from a raid.

As they rode, the sun fell and the shadow stole quickly down into the wrinkles of th canyon. Shortly afterward they came to spring and mirrored pool, at the foot of shee circular walls rising hundreds of feet, a natur amphitheater formed by solid coral sandston Runoff waters pouring down the cliffs had le the familiar black-brown stains.

She slid from Romeo hurriedly, before h could help her. She walked falteringly towar the pool, dropped to her knees and scoope the water in handfuls up over her face.

Turning about, she discovered him sti standing by his mule, his gaze roaming th length of her long, thin figure. He wiped hi face with a grimy handkerchief, moistened hi swollen lips and started for her. Step by ste she backed away toward the rock wall, boxe up in a dead-end canyon. All the words sh had thought up for the moment slipped fron her confused mind.

As he crushed her to him, she struggled, he arms flailing ineffectually. She said somethin then; she never knew what; but he didn't hear Wrenching suddenly, she broke his grip, o he let her. She ran and stumbled and fell, an as she looked up, scrambling to rise, the clif was a straight line into a sky that the star were beginning to dot. The next she knew he shoulders were being pinned down, and wher the cliff and sky had been a bearded face cam down on her, hunting her lips and findin them, and grinding at them until she felt hi teeth, and struggled to scream.

Laughing, he looked down on her as sh lunged and kicked. "I like to feel you squirm ing, baby," he whispered.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 80

The bottles tell you they'll taste just fine

Seems as if soft drinks are twice as delicious in clear, frosty bottles. Even before you pry off the cap, you know the sipping will be fine. But sparkling beverages not only look more appetizing in glass. They taste just the way you expect them to, because glass never adds anything to the flavor. To be sure of freshness and flavor, insist on soft drinks in glass.

GLASS CONTAINER MANUFACTURERS INSTITUTE, 99 PARK AVENUE, NEW YORK

. . . an active life, a woman's life . . .

then how glorious it feels to rela

©1957, PUREX CORPORATION, LTD

n your SweetHeart bath

Warm . . . welcome . . . wonderful, aren't they, those precious moments of privacy?

But only in a SweetHeart bath can you savor all the luxury these leisure moments promise. Because SweetHeart's special secret is the unique way it pampers your hands and face and all of you . . . soothes you with a gentle touch that floats weariness away . . . whispers its fragrance that breathes femininity.

Only SweetHeart can relax you, revive you, reward you so well—because only SweetHeart adores you so.

now "glamorapped"
in new gleaming foil because SweetHeart adores you so!

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 76

Again she managed to pull her head away, and said, "Didn't you ever have a girl you loved—and respected—and wanted the way a man should want a girl?"

The taunt stopped him. Over his body ran a quiver that transferred to her. He said slowly, "Yeah, I had a girl." Momentarily, his mind was far away, then something inside pulled him back. "Don't try to snow me, doll."

His fingers dug into her shoulders and ripped her blouse, and his lips again fastened on hers but couldn't hold as she jerked her head about.

If she could only keep talking ——

But the words died in a muffled sound as he found her lips. The scream kept rising, never to find escape.

Suddenly she went inert, quitting the struggle. The second her body was quiet, he lifted himself a little and stared down questioningly at her. Half sobbing, she asked, "Is this the only way you can get a woman?"

The enjoyment ran out of his eyes. But he continued crushing her, his fingernails breaking the flesh of her arms.

She continued, "By brute strength—with a gun?"

He brought his hand up in a hard slap across her face. He shouted, "Don't you ever talk to me like that, you damn little broad."

He got to his feet, his fingers working as though they could strangle her. Then, turning, he walked away. Noisily he began unsaddling the mules.

By the time they ate, the stars were hung low, and so diamond-bright they cast a ghostly, milky light over the amphitheater and the pool, so that everything seemed unreal.

Marv alone was dimensional as he sat some distance away, rocking on his heels cowpuncher fashion. He was wolfing down a can of baked beans and the heel of a loaf of stale bread. He tore off chunks with an anger that was far from spent. She sat on the ground with her legs curled under her, and forced the food down with a wash of tepid water.

Previously she had broken the racking silence by asking to build a fire. He had come from hobbling the mules and had been tempted by the thought of hot coffee. Then he said, "We didn't when Joe was with us," and walked off. It was the first he had mentioned Joe, and it was evident he was closer to Joe now than he probably ever had been in life.

As they ate, the quiet once more began to work on her. She never before had thought of solitude as other than peaceful, but now the stillness itself was danger, treading noiselessly.

He drew his hands across his trousers, wiping them. "You're a cold one—for a nurse."

She was taken by surprise. "Why a nurse?" she asked.

He got to his feet. "You kidding?" he asked, and walked toward the pool where suddenly he swore and hurled a rock into the water.

He turned on her. "I can get plenty of women—women crazy about me," he blurted.

"I believe you," she said quietly. "You're good-looking, and you've got a way with you—when you're not taking things by force."

She wanted to keep him talking. "What happened with you, anyway?"

"You talk too much. I can't stand dames that talk."

She ignored him. "Did you ever know your folks?"

He didn't answer and she pressed, "Well, did you?"

He rose and sent a rock skipping across the water. "I was twelve when my mom ran off with the junkie."

He added quickly, "I'm not blaming her—or my old man. They were made that way. It's like the doc said. He's a guy I knew at Quentin. It's all the way you're born. The chemistry in you. You got it—and you can't fight it. Some guys are rabbits—and some drunks—and some of us are born with guts."

He talked as though this was something that had to be said, as though he had to explain himself to himself.

"And with us gutsy guys it depends on how the breaks go, whether we're heroes and they put up statues to us, or we're bums and they sock us in prison. You see, some guys never figure themselves. But I did a lot of thinking at Quentin—with doc's help."

He paused, listening, and she did, too, but heard only the shuffling of the mules, more restless than usual.

He played nervously with a handful of pebbles. "Most guys alibi. They blame their old man, or the breaks they got. But I don't. And I'm not asking for any redeal. I'm just happy I'm not one of them rabbit guys."

He began massaging the cords at the base of his neck.

She said, "You've got a headache."

"Sometimes I get bad ones. Migraines."

"I've got aspirin."

He fell back into his old taunting way. "You wouldn't dope me, would you, doll?"

"Don't be like that." After a moment, she added, "You think you're different from the rest of us—but you're not. Don't you know that most of us have wanted to steal at some time—or take something by force? That we've all got pretty much the same chemistry?"

INFECTIOUS HEPATITIS NOW A NATIONAL PROBLEM

● In recent years the liver ailment known as "infectious hepatitis" has reached almost epidemic proportions in the United States. Nearly everyone knows of a case among friends. It is now reported to be the third most common of our infectious diseases.

Seldom fatal, it is nevertheless a serious illness because of the long months spent in convalescence. Hepatitis is, presumably, caused by a virus, but the specific virus has never been isolated. It commonly produces jaundice, a yellowish skin color, in its victims. Even more unpleasant are the lassitude, weakness and irritability it causes. Fever, chills, nausea, vomiting, diarrhea, fatigue, joint and muscle pain, loss of appetite are other symptoms.

It can spread through personal contact, by drinking water, food and milk. Once an outbreak occurs, exposed persons can frequently be saved by inoculation with gamma globulin.

The only treatment is bed rest, controlled diet and avoidance, for long periods, of alcohol and too much physical exertion.

From Today's Health

He continued rubbing his neck, his head sunk on his chest. "You're doing too much soft talking, doll. I knew a con man like you once. He could soft-talk anybody."

His steps moved away, weary feet unsure of themselves. Soon he was stirring about where he had tossed the blankets when he unsaddled the mules.

"Here." A blanket was shoved toward her, and a hand set like metal about her arm. "You sleep up that way." He pushed her toward the face of the cliff. "I'm going to kill you, doll, the next time you try to run away. I'm going to line up my sights real careful and put a slug through that pretty head.

"Another thing—be real nice to me next time I want a kiss, or something's going to snap, and I'll let you have it. I won't want to—but I won't be able to help myself."

She couldn't bring herself to stretch out. She sat up, leaning against a boulder, and wrapped the blanket about the lower part of her body, leaving it loose enough, though, so she could free herself easily.

She followed him by the glow of his cigarette as he bedded down astride the trail where she would have to pass to escape. Her thoughts grabbed at straws.

But it was no use. He was thinking as she was thinking, putting himself in her place and checkmating each move.

The glow died at last, and he was quiet.

She suffered an exhaustion so utter that fighting off sleep was agony. By sheer will power she forced her mind to keep working. For a time she lay studying the stars and hunting for the ones her father had pointed out on camping trips—the Little Dipper, the Pleiades, the North Star.

She reached a decision as she put the Little Dipper together. She would chance one more break, and if she died, so be it.

Suddenly, she didn't want to die. She had a wild desire to live, and knew this was how her dad felt when he was slipping away, and knew it, minute by minute.

Hosteen roamed softly about the Law and Order room, glancing again at the wall map, checking a firearm, and sanding his finger tips so they would be sensitive to the touch of a trigger.

He swung about as the sheriff said unexpectedly, "We might as well come clean with each other. We all know who he is."

Patiently and methodically, the three had gone over the physical evidence this last half hour, and then sifted through what was not so physical—all those soft, impressionable, little footprints formed in a man's mind by what he has seen or heard, tracks so faint that sometimes only in talking them over do they take on meaning.

"It wouldn't hold up in court," Rip said.

"I'm talking about us," Walt said irritably. He added then, gently, "Though I still can't believe it."

"The People have a saying," Hosteen put in. "Man is like a coyote. Nobody knows which way he will jump—and least of all, himself."

Walt ambled toward the door. "I'm going to get off a couple of shots," he said. "I'll see you at the car."

Their eyes followed him. He was a man bothered and they knew it.

The helicopter rose over a hogan, a corral and a flock of sheep seemingly as fixed as the buttes and mesas. Two officers from the 93rd Transportation Company, U. S. Army, were at the controls, and an Army paramedic hovered behind them, scanning the silent blacked-out land. Within minutes they were drifting over the Rainbow country.

Hosteen watched the land slide by, thinking of lagoons and palms sweeping under him on flights in the South Seas; Rip studied his watch occasionally, knowing how momentous a minute could be in an operation of this type; Walt busied himself with his pipe; Sam Morales spun the cylinder of his .38; and Bill Parkinson shifted nervously in his seat, his gaze roaming from one face to the next in the way of a newspaperman searching out the facets of a story.

The first faraway dim gray of dawn was slipping into the east when the helicopter began settling, like a huge bird coming to rest. The pilot called for Hosteen, and the Navaho stood behind him, talking low, indicating a ledge of rock far beneath them. The two agreed that the hazard, already great, would be increased if they attempted to put down in the canyon bottom itself, and that the rock ledge offered the best landing site in view. Soon they were dropping between walls with the sensation of an elevator descending too rapidly. The walls were not so sheer as they had expected, but jagged with treacherous tentacles that jutted out sharply. Once the pilot took the 'copter back up and maneuvered it a few feet before lowering it again. Eventually they settled as easily as a bird on the narrow ledge.

They took their time leaving the ship, and afterward they took their time about everything, since in a country like this a man's gait had to be studied and thought out, and every chance reckoned with, as in a game of chess.

Walt said, "I'm figuring to stay here and handle the radio." Then he noted Rip's odd, questioning glance, and added, "My arm's giving me a little trouble."

Here deep in the canyon the night was still black. They huddled to recheck the plan before beginning the risky descent to the canyon floor. They were on the Colorado River side of Rainbow Bridge, and if their calculations were correct, the girl and the fugitives were encamped on the other side of the natural bridge. They had put down well ahead of them, and now would make their way back on foot. Hosteen would work one side of the canyon, and Rip the other, both on high ground, so that when the sun rose they might look down on the canyon and through binoculars locate the party.

The others would follow at a considerable distance, and would not move in until instructed to do so. It was agreed Hosteen and Rip would work the advance operation alone. They could maneuver more quietly than a posse, and hence the likelihood of taking the fugitives by surprise would be greater. They would keep in touch with each other through transistor microphones. Each man would carry a white-smoke flare, for use in case of serious trouble.

As the first sun splashed the cliff rim, Hosteen moved stealthily, walking with scarcely a sound, even stilling his breathing. He squatted low so he wouldn't be silhouetted against the sky, and watched his shadow as it moved along with him, since a shadow could betray a man. Frequently he paused to survey the country. Several times he glanced back, scanning the canyon as far as he could see, but he was unable to locate the two Navaho officers who were trailing him. He searched, too, across the way with binoculars, and at last found a sign of Rip when a long-stemmed sapling moved against the wind.

He whispered into the microphone, "Rip—Hosteen here. Hosteen here."

He informed Rip he was at Rainbow Bridge and would work past it toward the natural amphitheater and pool that was not far beyond.

On the opposite side of the gorge, Rip was well behind Hosteen when the message came over. His progress had been slower than the Navaho's. Occasionally he could hear the telltale stir of rock behind him as Sam Morales and another deputy followed at a considerable distance. Hosteen had said that the white man was heavy on his feet, that a white baby was never taught to walk.

At the top of a long rise, and then a turn, his gaze was pulled upward by the bridge span that bisected a sky of great pink rain clouds. The wonder and beauty and symphony of it all lay hold of him for the barest brush of time, and then the spell broke as Hosteen's low guttural words came over. "Hosteen here. Hosteen here. Party has been located near the pool, and the woman seems all right. They are breaking camp, just one man—and the woman. No sign of second man and from this distance cannot tell identity of fugitive. Will trail them as planned."

Long before the light began to filter the dark out, Ruth heard Marv tossing restlessly. Once awake, she began planning how to live out this day, how to crawl from hour to hour. She rose the second she heard Marv stirring, washed her face, and then got out the canned meat and bread.

He was in a sullen mood, his lower lip pushed out and his eyes stony. He didn't help her as she swung into the saddle. He gestured for her to go first, and she did, sitting awkwardly. There was more cold and ache in her bones than before, and every movement seemed to touch a bruise suffered the previous night. Romeo offered consolation, turning big, lugubrious eyes on her a time or two.

Marv rode hunched up, as a man will who is cold to the marrow. He never took his sharp eyes from the canyon sides, down which the sun was slipping stratum by stratum.

The fall of the mules' hoofs grew softer once they left the amphitheater, and more rhythmic as they settled into the old, fixed pattern. As they rounded a bend, Rainbow Bridge in all its bright, freshly washed hues of early morning rose with moving, telling effect. If Marv noticed, he gave no indication. For him it would be only more scenery, a landscape that was so many rocks and trees tossed haphazardly about.

Hosteen squatted in thick bushes, hidden by a boulder, and listened to the slow, plodding patter of the mules. He was so close to the trail that he could spit on it.

The wind had died, and a great stillness weighed on him. It was broken only by his own faint breathing which seemed loud, and because you are the very air he breathes...

CONTINUED ON PAGE 82

Nothing matters but you two. Your world is all wrapped up in this one momentous moment. Don't let anything spoil it. Double check your charm every day with VETO... the deodorant that drives away odor... dries away perspiration worries. (Remember, if you're nice-to-be-next-to... next to nothing is impossible!)

One touch of VETO dries away perspiration worries!

VETO is for you in more ways than one

Cream Spray Stick Aerosol Mist

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 80

the crunch, crunch of the mules as they pounded out these last minutes to zero hour. As an idle apprehension nudged him, he squinted through the brush at the trail directly opposite. He had had to cross it to reach this covering, and had brushed out his footprints behind him step by step. They were obliterated, but still to an eye that could read this land, the brush strokes stood out in bold type.

He told his body to sag, to let his muscles rest. A man could hold himself tense only so long.

The deadened clip-clop shifted from a muted sound to one clear and distinct, and he knew they had rounded a turn some fifteen feet away and were bearing straight toward him. Swiftly, as a camera shutter records an impression at a thousandth of a second, he glanced their way to assure himself the woman was still in the lead. Then he averted his eyes, half closing them. Even a rabbit could "feel" a man's eyes on him. Henceforth, he would time his moves by ear, by the grinding of the hoofs on the hard ground.

In that thousandth of a second, he had seen a tongue running over swollen lips, a cheek bruised at the high bone line, and full, rounded, hurt eyes. He had noted, too, that she wore her stirrup loosely, and that was good.

The night's coldness was still on his .38 as Rip held it in one palm, and the flat, thin stone, shaped like so many he had skipped across a pond as a boy, in the other. From where he crouched, across the trail from Hosteen and considerably higher up, he could glimpse little more than movement through the dense brush. A woman's hips riding easily and then, seconds later, a man's equally at ease and with his far arm swinging close to his side.

Behind Rip, Rainbow Bridge loomed, and beyond, the sheer cliff walls. Minutes now. He took a long, deep breath, and his eyes followed down the slit opening in the brush to his left, straight through to the trail. As he watched, he held his gun hand in a splotch of warm sun close to the ground, and exercised the fingers, feeling the blood coursing again and the bones thawing out.

Seconds now. His hand tightened about the stone. When the mule's nose jutted into his line of vision, he rose ever so slightly and in a fluid movement sent the stone spinning into a clot of brush directly behind Marv. In the same instant, he fired a wild shot into the air that in the canyon's closeness seemed to blow up the world about him, hurl itself about the walls, and surge back on him in shock waves.

Simultaneously with the explosion, Marv swung around in the saddle, a flow of disciplined muscle that found the weapon in one swift, unbroken movement. Firing into the brush moving behind him, he jerked the mule's head up with his left hand, and dug his heels into the animal.

At the second Marv was turning backward, an arm went out in a swifter movement to lock about Ruth at the waist, and the same moment a hand clamped roughly over her mouth to shut off the gasp. As the explosion shattered her hearing, she was heaved in one violent swing from the saddle. The cliffs, the bridge ahead and the patch of sky whirled insanely, seemed to topple and all crash in the explosion, and somewhere up there, lurching madly, was Romeo's big head, and then a Navaho face. She was stunned, and yet somehow knew.

Marv's face became a part of the whirling sky as he swung back, but disappeared as brush closed about her. Another shot exploded. It seemed far away, but the ground burst open near her and spat in her face, blinding her. She felt the Navaho pin her to the ground. And then a man's voice was calling above Marv's. He was shouting something about officers, and calling for Marv to throw down his gun.

She didn't hear any more, because her own sobbing was in her ears.

Hugging the ground, Rip talked into the transistor microphone as he ran, trailing Marv, who had scrambled from the mule and taken to the heavy growth. On higher ground, Rip could see the brush breaking below him as Marv fought and ripped his way like some crazed animal, fleeing toward Rainbow Bridge. Rip followed doggedly, leaping a small gully, jumping from rock to rock, keeping under cover when he could and moving with the dart of a desert lizard when he couldn't.

He said into the mike, "Watch it, everyone. Subject attempting to gain Rainbow Bridge."

From that height, Marv could command the approach for several hundred yards and might hold them off until his ammunition was spent. By that time he possibly would have killed more than one officer.

As Rip ran headlong, his senses told him that the thunderous roar from higher up the opposite canyon was Sam Morales coming down like a bull. A shot roared, and then a piece of rock knifed Rip's cheek as the bullet chipped it from a boulder.

Racing, Marv emerged for a brief moment as he deserted a dry stream bed and streaked across a clearing, reaching the base of the bridge. Unexpectedly, then, he turned and stood spread-legged in the open, defiantly, as though he were a superman no human could shoot down. He took a few steps forward, raising his arms slowly but still holding the gun. His words were toneless:

"O.K., come and get me. You guys win."

Rip stood very still, and apparently Sam Morales did, too, for no living thing seemed to breathe.

Marv continued, "Hey, out there—do you hear me?"

Rip said slowly, "Throw down your gun."

The minute that followed dragged endlessly as Marv stood motionless, as much a figure in stone as the bridge above him. Rip felt the cold crawling up his back, and the sweat breaking out in its wake.

Marv tossed the gun before him. "I said, come and get me." He shouted defiantly, "What's the matter with you guys out there? You afraid?"

Rip whispered into the microphone, "Subject surrendering. Hold your fire and stay where you are—but cover me if you can."

He climbed out of the undergrowth into plain view, approaching warily, his .38 swinging along with him, loosely at his side. A pain slashed up a shinbone, and his feet were heavy as they half stumbled over the rough, unfamiliar ground.

Marv stared with all the hatred of the years, stared as if by the force of brute will alone he could halt him in his walk.

Suddenly he dropped like a dead weight, falling in the direction of the weapon. His hand snaked out for it before his body hit the ground, and brought the gun up. In that unmeasurable moment, the gun seemed to hang there, suspended by the hand. Then he doubled up, and turned once, in the wake of three roars fused into one as Rip and Hosteen and Sam Morales fired. Marv threw out an arm and was quiet.

Rip moved slowly toward him. He heard voices about him, Sam Morales and Hosteen, and Ruth Madison—and yet he did not hear them.

As the helicopter rose easily from its perch, she thought the canyon and cliffs shrinking below were a never-never land someone had made up; and as the craft climbed higher, some of the dull, deadened weight began to lighten.

She looked at the faces about her, rugged, deeply furrowed faces for the most part, sober, exhausted, needing shaves, quiet men speaking only to shake out a cigarette or ask the time. They were men she had never known, would never see again, who had given life back to her, impersonally, for that was the way of the law. But not entirely so, for they had offered water and hot coffee from their canteens, they had been solicitous about her while she waited for them to bury Marv, and later on the long hike back to the 'copter.

Her gaze dropped again to the open face of the country they were skimming over, hot in the brilliant sun, where at long last she had found herself.

A little after eight that night, Rip sauntered wearily into Anne Hayes' and dropped into a seat at the far end of the counter where he might be alone.

Anne glanced at him uneasily. "Hi, Rip," she said.

"Hello, Anne," he answered. "The usual, please."

It was like any other night, and yet it wasn't. As she brought the coffee and apple pie, the fork rattled and slid from the plate and the coffee slurped over.

Her eyes slipped away from his. "Will anyone have to know?" she asked, dropping her voice.

"I don't know, Anne."

"You mean they will."

"It's up to the United States attorney." He sipped at the scalding coffee, then added, "He may not see any reason to."

She looked relieved. "Clay was a good man, Rip. He just sort of—sort of drifted into things."

"Joe Barnes was in here, wasn't he? Talking with him?"

She bit her lip. "I'm sorry, honest I am, Rip. But I figured—well, it wouldn't do any good telling you, Clay being dead. It wouldn't have gotten you any place—and it would've hurt him with the folks around here. They thought an awful lot of him."

"How many times was Joe Barnes in here?" Rip asked.

"Only once I know of." She stared past h into the street. "Clay did it—for that hon wanted, and the kids we were going to ha He didn't think any harm would come o I'm sure. The money was insured and no would lose anything."

She busied herself then folding pa napkins. "I—I shouldn't be defending h the way it came out. But if you'd kn him ——" She met his eyes. "But I di know about it. Honest, I didn't. He ne told me."

"I believe you."

She finished with the napkins. "Nobod ever known about Clay if I hadn't opened big trap and said he was going over Chambers."

Rip forked the last piece of pie. "It wa that alone. It was other things."

It was little things, that at the time ha meant much, but in the aggregate did. C had locked the bag of money in the rear tru though Charlie Frazier said he never done that before, always tossing it back of front seat. A man wanting a holdup to l legitimate would lock the money up.

Then, too, Hosteen had noted that C had fired only one shot, although the Nav officer with him, Jim Begay, had emptied revolver. Yet Clay was fast with a gun. when they started putting the facts toget it looked as though he had held his fire that moment he realized Marv intended kil him, too, for the extra third of the split.

Clay's pockets had been rifled, moreo though Jim Begay's had not. Rifled perh because Marv wanted to assure himself hadn't jotted down anything incrimina

Then, of course, when the Navaho pc found the desperadoes' getaway car Chambers, Rip remembered Anne's idle c versation about a date she had with Clay t to a movie and how he had canceled out "s denlike" when he had to go to Chambers "business." It was evident now he had g there to cache the car for Marv and Joe.

The operation had worked out someth like this: Joe Barnes had wandered into F staff to look around, liking the town beca it was isolated. Perhaps he was planning hold up the bank. Anyway, he learned ab Clay and the money he was running up the Navaho country. Probably he took time in getting acquainted with Clay before sounded him out. Joe was the kind of who would appeal to Clay, a rugged fel like Clay himself and yet soft-talking easygoing.

Rip drained the last of the coffee and, risi placed the exact change on the counter.

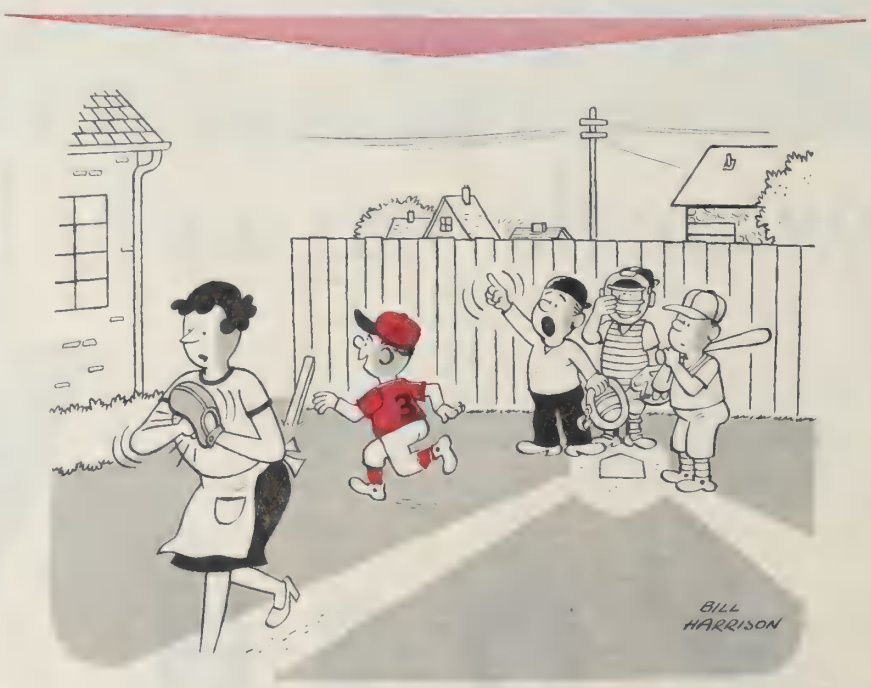
There was hesitation in her voice. "I h you won't stop coming around."

He smiled down at her. "As long as keep making pies like that, I'll be around.

The day Ruth came back to the Red L Trailer School, Chee was waiting. He han her the piñon nuts, and said, "Worry killing me, Miss Madison, but the men w not let me go for you." He added accusin "They took too long."

She started to put a hand on his shou but quickly withdrew it and shook hands stead. "Thank you, Chee—and I think it wonderful of you to want to help me."

"Yes, sir."



"Ma'am, Chee. Ma'am. How many ti must I tell you?"

He grinned. "Yes, ma'am."

After he scooted away, she stood a mom looking across the scorched wastelands to long strip of dark mesa wavering on the horizon, and up to the lazy white clouds in blue sky that was one big eggshell. This the land she had hated at first, and then gr to love, and these were the people who w always be close to her, no matter how far was from them.

Corny had written, "I've never stopped ing you, Hypo. I always knew someday find you."

Funny. A criminal had given her back life. Two criminals, for it was Joe who started her thinking, and it was Marv who mirrored her and shocked her into the t about herself. Two desperate men, on killer.

"Now substituting for Tommy Davis at first base is Mrs. Davis, while Tommy eats his lunch."

Try the field-fresh flavor of Del Monte® plantation pineapple

SPOON IT OVER VANILLA ICE CREAM! DEL MONTE Crushed Pineapple makes a special sundae in seconds! Such delicate fruit flavor takes a lot of growing, a lot of knowing—and we specialize in both on our own DEL MONTE pineapple plantations. Each pineapple is patiently sun-ripened until the flavor is a perfect blend of tart and sweet. Then we harvest and can at peak speed! That's why, if you want all the natural field-fresh flavor of the finest pineapple, you'll buy DEL MONTE Pineapple—the brand that always puts flavor first!

5 fine styles–tender SLICES, dainty TIDBITS, bite-size CHUNKS, handy CRUSHED, refreshing JUICE

just comb it in...

then comb out!

the world's first 1-step permanent!

creamy Prom

end curl Prom

Creamy Prom

FASTER...BECAUSE PROM IS A WAVING CREAM! Just comb in PROM's waving cream once—(then roll up and rinse). One Step! That's all. The neutralizing is automatic! When your wave's ready... comb out!

EASIER...BECAUSE PROM IS A WAVING CREAM! No dripping! No dabbing! No messing! Creamy Prom stays where you put it—waves where you want it!

SOFTER...BECAUSE PROM IS A WAVING CREAM! No after-wave dryness! No snarls! No frizz! PROM is rich with costly conditioners. It actually waves in silken softness... leaves hair far easier to manage. And, it's the longest lasting home permanent you've ever had! TRY IT!

NEW HOPE FOR CHILDLESS WOMEN

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 47

sing a slight bleeding or "premature men- in some 20 per cent of the treated monthly es. Even though these "breakthroughs" d be overcome by a prompt increase in age, their occurrence was inevitably highly urbing to the patients. From Pincus' point iew, the fact that progesterone inhibited lation only about 85 per cent of the time ned as a major drawback to its potential s use.

'hat was obviously needed—both for k's purpose and for Pincus'—was a com- nd as harmless as progesterone, yet far e potent in suppressing ovulation and— r as Rock's goal was concerned—at least ffective, if not more so, in the relief of :plained sterility.

t Pincus' request, several leading hormone ufacturers set their best research chemists preparing whole groups of synthetic oid compounds differing from proges- ne in one slight chemical detail or another. all through the summer and fall of 1954 ights burned late in the labs at Worcester ore than fifty of these compounds were :ned, for safety and potency, upon batch batch of rabbits and rats.

December of that year, the long series imal experiments was completed. Fifteen ne fifty compounds had proved to have e effect as ovulation inhibitors. More im- nt, two of these not only were effective n administered orally but were also from to ten times more potent than proges- ne in inhibiting ovulation in laboratory als.

us, John Rock—aided now by Drs. i Mastroianni, Jr., John V. Kelly and R. Garcia, who left his post as assistant ssor of obstetrics and gynecology at the ersity of Puerto Rico to join the Brook- eam—began to recruit a new group of fertile women for a third series of tests. again each woman went through a pre- ary month of testing to make sure that vas a "natural ovulator." Then each be- aking one or the other of the new drugs outh, from the fifth through the twenty- day of her cycle. But, where the women e earlier tests had had to swallow 300 ligrams of progesterone every day, those the new drugs now received no more 50 milligrams daily, and, in some in- ces, as little as 10 milligrams a day.

Despite these far smaller doses, tests showed he new compounds achieved a virtually 00 per cent inhibition of ovulation. And h the women completed their two-cycle or r-cycle courses of treatment, every last n of them promptly resumed her normal at n of ovulation and menstruation, in- ic ng that the drug had no deleterious ef- ect pon their organs.

a third time, Rock sweated through the va ng period for the first signs that the new ru could evoke what his colleagues now all the Rock Rebound. Within eight weeks is orries ended as the first ecstatic patient us d to his offices and proved indeed to be re ant. During the next few months, six no of his 50 troubled women heard the an glad tidings. Two of them had been ai striving for motherhood for more than u nd a half years. Another had been in- rt for at least five years. And in still an- the case, pregnancy was achieved after more ha ix years of hoping against hope.

T new synthetic hormones were not only io potent than progesterone in suppressing vu ion; they had evoked the rebound re- ti in 14 per cent of this seemingly hope- ss roup after everything else had failed. nc hey had produced far fewer—and far il —side effects than had occurred in the ir progesterone experiments.

Si e 1955, the medical team at the Re- pd ctive Study Center has treated 60 addi- on barren women. As this is written, re -of the 25 in this group who have com- et therapy four months or more ago— e w pregnant.

(I recent months, a number of other ne logists have been repeating the Rock experimental pattern. At the Albert Einstein College of Medicine in New York, for example, Dr. Maxwell Roland has conducted a pilot study involving 19 patients who had suffered from infertility for from two to ten years. Unlike the Rock group, 10 of Doctor Roland's patients were women who, tests revealed, failed to ovulate at all in at least some of their cycles. Yet within three months after the completion of treatment three conceptions occurred, including one to a woman who had not previously been ovulating.)

While the new synthetic hormone was so spectacularly enhancing the fertility of the barren patients of Doctor Rock and other physicians, Doctor Pincus was searching for an opportunity to test its efficacy as a fertility inhibitor under the most rugged of circumstances. He found both that opportunity and the ideal person to conduct such mass tests, in Puerto Rico. There, a tremendously high birth rate and a rapidly falling death rate—the result of excellent public-health measures instituted by the commonwealth government—had combined to make this beautiful island one of the most overpopulated areas in all the world. And there a determined and energetic woman, Dr. Edris Rice-Wray, the medical director of Puerto Rico's Family Planning Association, was willing to undertake the exacting and demanding work of organizing a prolonged, mass experimental test.

Early in 1956 she set herself a twofold goal. First, to establish beyond a doubt whether or not the new hormone would be really effective. Second, to determine whether women without financial or educational advantages would find the drug acceptable and be able to follow conscientiously the necessarily complicated directions for its effective use.

In a bustling slum-clearance development, near San Juan, Doctor Rice-Wray and her aides began to visit women who had already given birth to one or more children and who were under 40 years of age. Many had to be rejected for the study because either they were pregnant or they had undergone a sterilization operation. But as the grapevine carried the word from house to house that the "lady doctor" could help women have only as many children as they could support and take care of, the interviewers were besieged by several times as many applicants as the 100 they had originally planned for their case load.

The anxiety of these poor women to be included in the experiment was easy to understand. Typical was Julia A——, at 31 already the mother of five children and the wife of a mentally ill husband who would not consent to sterilization for either himself or his mate. Felicia G—— had even more reason to grasp eagerly for surcease from childbearing. Though she was but 30 years old, she was already the mother of ten children ranging in age from 16 years to 10 months. And because her husband was both ill and a heavy drinker, the major responsibility for supporting this brood fell upon her.

Early in April, the 125 accepted women were visited again. Each was supplied with a vial containing 20 pills. Each was instructed to take one pill a day starting five days after the onset of her period. Following these directions, each would automatically discontinue medication on the twenty-fifth day of her cycle, since the twenty-pill vial would then be exhausted.

The vast majority of the women followed this regimen to the letter, month after month. Others who forgot the directions or moved away were dropped from the test group and replaced—from time to time—with new volunteers. Some, at the start, complained of dizziness, nausea or headaches. But many of these continued faithfully to swallow the pills and eventually their mild reactions faded and disappeared.

By last January 1st, 221 fertile women under 40 years of age had been taking the new drugs for periods varying from one to nine full months, while they continued to live with their husbands and had no recourse to any other method of birth control. Yet, as long as they took the pills, not a single one of these women became pregnant. "The drug," Doctor Rice-Wray declared, "has given 100 per cent protection against pregnancy in ten-milligram doses taken twenty days of each month."

Nor did the medication have any detectable effect against the fertility of these volunteers. This was demonstrated by the post-treatment pregnancy record of the 113 women who discontinued taking the medication at various times during the year. By last January 1st, 17 of these women had become pregnant, just about as many as would have conceived children within the same period of "exposure" if they had never taken the pills at all.

(The mass tests in Puerto Rico are still continuing. As of May 15, 1957, 117 women—who were still taking the pills—had completed treatment courses for as long as sixteen menstrual cycles without ill effects. And still not a single woman had become pregnant while participating in the experiment!)

During the last year and a half, as reports of the Rock and Pincus studies have been discussed at medical meetings and published in scientific journals, numerous other endocrinologists have initiated their own experiments with the new synthetic hormones. At recent conferences, many of these specialists have reported that the new synthetic hormones have proved markedly helpful in relieving varied and deeply troublesome disturbances of menstruation.

S S S S S S S

I do not pin my dream for the future to my country or even to my race. I think it probable that civilization somehow will last as long as I care to look ahead.

JUSTICE OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES

S S S S S S S

Dr. Robert W. Kistner, of the Free Hospital for Women, Brookline, has used the hormone combined with an estrogen, stilbesterol, in successful treatment of women suffering from endometriosis, a painful and sometimes sterility-causing ailment which Doctor Kistner estimates is responsible for up to a third of all gynecological problems. Heretofore the only nonsurgical treatment known for endometriosis has been for a woman to have a baby, precluded in many cases because the condition itself induces sterility. Now the way is opened for relieving even unmarried women of endometriosis without resort to surgery; and married women suffering from sterility induced by endometriosis may now become pregnant without first undergoing an operation.

Dr. Anna Southam, of Columbia's College of Physicians and Surgeons, for example, has described her treatment of a group of 17 women suffering from amenorrhea, or complete failure to menstruate. In five of these refractory cases—an astonishingly high proportion—normal menstruation periods occurred shortly after completion of oral treatment with the new hormones. In one instance, after a three-cycle course of treatments, menstruation took place for the first time in nearly eight years. Drs. Harry Kupperman and Jeanne A. Epstein, of the New York University School of Medicine; Dr. Jay J. Gold, of Chicago's Michael Reese Hospital; and Dr. Maxwell Roland, of the Albert Einstein Medical College, are among others reporting similar successes in the relief of amenorrhea.

Uterine hemorrhages and excessive menstrual flow—metrorrhagia and menorrhea, to the M.D.'s—have both been promptly arrested in a large number of cases treated with the new hormones by various experimenters. Dr. Carl Heller, of the University of Oregon, for instance, has stated that for women suffering from prolonged or excessive bleeding, the hormone has repeatedly stopped the flow within six to twelve hours. Of a series of 15 women treated for the same condition, by Doctor Southam, 14 were promptly benefited by oral doses.

Menstrual cramp, or dysmenorrhea—a condition which periodically agonizes more than one third of all women—has likewise succumbed to the medication. At the Touro Infirmary in New Orleans, for example, Dr. Carl H. Weinberg recently reported on his treatment of 26 such cases. In 20 of these, the new drug either provided complete relief from all discomfort or, at least, sufficient relief to make it possible for the patients to perform all their usual duties. Dr. Emil G. Holstrom, professor of obstetrics and gynecology at the University of Utah, has reported similar—though not quite so uniformly successful—results in the treatment of a series of sixteen young women suffering from dysmenorrhea.

Particularly spectacular was the relief afforded one young New Orleans woman who had suffered from painful menstruation for more than ten years. As a schoolgirl and later as a saleswoman, she had been compelled to stay home for at least two days every month by the severity of her cramps. Various medications and even a dilation and curettage operation had afforded her no relief. But after taking 10 milligrams nightly for twenty days, she experienced her first pain-free period. Continued treatment provided equally complete relief in subsequent months.

Especially surprising have been the effects of the new hormone in relieving the premenstrual tensions which make innumerable women extremely nervous, irritable and depressed during the days immediately preceding their periods. In Portland, Prof. Carl Heller, of the University of Oregon Medical School, treated a series of 20 women seriously affected by this syndrome, obtaining "excellent" results through three or more menstrual cycles. Doctor Weinberg has reported equally good results secured by the oral administration of just one 10-milligram tablet daily for only one week prior to menstruation.

For the treatment of menstrual disturbances, the new hormones will shortly be made available to all physicians by two leading pharmaceutical houses. They will be obtainable only upon a doctor's prescription.

But the new hormones will definitely not be released, in the immediate future at least, for widespread use as birth-control pills. Despite the phenomenal success of the Puerto Rican experiments, both Doctor Pincus and Doctor Rice-Wray strongly emphasize the fact that additional mass trials will be necessary before they can be deemed completely ready for medically unsupervised use. It will be essential, for example, for extensive tests to be conducted under the even more difficult conditions of squalor and illiteracy to be found in the crowded villages of Japan and India. In both countries, plans for such trials are now in their preliminary stages.

Cautious researchers also point out that, though the Puerto Rican tests have revealed no deleterious effects after more than a year of oral use of the new hormone, only longer use by volunteers will provide full assurance that such effects will not take place even if the drug is utilized for several years at a stretch. Further experimentation will likewise be necessary to reduce—or eliminate entirely—the reactions which still trouble some users today.

Yet, notwithstanding these reservations, the fact remains that the pill is no idle dream but rather a practical and imminent possibility. Nor are the new hormones the only arrows in science's quiver. Already scores of other closely related compounds are being synthesized and readied for testing. One or another of these may prove even more acceptable or cheaper to manufacture than the drugs we already have.

Thus, mankind today faces a doubly happy prospect. Thousands of despairing, infertile couples may soon see their dreams of parenthood fulfilled. And the explosive growth of population that today condemns swarming scores of millions to perpetual poverty may be stemmed and brought under control. END

COOL SUPPER IDEAS:
with chilled Cranberry Sauce

It's a natural hot-weather food—Ocean Spray Cranberry Sauce, jellied and chilled igloo-cool. Bright contrast to turkey or chicken or ham, it's an elegant salad escort, too—for meat, fish, or vegetable. And see how it points up the flavor of summer fruits! You'll wonder, "Why didn't I think of that before?"

NOW IN CANADA, TOO!

For a holiday flavor any day—serve

Ocean Spray CRANBERRY SAUCE

Have dinner at any hour—when it's cold chicken with Cranberry Sauce. Or supper on the porch—your favorite molded salad of chicken or tuna, centered with cubes of jellied sauce. Or a pineapple luncheon plate, sparked with Cranberry Sauce.

DOUBLE

STUART

Opening night: Blanquette de veau, savory with vegetables and golden veal, in a subtly flavored sauce.

Summertime, with its wealth of fresh fruits and vegetables, showers blessings on the inventive cook. One thinks of platters of cold sliced tomatoes sprinkled with fresh basil, served with homemade mayonnaise; bowls of hot corn chowder; cucumbers cooked in butter, with a pinch of dill. But there are all those beautiful sunny days, and who wants to spend much time indoors preparing meals, in even the most inviting kitchen? One way to deal with this problem: the main dish which can be made in double quantity, and completely transformed, quick as a wink, for the next night so that no member of the family could possibly penetrate the disguise. Here's how it works: The first night, for instance, you make a double quantity of a delicious golden veal stew, putting half aside to store in the refrigerator. The first night it is served with tiny tender carrots and whole onions, plus noodles. The second half of the stew, the second night, minus vegetables, is seasoned with curry powder; raisins and water chestnuts are added; it's served with buttered rice.

First night: BLANQUETTE DE VEAU

Flour lightly 4 pounds boneless stewing veal, cut into 1" cubes. Brown th veal in a skillet in 5 tablespoons butter until golden. Remove veal to a heav skillet or Dutch oven. In the skillet, make a roux with the drippings and tablespoons flour. Gradually add 4 cups chicken broth, stirring constantl Season with 2 tablespoons chopped parsley, ¼ cup wine vinegar, 1½ teaspoo salt, ¼ teaspoon each pepper, thyme, rosemary, and ⅛ teaspoon powdere cloves. Pour over the veal and simmer over low heat for half an hour. Remo half of the veal mixture. Cool, cover and store in the refrigerator for the follo ing night. To the remaining veal, add 15 small, peeled white onions and 4 ca rots, sliced. Simmer another half hour. Makes 6 servings.

A second version of this "double feature" plan goes this way: The basis of the two recipes is a richly flavored tomato sauce, with tiny meat balls. Half of the sauce is reserved in the refrigerator for the second night. The first night's dish is a delicious casserole of spaghetti and cottage cheese, layered with meat balls and sauce. On its second appearance, the other half of the tomato-meat mixture, spicily flavored with chopped green pepper and chili powder, becomes the basis of a steaming tamale pie. You'll see how it goes:

First night: BAKED SPAGHETTI CASSEROLE

To make the meat balls: Add ⅓ cup milk to 1½ cups soft bread crumb Mix together with 3 pounds ground round steak, 1 egg and ½ cup mince onion. Season with 1 tablespoon salt, 1 teaspoon each garlic salt and mono sodium glutamate. Then add ½ teaspoon each black pepper, thyme, orégan and bitters. Finally add 2 dashes hot pepper sauce. Remix to blend the flavor Shape into small meat balls and brown in a skillet in 4 tablespoons butte Remove them when well browned and add 1½ cups chopped onion. Brown th onion also and then put the meat balls back in skillet.

To make the sauce: Over the meat balls pour 2 No. 2½ cans tomatoes, or 8-ounce can tomato paste, 2 cloves garlic, crushed, ½ teaspoon orégano, ½ teaspoon each thyme and basil, and ½ cup crumbled, cooked bacon. Simm about 45 minutes. Remove from the heat and adjust seasonings if necessar Divide in half. Cool and refrigerate one half, well covered with aluminum fo or plastic wrap.

FEATURE DINNERS

Delicious hot-weather dishes to make in twice the quantity, ompletely transformable for the next night's meal.

By NANCY CRAWFORD WOOD

2 Second night: A spicy curry, served in a ring of rice, crunchy with sliced water chestnuts, sweet with raisins.

econd night: CURRY OF VEAL

Heat the refrigerated veal and sauce, made the night before, in a saucepan. dd 1 cup thinly sliced water chestnuts and ½ cup seedless black raisins. Sea- on with 2 tablespoons curry powder, 1 clove garlic, crushed, and a pinch f saffron. Simmer half an hour. Remove pan from heat and quickly stir in ½ cup commercial sour cream. Serve with rice, or in a molded rice ring.

To make the casserole: Cook ½ pound spaghetti according to package direc- ons. Then place half the cooked spaghetti in a buttered 3-quart casserole. ver this spread 1 cup creamed cottage cheese mixed with ½ cup commercial ur cream. Cover with half the meat and sauce. Top with remaining spaghetti nd dot with butter. Bake 30 minutes in a moderate, 350° F. oven, uncovered. lakes 6 servings.

econd night: TAMALE PIE

Gently heat the other half of the sauce and meat balls, which has been efrigerated overnight. Add 1½ tablespoons chili powder, 1 large green epper, seeded and diced, 2 dashes hot pepper sauce, 1 cup chopped, pitted lack olives and 2 tablespoons Worcestershire sauce. Crush the meat balls a ttle with a fork while the sauce is simmering.

To make the crust: Mix 1 cup dry corn meal with 1 cup cold water. Add to cups hot beef bouillon and cook gently, stirring occasionally, for 30 min- tes, or until thickened. Remove from the heat and stir in 2 tablespoons butter nd 2 tablespoons chopped parsley. (This mixture can be stored in the refrig- rator overnight. If so, mix when ready to use, until softened, with a rotary eater.)

Spread the bottom of a 3-quart casserole with a little over half of the corn- eal mixture. Pour the meat sauce over. Then spread the remaining corn meal ver the top, leaving a circle in the middle uncovered. Bake in a moderately ot oven, 375° F., for 35–40 minutes. Makes 6 servings.

When a step stool is handy... everything else is!

GET A COSCO® STEP STOOL

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping — Replacement or Refund of Money if not as advertised therein

● High spots to reach? Up and at 'em on ■ Cosco Step Stool, the safer household ladder with the extra-roomy, rubber-treaded steps! A restful seat, too, for kitchen chores. Chromium or black enamel legs; washable Duran upholstery, six colors. At department, furniture, hardware stores. Got yours?

Model 4-M $13.95
($14.95 Colorado and west)
Other models as low as $9.95

HAMILTON MANUFACTURING CORPORATION
COLUMBUS, INDIANA

MONEY...
In Your Free Time

Spare-time income can help you meet expenses. Write for details about our subscription-selling plan. No obligation.

CURTIS CIRCULATION COMPANY
201 Independence Square
Philadelphia 5 Pennsylvania

DO YOU NEED EXTRA MONEY?
$50.35 IS YOURS
for selling only 53 boxes of our Christmas Card Lustre Line. Free samples. Other leading boxes on approval.

It costs nothing to try.

Last year some folks made $150-$250-$500 from now to Christmas. Church groups and organizations did this, too. No experience needed.

Write today

COLONIAL STUDIOS, Inc., Dept. 641, White Plains, N.Y.

Thick Rich BROADLOOM Why Pay More?

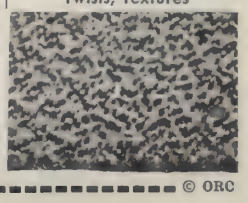
SAVE UP TO ½ by Sending Your Old Rugs, Carpets, Clothing to the OLSON FACTORY

2 Rugs in 1
Use both sides. Double the wear! Each sq. yd. weighs 3¾ lbs.

By the Famous Olson Process, we scientifically reclaim the valuable wools and materials in used carpets, rugs, clothing, etc., sterilize, merge, shred, bleach, picker, card and combine with choice New Wools, then redye, respin and weave into luxurious, new, Two-Sided Broadloom (almost ½ inch thick). Any size to 18 ft. wide, seamless, any length in ■ Week. Easy Monthly Payments.

CHOICE of: Embossed Effect, Floral, Solid Colors, Early American, Scroll, Tweeds, Tree Bark, Ovals



Over 3 million customers. Satisfaction Guaranteed. Our 83rd year.

FREE Big, New, Money-Saving Book in Color—Model Rooms
Mail Coupon or Postcard

Your Name.....
Address.....
Town.....
State.....

OLSON RUG CO. Dept. P-35
CHICAGO 3500 N. Crawford — NEW YORK 15 W. 34th St. — SAN FRANCISCO 209 Post Street

Rich New TWEEDS, Twists, Textures

© ORC

For weight watchers... new low-calorie D-ZERTA PUDDING

Now weight watchers can have dessert—sweet satisfying D-Zerta Pudding. It is made without sugar yet has all the goodness of America's best-liked pudding. Everybody enjoys it! You'll want to try all three flavors—Vanilla, Chocolate and Butterscotch.

D-Zerta Gelatin is made without sugar, too... in six tempting flavors. Keep several packages on hand for refreshing salads and bright, low-calorie desserts that cost only pennies a serving.

D-Zerta and Jell-O are registered trademarks of General Foods

Compare the calories in one serving
Peach pie	406
Vanilla layer cake	309
Lemon sherbet	241
D-Zerta Pudding (with skim milk)	54
D-Zerta Gelatin (all 6 flavors)	12

Made by the makers of JELL-O desserts...so you know it's good!

MUST SCHOOLS BE PALACES?

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 13

Indian and East Asian children of greatly contrasting color.

The climate of the school impressed me greatly—an atmosphere of industry, decorum and gaiety. Obviously these children, want to learn—to speak and write correct English, to know their "figures," to learn about the history of their own old lands and of the New World, and much opportunity is given them to develop their artistic talents and perceptions.

The moral background is in the great tradition of American liberal democracy—of freedom and order, individualism and co-operation. It interested me to see how these children responded to some of our great American documents, reading into them the aspirations of their own peoples. Most of them know the Gettysburg Address by heart, seeing it as universal, not national and provincial, and when they sing "My country, 'tis of thee"—as they do—they sing of their own aspiration to be members of a "sweet land of liberty."

This school attempts only to teach—in an interesting but thorough way. Except as learning is itself entertaining, it does not entertain, feed or transport children, nor accept the responsibilities that traditionally, everywhere, have been assumed by families. Yet it is undoubtedly forming as well as filling the chil dren's minds.

The physical plant is not adequate because first, twice as many parents wish to enroll thei children as can be accepted. It needs an as sembly hall, a playground and administratio offices. But it neither needs nor asks for room in the "decorator colors" that have becom standard for modern schools all throug the country—violent blues, yellows, pinks greens—or for miles of glass walls that the have to be provided with draw curtains to kee out an overglare and that have to be cleaned along with wide long corridors that must b mopped every day.

How are these great plants such as the on in the New England village to be maintaine if even a minor recession from full employ ment sets in? The contrast seems to me to prov that many costly things, however desirable, ar relatively incidental. And nothing has s raised American prestige in Tangier as "The American School," partly, I am convinced, by its modesty.

There are schools in this country that hav become famous, not at all for their plants an equipment, but for the clarity and integrity o their educational purpose and the quality o their teaching. These are the important things confidence. "I heard about you," he said, and paused. "You wouldn't be any relation of Sir Jocelyn Curtis, would you?"

BEGINNER'S LUCK

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 42

"I'm his son," I said, in as neutral a tone as I could manage.

Hunt regarded me for a moment in gloomy silence. Then he turned to Lawson. "Seen any good fires lately, Jack?"

"I hear there was a big one in Whitechapel last night," Lawson said. "At a furrier's."

I smiled rather sheepishly.

Martin said, "It's your turn to buy the coffee, Fred."

"What, when I've been away all week? Not on your life! Curtis can buy it—he's probably rolling, anyway."

I dialed the canteen and ordered five coffees. Presently the newsroom door opened with a bang, and a perky youth came out, whistling softly between his teeth, and gave Hunt a cutting. "Mr. Blair thought you might like to see this."

If you want to travel fast, travel light—take off all your jealousies, prejudices, selfishness and fears.
GLENN CLARK

Hunt took the cutting between his finger and thumb as though it were contaminated and dropped it into the wastebasket. "Now why would he think that? . . . Ah, here's the coffee! Morning, Phyllis! Have a good time last night?"

The waitress said, "None of your lip!" and passed the cups around.

Lawson looked up from a copy of the Courier he was reading. The Courier was the Record's chief rival. "I say, Fred—do you see Mollie Bourne's got herself mixed up in a story again? That girl doesn't report the news, she makes it!"

"What's she been up to this time?"

"Dined with Alonzo just before he caught that plane last night. Drove him to the airport!" Lawson picked up his coffee cup and gave me a nod of acknowledgment as he drank. "I suppose you haven't run into Mollie Bourne yet, Curtis, have you?"

"No," I said. "Who is she?"

"Reporter on the Courier. Always getting into trouble. Always getting scoops. If you want to do well in Fleet Street, here's a tip: keep your eye on Mollie!"

"What's she like?" I asked.

Lawson leered. "Smashing redhead," he told me.

"She's a good reporter," Martin said.

The newsroom door banged again. This time the perky youth made a beeline for me. "Mr. Blair says you're to get a bright story out of this," he announced, and slapped a journal down in front of me. It was the Economist.

I looked round at the others. They were all grinning like apes.

It was a quarter to twelve now and, judging by the activity in the newsroom, Blair's preparations for the morning conference were reaching a climax. Presently he came bustling out. He was a short, square man, with enormously powerful shoulders. I turned a page of the Economist and tried to seem interested in the "Active Securities." Blair proposed an assignment to Hunt that Hunt didn't like. There was a short, testy argument. In the end, of course, Blair had his way, and Hunt departed, grumbling. Mabel Learoyd was dispatched to a luncheon. I was ignored. Martin went to help out at the news desk. Lawson opened a paperbacked thriller and put his feet up.

The conference lasted half an hour, and then the newsroom came to life again. I looked through the glass partition and saw that Blair was grinning hugely. After a moment he came out. "Oh, Curtis," he said, "here's a story for you. A cannon ball's disappeared from Lodden Castle in Sussex. You might get down there and find out what's happened to it."

I thought at first that he was simply pulling my leg. But when he'd gone, Lawson said, "Well, good-by, Curtis. Into the valley of death!"

"You don't mean he was serious?" I said.

"Sure he was serious."

"But it's such a trivial thing. What's the point?"

"Yours not to reason why, old boy. Probably your penance! Anyway, why should you worry? It's a day out of town on expenses."

I closed my desk, and went and collected my hat from the stand. As I passed the correspondence rack I saw that a new headline had been pasted beside my name. This time it read: BARONET'S SON ON ARSON CHARGE.

Still smarting over my unpromising assignment, I headed the Riley for Sussex. Not that I blamed Blair, or any of them, for having a bit of fun at my expense. I'd gone into Fleet Street by the wrong door, the door of influence, instead of the hard, slow way via police-court reporting and a local paper. I'd done it with my eyes open, because after three years at Oxford and two more in the army I'd felt there mply wasn't time to start at the bottom. I'd tended to work hard and make up for it that ay. Instead, I'd made a botch of things. Nat-ally, the professionals were gloating. All I ished was that they'd taken it out on me by nding me on another fire, in which case I oubted if any police cordon would have topped me. This cannon-ball story was not erely humiliating—it held out no hope of re-emption.

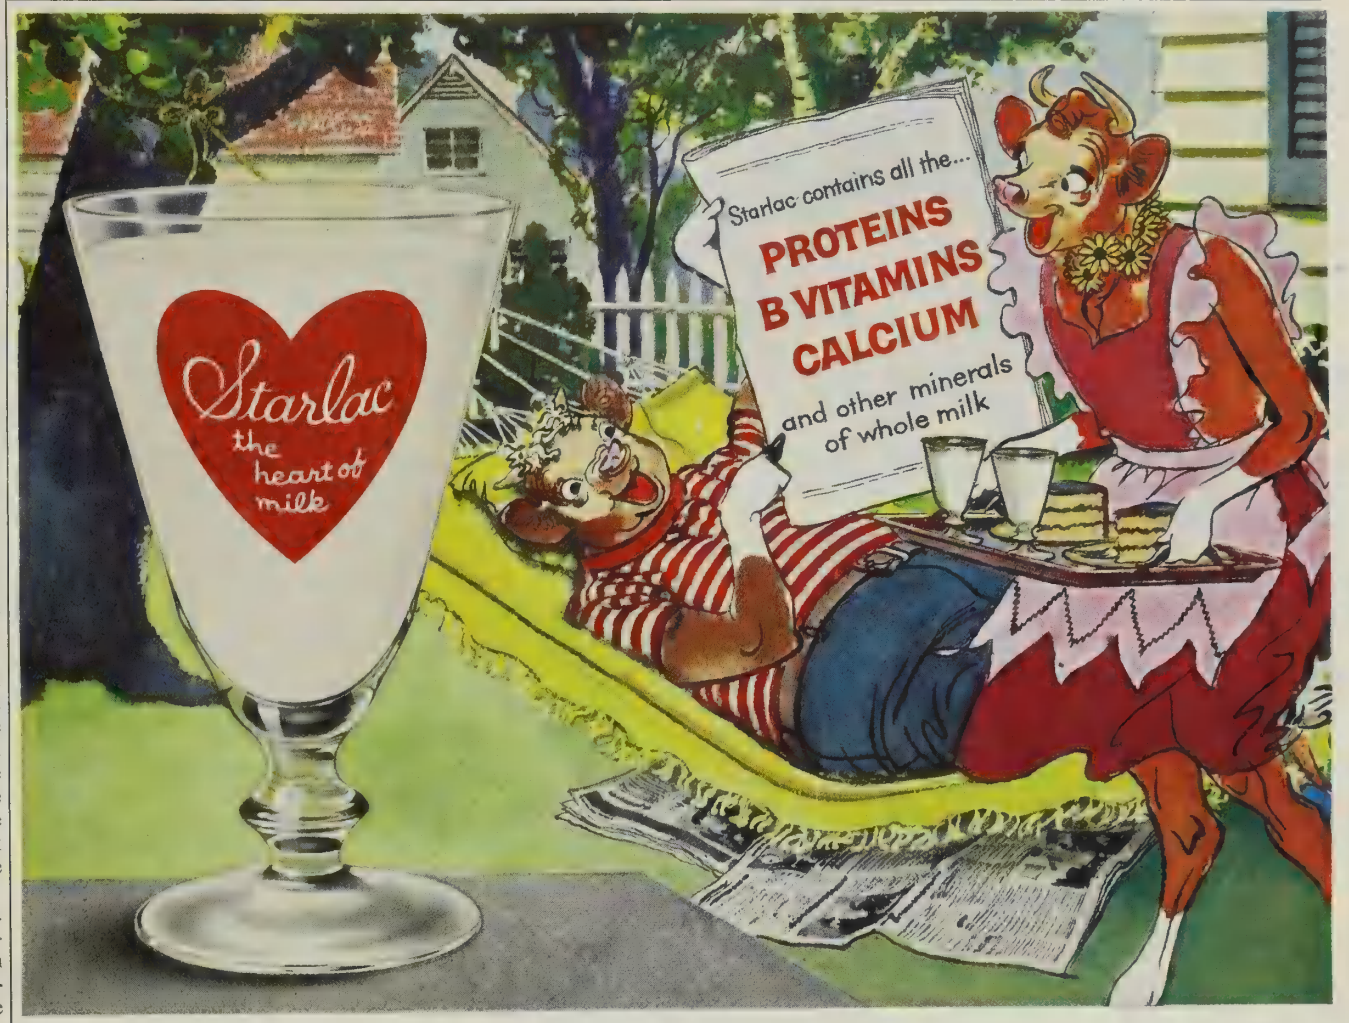
However, there were certainly worse ways spending a May afternoon than cruising rough a pleasant countryside. It was nearly ur o'clock when I reached Lodden, a most tractive little hamlet, set well back from a sy main road. It had a picturesque parish urch, one shop, an inviting-looking pub lled the Castle Arms, and a few old cot-ges, clustered round an ancient stone bridge ross the River Lod. The castle, of which only e top of a tower was visible from the village, ood on rising ground about half a mile from e church. I drove as near to it as I could get, rking the Riley beside a tearoom that, rather rprisingly, was shuttered. When I reached e gate I found a notice which said: LODDEN ASTLE. CLOSED FOR REPAIRS. REOPENING UNE 1ST.

That shook me a little. I'd assumed that if a nnon ball really had disappeared, it had robably been taken by some skylarking oungsters during a visit. Now that seemed ss likely.

A paper tacked to the board gave the name nd address of the caretaker, T. Figgis, Rose ottage, Lodden. I soon found the cottage, a harming blend of thatch and old timber—but ot T. Figgis. His wife, a fair-haired girl who as preparing to leave as I arrived, said that er husband had gone to London, and that she pected him to be away for nearly a week. hen the castle reopened, she explained, he as to be the official guide as well as the care-ker, and he was being briefed for the job.

She said that the cannon ball had been ken two days ago and that they had no idea ho might have taken it. I asked if anyone ad been allowed inside the castle while it had een officially closed and she said no, only the orkmen, and they'd finished a week ago. She as sorry she couldn't stop and talk, but she ad a bus to catch. Perhaps I'd like to look ver the castle? If so, she thought it would be l right, as I was from a newspaper.

I thanked her and she gave me the key, a assive object that made me feel like a beef-ater, together with a short Guide to Lodden astle for which I paid her ninepence. I prom-ed to leave the key under a box beside the ack door when I'd finished with it.



I walked slowly back, glancing through the troduction to the guidebook. There was a himsical paragraph about some medieval gend, which I didn't pay much attention to, nd a few historical facts, which I marked for ossible use later. The castle had been built in e fourteenth century to command the water-ay of the River Lod at a time when naval aids were feared. It had suffered a short siege uring the Wars of the Roses and had played small part in the Civil War. It had been pri-ately owned until 1939 and had then been resented to a trust. That was about all. By is time I had reached the gate, and I set off p the field path to see what the castle looked ke.

was in a wonderfully fine state of preser-ation. It was built on a simple rectangle—bout fifty yards long by forty wide, the book aid—and its crenelated walls, seven feet thick nd forty feet high, were all intact. Except for few narrow loopholes, the walls were blank. t each corner there was a round tower, and n the center of each flank a square tower, and e towers, I read, were sixty feet high. The hole pile rose majestically from a broad oat, carpeted with water lilies and fringed ith hazel bushes. Apart from a small wooden ut near the entrance, which was obviously sed for the sale of tickets when the castle was pen to the public, there wasn't a building in ght. The place had a wonderful air of seren-y and peace, and I could imagine that T. iggis enjoyed his custodianship.

An earthen causeway led across the moat to pointed gate arch, with a spiked portcullis at seemed to hang threateningly but was, in fact, well rusted into its socket. I thrust my key into the big mortise lock and wrestled with it and finally succeeded in swinging one of the halves of the huge oak door back on its creaking hinges. Inside, there was a broad passage with some fine groined vaulting, curiously pierced by a number of large circular holes. I referred to the book, and discovered that they were meurtrières, or "murder holes," through which the old-time defenders had poured their molten lead and pitch as the enemy stormed in. Beyond there was a rectangular courtyard, grassed over with well-kept turf, and surrounded by remnants of partition walls. Ferns and wallflowers grew in profusion from the sheltered crannies of the gray-green lichened stone, and the air was deliciously scented. It was a most satisfying place, tranquil as an abbey cloister.

So far I had seen no sign of cannon or cannon balls, but as I glanced around the courtyard I spotted some sort of gun and walked quickly across to it. There was a guard chain around it, and a descriptive panel was planted in the grass beside it. The gun, I read, was a replica of a fifteenth-century siege gun, or bombard, the original of which had been dredged up out of the moat and given to a museum. The stone shot lying beside the gun, the panel said, was also a replica. It had a diameter of fifteen inches and weighed a hundred and fifty pounds. There was a depression in the grass where the shot had lain, but the shot was no longer there. This, I had to conclude, was the missing "cannon ball."

By now I was beginning to feel distinctly intrigued. The physical effort involved in moving a stone shot weighing nearly a hundredweight and a half must have been considerable. If it had been taken away altogether, it had presumably been manhandled all the way to the gate, a tremendous undertaking. And why should anyone want to steal a stone shot, particularly one that was only a replica? It was possible, of course, that it hadn't been

"It's the modern, thrifty way to get heart-of-milk nourishment" says Elsie, the Borden Cow

Borden's Starlac® is the finest, pasteurized milk with water and fat removed. And it tastes like just what it is—the delicious heart of milk.

This modern milk without fat mixes instantly, dissolves completely, even in ice water. Smart young homemakers drink it, cook with it, bake with it.

Borden's nonfat Starlac costs as little as 8¢ a quart when you buy it in the money-saving 12-quart family size package. Slightly higher in the 5-qt. and in the 3-qt. size which contains 3 pre-measured 1-qt. envelopes.

Use Starlac, the heart-of-milk in your made-with-milk recipes.

Every time you add Borden's Starlac to chopped meats, casseroles or beverages you add extra nutrition.

Milk desserts, sauces and gravies are smoother and pastry browns so much better when made with Starlac.

©1957, The Borden Company

1857 SECOND 100 YEARS

8¢ a quart in the 12-qt. family-size package

NO-COOK SUNDAE SAUCES

Chocolate: Gradually stir contents of 1 package instant chocolate pudding into 1 cup Karo Syrup, Red Label. Blend in ¼ cup water. Makes 1¼ cups. For a richer sauce, stir in two tablespoons melted margarine or butter.

Butterscotch: Add ¼ cup undiluted evaporated milk to 1 cup Karo Syrup, Blue or Green Label. Stir until well blended. Makes 1¼ cups.

When your recipes call for corn syrup . . . that's Karo!

Santone®
going to school in style

Kids know style... that's why they enjoy dressing up for school or leisure in these "man-tailored" fashion pace setters. Santone-selected fabrics are chosen for long wear and easy-on-mother care. At leading children's specialty shops near you... and department stores, too.

Bomber Jacket, Stormsheen with all wool quilted lining and Timton collar 2-6x, about $7.00; 8-12, about $8.00.

Dan River wrinkle-shedding Car Coat, 2-6x, about $10.00; 6-12, about $11.00.

Wash'n Wear Sheen Gabardine Slacks, 2-6, about $4.00; 7-12, about $6.00.

Wool tweed blend Sport Coat, 6-12, about $13.00. Acrilan blended flannel Slacks, 6-12, about $6.00. White long sleeve Shirt, 6-12, about $3.00.

Juvenile Manufacturing Company, Inc., 327 North Flores Street, San Antonio. Also New York, Chicago, Dallas stolen—some vandal might simply have rolled it into the moat for a joke or on a bet. But what opportunity had there been, when the castle was closed to visitors? Certainly no one could have broken into such a place. I wished more than ever that I could have had a word with T. Figgis.

I went on to explore the rest of the castle, and it didn't take me long. Though the outer walls were so well preserved, they were in fact no more than a beautiful shell. The towers, with one exception, were all hollow and stairless. The exception was a square one directly opposite the main entrance. I went through a wooden door and climbed a spiral stone staircase dimly lit by loopholes. Halfway up the staircase there was access to a first-floor chamber, bare and cold, and at the top of the flight there was a heavier door, opening onto a flat concrete roof some twenty feet square. It was here, apparently, that much of the repair work had been done, for I could see several places where holes and cracks in the stone had been filled and strengthened with new cement. A waist-high parapet, carried on heavy stone corbels, overhung the sides of the tower, leaving a gap a foot wide between the parapet and the walls down which more nasty liquids had doubtless been poured on the heads of scaling parties. The gap was protected now by three narrow iron slats, an inch or two apart, so that one could still look down the sides of the walls to the moat and yet tread with safety.

I stayed up there for a few minutes, admiring the scene and enjoying the sense of remoteness that one had at the top of the tower. Then I finished my circuit of the castle, locked the door and took the key back to Rose Cottage. I had had a pleasant little excursion, but I hadn't got very much further with the story.

I sought out the village policeman, P. C. Mathers, and asked him if the loss had been officially reported. He said that Tom Figgis had mentioned it to his superior, but as the shot was of no great value and they were shorthanded anyway, nothing had been done about it. He agreed that it was a "funny business," but he hadn't any theories about the disappearance to offer.

I wrote my story in the lounge of the Castle Arms, padding out the few facts with a bit of description from the guidebook, and at six o'clock I got on the phone to the office and dictated it. Afterward I was put through to the news desk. Hatcher was there and I started to tell him what I'd been doing.

He cut me short. "Have you found the cannon ball?"

"Well, no," I began. "The fact is ——"

"Then stay there till you've found it," he said, and hung up.

It hadn't occurred to me that I might be kept out of town overnight, but luckily I'd taken a bit of advice Furnival had given me and I had a small bag already packed in the car against just this sort of emergency. I booked a room at the Castle Arms, which I'd already discovered to be a homely, do-as-you-please sort of inn with a tradition of comfort. Then I rang the news desk again to let them know where I was staying, and went off to find the bar and drown my sorrows.

There was only one other customer there, a girl. She was sitting on a high stool with her back to the door, sipping tomato juice and doing a crossword puzzle in the Courier. The back view was distinctly promising—she had a mass of rich chestnut hair, a glorious color, perfectly set off by a cool summer frock with unusual shades of green in it. I ordered a small bitter, and as she turned to see who had come in, the promise was more than fulfilled. She had dark eyes and a creamy complexion and a beautifully shaped mouth. She was lovely.

I felt sure it couldn't be a coincidence. I said, "Excuse me—but are you by any chance Mollie Bourne?"

She gave me a haughty stare. After a moment she said, "I am—yes. Who are you?"

"My name's Hugh Curtis. I'm a reporter on the Record."

People will believe anything that you tell them, if you whisper it.

IRVING HOFFMAN'S column in The Hollywood Reporter

She thawed at once. "In that case, draw up a stool."

I drew up a stool. Close to, she looked even more attractive. She was exquisitely groomed, immensely self-possessed. Yet she couldn't have been more than twenty-three or twenty-four.

"You're new, aren't you?" she said.

I nodded. "Straight from the mint!" I told her.

"I suppose you're on this castle story too?" she asked.

"Yes. I thought I had it to myself. Isn't it rather small stuff for a star reporter?"

She smiled. "I happen to like Lodden Castle—my people used to live not far away—and the story sounded mildly amusing so I suggested I should cover it."

"Now that's what I call a civilized way of running an office," I said. I looked at her empty glass. "What about a real drink?"

"I'd sooner have another tomato juice, if you don't mind. I have to watch my figure."

I'd been watching it, too, and it wasn't any hardship. "Keeping an eye on Mollie," in Lawson's phrase, would be a pleasure.

I ordered the drinks. Then I said, "Did you send a long piece about the castle?"

"Good heavens, no. There wasn't much to say, was there?"

I agreed, with relief, that there wasn't. "All the same, it's quite interesting," I said. "What do you think happened to the stone?"

She gave a slight shrug. "Just a piece of hooliganism, I should think. It's probably at the bottom of the moat."

"Yes, but how did the chap get into the castle?"

She gave me a quizzical smile. "That's the mystery, isn't it?"

"In any case, it would have been quite a job to get the stone even as far as the moat."

"But not impossible—not for a big man." She looked me up and down, appraisingly. "I should think you could carry a hundred and fifty pounds, couldn't you?"

"To the moat? Just about—but it wouldn't be much fun."

"Whoever did it was probably crackers," she said. "You know—strength of madness." She sounded a bit bored with the subject, so I didn't pursue it.

"How long do you think you'll be staying?" I asked.

"Over tomorrow, anyway. I'm due for a few days off and I thought of doing some sketching at the castle."

"Sketching? Are you good?"

"Not really. I dabble a bit, that's all." She began to gather up her belongings.

"If you're going to be around," I said, "perhaps you'd join me for dinner tonight?"

"And help you to relax?"

"That's the idea."

"It seems quite a pleasant one." She finished her tomato juice and slid off her stool. Tall, but not too tall. Slim but not in the least fragile-looking. I couldn't see a single flaw. "I'll see you in the dining room at seven then," she said.

She was delightful company. From the way Lawson had described her, I'd expected her to be very hard-boiled in the Fleet Street sense, but there was no sign of that. Her conversation was bright, but not in the least tough. Naturally, we talked shop most of the time. I asked how long she'd been on the Courier and she said two years. Apparently she'd gone there straight from Lady Margaret Hall and, like me, had never been near a local paper, which I found encouraging. She told me about some of the stories she'd been on, and one or two of her experiences struck me as pretty hair-raising. She seemed to find them merely amusing. She had tremendous zest and obviously enjoyed every minute of her work.

I asked, in a mock-interview manner, to what she attributed her spectacular success.

"If you must know," she said with a mischievous smile, "it's just a confidence trick. If a reasonably attractive girl is sent to cover a fashion show, nobody takes any special notice of her. If she turns up to report a murder, everyone falls over backward to help her because they're sorry for her."

"In fact, you concentrate on the men and use everything you've got?"

"Almost everything," she said. "One has to keep a reserve for contingencies."

It was after eleven when we finally said good night—and that was still too early for me. I put the lights out in the lounge, because everyone else had gone to bed, and we crept quietly upstairs.

Her room was number six, two doors from mine. She lingered for a moment at her door, and the heady thought crossed my mind that she was going to ask me in for a nightcap. But she just smiled very charmingly and said it had been a delightful evening and wished me good night. I went to my own room in a mental whirl. At that moment I couldn't have cared less about Hatcher, or the office, or stone shots weighing a hundredweight and a half. I had met, I felt sure, the one woman in my life!

There was no sign of Mollie when I went down to breakfast at nine next morning. I thought perhaps she was sleeping late, but it turned out that she'd already breakfasted and gone out.

I'd asked the hotel to get me the Courier as well as the Record, and they were both beside my plate. I opened my own paper first and looked eagerly through it—but once again not a line of my story had been used. I was disappointed, but hardly surprised. I picked up the Courier, feeling fairly sure that Mollie wouldn't have got much of a show either. But I was wrong. On page three she had a signed story with the Lodden date line and a picture of the castle and a caption across three columns. I read what she'd written:

Mystery broods today over the lovely castle of Lodden in Sussex.

Ever since Sir Bedford de Courtenay leaped to his death from the battlements after an interrupted tryst with his mistress, the Lady Blanche, the inhabitants of this charming Sussex village have believed the castle to be haunted. Strange noises have been heard at night, and there are villagers who refuse to go near the place after dark.

But now the question is being asked, Can a ghost carry a stone shot weighing 150 pounds? For that is the object that was mysteriously removed from the inner courtyard two days ago.

The castle, which has been closed for repairs, was locked up at the time and Mr. Tom Figgis, the caretaker, told me today that the key was in his possession when the theft occurred. The castle is moated and the walls are forty feet high, so that entry is virtually impossible except through the main gate.

Mr. Figgis doesn't believe in weight-lifting ghosts, and he had his own theory. Four years ago a key was taken from the lock of the main gate by some visitor. As the castle contains nothing of value, the lock was never changed. Are the two thefts connected?

If so, the mystery deepens. For why should anyone return after four years to remove a hundredweight and a half of completely worthless stone?

I drank my coffee moodily. It was naïve of me, I knew, but I couldn't help feeling piqued with Mollie. No wonder she hadn't wanted to talk about the castle; no wonder she'd said, "It's a mystery" when I'd asked how anyone could have got in! And all that disarming chatter over dinner! There she'd sat, knowing all the time that she'd done me down and that I was going to look pretty silly in the morning. And I'd detected no toughness! If a light and unimportant story like this could bring out such duplicity in her, what, I wondered, would she be like over a big one? The imagination boggled.

I went out and bought all the other papers that I could get and read them with a conscientiousness that even Hatcher couldn't have criticized.

Afterward I continued to hang around the hotel lobby. Just before eleven there was a call for me. It was Martin. His voice was quiet and restrained, as always, but it had an edge to it.

"Hello, Curtis," he said. "Have you seen Mollie Bourne's story about the castle?"

I said I had.

"Pity you didn't get it. All that guidebook stuff you sent cuts no ice at all, you know. You're supposed to be a reporter, not a Baedeker. Blair's pretty annoyed."

I wiped the sweat from the earpiece of the receiver, and said I could imagine it and that I was sorry I'd fluffed the job.

"Didn't Figgis tell you about the key?"

"Figgis has gone to London," I said. "He left just before I arrived. He's staying up there."

"I see." Martin's tone became slightly more amiable. "That was bad luck. Well, get his address and we'll put someone on to him here."

"All right. What do you want me to do afterward?"

"Stay there, I should think, and try to get a good follow-up. Hold on a minute. . . . Yes—Mr. Blair says keep at it."

"You mean I'm still expected to look for the stone?"

"I imagine so. It's up to you to do what you think best, Curtis—it's your story." There was a click, and the line went dead.

I got Figgis' address from his wife. I also asked her about the missing key. She remembered the incident perfectly. There'd been a particularly ghastly motor smash that day on the road just above the castle, and her husband had gone rushing up the road, leaving the castle unattended, and it was while he was away that the key had been taken. I asked if I could borrow the key again. She said that the other reporter, the young lady, had already borrowed it, and I remembered then about Mollie's sketching. I went back to the pub and rang the news desk and gave them Figgis' address.

Then I strolled up to the castle. There was a new Sunbeam Talbot 90 parked outside the tearoom, a very lush job in cream and sage, obviously Mollie's, and I wondered just how many thousands a year the Courier paid their spoiled darling. Enough, obviously, to make her fight tooth and nail against all comers—even beginners!

New! Mushroom Dumplings on

Dinty Moore
BEEF STEW

Quick can opener-and-mix trick turns out impressive eating! The lean beef, firm white potatoes, tender carrots, rich gravy of Dinty Moore Beef Stew . . . get a luscious topper of Mushroom Dumplings: Blend together 1 cup biscuit mix, 1 tbsp. soft butter, ½ cup condensed canned mushroom soup (add ½ tsp. water if dough seems stiff). Drop on hot Dinty Moore Beef Stew. Cook over low heat uncovered 10 min., covered 10 min.

EVEN BETTER NOW—in the new "picture" can!
1½ lb. family size.
Geo. A. Hormel & Co., Austin, Minn.

keep

COOL

Nothing to stop you from rushing headlong into a clear, fresh pool, a mountain spring, a briny surf! When it's time-of-the-month, you can still keep cool! You can swim wearing Tampax—the internal sanitary protection that really protects while it keeps your secret safe!

Doctor-invented Tampax® is invisible and unfelt when in place. You can wear it under the sleekest bathing suit—and no one will ever know! You can dive, swim, be a living mermaid—and Tampax won't absorb a drop of water!

Any time, anywhere, Tampax is the coolest, nicest, most comfortable sanitary protection you can wear. No belts, pins or pads to chafe and bind. Nothing to bulge or show. Nothing to cause odor.

NO BELTS
NO PINS
NO PADS
NO ODOR

Take off for a breezy beach at a moment's notice! Say "goodbye" to "problem days" with Tampax! It's easy to change . . . simple to dispose of . . . convenient to carry. Why, as much as a whole month's supply tucks away in your purse! 3 absorbencies: Regular, Junior, Super. Wherever drug products are sold. Look for Tampax Vendor in restrooms throughout the United States. Tampax Incorporated, Palmer, Mass.

Invented by a doctor—now used by millions of women

TAMPAX INCORPORATED
Palmer, Mass.
Please send me in plain wrapper a trial package of Tampax. I enclose 10¢ (stamps or silver) to cover cost of mailing. Absorbency is checked below.
( ) REGULAR ( ) SUPER ( ) JUNIOR

Name_____
(Please print)

Address_____

City_____ State_____

I walked up the field path with reluctantly eager steps. She'd probably be patronizing about my poor performance, which would be hard to take—yet I badly wanted to see her again.

She was sitting on a chunk of fallen masonry in the courtyard, with a sketching block on a small folding easel in front of her. I stepped up quietly and had a look at the sketch. It was of one of the towers, and by my standards it wasn't at all bad. She turned and greeted me with a friendly smile.

"Hullo!" she said.

"Hullo!" I said very coldly. I'd made up my mind to be dignified and nonchalant—but I overdid it a bit.

"What happened to your story? They didn't use it, did they?"

"No."

"Too bad."

"Oh, I didn't really expect them to." I stood back and studied her drawing with my head slightly on one side as though I were an expert, and said in an offhand way, "I thought you did a nice piece."

"Thanks."

"Very pleasant flight of imagination."

Her beautifully plucked eyebrows became a little more arched. "Oh, not entirely."

"Haunted castle?" I said.

"All the best castles are haunted."

"Noises in the night?"

"But there have been noises. Strange knockings and clankings—most weird. Haven't you heard about them?"

"And terrified villagers?"

"Scared to death."

"The amours of Sir Bedford?"

"That's in the guidebook. And the missing-key stuff is certainly true."

"Oh, that's true enough. That's why you kept quiet about it, of course!" I meant to sound teasing, but my voice came out peevish.

She looked at me in surprise. "What did you expect me to do—give you a carbon copy of my story? I paid you the compliment of supposing you'd prefer to stand on your own feet."

"Quite right. I'm merely admiring your powers of dissimulation."

"Well, all's fair in love and war, you know."

"Reporting is war, I take it?"

"To the knife! That's the whole fun of it. No quarter asked or given, survival of the fittest, and the weakest to the wall."

"A hard philosophy," I said.

"I don't think so. After all, no one has to be a reporter. If you are one, you can't afford to be squeamish. You've got to be tough—very tough—or you just won't last. You'll soon learn."

"I'm learning fast," I said.

She drew a few more lines on her sketch pad and then looked up at me again curiously. "What are you doing around here today, anyway?"

"I'm supposed to be doing a follow-up," I told her.

"Is there one?"

"I wouldn't have thought so—not unless I can get a line on the chap who pinched the key."

"What makes you think he had anything to do with the stone?"

"It was you who suggested it."

"I didn't suppose anyone would take it seriously. Probably some tourist took the key as a souvenir."

"Then we're back where we were—how did the stone thief get in?"

She shook her head sadly. "Poor old Record!" she said. "Always flogging dead horses. If you find out how he got in, the explanation will probably be quite banal. Why spoil a good mystery?"

"Don't ask me," I said, "it's not my idea. All I know is that I'm expected to produce something good—preferably the stone. I've a good mind to drain the moat and charge it to expenses."

"Now that's what I call enterprise."

"How deep is it, do you think?"

"The water's eight feet deep, according to Figgis, and there are two feet of sticky black mud at the bottom."

"Really? Oh, well, perhaps I'd better content myself with another walk round."

I examined the grass around the gun like a detective looking for clues. There were lots of marks, but nothing at all helpful. I climbed down into the little dungeon, and up onto the flat roof. I descended to the basement of the well tower, but there was nothing there. At least, I didn't think there was. Then I wondered. There was a lot of soft wet mud around the well, and it had taken quite a number of footprints. Some were mine from the previous day, some were Mollie's. Some were probably Figgis'. The rest might be the workmen's, though there was no sign of repairs here. There were certainly three different sets of men's prints, possibly four. Some of them went right round the well.

An imaginary conversation was running through my mind. I was telling Hatcher that I'd searched the castle without success and he was saying was there a well and I was saying yes there was and he was saying what had I done about it and I was saying "Nothing" and he was saying "Then go and do something." So I stayed and pondered, gazing down at the opaque green water.

I wondered how deep it was, and decided that I might as well find out. I returned to the courtyard, where I'd noticed a few tools of

VALUE

By GEORGIE STARBUCK GALBRAITH

Ask not the dweller in the garden
To gauge the rose.
It is the wanderer in the desert
Who knows
The crimson value of the blossom.
A prize's worth
Cannot be measured by possession.
But dearth.

Figgis' in an alcove. I chose a rake, and took it back to the well and pushed it down into the water as far as I could, but it didn't reach bottom. I'd have to tie something else to it.

I searched among the tools for some string, but there wasn't any. Then I remembered that I'd seen a piece beside the parcel of sketching materials that Mollie had brought with her, and I went over and asked her if I could borrow it.

She said, "What on earth are you up to now?"

"I'm trying to find out how deep the well is," I said.

"Ten feet," she informed me. "It's in the guidebook."

I thanked her politely, and took the string and found a long pole in the alcove and lashed it to the rake. Then I carried the contraption to the well. After a moment Mollie joined me.

"Muscling in?" I said.

"Just idle curiosity. Are you still looking for the stone?"

I nodded. "This seemed easier than the moat."

"You'll probably lose the rake."

I pushed the unwieldy probe down into the water till it touched bottom. Then I began to move it around, cautiously, because the lashing wasn't very secure. The bottom was soft, but after a moment or two I came up against some hard obstruction.

"You know, I believe it is here!" I exclaimed. I wiggled the pole, trying to make out the shape of the object, and it seemed to be round, and about the right size.

Mollie gave me a teasing smile. "It'll make a wonderful follow-up," she said. "I can see it now—front-page splash, streamer across seven columns. By-line—'From Our Special Correspondent, Hugh Curtis.' And then the sensational facts! 'Today I am in a position to reveal exclusively that the stone shot believed to have been stolen from Lodden Castle was in fact dropped down a well.' What a story!"

"At least I'll be able to stop looking for the perishing thing," I said, and continued to wiggle. Mollie leaned over the rail and helped to steady the rake.

Then suddenly, horribly, it happened. There was a stir in the water, and a lot of bubbles, and something large came swirling up to the surface and floated there.

It was the fully dressed body of a man.

For a moment we gazed down in shocked silence at the white, bloated face. Then Mollie gasped "Oh!" and turned quickly and rushed up the short flight of steps to the courtyard.

I felt a bit queasy myself, but not for long. I was much too excited. I climbed over the railing to see if I could get the body out. The water was almost level with the ground or I'd never have managed it. As it was, I was able to drag it out with a bit of a struggle. It seemed to be a fairly elderly man, judging by the sparse gray hair. The face, after its soaking, could have been pretty well anyone's. As I straightened the waterlogged torso, I saw that a length of stout wire had been looped round the waist, and twisted, and then formed into another loop which made a perfect circle about fifteen inches in diameter. The mystery of the stone shot, at least, was solved. It had simply been used as a weight to keep the body under water.

I went up the steps. Mollie was folding her easel, her face a pale shade of green. She was not, I decided, with an odd feeling of relief, quite as tough as she'd pretended.

"Are you all right?" I said.

"I will be in a minute."

"It was pretty nasty."

"Strictly between ourselves," she said, "I never did like corpses. Particularly those that bob up under your nose without warning. . . . I suppose the stone was holding him down."

I nodded. "What do we do next? Search the body for identification? I don't mind trying."

"Better not," she said. "If the police found out there'd be a frightful row—and we wouldn't get another thing out of them."

"In that case, we'd better go tell them."

There was a telephone booth near the teahouse. The chief inspector said he'd be right over and asked us to stay where we were.

Fifteen minutes later two police cars drew up at the gate and four plain-clothes men came up the path. The chief inspector introduced himself. His name was Cobley. He was a big, grim-looking man with a thin, tight mouth, but his manner to us was friendly enough.

He knew about the shot, because he'd read Mollie's story in the Courier. I told him I'd pulled the body out, and he looked a bit disapproving, but didn't say anything. He took his sergeant down to the well, and we stood on the steps while they examined the body. After a moment Cobley felt in the inside breast pocket of the dead man's jacket and produced a wallet, which he brought out into the brighter light of the courtyard.

"Bashed on the head!" he remarked laconically to a third man. The two who had not yet seen the body went down to look. Cobley put the wallet on a bit of broken wall and opened it and began to go through the sodden contents. About the first thing he pulled out was a driving license.

"May we know who he is, inspector?" Mollie asked, in her most cajoling tone.

"I don't see why not," Cobley said. "You'll have to give us time to break the news to the relatives before you start any inquiries, that's all. . . . John Hoad, Down View, Clifton Road, Brighton."

I memorized the name and address.

"I'll want a statement from you two," he said. "Just hold on a minute."

He turned to the other men and gave them some instructions. One went back to the gate. Another prepared to take photographs of the body and its surroundings. The third went off for a preliminary look round the castle.

"Now, then," said Cobley, "if you'd just let me have the main details again. Exactly what time was it when you found the body?"

I gave him the details. He thanked me for the information, then checked our shoes against the footprints round the wall. "Looks like a herd of buffaloes has been around here," he grumbled. He had a look at the grass near the bombard, and then set off on a tour of the castle. We went with him, in case he discovered anything we'd overlooked, but he didn't appear to. Presently two men came up the field path with a stretcher, and the body was taken away under a rug.

Cobley said, "By the way, Miss Bourne, what were those noises in the night that you mentioned in your story? Anything specific?"

Mollie avoided my eye. "Not really, inspector. Just . . . well, sound effects."

"Atmosphere, eh?"

"That's all."

He nodded tolerantly. Just then two more men came up the hill, drawing a wheeled pump behind them. They took it to the well tower and started the engine and we watched while they pumped the well dry. Afterward one of them went down by ladder. There was nothing at the bottom but a thin layer of mud and the stone shot.

Cobley turned to us. "All right," he said, "I don't think I need detain you two any longer. Thank you for your help."

Mollie smiled and said, "Thank you, inspector," and we departed together. As we reached her car she said, "Well, this is where we split up."

"War to the knife again?"

"Naturally. It begins to look like quite a story."

"Why don't you get a job on the Record?" I said. "Then we could work together all the time."

"What do you think I am," she said, "a plumber's mate? Well—good luck!" She got into her car and drove off as though she were leaving the pits on a race track.

She hadn't said where she was going, but I assumed it was Brighton. I wondered if I ought to ring the office and tell them what had happened, but decided that I'd better go to Brighton, too, and ring them later.

I stepped hard on the accelerator. I didn't expect to catch Mollie, but at least I wouldn't be far behind. Then, as I slowed through Worthing High Street, I suddenly saw the Sunbeam Talbot drawn up beside the curb behind a police car. A flat-capped policeman was making notes in a book.

I reached Brighton just after one. Clifton Road turned out to be a new one, cut out of the downs at the edge of the town. Down View was the last house but one. I walked up a concrete path between beds of tulips and rang the bell in some trepidation, apologies for the intrusion already on my lips. But no one came.

I was just turning away when I heard a step on the path next door and a woman emerged. She looked at me across the fence. "Are you the police again?"

I told her I was a reporter from the Record.

"Oh, yes. It's about poor Mr. Hoad, I suppose?"

I nodded.

"I'm afraid you won't find anyone to talk to, except me. Mrs. Hoad's up in Scotland, visiting her mother. Dear, oh dear, what a shocking business."

She was obviously quite prepared to talk. I said, "Do you happen to know Mrs. Hoad's address in Scotland?"

"It's a place called Inveraray, that's all I know. I told the police and they said they'd be able to find her. I can hardly bear to think about it—it's going to be such a dreadful shock for her."

I moved closer to the fence. "A ghastly thing! It was I who found Mr. Hoad's body, you know. I've just come from the place."

She seemed avid for details, so I gave her some.

"Well, I just can't imagine how anyone could have done such a thing," she said at last. "He was such a nice, quiet man. I'm sure he never did anyone any harm. There really are some very wicked people in the world."

I agreed. "How old would you say he was?" I asked. "Sixty?"

"Oh, more like fifty. His wife is much younger—about thirty—she's very pretty."

"Have they any family?"

"A little boy of four. He's with his mother. Poor little chap."

"Have you any idea what Mr. Hoad could have been doing at Lodden?" I asked.

"Why, yes, he was on his boat," she said, as though she thought I knew. "He was having a week's holiday while his wife was away."

"What sort of boat is it?"

"Well, I don't know exactly—just an ordinary boat, with an engine. It was his hobby, he was absolutely mad about it. Mrs. Hoad didn't like going on the sea because it made her ill, but she often joined him for a weekend on the river when the weather was nice—and the little boy, too, of course. They were all absolutely devoted to each other. Such a tragedy!"

"Terrible!" I said. "Do you happen to know the name of the boat?"

"Now let me think—it was some bird. Snipe, that's it."

I thanked her and left. As I turned into the main road, Mollie turned out of it. She made a face at me as she passed.

I popped into a pub and had a beer and a sandwich, and then I rang the office. Lawson was on the desk.

I said, "This is Curtis. I thought I'd better let you know that I've found a body in a well."

There was a moment's silence. Then Lawson said anxiously, "Are you drunk, old boy?"

"Sober as a judge," I assured him. "Remember that stone shot I was looking for? It was tied to the body. The police have just taken the chap away."

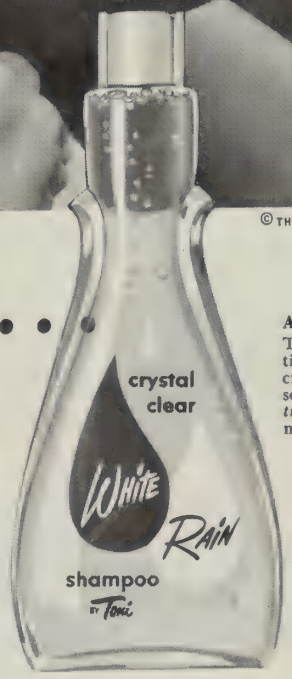
He said, "Look, hold on—I'd better tell Blair. He's up in the canteen."

I held on. In a moment or two Blair came on the phone. "Hello, Curtis," he said. "What's all this about a body?"

I told him. He kept grunting encouragingly—he had a most eager grunt when he was hearing news of a story. He seemed very pleased.

"Well, it sounds like a first-class story," he said when I had finished. "Is anyone else on to it yet?"

"Mollie Bourne," I said.



© THE GILLETTE COMPANY

It's crystal-clear...

the first and only crystal-clear liquid shampoo!

The difference is clear! It's new, pure, that's why it rinses twice as clean as any other leading shampoo. No thick, hard-to-rinse oils. No artificial color. Nothing but rich, crystal-clear WHITE RAIN . . . shining with a thousand sparkling bubbles . . . to leave your hair gloriously clean . . . freshly laced with sunshine. Try it tonight!

NEW! CRYSTAL-CLEAR WHITE RAIN LIQUID SHAMPOO

Also available—
The original lotion shampoo . . . creamy-rich and so gentle. Three times milder than most shampoos.

UNIVERSAL Coffeematic

with the FLAVOR-SELECTOR

CHROME ON SOLID COPPER

No guessing . . . no watching . . . no reheating

. . . it's Completely automatic!

Coffeematic does it all! The magical Flavor-Selector lets you choose the exact strength you want and from then on you're sure of that same wonderful coffee every time . . . automatically. And whatever brand of coffee you prefer, Coffeematic will bring out the full flavor, for it never boils in a Coffeematic, preventing any bitter taste. It's the fastest, finest way to good coffee.

Ten-cup model shown, $29.95. In copper, $32.95. Other models from $19.95

NO GUESSING
Flavor-Selector gives the exact strength you prefer every single time.

NO WATCHING
Redi-Lite glows to show when coffee is brewed to the strength chosen.

NO REHEATING
Heat-Sentinel keeps your coffee at the perfect serving temperature.

UNIVERSAL

LANDERS, FRARY & CLARK, NEW BRITAIN, CONN.

"Oh!" A little of the excitement went out of his voice; a hint of anxiety came into it. "Have you dictated your story yet?"

"No, but I can in a few minutes."

"Let's have it quickly—everything you've got. After that you'd better get back to the castle—but keep in touch."

The story sounded pretty good to me as I phoned it. I had another word with Lawson and then drove back to Lodden.

Things had changed a lot at the castle. A dozen cars were parked beside the gate and the place was swarming.

Tom Figgis turned out to be a strongly built, dark-haired man of thirty or so, with cold blue eyes. He wasn't very forthcoming, but he opened out a bit when I told him it was I who'd found the body. The trouble was, he didn't know anything except what had already come out.

About four I went back to the Castle Arms and there was a message for me to ring the office. This time I got straight through to Blair.

"Oh, hello, Curtis," he said in a voice that was almost genial. "That's a very good piece you sent. The editor's very pleased with it."

"I'm glad about that," I murmured.

"Now look, Curtis, we're sending Lawson down to take over. I don't want you to think it's any reflection on you. You've done very well, but it's an important story and it needs a man of experience. So Lawson will be down early this evening, and I'd like you to work under his direction."

"Very well," I said.

"In the meantime will you try to get a line on that boat of Hoad's—it must be somewhere around. You might find some clue there—and anyway, we'd like a description of it. We've got a good start on this and we've got to keep ahead."

"I'll do my best," I said.

"Good! That's all, then." Blair gave a little chuckle into the phone. "We'll make a reporter of you yet, Curtis!"

I put the receiver down with mixed feelings. Blair's praise had fallen on my ears like music, and the fact that I'd done reasonably well so far made it all the harder to accept the fact that I was to be superseded. All the same, I realized that Blair was probably right.

I bought an inch-to-the-mile map of the district and studied the course of the River Lod. There were only about seven miles of it between the sea and the castle, and I knew Hoad couldn't have cruised above the castle because the road bridge at Lodden was too low to get under. Seven miles didn't seem too formidable a proposition. I decided to walk it.

There was no proper path, but the river ran mainly through quiet pastures and I didn't think anyone would object to my doing a bit of trespassing.

I'd walked about three miles when, from somewhere not far ahead, I caught the sound of a two-stroke engine and a moment later a small boat appeared round a bend in the river, traveling fast. There were two men in it. By the time I'd identified one of them as Inspector Cobley it had swept past me and disappeared round another bend.

I felt pretty sure they were looking for Snipe. If they'd stopped I could have saved them a journey. As it was, they'd saved me one. I sat on the bank to rest and I wondered what Mollie was doing.

Twenty minutes passed, and then I heard the outboard again. As the dinghy approached within hailing distance I cupped my hands and called out, "No sign of Snipe?" This time Cobley recognized me. He slowed for a moment and shook his head. "Not on this river!" he shouted. Then he opened up again and they were gone. Presently I got up and began to retrace my steps back toward Lodden.

There was a strong smell of petrol in the air, and I noticed that the outboard had left a slick of oil on the water. It drifted slowly downstream, a patch of iridescent purple and green. A couple of hundred yards ahead there was another patch. For the next half mile there were patches at regular intervals. Cobley's engine evidently needed attention. Then, right before my eyes, a stretch of water that had been clear suddenly became covered with the same oily colors. The oil wasn't from the outboard! It was coming up from the river bed. It must have been coming up when I'd passed by before, only I'd been too busy thinking about Snipe to notice.

The channel in the middle must be eight or ten feet deep. If I was going to investigate, I should have to swim. I took a quick look round. Except for a small clump of trees just ahead of me there were open fields on all sides, and there was no one about. I stripped and slid into the water.

Half a dozen strokes brought me to the middle of the river, and I dived cautiously. The water was remarkably clear. I looked ahead, and almost at once I saw a large object sitting on the river bed. It was the boat! The woodwork was badly smashed, as though it had been hit with some heavy instrument. It was pretty clear that Snipe had been scuttled.

I surfaced and climbed onto the cabin roof, the top half of me out of the water. As I emerged I heard a sharp cry from the bank. Mollie had just come out from the trees, and she was gazing at me in astonishment.

"What on earth are you standing on?" she said.

It was too late to pretend I was treading water. I said, "Father, I cannot tell a lie. I'm standing on someone's old boat."

"Why?"

"Well, mainly because I've nothing on. Nudity always strikes me as rather undignified."

She smiled, but her glance switched to a patch of oil that was just drifting away.

"It can't be a very old boat," she said. "Is it Snipe?"

"You surely don't expect me to give you a carbon copy of my story," I said.

"I suppose I'll have to come and look," she said coldly, and turned toward the wood.

I called after her, "Don't be silly—I don't mind telling you. Always ready to help a colleague in trouble!"

"Thanks, but I don't think I want my news secondhand, after all."

I rested a bit, and then dived in again. I wanted to have a look in the cabin if I could, but the doors were shut and by the time I'd got them open I needed air again. I reached the surface just in time to see Mollie approaching from upstream at a fast crawl. I caught the flash of a gleaming shoulder, and then she dived. She looked much more attractive than any mermaid. I swam down and peered through the cabin doors. I don't know what I'd expected to find, but there was nothing of any obvious interest. Perhaps I wasn't concentrating.

I surfaced for the last time and swam back to my clothes. I dried off as well as I could with a pocket handkerchief, and dressed damply. Mollie was already on her way back upstream to the wood.

She emerged a few minutes later, combed and lipsticked, though hardly her usual soignée self. She gave me an amused smile.

"The things I do for my paper!"

"You owed it to them," I said. I wanted to ask her if she'd noticed the broken plank, but I didn't, in case she hadn't.

"We'd better be getting back," she said. "If we phone our stories first, and tell the police afterward, there's a chance we'll beat the others to the first editions."

It was after seven when we reached the Castle Arms. I reported the new development to Blair, who grunted happily and said, "Splendid, Curtis!" Then I ran into Lawson. He'd just checked in at the reception desk.

PUMPERNICKEL

In the Westphalian section of Germany, the peasants made huge loaves of rye bread which won enthusiastic praise from everyone who tasted it—everyone except a French cavalry officer, who disliked it so thoroughly that he maintained it was only "bon pour Nicolas"—that is, good (or proper) for Nicholas, his horse. That derisive epithet, "bon pour Nicolas," became "pumpernickel," the name of that dark-brown, now almost universal, bread.

"Hullo, old boy!" he said affably. "I say, I hope you don't mind me butting in like this?"

"Of course not," I lied.

"Personally," he said, with equal insincerity, "I'd have left you to handle it on your own, but you know Blair. Anyway, it'll probably take both of us to exploit the thing properly."

I nodded, and he looked relieved.

"Let's go and have a drink," he said, "and you can fill me in on what's happened." He grinned. "You certainly did run slap into this story, didn't you? Quite a break!"

"Just beginner's luck," I said modestly.

Next morning, for the first time I had the exquisite pleasure of seeing my words in print and my name over a story. I'd made the front page and my first-person descriptions of finding the body and the boat were more or less intact.

I read Mollie's story next—and once again I had a slight feeling of chagrin. She'd done a first-person account, too, but with a difference. I'd described how "I and another reporter" had found the body. She'd just said "I."

I met her in the lobby on my way to breakfast. She looked very smart, more like a photographer's model than a working reporter.

I said, "Morning, Mollie!"

"Morning!" she said brightly.

"I've just been reading your story. I thought that was a pretty good effort of yours, dealing with the body singlehanded. Some women would have been too upset!"

Her self-possession faltered. I detected a very faint blush. "I didn't write it like that," she said. "Rewrite altered it."

I grinned. "I believe you," I said, "but millions wouldn't."

"Cross my heart!"

"Well, it read very nicely, anyway. I don't know how you do it."

"Your piece was good too," she said graciously. "The trouble with you is that you're too modest—you've got to put yourself over in this game. It's like show business." She went in to breakfast.

The dining room was packed with reporters. Lawson was there, reading the papers over his coffee. He congratulated me warmly on my story, but he seemed a bit puzzled. "Are you and Mollie Bourne running some sort of co-operative society?" he asked.

"On the contrary," I said, "we're at each other's throats."

"I just wondered. It's odd she should have noticed that petrol on the water too. Pretty chancy thing to happen."

"She's a very observant girl," I said.

He looked faintly suspicious, but he didn't pursue the subject. About ten we went off along the riverbank to watch them raising Snipe. The police had brought some experts along, and the whole job took only about an hour. After they'd had a preliminary look we were allowed aboard one at a time, with instructions not to touch. Actually, there was nothing very interesting there, nothing to hint at violence.

When Cobley left, we went along to headquarters and for the first time I had a chance of seeing Lawson at work. He undoubtedly had a way with him where policemen were concerned, and, though he didn't actually prize away any facts that our rivals didn't get, I could well imagine him doing so.

At an informal press conference Cobley told us what the police had discovered so far. Hoad had been killed, it appeared, by two savage blows from some blunt instrument, possibly a blackjack. If something heavier had been used, it had probably been wrapped up in a cloth of some kind, because though the skull had been fractured the skin had scarcely been broken and there had been almost no blood. The murder had been committed four or five nights ago. Hoad had been noticed by a farmer, cruising upriver about four miles below the castle, at around six in the evening, which was the last time anyone but the murderer had seen him alive. At that time, the stone shot had been in place; by nine next morning it had disappeared. The official view seemed to be that Hoad had probably continued on his way to the castle, tied up near there for the night, and been killed somewhere close by. The wire that had been used to make the stone fast to him might well have been aboard the boat, though that was speculation. The murderer, having disposed of the body, had then brought the boat downstream where the water was deeper and scuttled it, presumably in the hope that when both Hoad and Snipe were reported missing it would be supposed that he had put out to sea and met with some accident there.

The only indication of motive—and this came as a surprise—was that something like twenty pounds in notes was missing from Hoad's wallet. The case might therefore be a comparatively simple one of robbery with lethal violence, unplanned and fortuitous. There was no other known reason why anyone should have wanted to kill Hoad. As far as could be gathered, he had been a conscientious worker, a kind husband and father, a man with many friends and no enemies. At the same time, Cobley admitted, there was no present explanation of how a casual murderer could have got into the castle, and the police were still looking into this. If the murder hadn't been casual, but premeditated, then it was possible that the theft of the castle key four years earlier might have something to do with it.

It wasn't a very satisfying statement, but it gave us a certain amount of copy. We drove quickly back to the pub and Lawson phoned half a column off the cuff. Then he joined me in the lounge. I'd been thinking quite a bit about what Cobley had told us, and the more I thought about it the more snags I could see.

I said, "What do you think about this casual-murder idea?"

He grinned. "Not much. And I'd lay long odds that Cobley doesn't either."

"He made quite a point of it."

"Oh, he wants it published, all right—but that doesn't mean he believes it. He may be trying to lull the real murderer. You could hardly have anything less casual than the way that body and boat were disposed of. I'd say it was a carefully planned job."

I nodded. So far we were seeing eye to eye. "All right," I said, "let's suppose the murderer had a personal motive. Let's suppose the whole thing was premeditated. Where does that get us? It seems unlikely to me that someone stole the castle key four years ago with the intention of bumping Hoad off on the premises four years later. And if it wasn't stolen for that reason, why was it stolen?"

Lawson said, "How do we know a key was stolen? Figgis says it was, but we've only got his word for it."

Oddly enough, I'd never thought of that. After a moment I said, "Well, can't it be checked? He must have reported it at the time."

"He didn't, old boy. I asked him this morning. He said he had another key so it didn't seem worth making a fuss about."

"Well, that could be true, I suppose," I said.

"It could—and it could be untrue. In our game, you can't be too suspicious."

I said, "Do you mean you suspect Figgis of the murder?"

"Between you and me and the gatepost, I'd say it was a possibility. He had a key, he could have slipped out of his house at night, knowing that Hoad's boat was already moored near the castle, he could have done the job. And as far as we know, no one else could. He'd realize that too. So what would he do? Invent a stolen-key story to provide an alternative."

I suddenly remembered my talk with Mrs. Figgis. I said, "But his wife told me about the key."

"She may be in it too."

I gaped. "I'm glad my reputation isn't in your hands," I said.

He eyed me quizzically. "Don't be too sure it isn't, old boy."

"Well," I said, "you're the boss. What do you suggest we do?"

He shrugged. "Check up on Figgis, I guess. We might walk up to Rose Cottage for a start and see if we can find anyone who heard him sneaking out of his house on the night of the murder."

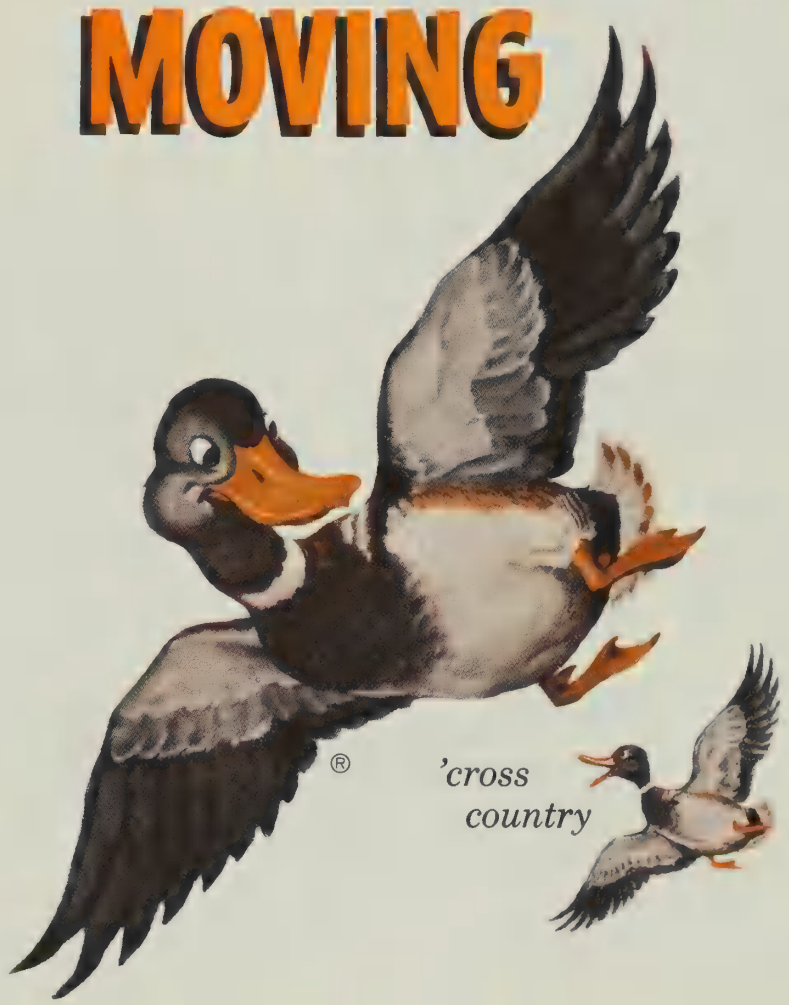
Next door to Rose Cottage there was another thatched house, Lavender Cottage. An old countryman was leaning over the front gate, smoking his pipe. A large mongrel dog sat at his feet. As we approached, the dog sprang up and began to bark. There was a kennel near the back door.

I said, "Good evening!" and stopped. "Does she bark like that at everyone?"

"Most everyone," he said. "No harm in her, though."

"Would she bark if she heard a neighbor prowling about in the night?"

He gave me an odd look. "She would that."



"Did she bark the night that man was murdered at the castle?"

The man took his pipe out of his mouth. "No," he said. "Why should she?"

"I just wondered." I took Lawson's arm and steered him back down the hill.

By next morning, Lawson's interest had switched to something quite different. Several papers, including the Record, carried an agency photograph of Hoad's widow, taken as she was about to start her long journey home from Inveraray. Even though her face in the picture was set and expressionless, it was for DEPENDABLE MOVING

® 'cross country

CALL YOUR ALLIED MOVER

... he's the No.1 Specialist

Ask your Allied Mover for a copy of "Before You Move." See the yellow pages of your phone book, or write Allied Van Lines, Inc., Broadview, Illinois.

ALLIED VAN LINES • WORLD'S LARGEST LONG-DISTANCE MOVERS

clear that the neighbor's description of her as "pretty" was an understatement. She was, in fact, an extremely striking brunette, and she had an excellent figure. Lawson was most impressed.

We called at Cobley's headquarters to see if there were any new developments, but there weren't. Then we drove to Brighton.

Lawson had a talk with the milkman who was delivering up Clifton Road. Lawson asked him if Mrs. Hoad had had anyone to help in the house, and the milkman said yes, she had a woman named Bray who came every morning. He didn't know where Mrs. Bray lived, except that it was on a council estate.

That was all Lawson needed. We whipped off to the town hall and Lawson went in alone. When he came out he had the addresses of two families named Bray. The first one we called at turned out to be the right one, and Mrs. Bray was at home. She was a woman of about forty, plump and pleasant but not outstandingly bright. We all agreed that it was a dreadful thing, and Lawson said the newspapers could often help in bringing a murderer to book, and asked if she knew of anyone that Mr. Hoad had been on bad terms with and she said she didn't. Lawson asked what Mrs. Hoad was like to work for and what the little boy was like and said he supposed when Mrs. Hoad went out she left the boy with Mrs. Bray. Mrs. Bray said yes, she did, sometimes for the whole day. Lawson asked if Mrs. Hoad had spent a whole day out lately and Mrs. Bray said she'd been up to London about a week ago. Lawson said, "Shopping, I suppose?" and Mrs. Bray said no, she'd gone up to have lunch with a friend. For the first time she began to look a bit uneasy. Then Lawson made a hypocritical little speech saying he naturally didn't want Mrs. Bray to give away any secrets, but at the same time the only way poor Mr. Hoad's murderer could be found was to check up on all the people who knew the family. Then Mrs. Bray said she'd heard Mrs. Hoad making the lunch date on the telephone, and it was someone called Stanley and, though she couldn't be sure what Stanley it was, there was a Mr. Fairfax whose name was Stanley who was a friend of the family and belonged to some boat club at Saltwater that Mr. Hoad belonged to. Lawson continued to ask about other people that Mrs. Hoad knew, but Stanley Fairfax was the only one who seemed to offer anything. In the end he thanked Mrs. Bray, and said she'd been a great help, and we left.

We had a quick lunch, and then drove over to the Saltwater Yacht Club. There were two or three members at work on their boats, but Lawson said they'd probably be stuffy about answering questions. After we'd looked round a bit he found a man named Sharpley who had a small boatyard alongside the club and did a lot of work for members and knew them all. Sharpley confirmed that Hoad had been a very pleasant man who had lots of friends. Lawson said he understood that one of his friends had been a Mr. Fairfax, and Sharpley said that was so and that Mr. Fairfax had accompanied the Hoads on their trips on many occasions in his own boat, Water Baby—though not very often lately. Lawson asked him what Fairfax was like, and Sharpley said he was a big, good-looking man of about thirty-five. By profession he was a stockbroker and pretty well-to-do.

We looked up Stanley Fairfax in the phone book and found his address. Around seven-fifteen we went to the address. It was a big block of luxury flats, and Fairfax lived on the fifth floor. We asked the porter if he'd come in, and the porter said he had. We went up and rang the bell and Fairfax opened the door. He was a strongly built, bluff-looking man, with a tanned face and very blue eyes.

Lawson said, "Mr. Fairfax?"

"Yes."

"We're from the Daily Record." Lawson gave our names. "It's about the death of Mr. Hoad. We wondered if you could spare us a few minutes."

Fairfax looked closely at each of us in turn, and glanced at his watch. "I suppose so," he said, "though it'll have to be a very few minutes—I'm expecting someone for dinner. Come in, will you?" He led the way into his sitting room.

"We understand you were a friend of Mr. Hoad's?" Lawson said.

"Yes, indeed. I've known him for years. Shocking business!"

Lawson said, "The thing is, sir, everyone tells us that Mr. Hoad had no enemies, and yet someone killed him. The Record thought it might be a good idea to visit everyone who had any contact with the family. Naturally we don't want to trouble Mrs. Hoad at such a time."

Fairfax nodded. "Well, I'd be only too glad to help, but there's nothing I can suggest. I'm utterly baffled."

"Didn't he have any trouble at all, with anyone?"

"If he did, I never heard of it."

Lawson appeared to hesitate. "There was one bit of information we got, sir ——" He broke off. "You'll understand that it's a little difficult to mention these things, particularly to a friend of the family—but we gathered Mrs. Hoad lunched with some man in London last week. There seems to be a bit of a mystery about it—we wondered if by any chance he could be connected with the case in some way, and if you could suggest who he was."

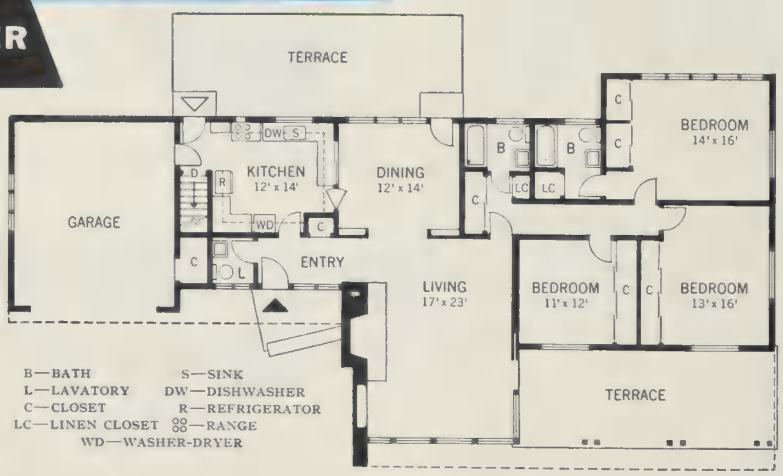
Fairfax stared at him. "Is this some sort of gag?"

"I'm afraid I don't know what you mean."

"Do you really not know who the man was?"

"Indeed we don't."

"Well, that's one thing I can clear up for you," Fairfax said. "The man wasn't connected with the case in any way at all. Actually, Mrs. Hoad was lunching with me."



CONTINUED ON PAGE 98

ARCHITECTS: MCCOY AND BLAIR; PHOTOGRAPHER: RUDOLPH E. LEPPERT, JR.

House and Setting

PLANNED TOGETHER

Careful attention to detail lends distinction to this attractive one-floor home.

By CAROL L. CRANE

From its sunny foyer to its expansive rear terrace, this three-bedroom house is large in charm, comfort and convenience. To make the most of a lovely wooded lot, it opens large glass areas to the view in three directions. But see how the house and its setting, planned as one, secure privacy for the occupants.

Opaque windows in the entry admit softly diffused sunlight, yet protect indoor privacy. Floor-to-ceiling windows in the living room face the road, but are shielded from view by a projection of the fireplace wall beyond the building line. Carefully placed evergreens provide pretty year-round concealment for the sheltered front terrace.

Inside, the house combines openness in the living areas with seclusion for the sleeping wing. Living and dining rooms make one large, inviting space for entertaining—and parties can overflow out-of-doors to front and rear terraces. The generously proportioned kitchen uses every spare inch for cabinet space; notice the cupboards over dining-room and entry doors, so handy for seldom-used items. Kitchen is strategically located to save meal-serving footsteps, whether for formal dining, living-room snacks or backyard barbecues.

The sleeping wing is amply supplied with storage space. There's a linen closet for each bathroom, and wall-to-wall closets in each of the bedrooms, placed to free a maximum of floor area for easy furniture arranging. And notice the big, big utility closet at the entrance to the bedroom hall.

Exterior walls of vertical cypress siding are stain-finished for easy maintenance in a warm gray-brown; built-up roof and painted trim are both a sparkling white. Rough stone chimney wall in shades of gray, tan and brown, and crushed bluestone driveway, complete an attractive scheme.

Estimates for building this house range from $19,800 to $27,800, depending upon regional variations in cost of labor and materials. Sorry, no plans available.

New idea! VINYL in a floor wax

and the beauty of it is — *it's childproof

Never before such a high gloss!

New Simoniz Floor Wax with vinyl in it, gives you higher gloss than you've ever known. On any kind of floor—linoleum, asphalt, rubber, vinyl tile or finished wood! Throughout the house!

No wax easier to apply!

New Simoniz Floor Wax polishes itself. No buffing. No rubbing. It spreads evenly —without streaks—quickly sets to a tough, beautiful, vinyl gloss!

Wet spills won't harm gloss!

Splashes and spills—so common with children—won't hurt the tough vinyl surface —or shine. Simply wipe them up. New Simoniz Floor Wax is water-repellent.

Never before such protection!

The miracle of vinyl—and only Simoniz has it—gives you the toughest floor surface. The kids won't scuff it, or harm the gloss with their roughhousing. No doubt about it—it's childproof!

No finish so easy to maintain!

Simoniz Floor Wax with vinyl has a gloss that lasts and lasts. You can even damp mop your floors freely without dulling the shine. Without spoiling the wax finish.

Good news about re-waxing!

Here's the one floor wax you can remove evenly before re-waxing. Simply use your regular household detergent and warm water. The beauty increases with re-waxing. You'll be amazed, once you try it.

Simoniz® Floor Wax

For all floors—linoleum, asphalt, rubber, vinyl tile and finished wood

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 96

"Really?" said Lawson. He contrived to look quite confused. "I see—I'm afraid that never occurred to us. . . . It looks as though we've been wasting our time, then. Yours, too, I'm afraid." He picked up his hat—but his expression invited further information.

Fairfax said, in a faintly ironical tone, "If you're interested, it was Mr. Hoad's birthday the next day and Mrs. Hoad wanted to buy him something for his boat. She asked me to help her choose it."

At that moment there was a ring at the door. Fairfax said, "Excuse me," and went out into the passage and opened the door.

Someone said, "Hullo, darling, am I late?" and a pretty blond girl appeared.

Fairfax said, "I've just been talking to the press, Lena. About poor old John." He introduced us. "Mr. Lawson, Mr. Curtis—my fiancée, gentlemen. I'm sorry I can't help you further."

Soon even the theories began to fizzle out. By the end of the fourth day, the story was beginning to look very frayed. We were suddenly told that the police had completed their inquiries in and around the castle and that Inspector Cobley was returning to his permanent HQ in the county town. That didn't mean, it was emphasized, that the case was being shelved—all it meant was that there was nothing more to be done around Lodden.

Several reporters drifted away that evening. Figgis returned to London and it was stated that the reopening of the castle would be postponed for a month to allow morbid public interest to die down. Lawson gathered together our last few scraps of information and phoned them to Blair, and Blair said we were both to return to the office in the morning. Personally, I felt quite ready to go. Mollie, I gathered, was staying on for a day or two, but only because she now had even more "days off" owing to her. I suggested that, now that the work was done, we should drive into Brighton and have dinner and perhaps dance, but she said she was tired. She didn't look tired. She never looked tired.

I sat up rather late that night, drinking bitter and talking shop with Lawson. By now he'd completely accepted me, and we got along fine together. It was nearly midnight when we went up to bed. Even then I wasn't in a hurry to turn in. I sat in the window seat of my room, finishing my pipe, and gazing down at the quiet street.

The church clock struck twelve. As the last note died away I caught a sound from below which, at that time of night, was most unusual. It sounded like the front door of the pub being opened. I looked out, and saw a shadowy figure slip into the street and walk quickly away. It was Mollie!

I hesitated, but only for a second. It was possible that she was simply in need of fresh air, but it seemed most unlikely. I remembered Lawson's advice—"Keep your eye on Mollie!" I crept downstairs and let myself out. I could still hear the light tap of her heels on the road. She was going up the hill toward the castle. I closed the door softly behind me and set off after her.

The night was very dark. Lodden's two street lamps were already out; not a light glimmered in any of the cottages. I could see nothing of Mollie at all. I assumed that she must be making straight for the castle, and went cautiously forward in what I hoped was the right direction.

It was eerie out there in the lonely darkness. Until now I'd taken a pretty impersonal view of the castle murder—I hadn't known or met any of the people directly affected, and to me it had been just a story, a mystery to be solved. Tonight I felt less detached. The battlements of the silent castle, which I could just make out now as a vague shape against the sky, had a brooding, sinister air. The thought that a savage killer had been at work here so recently was unpleasant. Whatever it was that Mollie was up to, she had plenty of nerve. For a while I stood still and listened. Then a twig cracked sharply, away to the right. Mollie was down by the river. She seemed to be working her way round the foot of the castle hill. What on earth could she hope to discover in the dark?

Suddenly I felt my flesh creep. A slow, stealthy tread came from behind me. The back of my head tingled. If only I could see something!

I stood very still, listening. I could hear nothing now. I took ten paces downhill, and stopped once more. Again for a second I caught the sound of that cautious, menacing step—then, silence!

I took another step—and almost missed my footing. I crouched down and felt the ground with my hands and it fell away sharply. After a moment I touched water. It was too shallow for the river—it must be the tributary. I drew back, listening. The movement behind me was louder. I could hear breathing, agitated breathing. The shape of a man rose above me. I made a dive for him.

There was a fearful yell, a moment of wild struggle, and then he went plunging down the bank into the stream. It was Lawson!

Judging by the gasping and splashing, he was in a pretty panic. I called out in a fierce whisper, "It's me—Curtis! Come out, you clot!" There was a second's silence, and then he came clambering up the bank toward me, breathing hard. I stretched out a hand and helped him. He was soaked from head to foot.

"Heavens!" he said. "You gave me an awful fright!"

"You gave me one too. What on earth are you doing here?"

"Same as you, I suppose. I saw Mollie slip out and thought I'd better follow. I didn't realize you'd seen her too. What's she up to?"

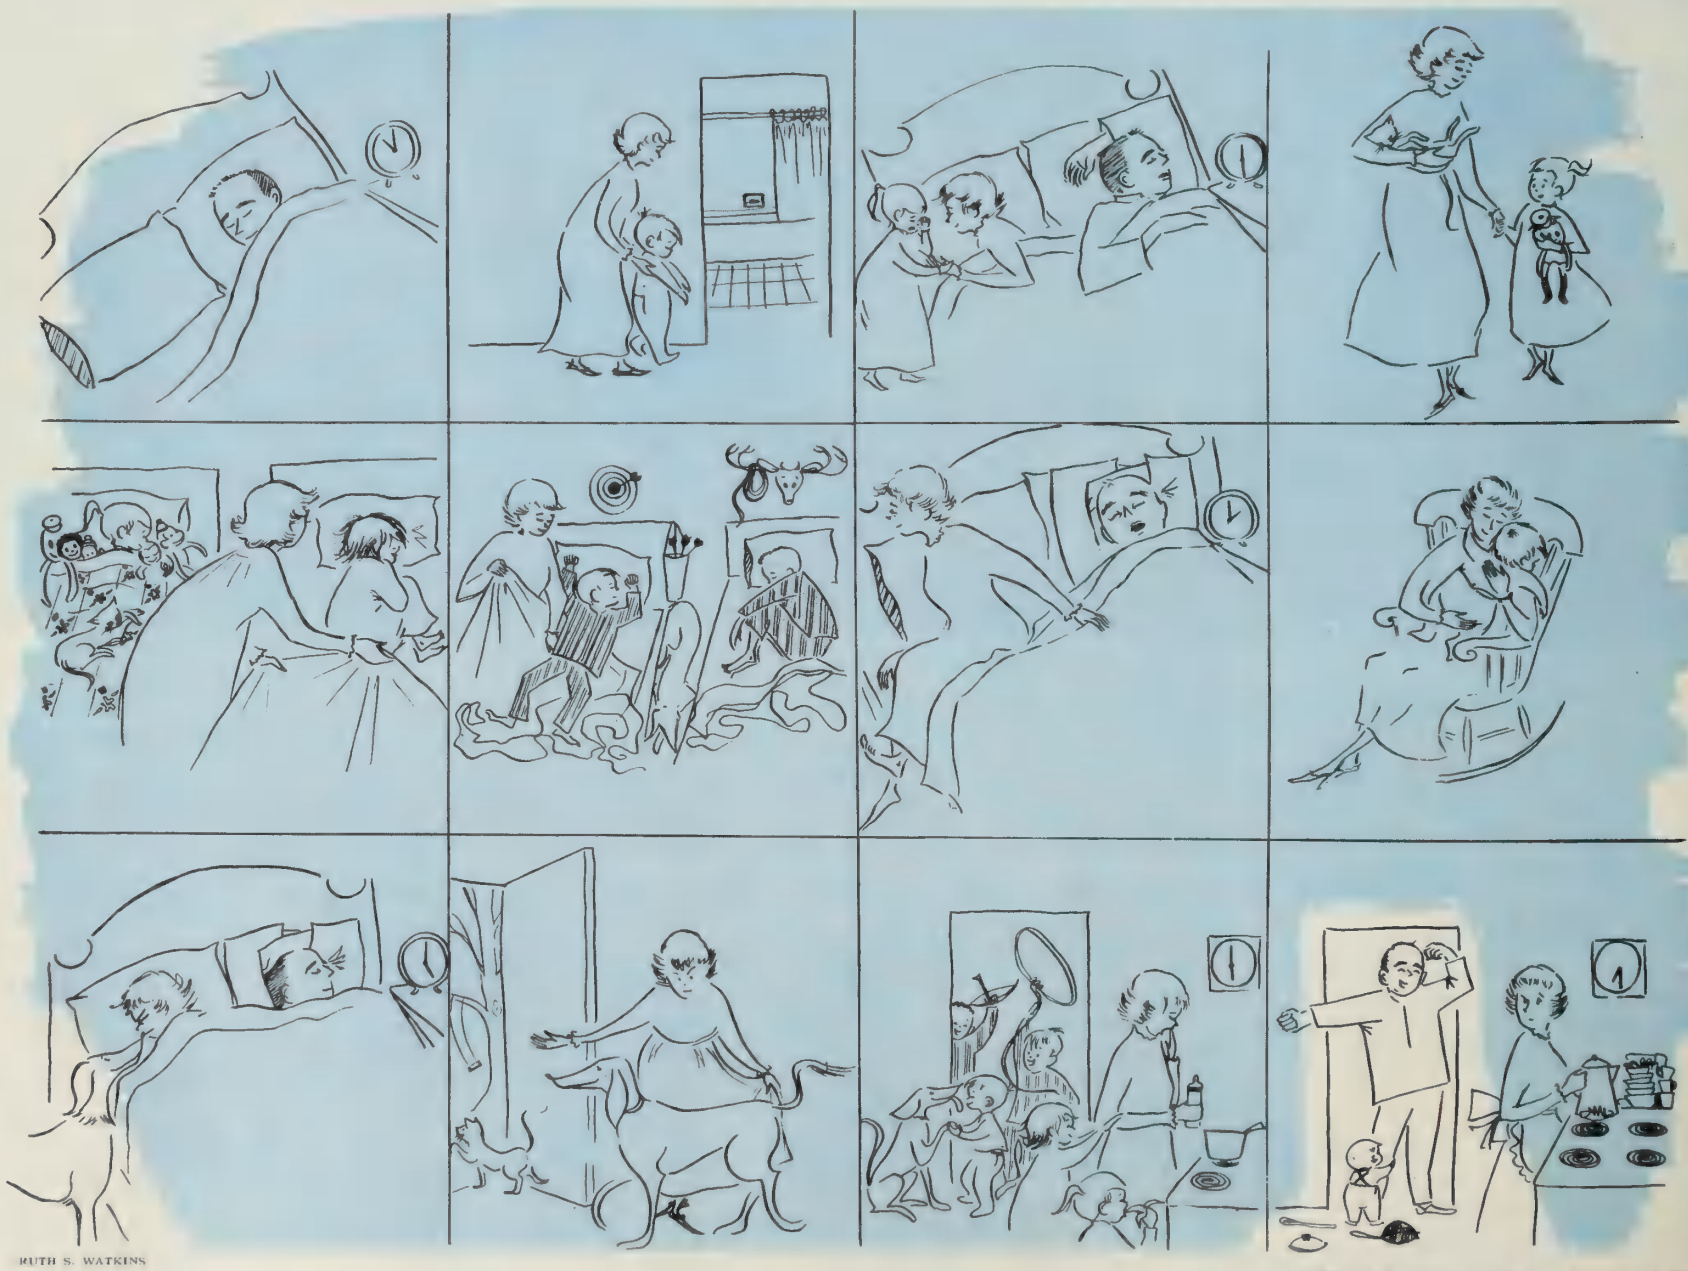
"I haven't a clue. I don't even know where she is now."

He shivered. "Well, I'd better get back to the pub—I can't stick around in this state. What are you going to do?"

"I'll stay for a bit, now I'm here."

It had been a ridiculous episode, but at least it had broken the tension. Mollie must have heard us, so there was no point in keeping quiet any more.

I turned up the slope toward the castle. Near the top I stopped to listen again. As I did so, a voice almost at my feet said, "Is that you, Hugh?" I hadn't found Mollie—Mollie had found me.



I said "Yes" and dropped down beside her on the grass.

She said, "What's the idea of following me?"

"Magnetic attraction," I told her.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 100

BE SURE TO BRING THE CHILDREN

RUTH S. WATKINS

"Great sleeping weather, eh, sweetie?"

Kroehler dealers everywhere invite you to live elegantly on a modest budget!

THE PERSONALITY® GROUP as shown in bouclé metallic texture can be yours at these low prices: Open-end sofa, each $129.75. Quarter circle, $129.50. Twin-sectional sofa, each $119.75. Lounge chair, $89.50. Also available, not shown: Sofa, $165.00. Armless chair, $79.50. Sleep-or-Lounge, $279.50. Foam rubber cushions at extra cost. Prices slightly higher in some areas and vary with fabric selected.

SEE THE EXCITING NEW PERSONALITY® LIVING ROOM GROUP

The moment this fresh new furniture becomes part of your living room, your home comes alive with inviting new comfort and charm . . . and with styling that makes every glance a compliment to your own good taste. Best of all, you live elegantly on a modest budget!

PLUS® Built + for the years ahead! You choose wisely when you choose living room furniture by Kroehler because it's Plus-Built . . . extra rugged in nine important ways . . . built to stand up beautifully under the extra wear and tear of this age of TV and active family home life.

WORLD'S LARGEST FURNITURE MANUFACTURER

KROEHLER

(pronounced "KRAY-ler")

PLUS-BUILT® LIVING ROOM FURNITURE

PERMANIZED® DINING ROOM AND BEDROOM FURNITURE

General Offices: Naperville, Illinois

In Canada: Stratford, Ontario

MOTHER, STOP HURTING YOUR CHILD with old-fashioned, harsh antiseptics!

NEW JOHNSON & JOHNSON FIRST AID CREAM fights infection; speeds healing—without stinging!

No other antiseptic—liquid or cream—is so effective, yet so safe for cuts, burns, abrasions:

✓ won't sting—won't irritate tissues ✓ speeds healing
✓ fights infection ✓ penetrates deeper, protects longer
✓ relieves pain quickly ✓ greaseless, stainless

Keep a tube handy in your home, car, office or workshop.

Johnson & Johnson

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 98

"Was that Lawson down there?"

"Yes. He's gone back to take a mustard bath." I told her what had happened.

"You are a couple of idiots."

"We had no choice. It's a rigid instruction at the Record—'Keep your eye on Mollie.' What are you doing here, anyway?"

"Following a hunch."

"So I imagined. May I know what? I mean, if it comes off I'm bound to be in on it now, aren't I?"

"Well, it's quite simple. My idea is that Hoad may have been killed because he saw something he shouldn't have."

"At the castle?"

"Probably. Someone might have been doing something there in secret."

"Well, it's an interesting thought," I said, "and you may be right. But that still doesn't explain what you're doing here. The murderer's hardly likely to show up again."

"He might, if his work was interrupted."

"Wouldn't he have finished it before he left?"

"He wouldn't have had much time," Mollie said. "Getting rid of the body and scuttling the boat must have taken hours. . . . Anyway, if he'd thought he could finish it he'd hardly have gone to all that trouble to cover up what had happened. He'd simply have finished it and cleared off. At least, I should think so. I'd say he knew he had to come back."

"Even if you're right, what makes you think he might turn up tonight?"

"It's the first night he could do it safely. The police have gone—the coast's clear."

"That's a point. . . . So how long do you plan to stay here?"

"Oh, an hour or two."

"I thought you said you were tired!"

She laughed softly.

"Well," I said, "what do you want me to do? Leave you to it?"

"I don't insist—not if you don't make a noise. Nobody's likely to come if we chatter."

"I won't make a sound," I said.

My eyes had got used to the darkness by now. I could make out the loom of the castle quite clearly. We were under a low bank about fifty yards from the moat. It was a good strategic spot. It was also a pleasant one. The air was balmy and full of summer scents. I lay back and relaxed. Mollie seemed pretty relaxed too. She was very close to me, and she didn't have to be.

As the minutes passed, my thoughts moved farther and farther from the castle and concentrated more and more on Mollie. I moved my head a little, and tried to see her face. I could hear her quick breathing, I could just make out her features. She didn't move and I kissed her mouth. I'd been wanting to do that ever since I'd set eyes on her. She still didn't move, not at first. She just let me kiss her, as though it was an interesting experiment. Then, suddenly, her arms went round me and she kissed me back with warmth and fervor.

"You take a long time to get to the starting point, Mr. Curtis," she said softly, "but there's nothing wrong with your acceleration. I think we'd better call it a night!"

It was then that the silence was broken by a peculiar grating sound. I think we'd both forgotten that we were supposed to be keeping watch, but now we were alert in a second. Someone had turned a key in the lock of the castle door!

OTHER VIEWS, SIZES AND PRICES OF VOGUE PATTERNS ON PAGES 60 & 61

Vogue Design No. 9236.	One-piece dress; 12 to 42 (32 to 44). 75c.
Vogue Design No. S-4813.	One-piece dress and scarf; 10 to 18 (31 to 38). $1.00.
Vogue Design No. 9259.	One-piece dress and scarf; 10 to 16 (31 to 36) and 9 to 15 (30½ to 35). 75c.
Vogue Design No. 9256.	Two-piece dress and scarf; 10 to 16 (31 to 36) and 9 to 15 (30½ to 35). 75c.
Vogue Design No. 9254.	One-piece dress; 10 to 18 (31 to 38). 75c.
Vogue Design No. 9253.	One-piece dress; 10 to 20 (31 to 40). 75c.
Vogue Design No. 9255.	"Easy to Make" one-piece dress and cummerbund; 10 to 18 (31 to 38). 75c.

The thought did cross my mind that perhaps he most sensible thing would be to go and ing up the police—but then I'd been a re-orter for only a week. Mollie didn't hesitate. "Come on," she said in a fierce whisper. "Let's find out what's happening."

We advanced on tiptoe to the door, which was shut. We stood tensely under the great portcullis, listening. Perhaps, I thought, we'd been mistaken about the grating noise. I grasped the iron ring that formed the handle, nd began to turn it, very slowly and care-ully. Even so, it squeaked a bit. When it was ully turned, I pushed against the door—and t moved. We hadn't been mistaken.

The entrance passage with the "murder oles" over it was impenetrably dark. I lipped through the door and Mollie followed. Somewhere a night bird hooted. In the dis-ance the church clock struck two.

The courtyard seemed to be empty, but the ncertainty was spine-chilling. The man with he key might be skulking in one of the al-oves, one of the hollow towers, anywhere. Broken masonry lay across our path like a nine field. I stood there so long that Mollie rew impatient. "Get on!" she whispered. She was either less scared than I was or less imag-native.

I managed to avoid the obstructions, but Mollie stumbled over something and for a moment we stood motionless, scarcely daring o breathe, listening. Then, somewhere ahead of us, high up, the silence was broken. There were three or four dull, heavy blows, as though someone was knocking in a tent peg with a wooden mallet. The sounds seemed to be coming from the square tower.

"Who said there were no noises in the night?" Mol-ie murmured in my ear.

We had reached the base of the tower. The wooden door at the foot of the spiral staircase was closed. I eased t open gently. The sounds from above were more muffled inside, but I could still hear them. I began to climb the spiral, telling myself that as long as the noise went on I wasn't likely to meet anyone on the stairs.

I stopped at the first-floor room and peered in, but it was empty. Mollie was press-ng at my heels, and I continued to climb. As I rounded the last curve, I saw that the heavy wooden door giving on to the flat roof was standing open, and through it I caught the glimmer of a light. I sank down on the last step, pressing myself against the wall so that Mollie could squeeze in beside me. Then, cau-tiously, we looked out.

There was an electric hand lamp on the roof, placed so that its light was focused on a section of the parapet. In the beam, a man was working. By now I'd almost convinced myself that it would be Figgis—but this man was much bigger than Figgis. His face was turned away from us. He had a heavy hammer in his right hand, its head covered with a cloth to deaden sound. In his left, he held something that looked like a chisel. He was breaking out the cement that the workmen had put into the parapet. A few feet to the right of him there was already a gaping hole, which he seemed to have abandoned. On the roof beside the lamp there was a soft traveling bag and a coil of thick wire. This, beyond doubt, was Hoad's murderer.

We were only a few feet from the man, and now I daren't even whisper to Mollie. Once more discretion suggested a quiet retreat for reinforcements. But Mollie might not want to go, and I couldn't leave her.

We watched him for what seemed an hour, though in fact it couldn't have been much more than twenty minutes. His blows on the chisel were strong and well directed. Obvi-ously, whatever he had begun, he meant to finish that night. Suddenly his chisel went through into a cavity and he gave a little grunt of satisfaction. He pulled away several large lumps of cement, and put his hand in the hole and then his arm, and for a while he groped around inside. Then he picked up the coil of wire and cut a length off it with some pliers, and bent one end into the shape of a hook. He pushed the wire into the hole and began to fish around with it.

Several times he drew the wire out and bent the end into a different shape and started over again. Either he couldn't hook the fish, or he couldn't land it, or there wasn't any fish there. He was certainly having extreme difficulty. Then a satisfied "Ah!" escaped him, and he withdrew the wire very slowly, very carefully, as though he had a trembler mine on the end of it. What, in fact, he had was something that looked like a leather purse with a string that pulled tight at the neck. He dropped the wire and opened the neck of the purse and took out some small object which he held in his palm before the lamp. It flashed and sparkled, throwing out blue lights. After a moment he put it back and stuffed the purse into his pocket and began to collect his tools. He was going to leave!

I put my mouth against Mollie's ear and whispered "Back!" She began to wriggle her body down, but we were tightly jammed on the narrow stairway. "Hurry!" I urged. The man had zipped his bag shut and picked up the lamp. He was walking toward me. In a second he'd see me. There was only one thing to do. I struggled clear of Mollie and burst out of the doorway.

He was on to me like a panther, before I could even get upright. I caught one glimpse of a lean and ruthless face, and then I hit the parapet. He came after me at once, and I grabbed wildly at a foot, which was all I could see of him. He fell with a crash and I grappled with him in the shadows. He was a powerful man, and there wasn't a nasty trick he didn't know. He caught me an agonizing blow with his elbow, and I fell back, writhing. He might have finished me then, but Mollie suddenly joined in, using the bag of tools like a two-handed ax, and though her blows weren't heavy they distracted him and gave me the respite I needed. I staggered to my feet and went at him, punching with all my strength. He crashed back against the parapet and fell with a clang on the iron slats. I rushed in to settle him, too recklessly, and he lashed out with his foot and caught me sharply in the side. As I fell back his hand went to his pocket—and a moment later I was looking into the barrel of a gun.

"Back against the wall!" he said, breathing hard. "You too, girl!"

He was holding the gun like a man who was used to guns. I stepped back against the wall. Mollie joined me.

The man got slowly to his feet. One of his shoes had got caught by the heel between the slats and had come off. I could see his face quite clearly—intelligent, good-looking, sardonic, his eyes and mouth utterly without pity. I thought he would make a most efficient executioner.

He took half a step forward, gave a little gasp and stopped. Still covering us, he began to rub his right foot, the one that had lost its shoe. Finally he hobbled round to the wooden door, using the parapet as a crutch, and pushed the door shut.

"Well, now," he said, "who are you?" He had an educated, almost a suave voice.

I told him who I was. I told him who Mollie was. It was the oddest introduction I'd ever made.

He nodded. "My name is Smith," he said. He was a man with a sense of humor! He asked if we were staying at the Castle Arms, and I said we were. He seemed to be debating what to do.

At last he said, "Well, this is awkward. I've sprained an ankle. That's going to hamper my plans. I'll have to rest up here for a day or two. Which means, of course, that I shall need your help—in a number of ways."

Neither of us said anything. "We'll arrange things like this," he went on. "You, Mr. Curtis, will be allowed to leave. You will get food, water and blankets and tomorrow night you will come back here with them. Miss Bourne will stay—as hostage. If you give me away, if you attempt to bring anyone back with you, if

One can be more moved by a puppy of one's own than by anybody else's lion.
ZONA GALE

You get a CLEANER WASH with CLOROX®... whiter...brighter...
sanitary, too!

GOOD ADVICE to a bride-to-be ... or any housewife: Give your treasured linens and other fine fabrics a long lease on loveliness with Clorox care right from the start! Clorox gently removes dinginess, stains and odors from white and color-fast cottons and linens...and from white 100% nylon, rayon, and Dacron, Orlon and Dynel, too. Remember, when you launder with Clorox you provide added health protection for your family because Clorox disinfects!

Every time you use CLOROX you protect family health!

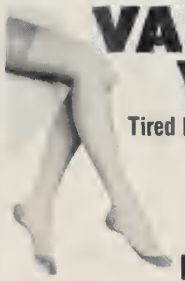
Another hint for homemakers: Always keep Clorox handy in your bathroom and kitchen, as well as in your laundry. See the label directions for many ways Clorox can help you every day, all through the house!

JOHNSON, STEPHENS & SHINKLE SHOE COMPANY • ST. LOUIS, MISSOURI



Alert Women!
MORE MONEY EASIER
with Peerless
PERSONAL CHRISTMAS CARDS

Profits come Big and Fast! Show friends popular priced series; from 40 for $1.50 to 25 for $3.95. A line that sells on sight! Increase profits with complete line Box Assortments, Wrappings and Gifts.

Profit up to $1.35 per Box

Write for sample kit and 2 Box Assortments on approval.
PEERLESS GREETINGS, Dept. H 316 N. Michigan, Chicago, Ill.

VARICOSE VEINS
Tired Legs, Leg Cramps Relieved
Dr Scholl's
Super-Sheer
ELASTIC STOCKINGS

Nylon, full-footed, full-fashioned. So sheer, they look just like regular nylons—yet give comfortable, uniform support. No overhose needed. In French Nude, White, Black. At Dr. Scholl's Foot Comfort Shops, Drug, Dept., Surgical Supply Stores. For free booklet, write Dr. Scholl's, Dept. E2, Chicago 10, Ill.

STOP PAIN INSTANTLY
COMBAT INFECTION-PROMOTE HEALING
WITH SOOTHING
Campho-Phenique
(PRONOUNCED CAM-FO-FIN-EEK)
USE IT FOR FEVER BLISTERS
COLD SORES, GUM BOILS

Not only do fever blisters heal faster, but the same thing happens when Campho-Phenique is used on cold sores, gum boils. Wonderfully soothing too, for minor burns, poison ivy, itching of insect bites. And Campho-Phenique is a highly effective, pain-relieving antiseptic for minor cuts and scratches from paring knives, can openers, tin cans, etc. Used on pimples, Campho-Phenique helps prevent their spread and re-infection.

the police come here—she will die . . . in agony."

"You must be mad," Mollie said.

"Not mad, Miss Bourne—just desperate. As you undoubtedly realize, I killed Hoad. If I'm caught, I shall have to pay for that. If I kill you, too, I shall have to pay the same penalty. Why should I hesitate?"

Offhand, I couldn't think of a reason.

"At the same time," he said, "if you cooperate with me for a day or two, you have nothing to fear. When I can move about again I shall leave here and let you free. Before you can put anyone on my trail, I shall be out of reach. Our interests are identical—we all want to get away safely, and there's no reason why we shouldn't. Mr. Curtis, what do you say?"

"The police may come anyway," I said. "The caretaker may come. Anyone may come. The odds are hopelessly against you."

Mollie said, "They may come and look for me. They're bound to start searching if I don't go back to the hotel."

"That's something we must take care of, Miss Bourne. Write a note to the manager—I'm sure you have paper and a pencil with you. Make it sound as though it was written early tomorrow morning—as though you'd suddenly decided to go off for a day or two but were leaving most of your things and wanted your room kept. Mr. Curtis will see that it's delivered."

"If it was written in the morning," Mollie said, "my bed would have been slept in. And it won't have been."

"Ah!" Smith considered that for a moment. "Is your room locked?"

"No."

"Then Mr. Curtis can attend to the bed when he goes back tonight."

"My car's parked at the hotel—I'd never go away for two or three days without that."

"Then Mr. Curtis must look after the car too. After all, it's your own lives that are at stake." The gun jerked. "Please—the note!"

Mollie looked at me—and took a pad from her bag and wrote.

When she'd finished, Smith said, "Give your car ignition key to Mr. Curtis."

She gave it to me.

"Now put the pad in your bag and throw the bag across to me. Gently!"

She tossed it at his feet. He put the gun on top of the parapet and opened the bag. I sprang toward him. But before I was halfway there he'd whipped up the gun.

"You have a strange idea of co-operation, Mr. Curtis," he said quietly. "Get back to the wall. I'll deal with you in a moment."

Beaten, I rejoined Mollie. She said, "Don't try it, Hugh—it's too risky."

Smith read the note, put it back in the bag, and threw the bag back to Mollie. "Give the note to Mr. Curtis."

I put it in my pocket.

There was a little silence. Then Smith said, "Mr. Curtis, you need a lesson. Stand away from Miss Bourne!"

I moved along the parapet. Then he began to hobble painfully round the roof toward us. He looked more like an executioner than ever. As he drew nearer, I braced myself for a blow.

But it didn't come. Instead, he stepped close to Mollie and pressed the gun into her stomach. "I'm going to hit Miss Bourne," he said. "If you make a move, Mr. Curtis, I shall shoot her."

He struck her hard across the face with his left hand. Involuntarily I started forward, but Mollie's warning cry and the wicked little gun checked me.

"You can't argue with a gun, you know," Smith said softly. "You can't be chivalrous in face of a gun. You could try, of course, but it would go off before you could do any good."

Mollie looked terribly pale. She said, "You'd better go, Hugh. We've no choice."

"But I can't leave you with him."

"You must. It's the only way."

I turned savagely to Smith. "All right," I said. "But if Miss Bourne comes to any harm, I swear I'll get you."

"A nice speech," he said. "I'll bear it in mind." He produced a big key from his pocket. "The key to the castle," he said. "The spare key! Lock up behind you when you leave—we don't want anyone wandering in. . . . Now let me see. . . . Bandage for my ankle. And bring us something nice to eat. You probably know Miss Bourne's tastes. Some wine wouldn't come amiss—and glasses, of course. Come as soon as you can after dark—I'm sure Miss Bourne will get very hungry and thirsty. And don't try any tricks. Good night, Mr. Curtis."

I moved toward the door and opened it. "All right, Mollie?"

She nodded. She had herself well under control. "All right, Hugh. This is going to make quite a story in the end."

I turned and descended the steps.

I crossed the courtyard in a kind of daze. I locked the castle door behind me mechanically. I walked down the field path in revolt against the facts. The whole affair was too gangsterish, too utterly melodramatic to be credible.

There was only one consolation—and I didn't know how long it would remain one. If I hadn't followed Mollie to the castle, if she'd stumbled alone upon the man, he'd almost certainly have killed her out of hand.

I was still pretty dazed when I reached the hotel. I slipped into the lobby and stole silently upstairs. My room came first, then Lawson's, then Mollie's. I opened Mollie's door and went in and closed it behind me. I loosened the pillows, and made a dent in one of them with my fist, and mussed up the bedclothes. I damped one of the towels and threw it carelessly over the towel rail. I moistened the soap. I put a little tooth paste in one of the tumblers and swilled it around with some water. Then I gathered up a few things that Mollie would certainly have taken with her—her nylon nightie from the bed, a thin silk dressing gown from the wardrobe, her hairbrush and toothbrush and a few other toilet things from the shelf above the basin and from the dressing table. I stuffed the nightie and the smaller things into my pockets, and the dressing gown inside my jacket, and crept out.

Little minds are wounded too much by little things; great minds see all, and are not even hurt.

LA ROCHEFOUCAULD

Lawson's door opened, sending a flood of light into the corridor. For a moment he gazed at me as though he couldn't believe his eyes. Then his pale face split in a fatuous grin.

"Oh, naughty, naughty!" he said under his breath, and tut-tutted.

"What are you snooping about for?" I burst out in an angry whisper.

"Sorry, old boy, I'm a light sleeper. Don't worry, I'll keep mum. You lucky chap!" He gave an awful leer. "Anything happen out there by the castle?"

"Not a thing!"

He grinned again. "O.K., see you in the morning," he said, and went back into his room.

I went into my own room and stuffed Mollie's things into the bottom of my suitcase. It was half past three. Any thought of sleep was out of the question. I drank a pint of water and bathed my bruised face. Then I sank down on the window seat and tried to get things straight in my mind.

The natural thing was to enlist help—but I didn't see how I could. I tried to imagine what the police would do if I did bring them into it, how they would set about coping—and I couldn't think of anything that wouldn't put Mollie in mortal danger. There was no way in which they could safely tackle Smith in his tower stronghold. There was no way I could take him by surprise. I mentally canvassed the wildest possibilities, from tear gas to lowering someone from a helicopter, but there was always one insuperable snag. Smith would be able to shoot Mollie before any attack could be pressed home.

If, on the other hand, I kept quiet and carried out instructions, Mollie and I ought to be safe enough for the time being. Smith had the whip hand—I couldn't give him away. But he was stuck in the castle for several days and he couldn't just order me to bring supplies for all the time he was likely to be there, and then dispose of us. For one thing, he didn't know how long he was going to be there. For another, if I disappeared without trace there'd be no one to cover up for me at the hotel. And he certainly wouldn't want any more mysteries in Lodden until he was out of reach.

But when I considered the position from his point of view, I couldn't believe that he'd let us go in the end. We knew far too much. We knew that he was probably a jewel thief, and in a pretty big way of business. We could describe him in detail. His description would be circulated everywhere, on the Continent as well as in England, and the chances were high that he'd be picked up. But if he could leave the castle without anyone's knowing anything about him or his visit, he'd be safe. So why should he hesitate? He'd do to us what he'd done to Hoad. We should end up in the well or the moat.

The burden of responsibility sat squarely on me; I'd have to be prepared to take desperate risks, even fantastic risks. Nothing, however bizarre, could be ruled out.

I thought of trying to get hold of a gun myself and taking a pot at him when he opened the door to the roof. I'd used a revolver a bit in the army. Still, I'd never been much of a shot and Smith handled his gun with the speed of a cowboy in a Western.

I thought of trying to get hold of a rifle, and picking him off from the shelter of the hazel bushes beside the moat. The trouble was that if I failed to get him with my first shot I shouldn't have another chance—and he'd almost certainly regard the attempt as a declaration of war, which could well be the end of Mollie.

Perhaps I could draw him out of the tower by some ruse—create some diversion, maneuver him into a position of disadvantage? That was fine in theory, but specifically I couldn't think how.

Meanwhile, a minor problem was what I was going to do about Lawson and the office. I'd have to think up some good reason why I couldn't go back—something that wouldn't rouse any suspicion or start any inquiry. The last thing I wanted was that Lawson should get suspicious. Illness! That was the thing. I'd have to say I wasn't well. No one ever argued about that.

By now it was full daylight, and I concentrated on the immediate tasks. I had to move Mollie's car before the hotel servants were up. I also had to leave her message somewhere. I crept downstairs to the lounge. The window of the reception desk was closed, but a heavy inkwell had been left on the ledge outside and I put the note underneath it and went out into the street. It was a beautiful morning again—the sort of morning that made you feel you wanted to live forever. I walked round to the car park, squeezed myself into Mollie's car and drove quietly away. In Worley I settled down for a long wait. At ten minutes past eight a man arrived to open the garage. I asked him if I could leave my car there for a few days and he said, "Certainly, sir!" and gave me a ticket.

The bus back to Lodden got me to the pub just before nine. Mollie's message had gone from the reception desk. I nodded a "Good morning!" to the manager's wife and went into the dining room. I felt extremely hungry, but I didn't dare order much of a breakfast—if I was going to malinger, it wouldn't do to let Lawson catch me wolfing bacon and eggs. I asked for coffee and a roll, and thought of Mollie sitting up there in the tower all day without food or water.

Lawson came in. He said, "Oh, what a beautiful morning!" and sat down opposite me. He picked up the menu and gave me a sly glance. Then his jaw dropped.

"What have you been doing to your face?"

I'd forgotten he hadn't seen my bruises in daylight. I said, "My wardrobe door was open and I walked into it in the dark. I'm surprised you didn't hear me."

He grinned. "Sure it wasn't Mollie trying to save her honor?"

"It was not," I said shortly.

"Well, you certainly don't look so good. How do you feel?"

"Lousy," I said. "Very tired."

"What do you expect, old boy? By the way, what was Mollie up to at the castle?"

"I don't think she was up to anything. She just said she couldn't sleep."

"That's a likely story! Where did you run into her?"

"Outside the pub, as a matter of fact," I told him. "I caught her up at the door on my way back."

"Nice timing. Is she around yet?"

"She was—but she went off early. Said something about going to stay with friends for a day or two."

"You mean she's checked out?"

"No, I gather she's left some of her things. She said she just couldn't be bothered to pack."

He didn't pursue the subject. Around ten-thirty, he said that we might as well be getting on our way. I was just going to tell him I didn't feel up to it when there was a call from the office, and he took it. He talked for a minute or two, and then called out that Blair wanted me and handed the receiver over.

Blair said briskly, "Oh, Curtis, I'd like you to get back here as quickly as you can."

"I'm sorry, Mr. Blair, but I'm afraid I'm not well."

"Not well? Why, what's the matter?"

"Bit of fever. I think I've caught a chill. I honestly don't feel fit."

"Well, it's very inconvenient," he said in a testy voice. "We're extremely shorthanded."

"I'm sorry," I said again.

He grunted. "If you're ill, you're ill, I suppose. Anyway, see how you get on. Give me a call this afternoon."

"Very well," I said, and rang off. That hurdle seemed to have been taken all right.

Lawson was just putting his bag into his car. He obviously thought I was shirking work, and took a poor view. "Well, I'll be seeing you," he said. He got into his car, and a moment later he was driving away. I took a deep

People use CHI-NET® Plates

in all kinds of places

for all kinds of meals

CHI-NET®

the paper plate everybody likes

Outdoors and indoors . . . for picnics and parties . . . for quick meals and snacks . . . for breakfast, lunch and dinner, CHI-NET molded paper plates are always right for modern, easy living.

CHI-NET paper plates are molded to shape . . . they stay rigid even when piled high with food. And they have such a wonderful smooth, white finish you are proud to use them.

Look for CHI-NET paper plates at leading food or variety stores. Available in three popular round sizes for breakfast, lunch or snacks, compartment round dinner size and Square Meal Trays, especially popular for TV dinners. Look for the CHI-NET oval on the package.

KEYES FIBRE COMPANY
WATERVILLE, MAINE

Be Wise-Buy KEYES MOLDED PRODUCTS

breath, and began to consider the next problem.

I drove to Brighton, parked the Riley and started on my rounds. I bought a two-gallon can for water, some gray blankets, an elasticized bandage, two plastic tumblers and a collection of cutlery. I didn't suppose they'd need knives and forks, but it seemed the most promising way of getting potentially dangerous weapons into the castle. One of the knives, in particular, was short and strong and very sharp. As I stood at the counter of a provision store, watching cooked ham being sliced, the fantastic unreality of the whole business came over me again. But I didn't see what else I could do.

I glanced around the shelves—and my eyes came to rest on a small round tin.

Pepper!

It was an old idea, of course, as old as the hills—but that seemed all the more reason why it might work. It was certainly the best idea I'd had yet. I said I'd have it.

What I needed now was some little gadget that would direct a jet of it straight at him. But how and where would I hide it?

I thought about it for some time, sitting in the car, and presently I went back to the shops. I found just what I wanted on a cosmetic counter, a small pink atomizer of some soft, collapsible material, with a black plastic spray tip set at a slight angle. I could scarcely wait to try it.

In the car, I opened the tin and poured a little pepper into the container. Then I opened my jacket and put the nozzle through the top buttonhole from the inside and buttoned up. I got out and walked about a bit and the thing seemed to be held quite firmly by the nozzle, which was pointing slightly upward and away from me. I gave the top of my jacket a smart tap, and a fine spray of pepper shot out for more than a foot. Some of it drifted back on me, and I was seized with a paroxysm of sneezing and for a moment or two my eyes streamed. It seemed to work very well! If only I could direct the spray into Smith's face, I hadn't a doubt that he'd be temporarily incapacitated. A mere second off guard would be enough for me to get his gun.

I drove back to the Castle Arms, filled the water can from the hose pipe in the car park, and left the stores locked up in the car in a soft bag. It was nearly four and I decided I must try to get a little sleep. It wouldn't help anyone if I reached the castle in an exhausted state. I went up to my room and stretched out on the bed. The next thing I knew, it was six o'clock, and a maid was tapping on my door and saying there was a telephone call for me. It was Hatcher, and he was in his nastiest mood.

"I thought you were supposed to be ill!" he said.

"I am."

"We tried to get you after lunch and they said you'd gone out."

"I wanted some fresh air," I said.

"Well, there's plenty in Norfolk—you'd better come back."

"I'm really not fit," I said.

"Have you seen a doctor?"

"Well, no."

"Then see one."

"It's just an indisposition," I said. "I'll be all right in a day or two."

He blew his top then. "We run a newspaper here, not a convalescent home. See a doctor right away and let me know what he says. That's an order!" He hung up.

If I continued to stall, they'd probably send someone down to find out what I was playing at. They might even send Lawson back, which was the last thing I wanted.

I went into the lounge and composed a letter of resignation. There might be repercussions later, but I felt much happier when the letter was posted.

The rest of the evening dragged. I went to my room and waited there in a state of tension. I couldn't leave the hotel until the manager had locked up and gone to bed, because otherwise I should be locked out. From my window seat, I watched the lights go out one by one. When all seemed quiet, I crept downstairs and silently let myself out. I'd already taken the precaution of parking the car up the hill and I walked quickly to it. I took the blankets under one arm, and the water can and provisions in the other, and set off up the field path. I had to walk very slowly and carefully, because the pepper spray was in position and I didn't want to set it off with a sudden jerk.

The night was dark, but I was getting to know the place better now and I had little difficulty in finding my way to the castle door. I let myself in with Smith's key. Apparently the lock worked from the outside but not from the inside. That cleared up a point which had puzzled me—why Smith had left the door open behind him on the night when Hoad had walked in on him.

I crossed the courtyard to the tower door, pulled it open and called up softly, but got no reply. I lugged the bag up the spiral staircase. The top door was closed. I couldn't see a thing. I made sure the atomizer was in position, and banged on the door. There was a moment's silence. Then Smith called out, "Is that you, Mr. Curtis?"

"Yes," I said.

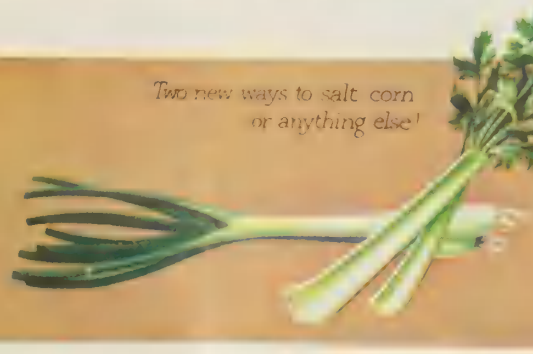
The door opened about six inches. A pale gleam of light came through from the roof. I couldn't see Mollie.

Smith said, "Put your hands through the door, and keep them there."

I obeyed. The door slowly opened. The first thing I saw was the gun, well out of reach. The next thing was Smith. He wasn't taking any chances. I hadn't overestimated him.

"Step in," he said. "Hands above your head. Now stand still." He hobbled up close. I could see that he still wasn't putting much weight on his foot. He thrust the gun against my belly and slapped my pockets expertly. Out of the corner of my eye I could just see the nozzle of the sprayer—though only because I knew it was there. It was pointing straight at his face, and I knew it would work if only I

Hold this page about arm's length from your face. Keeping your eyes on the blue dot between the rain and the corn, bring the page slowly to your nose. Hold it there a few seconds...presto! The cornfield gets rain Try this with the Morton's and corn, too



Corn in the field needs rain...
Corn on your table needs Morton's...

iodized or plain

They just naturally go together!

Two new ways to salt corn or anything else!

Morton Miniatures, 1½ inches high, packed six to the tray.

Morton Salters, 3⅞ inches in size, sold in cartons of three, plain or iodized

When it rains it pours uld get at it. He thumped my breast pocket id must have been within an inch or two triggering it off—but he missed it. "All ght," he said, and stepped back. I lowered y hands, sweating with disappointment.

Mollie was sitting propped up in an angle the parapet, her thin summer coat folded nder her as a cushion. I said, "Hullo, Mollie!
re you all right?"

"More or less," she said. She sounded as ough she was having difficulty with her ice too—but with her it wasn't excitement.
guessed it was just plain misery. "I could do ith a drink—I'm absolutely parched."

"I'll get it," Smith said. He backed to the or, and brought in the bag and the water
n. He opened the bag as carefully as though had been full of grenades. He took the ings out one at a time, and scrutinized each turn. When he came to the daggerlike knife gave me a sardonic glance, and tossed it er the parapet. He inspected the bandage id seemed to approve of it.

"Well, that seems all right," he said.
ou've been busy, Mr. Curtis." He un-rewed the top of the water can, smelled the ntents, and filled the two tumblers. He took ne over to Mollie, and himself drained the her at a draught. He filled them, and they th drank again. He shed the door shut
w and set to work to rve up a loaf. The gun as on the concrete side him, but I wasn't mpted. I was still ping for a chance to e the pepper.

Mollie hadn't moved.
ne light was dim and still couldn't see her ce properly. I said,
Has he behaved himlf?"

"So far," she said.
"Have you been up re all the time?"

"Only since dusk. We ent most of the day in e courtyard. I'm al-wed to exercise."

"Are you going to ep up here?"

"I gather so. Mr.
nith has fixed up a dget so that I can't cut his throat during e night."

I saw then that one of her feet was secured wire to the slats. There were two separate res, and two separate loops. The whole ing was cunningly arranged so that she uldn't get free unaided. The ends of the res were both out of her reach.

I said, "Look here, Smith, you can't leave r like this!"

Even as I said it, it struck me that indigtion was pretty foolish in the circumstances.
was like complaining of discomfort on the y to the gas chamber.

Smith was quite unperturbed. He was divid-g ham and tongue and tomatoes into two aps with meticulous care. He said, "The res aren't tight. Obviously I can't leave her e at night. Even if she didn't cut my throat, e might get desperate and I wouldn't like her hurt herself!" He picked up his gun, and lf the food. "Stand away, will you, while I ing this over?"

told Mollie about Lawson and the bedom incident, because I thought it might eer her up a bit, and it did. I also told her ere I'd put her car, and about my office ging up, and about the letter of resignation
I sent Blair.

Smith didn't mind Mollie and me talking.
tually, it wasn't easy to talk, because I had lf my mind on how I could get near enough him to use the pepper.

As I gazed around at the uniquely im-obable scene, I had to tell myself all over ain that this wasn't just a nightmare. In one rner, Mollie—the haughty, sophisticated ollie—tethered by a foot like some animal.
another corner, Smith, a callous and appartly quite unworried murderer, enjoying his od and behaving as politely as a host at a party. And there was I, with a woman's powder spray sticking out of my buttonhole, and homicide in my heart. All in the sinister, shadow-casting half-light of that now-failing electric lamp. It seemed incredibly macabre.

At last Smith stirred. "Well, that was good," he said. "Tomorrow, Mr. Curtis, perhaps you can do even better. We mustn't spare the expense."

"No," I said. "You've got twenty pounds to spend, haven't you?"

He smiled good-humoredly. "I shall need that on my travels."

"How is the ankle?" I asked.

"Coming along. Another two days, and you'll be celebrating my departure. . . . And now, Mr. Curtis, I think you'd better be getting back. Miss Bourne and I have had quite a tiring day."

"It looks as though you need a new lamp battery," I said.

"Yes, I was going to mention that. Please don't forget it. And I'd like some cigarettes; I'm running out."

I said, "Is there anything you'd like, Mollie?"

"You might change my library book."

"I'll bring some papers, anyway." I stood looking at her. I didn't want to leave her. I didn't want to leave either of them. I wanted to have a crack at Smith. But he was at the other side of the roof and I couldn't think of any excuse to get near him.

"Well, good night, Mr. Curtis," he said.

I didn't move.

"I said 'Good night, Mr. Curtis.'"

I'd suddenly had a very simple idea. I just stood there.

He got up and came hobbling over to me. "Are you deaf?" he said, and for the first time that night his voice had a nasty edge. "Get going!" I felt the gun in my ribs.

His face was about a foot away. I wondered if he'd have time to press the trigger before the pepper got him. I had to take a chance. I said, "I'm sorry, Smith—I've got a frightful pain in my chest." I clapped my hand on my jacket and the pepper shot out sideways.

Smith jerked back, his finger steady on the trigger. It would have been comic if there hadn't been so much at stake. As it was, it was just a ghastly fiasco.

He waited till I'd stopped sneezing. Then he made me move to a new place, and came up close again and unbuttoned my jacket and took away the sprayer.

"An ingenious idea, Mr. Curtis," he said, "but you really shouldn't have done it, you know. I did warn you. It seems you need another lesson. Stand back!"

He began to hobble toward Mollie. She looked distraught with fear. "Don't!" she breathed. "Oh, please don't!"

I couldn't bear it. Not again. I said, "Smith, if you touch her I swear you'll have to kill me. And that'll be the end of you too." I took a step toward him, and another. "So help me, I mean it."

He stopped, and gazed at me for a long moment.

"I believe you do," he said. "The breaking point, eh? Well, in that case you'll have to take your own punishment."

He came up to me and stuck the gun hard in my stomach and gave me a savage punch with his knuckles. He knew just where to hit so that it hurt most—and he kept on hitting, very calmly, very scientifically, and every blow brought its own peculiar agony. I slumped against the wall vaguely aware of gasps and cries from Mollie. I couldn't take any more. Then the blows suddenly ceased, and I swam slowly back to consciousness through a haze of pain.

AUGUST SONG

By BARBARA SHOOK

In fields where lambs and lions sleep,
Watch for claws upon the sheep;
Above the child asleep in bed
An eagle circles overhead;
Over the rooftop spirits pass
Slender as a blade of grass;
Sickening for lack of shade
Roses bloom, burst the glade.
In summer when the tiger runs,
Shelter the frail from too hot suns.

So easy! 50% more jam ...and fresher flavor

because you boil only 1 minute with SURE-JELL or CERTO

Recipe: perfect homemade peach jam. Peel, pit and crush 3 lbs. fully ripe peaches. Mix 4 cups prepared fruit in very large saucepan with 1 box Sure-Jell. (Or use liquid Certo—recipe on bottle.) Stir over high heat until mixture comes to hard boil.

Stir in 5 cups sugar at once. Bring to full rolling boil. Boil hard for 1 minute only, stirring constantly. This short boiling time means less juice boils away—so you get up to 50% higher yield, and the flavor comes through fresher—with Sure-Jell or Certo!

Remove from heat, then alternately stir and skim off foam for 5 minutes. Ladle into glasses. Paraffin at once. Yield: 9 medium glasses, for mere pennies a glass! And you're sure of perfect results with either powdered Sure-Jell or liquid Certo!

Your choice!

SURE-JELL

powdered natural fruit pectin

or CERTO

liquid natural fruit pectin

Pectin causes jelling. Amounts of pectin in fruits vary.

But no guessing with recipes you get with Sure-Jell or Certo.

Products of General Foods

"Well, I think that will do for now," I heard Smith saying. "After all, if I incapacitate you entirely I shan't get those cigarettes. Good night, Mr. Curtis."

I stumbled out through the door.

The only consolation I took away from the castle that night was that I'd stood up to Smith over Mollie, and I knew now that I could prevent him from hurting her. But I was still no nearer getting that gun away from him—and I was one day nearer the moment of his departure, the final reckoning.

The real problem was the tower. If Smith had been spending his nights in the courtyard, or even in the first-floor room, there might have been some possibility of creeping in quietly and catching him off guard. But the tower was a safe fortress. It wasn't even as though the door giving access to the roof was a light affair, that I could fling open and rush through.

The only one way of approaching that roof without announcing my arrival was from the outside of the castle. But how could it be done? A sixty-foot ladder floated across the moat and mounted on some improvised raft . . . but how could I get a sixty-foot ladder to the castle without attracting dangerous attention in the village? And the walls were too smooth to scale without a ladder . . . or were they? I hadn't seen them close to—I'd only seen them across the moat. I had a pair of binoculars in the car, and I decided to do a bit of reconnoitering.

Directly after breakfast I collected the glasses from the car and walked up to the gate. The gate itself was out of sight of the tower and fifty yards to the left was a small copse I could reach without showing myself. At the far end I should be visible from the tower, but the distance was short enough to risk a quick dash. Beyond the gap, the fringe of hazel bushes beside the moat would give me cover. Once I'd reached them, I could work my way round unobserved until I was opposite the tower.

I climbed quickly to the copse and went through it and dropped down into the dip. I kept the glasses on the tower for a full ten minutes, scrutinized all the loopholes—and made a bolt for it. I was across in seconds.

I began to move slowly round the moat, always keeping the bushes between me and the tower. I'd gone only a few yards when I came across what looked like an old pontoon in the water. It was a shallow box, about five feet square, moored against the bank. It was roughly made and pretty rotten, but it still floated. I pulled it in cautiously. It would get me over to the wall if I ever wanted to go.

I crept on through the hazel bushes until I was directly opposite the front face of the tower. I sat down on the bank, and through a gap in the leaves I set to work to study the wall in earnest. The glasses were powerful, and I could see every crevice. At close quarters the ancient stone was pocked with irregularities. With a growing sense of excitement I followed them up from the water, noting possible finger holds and toe holds, and they took me right to the top. But there my imaginary climb struck an insuperable obstacle—the overhang. The five stone corbels which carried the parapet on that side sloped sharply outward. There were spaces between the corbels, shaped like small arches, into which I might climb. But above them was the protruding parapet itself.

However, my hopes had been aroused. The tower, jutting out into the moat some fifteen feet from the main wall, had three approachable faces and I worked my way back through the hazels to have a look at one of the sides. I saw at once that the architecture was different. There were only four corbels instead of five. Where the fifth should have been, a section of the tower wall rose straight above the main battlements. If I could climb up near the angle there'd be nothing to prevent my reaching the top.

I turned my glasses on the wall near the angle—and my spirits sank. There were one or two footholds, but nothing like enough to provide a way up. I switched the glasses back to the side of the square tower and inspected the surface near the angle where it joined the front face. That looked more hopeful. But here, again, I should be stopped by the overhang.

Then I had another idea. The iron slats that had been put in to guard the gap must run along the top of the arches between the corbels. If I could reach them, and get a firm handhold, I could probably swing my way over each corbel until I came to the point where the overhang stopped. In fact, I felt pretty certain that I could. Whether I could do it silently was another matter. But I knew that I had to make the attempt.

It would have to be done, of course, in daylight. That meant running risks over and above those of the climb itself, for the job might take an hour or more and I'd be pretty conspicuous clinging to the wall—from above, if anyone happened to look down, and from the fields around, if anyone chanced to be passing. But those risks could be reduced by starting early. Crack of dawn was the time, when there'd be no one about and—with luck—Smith would still be dozing.

I crept back through the bushes, whipped across the gap and dropped down to the gate.

I collected the Riley from the pub and drove quickly to London. I had a little flat in Chancery Lane and I went there. I got out my climbing boots, and an old wind cheater that I always used on climbs. I also found two flat bits of wood that would do for paddles.

I lunched well away from Fleet Street, and in the afternoon I drove back to the Castle Arms. I asked if there had been any messages for me, but there hadn't. It looked as though my letter to Blair had done the trick as far as the office was concerned.

I decided that I'd have to skip my visit to the castle that night. Smith wasn't likely to do anything drastic just because I'd failed to turn up once. He'd be annoyed not to get his cigarettes and the new battery, but at least there was plenty of food and water at the tower for one more day. And if I was going to be in good condition for that climb, I needed sleep—a long night's sleep.

I turned in soon after dinner and slept soundly until three, the waking hour I'd mentally appointed. I put on my boots and laced them up tightly, stuck my trouser bottoms into my socks, zipped up the wind cheater, and crept downstairs. It was still quite dark. I let

They call us the weaker sex. But men are the weaker sex. They know it and we do too.
LADY ASTOR

myself out and walked slowly up the hill. The air was soft, the morning was fine, and there was almost no wind. Climbing conditions should be perfect.

I reached the pontoon, and sat down to wait for daylight. Slowly the old gray pile emerged from the shadows. It had never seemed more serene and beautiful. I watched the paling sky. The first faint trace of blue was beginning to show. This was the moment.

I stepped into the pontoon and pushed off from the bank. In two or three minutes I had reached the wall.

The first few feet were easy. There were good toe holds in broken stone and a deep crevice to get my fingers into, and almost at once I was able to pull myself up to the first loophole. I stood there comfortably and examined the wall above my head. The going looked pretty good about halfway up the tower. I continued to climb, slowly and steadily. There were plenty of handholds, but good toe holds were rarer. I owed most of them, I imagined, to some ancient bombardment, that had chipped out lumps of solid stone.

The middle loophole gave access to the first-floor room of the tower. I peered in cautiously. But it was all right—the room was empty. I got a foot in the loophole and rested again. There was a pitch ahead that I didn't at all like the look of. One essential toe hold was no more than a rough granite edge where a sliver of stone had weathered and sliced off. I got a foot firmly in place, and heaved myself up.

In a second I was hanging by my hands. I couldn't look down. I could find no place for my toes anywhere. I looked along to the right, and there were a couple of fairish toe holds about eight feet away. The only way to reach them was by a hand traverse along the crack between the courses, and I started to work my way slowly along it. My arms were beginning to feel the strain badly.

Still I felt reasonably confident. Compared with the four hundred feet of the Eagle's Nest Arete, the almost vertical, well-nigh ledgeless buttress in the lakes that I'd climbed for fun at Easter, this was child's play. The only thing was, there hadn't been a man with a gun at the top of the Eagle's Nest.

Inch by inch and foot by foot I worked my way upward. I was only a foot or two now from the bottom of the parapet. I climbed a little farther and looked up. My fingers were only a few inches from the iron slats. I squeezed between two of the corbels and made a final effort and gripped one of the slats. I had a bit of a shock as I put my weight on it because it was much springier than I'd expected and sagged a bit in the middle. But it was all right—I'd made it!

Swinging on one hand like a monkey from a branch, I managed to reach the next bit of slat. I took a firm hold and drew myself round the face of the stone. I looked up again—and froze.

Smith was slumped against the parapet asleep or dozing, immediately over my head. I pulled myself up as high as I could and saw that his right hand was in his trouser pocket. So was his gun! I could just see the butt.

This was my opportunity. If I could get it away without disturbing him, and reach the roof before he woke, our worries would be over. I drew myself up as high as possible with my left hand and inserted my right between the slats. I felt like a man defusing an unexploded mine. One touch on that wrist could set everything off. I got two fingers on the butt and tried, very gently, to draw out the gun. There was resistance; the corner of the pocket was holding it. I tried again, but it wouldn't come.

By now the pull on my left arm was almost unendurable. I grasped the slat with my right hand and let go with my left—and somewhere along the roof there was a sharp, metallic twang. In an instant, Smith was awake. He glanced down—and saw me. At first he looked incredulous. Then an evil grin spread over his face.

"Well," he said, "if it isn't Mr. Curtis! Another cat burglar, eh? And a very accomplished one too. I'm almost inclined to offer you a partnership."

I said, "I can't hang on forever, Smith. What happens now?"

He swung the gun playfully. "How about a rap or two on the knuckles, Mr. Curtis?" He brought the butt down on the back of my left hand, not hard, but very painfully. I had to loosen my grip.

"If you do that again," I said, "I shall fall."

"So I imagine. Perhaps a swim will cool your ardor for these adventures."

I said, "Can I come up?"

"How would you get out of the castle door?"

I'd forgotten the door. It was locked, of course, and the key wouldn't unlock it from the inside.

I began to move back past the corbel on the left.

"Perhaps," he said, following me along, "now that you'll be less busy you'll find time to bring those cigarettes tonight. I get in a very bad temper when I can't smoke. And we're almost out of water."

"I'll be along," I said.

I found the first loophole with my foot, and rested. I wasn't at all looking forward to the climb down. Not that a descent is actually worse than an ascent, but all the hope and excitement had gone out of the day. I was a broken army in retreat. I forced myself to concentrate again on the job. Once, when I looked up, I caught sight of Mollie's face, rigid with horror. I didn't look again.

I spent most of that day frantically trying to devise some new plan. I could scarcely think any more. I found myself going over and over the same ground, in a state of mind that at times wasn't far short of panic. I reached only one decision. If by the next day the situation still looked quite hopeless, I would go to the police and tell them everything.

I went into Brighton and got the battery, and a batch of newspapers and magazines for Mollie, the cigarettes and a bottle of wine to sweeten Smith, and another water can and a little food. After that I returned to Lodden and settled down at the pub for another ghastly wait.

When I finally reached the castle just after midnight, the routine was the same as on the first occasion. I knocked at the top door and Instantly!

Make Full Strength Iced Tea with COLD WATER!

New!

NESTEA®
Instant Tea

(Equal parts of Tea and carbohydrates)

INSTANT—EASY TO MAKE! Just a turn of the cold water faucet, and enjoy full strength iced tea, instantly. No tea bag mess! No water to boil!

REFRESHING, FULL STRENGTH FLAVOR. Nestea bursts with delicious pure tea flavor. Same fresh, full strength everytime. Always clear — never cloudy! Enjoy iced Nestea!

Copyright 1957 The Nestlé Company, Inc.

was cautiously admitted with my hands up, and very efficiently searched. Smith was putting more pressure on his ankle tonight, no doubt because it was firmly bandaged. The final showdown couldn't be far away.

Mollie was sitting on one of the blankets with her back to the parapet. She was still wired to the slats.

I said, "Do you have to keep her fastened up like this even when you're not asleep?"

"Only when you're here," Smith said. "She's been free since dusk. . . . As a matter of fact, Miss Bourne and I are getting along very well. She has a much more realistic approach to the situation than you have."

I bent over her. "How do you feel, Mollie?"

"All right," she said. Her voice was subdued; she sounded beaten.

I said, "I'm sorry I didn't manage to pull off that climb this morning."

"It was idiotic to try," she burst out. "You must be crazy." Her face wore an expression of furious anger.

I was completely taken aback. I said, "Well, I had to do something."

"Why? If you're trying to impress me with your bravery, I can tell you you're not succeeding. Don't you realize how dangerous it was?"

I shrugged. "I got down all right."

"As it happens, I wasn't thinking of you—if you want to break your neck that's your affair. But you might have got us both killed. Why don't you stop fooling about and just wait?"

"You see what I mean?" Smith said. "Miss Bourne has sense."

I ignored him. "Wait for what?" I said grimly.

"Mr. Smith says he's almost ready to leave, and as far as I'm concerned, he can. I know what he's done, and I know it means he's going to get away with murder, but it's not our job to stop him—we're not the police. I'm certainly not prepared to sacrifice myself to do it. I want to live, do you understand?" Her face shone white and scared in the lamplight, her voice was touched with hysteria. "So for God's sake stop behaving like an overgrown Boy Scout."

I could scarcely believe my ears. It seemed incredible that Mollie could be so naïve as to think Smith would leave us behind alive. If the strain had got her down, I couldn't justly blame her. I certainly didn't want to say anything to make things worse—she'd learn the brutal truth soon enough.

All the same, I couldn't help feeling let down. I'd have to count her out in anything else I attempted—and in the long run it probably wouldn't make any difference.

I said, in a bitter tone, "Well, you needn't worry—I'm hardly in a position to try anything else." I turned to Smith. "Just give me your instructions. What do you want me to do?"

He gave a sardonic grin. "Nothing that will tax you at all, Mr. Curtis. Your work's nearly over. . . . Tell me, where's your car?"

"Down by the gate."

"Does it run well?"

"Very well."

"How much petrol is there in the tank?"

I remembered that I'd meant to fill up that afternoon, and hadn't. "About a gallon, I should think."

"H'm! That's not going to be much help. All right—now sometime during the day get the tank filled. Check the oil and water and as soon as darkness falls, bring the car back and park it where it is now, the ignition key left in, the doors unlocked. Then come up here. That's all."

"I gather you're going to take my car," I said.

"I'm going to borrow it—just for a few hours. I shall leave it quite intact—and no doubt the police will return it to you eventually."

"I see. . . . And what are your plans for us?"

"Well, now, as far as you're concerned, Mr. Curtis, I shall leave you locked up here in the castle. You'll have a little food and water, so you'll be quite all right. As for Miss Bourne, I shall have to ask her to go along with me as a hostage, my guaranty against any monkey business at the car. It would be so easy, otherwise, for you to organize a police ambush down there by the gate, wouldn't it? This way, you won't dare to organize anything—because in the last resort, you will know that I should kill her."

I said, "When will you let her go?"

"As soon as I'm safely away from here. You needn't worry, I shall treat her well. She'll be found and then you'll be liberated too. I think you'll agree that my arrangements are extremely considerate."

"Is that all?" I said.

"That's all. You can go now."

I glanced at Mollie. She didn't look angry any more. She just looked very troubled. She said, "Hugh, I don't know what you must be thinking of me ——" Her voice broke. "I couldn't help it—I just couldn't bear the thought of any more violence. It's been such a nightmare." She began to cry.

"Easy, there!" Smith called out sharply. "We don't want the neighborhood roused."

She tried to check her weeping, but now that she'd begun she couldn't stop. "I'm so . . . tired," she sobbed. "This beastly wire's cutting my foot."

Smith grunted and got up. "I can soon fix that for you. . . . Just stand back a minute, Mr. Curtis. Right back!"

I stood back. There was no chance of getting the gun. I felt very low, and terribly inadequate. Then, suddenly, all hell broke out. Mollie yelled "Hugh!" I swung round in astonishment. She'd got Smith by the hair with both hands. I dived across the roof. As I reached them they rolled over together. For a moment I couldn't distinguish anything. There was a whirl of flailing arms and legs. The lamp was turned away—I couldn't see where to hit, what to hold. Then there was a blow, and a cry, and I felt the hard barrel of the gun against me. "Breathe and you're dead!" Smith said.

The whole incident hadn't taken more than ten seconds. Mollie was lying back against the parapet, holding her face. Smith was sucking

HERB SEASONING . . . Tasty! For soups, stews, fish, tomatoes, vegetables, macaroni, stuffing.

BARBECUE SPICE . . . For hamburgers, chops, steaks, spareribs, goulash, stews.

CINNAMON SUGAR . . . Delicious on toast, waffles, baked apples, hot cereals, custard, apple sauce.

MEAT TENDERIZER . . . Permits you to use the less costly cuts by tenderizing and enhancing flavor and texture.

Now McCormick is first to bring you a complete line of these special seasonings

PEPPER, COARSE GRIND . . . The flavorful kind you get from a pepper mill. 'Specially good on barbecued meats, in oyster stew, chowders, soups.

Packed in decorative glass shakers . . . a gay array for more flavorful meals indoors and out.

Follow the trend to more flavorful meals with the McCORMICK complete line of special seasonings . . . made by America's foremost spice house. These "just right" blends of spices and herbs give zest and flavor to everyday meals. make special meals delectable. A wonderful aid to the outdoor chef in your family. Add these delightful seasonings to your flavor shelf today!

McCORMICK
ONE FAMOUS EMBLEM—TWO GREAT BRANDS
McCORMICK and Schilling

ITALIAN SEASONING . . . For the preparation of sauces, meat loaf, pot roast, stews, fish, macaroni, spaghetti, ravioli, poultry, in the spicy Italian manner.

SEASON-ALL . . . An exciting new mixture of spices that adds a zesty flavor. Keep it on your dining room table as you do pepper and salt; for steaks, chops, in cooking vegetables, salads, soups, eggs, poultry, fish, hamburgers.

McCORMICK . . . The House of Flavor

his left hand, which was covered with blood. "You little hellcat!" he said.

I kept very still. "Careful, Smith!" I said. "No reprisals—not if you want me to live. Not if you need my car."

He stepped back, still sucking his hand. "You'd better go, Mr. Curtis."

"Go on, Hugh," Mollie said. She had got over the blow—she didn't appear to be seriously damaged. "He won't hurt me now."

I said, "Sorry, Mollie!"

"You needn't be. It was a long shot—like climbing the wall. It might have worked."

She gave me a gallant little wave, and I walked slowly to the steps.

I called myself every name under the sun. I'd been unforgivably dim not to see through that act that Mollie had been putting on. Now there was nothing to prevent Smith's going ahead with his escape plans—his real plans. He'd wait for me to bring the car that evening, he'd shoot us both, and he'd disappear.

I closed the castle door behind me and thrust the key savagely into the lock. When I tried to turn it, it wouldn't turn. I couldn't move the key in any direction. The door was still unlocked, and I couldn't lock it.

I stood back and considered the situation, and the more I thought about it the less I liked it. The day that would soon be dawning was a Saturday—the first Saturday since the news of the murder had got out. It was possible that sight-seers would come to the castle. Someone might go in. And then everything would blow up. I'd better go back and tell Smith. He wouldn't want the castle left open either.

Then a new thought struck me. If only I could let him know what had happened without going back to the tower—if only I could make him come down and join me in the passage——

I made my way quickly to the inner end where slopes of broken masonry led to a flat surface above the passage. I was in full view of the tower, but I groped around and almost at once found the murder holes. There were nine of them, and between them they commanded most of the passage.

After a moment I climbed down over the masonry and left the castle. I crossed the causeway and knelt down on the grass at the side of the moat. The bank there had been strengthened with lumps of stone, and some of them were loose. The first I dislodged was too big, but the second felt just right. It must have weighed twenty pounds. I lugged it from its bed and carried it back through the passage. I left it there beside the hole—it fitted nicely—and climbed down again and went out through the door. I walked round the moat till I was opposite the square tower. The place couldn't have been more deserted. I cupped my hands toward the tower and gave a loud hail.

I was just beginning to think I'd have to shout again when Smith's voice came clearly over the water. "Yes? What is it?"

"The lock's jammed," I called. "I've locked the door, but I can't get the key out."

He reacted to that, all right. He had to. If the door had really been locked, and the door jammed, he'd have been a prisoner.

There was a short silence. Then he called, "All right—I'll come down. But watch your step!"

I turned and raced back. I'd scarcely got into position on the passage roof when I saw a glimmer of light at the bottom of the tower steps, and Smith emerged, limping. He had the hand lamp in his left hand, the gun in his right. I raised the stone and lowered it into the hole and concentrated on gauging his speed as he moved under the arch. My heart was pounding so fiercely I could scarcely breathe. Through the hole, I could see the advancing light getting brighter.

I heard him call out, "Are you there, Mr. Curtis?" For a few seconds there was silence. Now he'd know that I was up to something, because the door wasn't locked as I'd said it was. He must have found the jammed key; I heard him fiddling with it. The beam grew stronger. I caught a glimpse of the swinging lamp, and I let the stone go.

There was a cry, a crash—and the light went out.

I listened. I thought I caught a faint sound, but I couldn't identify it. Suddenly I realized that my best course was to make for the tower. Once I was up there with Mollie, and we had that thick door between us and the gun, Smith would be helpless. I lowered myself back into the courtyard. Dawn was near, but for the moment the night seemed darker than ever and I groped my way forward with outstretched hands. Presently I felt grass under my feet and knew I was all right. I reached the door and dragged it open and slipped inside. I'd made it!

I raced up the stone spiral. The top door was open. I rushed out onto the roof and heaved the door shut behind me. "Mollie!" I cried exultantly.

A voice from the parapet said, "Stay right where you are, Mr. Curtis! I can see you against the sky."

The utter unexpectedness of it made it the worst blow yet. He must have sized the situation up the instant the stone had fallen, and nipped back to the tower while I was still wondering if he was dead.

He said, "Keep quite still, Mr. Curtis. I don't want any movement until daylight."

I didn't want any movement either. I'd half expected him to come over and beat me up, and it was a relief that he wasn't going to. I looked across at Mollie's corner. Now that there was no lamp, I couldn't see her at all. I said, "Are you wired up, Mollie?"

"Yes. He did it before he went down. What happened?"

I told her.

Smith said, with mock indignation, "He might have killed me!" He sounded very pleased with himself.

Mollie said, "Better luck next time!"

After that we were quiet for a bit. The sky in the east grew lighter. The blackness above slowly paled to gray. I could just see Smith now, lying back against the parapet with his gun at the ready. And Mollie, too, blanketed like a squaw, very still, very watchful.

I said, "What about the door? Anyone could come in now."

He fingered the gun almost lovingly. "It'll be too bad if anyone does. Still, we don't want unnecessary trouble, do we? Perhaps you'd better get the stone shot, Mr. Curtis."

Smith came with me. He didn't lower his gun even after I'd lifted the shot, though he could safely have done so. I staggered to the passage with it and dropped it a foot or two from the door with a sigh of relief.

Smith grinned. "I carried it farther than that!" he said. "Well, push it against the door."

I looked at him in surprise. "Aren't I going to leave?"

He shook his head. "You're altogether too inventive. I prefer to keep you under my eye as long as possible."

Mollie looked surprised to see me back. Presently she asked if she could go and stretch her legs and he said she could, but she wasn't to go outside the castle. He limped across and released her from the wire. He seemed to be quite confident he could trust her, as long as he held me as a hostage.

The sun was up now, and the warmth was comforting. I sat and watched Smith gently massaging his ankle.

It felt strange being a prisoner on the roof, with Mollie free down below. I said, "I'm not sure you haven't been a bit too trusting, Smith."

"Nonsense! She knows very well what'll happen to you if she tries anything. She wouldn't want her boy friend shot."

"I'm not her boy friend, unfortunately. I only met her three days ago. She doesn't care a bit about me."

"I didn't get that impression."

I knew he didn't believe anything I said, but he walked to the other side of the roof and looked over cautiously. After a moment he walked back again. If I'd achieved nothing else, I'd got him worried. Very soon, I thought, he'd take me down into the courtyard with him to make sure. That was the most I'd hoped for. If he had two of us on his mind, in the open, I might still have a chance to get the gun.

Then the whole thing fizzled. There was a step on the spiral staircase. Smith called out sharply, "Who's that?" and Mollie said, "It's me—who do you think?" and came out onto the roof.

Smith gave me a wide grin. "I thought I was a better judge of character than that, Mr. Curtis." He didn't bother to tell her what had happened. "Well, now, perhaps Miss Bourne would get us something to eat."

When the food was ready, he ate hungrily. Mollie said she only wanted a drink of water. I thought I'd better make a show of eating, but the food almost choked me. I never had believed that hearty-meal-before-execution stuff, and now I knew it wasn't true.

After breakfast, Smith went through the bag of supplies and flung over into the moat everything that I could conceivably use as a weapon. His own hammer and chisel followed the knives and forks and tin opener. By the time he'd finished there was nothing on the roof but two soft bags and a little food, the water can, and a couple of plastic tumblers.

Then he wired Mollie up again. As he refixed the wires to the slats, I heard the twang that had given me away when I'd scaled the wall. I realized now what had made the noise. Each set of slats was bolted down to two of the stone corbels, but the ends were free, so that the last four or five feet were merely supported by the next corbel. As I'd noticed when I'd put my weight on them from underneath, they were very springy, and when they were released after pressure at any point, they twanged. But for that, I thought ruefully, we probably wouldn't be there now.

As soon as Mollie was well secured, Smith came and sat down beside me—but at a safe distance. He had a clear view through the slats right across to the path that led up from the gate. It was a highly strategic spot. By leaning over, I could just share the view. But I still couldn't reach Smith. His hand, with the gun, was outstretched along the slats almost carelessly, or so it seemed, but it was too far away to be any good to me.

We were obviously in for a long wait now. Until Smith made some fresh move, there was nothing I could do. Mollie tried a new tactic—needling him. He just looked at her appreciatively and grinned. She asked him what his little bag of jewels was worth and he said, "Enough to keep me in luxury for the rest of my life," but that was all. She gave up and switched to me, and we discussed what sort of space the story was likely to get in our papers when we were in the clear again, and she said being with Smith for three days had been the worst experience of her life but that in the end it would probably turn out to have been almost worth it. We made a few cracks, a sort of proud defiance, boosting each other's morale. Then the talk faded out.

It was just before eleven when Smith, suddenly very alert, announced that two people were walking up the path toward the castle door. I leaned over and caught sight of them just before they went out of view—a man and a girl with their arms round each other. Smith got up and crossed to the other side of the roof, crouching down, so that he could see over the courtyard to the entrance passage without any risk of being seen himself. I made a tentative move, just to see how great his preoccupation was, but he whipped round in a second and I didn't try it again.

I'd been right about the Saturday sightseers, but the stone shot would frustrate any but a most determined effort to get in.

Then I heard voices. Several voices. Distant, at first, but getting louder and closer every second. Smith jerked the gun threateningly, and peered through the slats. I leaned over and looked too. A couple of youths appeared on the path, riding bicycles. Behind them were two girls, also riding. And then, up the slope, so many cyclists came surging that I lost count. There were thirty of them, at least—a whole club. And they were all making for the castle door.

Smith scrambled to his feet and went over to the ramparts again so that he could watch the entrance passage, his finger tight on the trigger of his gun. He was beginning to look like a man with an itch to shoot. These young people didn't give a fig for notice boards—or stone shots behind locked doors that moved at a push. They were coming in! Their cockney voices were suddenly much louder. They were in high, larking spirits.

Smith's face had turned a dirty, mottled color. An incursion on this scale was something that even he hadn't allowed for.

I said, "This is it, Smith. You've lost, I'm afraid."

"Don't move!" he said. "Don't move an inch!" His expression was vicious. "If I lose, you lose. But don't worry—I'm not finished yet." He tapped his gun meaningly.

"You can't shoot all of them!" Mollie exclaimed in a tone of horror. "Why start something you can't finish? You haven't a chance."

"We shall see."

I sat still listening. I could hear individual voices quite plainly now. Someone shouted across the courtyard, "These castles look like they just been put 'ere, don't they?" A girl said, shrilly, "Get on, you. I want to see too." There was more laughter. The tidal wave was sweeping on. They seemed to be down by the well now. One of them called out, "Prob'ly the bride's barf or somefin'." Another said, "Coo, look what's up 'ere!"

They'd reached the tower. They were certain to come up. I could see no end to it now but a massacre. First us, and then as many of them as there were bullets for.

Suddenly Smith stepped across to Mollie and released her from the wire and jerked her to her feet.

"Down the steps!" he said. He turned on me. "You stay here. You know what happens to the girl if you try anything."

He stuck the gun in his pocket, but he was still holding it. The barrel was pointing at Mollie as they went down the steps.

I heard the youths and girls come piling up the stairs. Someone was whistling the theme tune from La Ronde. A voice said, "Ever see The Thirty-Nine Steps, Alf?"

Then I heard Smith. "What do you people think you're doing?" he demanded in a tone of authority. "Get out, all of you. The castle doesn't open till next month. Can't you read?"

So that was it!

There was a moment's silence—then an outbreak of indignant "Coo"s and a few catcalls. Some bold youth said, "'Oo are you, mister, anyway?"

"I'm the caretaker. Now push off, all of you, or I'll call the police."

There was murmuring at that, and more derisive jeers.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 110

NOT SO SURE

By MARGARET SECRIST

Her braids pinned high upon her head,
Margaret clomped downstairs in her mother's spike-heeled shoes.
She dragged her mother's long skirt down the front-porch steps, and went to call on a lady who said, "Good afternoon, Mrs. Jones."
The lady served her sweet milk-tea in a little doll's pink cup, and frosted graham crackers on a little doll's pink plate.
Margaret was sure that day that she was quite grown up, but now that she truly is,
she is not sure at all.

The Picture of Health for August

by MAXINE DAVIS

The height of summer! Asters, lilies, gaudy dahlias make a brilliant backdrop for terrace dinners of Maryland fried chicken, corn roasted in its husk, and peaches and cream.

These pleasures once cost me a high price. The bill used to come after I'd packed away my easy cottons and shoe-rned myself into the extravagant grey flannel suit d black crepe sheath I'd planned to wear for years! fter a look at my expanded silhouette I'd hear the mily groan, "Mom has to diet again."

No more, thank goodness! After talking with my ctor, I now routinely use the NEW KESSAMIN PLAN d KESSAMIN #14 tablets. These contain essential tritional vitamins and iron as well as a neutral ad-tive. They help keep me perfectly happy—and rmal size—with only one ear of corn and a smaller ce of peach pie. And if my husband fattens I use e KESSAMIN way to help him lose the unhealthy cess promptly. It's the best aid to weight control e've ever found.

August is bounteous but it does have drawbacks! eat and humidity are hard to take. Everything I do, om golf to just a little mending, makes me drip like leaky faucet. When I cool off and dry I could be even ore uncomfortable than before.

The reason—I've learned that certain bacteria hich tend to grow prolifically in perspiration are the urce of the unpleasant smell that bothers one.

But now, I've solved this problem. I've found the ew YODORA, the deodorant containing an antibiotic hat paralyzes those germs and keeps underarms ainty.

YODORA's a light cream, lightly fragrant, and sooth-ng and healing to an irritated surface. It's a joy be-ause it lasts from this morning till tomorrow.

Uncle Joe isn't his jovial self this visit. His store eeth wobble. He's low; doesn't tell his improbable ales or shake with laughter from his chins to his shins.

We know just what he needs: ORA-FIX, that remark-bly efficient adherent, to hold his dentures firmly in lace; and ORA denture powder to clean them in 20 inutes and keep his breath fresh as a baby's. Now, ith ORA-FIX and ORA to make him comfortable, Jncle Joe butters a fat ear of corn and booms, "Once tiger . . ."

When he's with us Uncle Joe always insists on hav-ng projects—the sort of things he can't do in his achelor apartment in New York.

He picks lima beans and bravely ignores the arthri-is in his hands. In spite of his rheumatic back he noves fieldstones and makes a pretty path from the garage to the rose beds. And afterwards of course he's ull of complaints.

Consequently, as soon as he's through I bring out our jar of SURIN and have warm moist towels ready or him. "Put these where you ache and when the rea's warm I'll smooth the SURIN on," I tell him. 'It's not a cure for your arthritis; there isn't any. But SURIN is warming, soothing, relaxing—and it helps elieve that distress.

"Now you'll be able to enjoy the fruit punch we'll have waiting for you."

KILLS ATHLETE'S FOOT FUNGUS ON CONTACT*

Back comes that cool, clean comfort!

Octofen Liquid by McKesson proved effective by a group of skin specialists ...in well-known New York hospital!

ATHLETE'S FOOT can become so serious—you need hospital care. In clinical tests by a team of leading dermatologists, people so afflicted with Athlete's Foot, were treated with Octofen Liquid. Results were remarkable—progress rapid—and 90% of the patients were clinically relieved in a surprisingly short time.

The reason Octofen Liquid is so effective is very simple. Doctors know that it is a fungus which causes Athlete's Foot. So why attack it with ineffective cure-alls? The direct way to get rid of Athlete's Foot is with a fungicide —something that kills fungus.

Years of specialized research at McKesson Laboratories produced Octofen Liquid to do this special job of killing Athlete's Foot fungi. As it seeps into the cracked places, it searches out the Athlete's Foot fungi — kills them on contact—in minutes! In many cases, two or three applications may be all you need.

So today—when the warm, humid summer weather encourages the Athlete's Foot fungi to bother you—get Octofen Liquid and soothing Octofen Powder at your druggist's. He will agree with your wise decision to be ready to stop infection early. Your druggist can also explain why Octofen works better—why it is the only Athlete's Foot remedy approved by the National Foot Health Council of leading chiropodists and podiatrists. Like all fine McKesson products, Octofen is made better—so it's better for you.

*Laboratory tests have proved that Octofen kills Athlete's Foot fungus on contact!

Octofen

BETTER...by McKESSON

OCTOFEN POWDER
helps prevent Athlete's Foot. Dust it onto washed and dried toes—into shoes and hose, every day.

© 1957 McKesson & Robbins

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 108

"Go on," Smith said, "before I collect a bob off each of you." That worked better than the threat. There was a bit of grumbling. Then, slowly, the tide began to recede. In a moment or two they were all back in the courtyard. There were a few more insults, hurled from safety. There was more laughter. There was a cheeky cacophony of bicycle bells as they collected their machines. Then the noise gradually subsided. They were going. Smith had pulled it off.

I moved to the ramparts and watched them leave the courtyard. They weren't in any hurry. Some of them had begun fooling about on the edge of the moat outside. Smith didn't wait for their final departure. As the last one went out through the door he emerged from the tower with Mollie in front of him and the gun still in his pocket and crossed the courtyard to replace the stoneshot against the door. In a few moments he'd be back on the roof—and we'd all be as we were again.

I couldn't let that happen. I scanned the roof. How right he'd been to throw everything into the moat! I needed something . . . one of the slats, perhaps? Maybe I could break off one of the unattached ends.

I darted to my corner and heaved up a slat with all my strength. It bent like a bow—but it wouldn't snap. It was no good—they were coming back. I could hear them on the staircase.

I forced the slat back and down until it was bent double and almost flat again—but it still wouldn't break.

Then, suddenly, I had a different idea. I held the slat down with my right hand and drew the blanket over the bend in it and sat down with my right elbow pressing hard on the free end. I'd just settled myself when Mollie's head appeared in the doorway.

Smith stuck his head round the edge of the door, cautiously, and saw me. He grinned. "So I hadn't a chance, eh?"

I said, "You're a murdering swine, Smith, but I have to hand it to you. That was quite a performance you gave."

"I thought it was pretty good myself," he said.

He made Mollie sit down, and he wired her up again. While he was occupied I shifted my position slightly and pulled the blanket a little higher. It looked all right from where I was. If only he'd hurry! My elbow was beginning to ache horribly.

He finished with Mollie and resumed his seat beside me. "There they go," he said, as the rear guard of the cyclists disappeared over the hill. "Well, they'll never have a closer shave than that!"

I grunted. I was sweating all over now. I could hold on for another couple of minutes, and that was all. I could feel the end of the slat biting into the flesh of my forearm. The fingers of my right hand were beginning to grow numb. I moved a fraction of an inch, trying to ease the pressure, but the slat merely bit deeper. I tried not to think about it, about the pain. I began to count, slowly. One . . . two . . . three . . .

Then Smith moved. The hand with the gun came down over the slats beside him. The barrel of the gun was over the corbel where the slat had been. I jerked my elbow away.

There was a rending of cloth, a loud smack as the slat hit the corbel, and a yell of agony from Smith. The gun went off and flew into the air. It landed on the concrete in front of Smith. I dived for it, just as he shot out a foot and kicked it out of my way. It went spinning across the roof toward Mollie. She picked it up neatly and threw it over the parapet into the moat.

I was at the door before Smith could reach it, blocking his way. For a tense moment we all looked at one another. Smith's face was like putty. Blood was oozing from the crushed fingers of his right hand. My own right arm was still numbed and useless. My coat was almost ripped from my back. I slipped it off and dropped it at my feet.

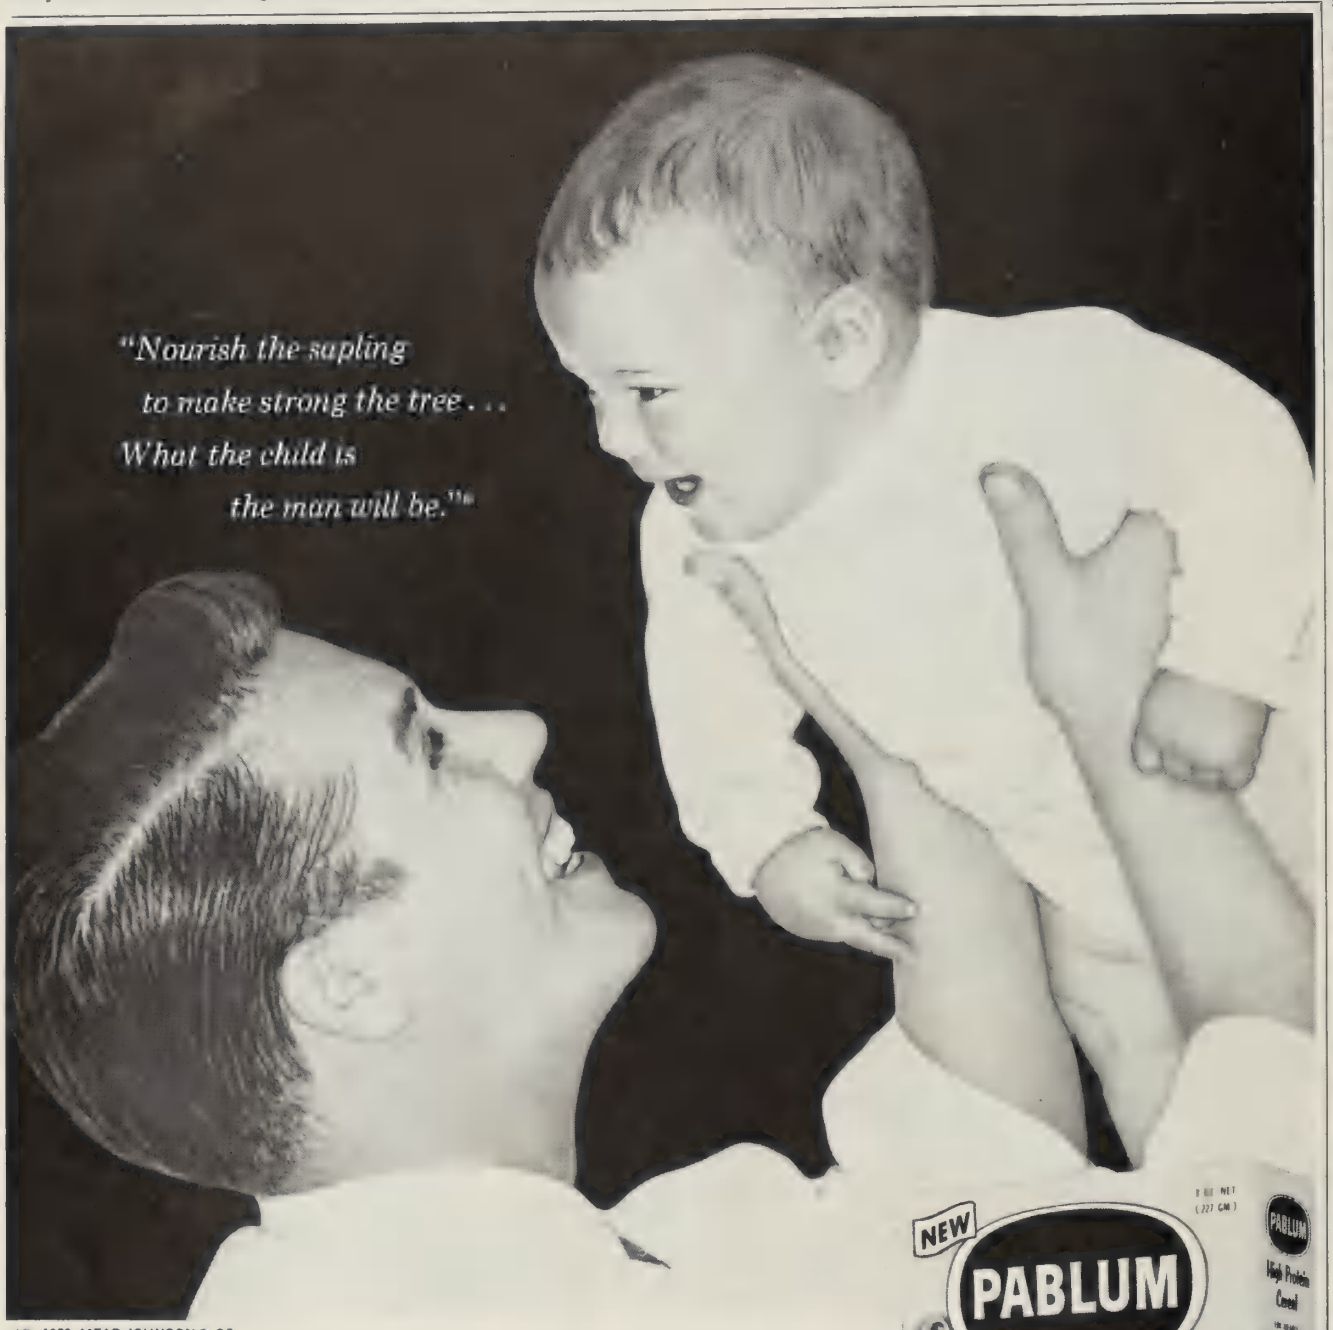
"Well, Mr. Smith," I said softly, "this looks like the last round, doesn't it? Let's see what you can do without your gun."

I approached him slowly, watching him all the time. I feinted with my right—what there was of it!—and hit out hard with my left. The blow landed, but not heavily. He grunted and, head down, came at me like a bull. He couldn't use his right, either, but with what he had he could lay me cold if I wasn't careful. My right arm was coming back to life now, and I used it. We weren't fighting for fun. I rocked him with a blow to the face and an uppercut to the chin and when I saw he was groggy I went in and battered him, hitting with all my strength. He didn't fall—he slowly sagged to his knees. I dragged him up and gave him one more for good measure—and that was the end of the fight.

My knuckles were flayed, but that was about all the damage I'd suffered. I rested for a moment while I got my breath back. Then I stepped across and slipped Mollie's foot out of the wire. "Nice bit of fielding!" I said.

She was pale, but amazingly composed. "I'd better get the police," she said.

"Yes, as fast as you like. I'll be all right—I don't think he'll give any more trouble, now."



Before she could leave, Smith called out "Wait!" and struggled to his feet, leaning against the parapet. He'd made quite a recovery, but I couldn't see him renewing the attack—and I was right. What was on his mind was something quite different.

He said, "Don't be hasty, Curtis—this is the chance of a lifetime for you. Surely you're not going to pass it up?"

"What do you mean?"

He tapped his pocket. "These stones are worth fifty thousand pounds. You can have them—in return for the use of your car. You and Miss Bourne can share them. You'll be quite safe—they've been lost sight of for four years, they're not hot any more. No one will ever know. If you let me go, I swear I'll never tell anyone that you had them. If they catch me, I'll say I threw them in the moat. Fifty thousand pounds, Curtis! Think of it!"

I looked at him sadly. It was the only speech he'd made since our first meeting that wasn't in *©—1930, MEAD JOHNSON & CO.

NEW Pablum–35% protein, builds health for tomorrow!

Your baby grows as much his first year as he will during his next three years added together! And sturdy growth takes lots of protein. That's why we developed this new cereal that gives baby a protein bonus! It contains 35% protein, the highest amount experts recommend for a baby cereal.

Of course, like all Pablum Cereals, this new High Protein Cereal tastes wonderfully smooth. And Baby will love the delicate flavor. Because Baby enjoys it so, it's easy for you to help your baby build health for tomorrow with new High Protein Cereal. For variety, serve all five Pablum Cereals.

Your baby deserves the best... PABLUM BRAND® Pablum Products

DIVISION OF MEAD JOHNSON & COMPANY, EVANSVILLE, IND., MANUFACTURERS OF NUTRITIONAL AND PHARMACEUTICAL PRODUCTS

haracter. But then, of course, he'd never been n these straits before.

I said, "Carry on, Mollie. Let's get this ver."

I stepped aside to let her pass. Smith's expression was desperate. He pulled himself up n his toes as though bracing himself for a ast effort. I thought he was going to take another crack at me after all. But he didn't. He ook a flying leap onto the parapet, stood here for a second, raised his arms above his ead—and dived.

We both rushed to the edge. It was an incredible dive for a man in his state—a remarkble dive for anyone fully clothed. He went ertically into the moat with hardly more plash than I'd have made from ten feet. He ad such momentum that I expected him to ome up near the bank. I was all set to rush for he car and intercept him. But he didn't come p near the bank. He didn't come up at all.

That afternoon the police put a dinghy on he moat and recovered his body with a couple f grapnels. They had quite a job because he'd one head first into the mud. It couldn't have een a nice death.

Once they had the body, as well as our tory, it didn't take them long to identify im. The Yard knew all about him. His name, turned out, was Walter Rance. Up till a few ears back, he'd been notorious as a gifted cat urglar and jewel thief. Lawson, who came acing down to Lodden that evening, goggling nd almost speechless over our adventure, told s when articulate words finally came to him at he'd have known the man anywhere from he photographs he'd seen.

The jewels, mostly diamonds and rubies, beonged to the Earl of Carisdown. They'd been tolen from his home on the south coast four ears earlier on the night of his daughter's wenty-first birthday party. Rance had been rrested in London about a month later, but n another charge. He'd been suspected of the arisdown coup, but a woman had given him n alibi which the police couldn't break, and they hadn't been able to prove anything. He'd been jailed for four years on account of the job they knew about.

The Carisdown affair had never been cleared up. There had been a suspicious incident near Lodden the day after the raid, when a police car on special patrol had chased a car that had refused to stop. It had skidded and crashed on Lodden hill, overturning and bursting into flames. Two men had been trapped underneath it, and when the fire had died their remains had defied identification. So had everything else in the car. The engine number had been scored out; the registration plates had turned out to be false. The two men were clearly crooks, but there had been nothing definite to connect them with the jewel robbery.

When Hoad had been found murdered, and attention had turned to the missing key, no one had thought of associating the theft of the key with the car crash. If the police, on the day of the crash, had happened to notice a third man in the escaping car, the link might have been established—but they hadn't. Now it seemed more than likely that all these incidents were connected.

With Rance dead, the truth of what had occurred could only be a matter for conjecture, but the police reconstruction ran something like this: Rance had led the Carisdown raid, with two associates. For some reason that would never be cleared up, the three men hadn't left the district immediately after the burglary, but had spent the night there. Next day they'd set off for London. Rance had been in the back seat, and at the first glimpse of the police car he'd ducked down. When the car had crashed, Rance had been flung clear. He'd been carrying the jewels in his pocket. Knowing that the police were close behind him, he'd looked around for some safe place to hide the loot. He'd spotted the castle and crossed the fields and gone in through the open door while Figgis was hurrying to the scene of the crash. Up in the tower, he'd found a deep crevice in the ancient parapet and stuffed the leather purse in. It had gone in farther than he'd intended, dropping down out of his reach. On the way out he'd removed the door key, in case he'd need more time for recovering the jewels than an authorized visit would give him. Presumably he'd intended to come back for them as soon as the heat was off, but the jail sentence had spoiled his plans. And that was about all there was to it.

NEXT MONTH

"You understand what it is all about? You will have to be—er—made over; a new hairdo, different clothes." He smiled sourly. "I don't suppose you will care for the clothes. We will give you an entirely new identity card, life history, passport and papers."

Thus Miss Jones—which was not really her name—began her assignment as an espionage agent. But she should not have fallen in love—especially with the spy she was ordered to uncover.

THE UNFORGETTABLE MISS JONES

By DOROTHY BLACK

condensed novel
complete in the September JOURNAL

It was an incredibly exciting evening—one of those occasions that stay in the mind forever. To be free again, with Mollie looking as fresh and lovely as though her ordeal had never happened, with the office wires crackling congratulations and even old Hatcher saying he'd like to buy me a beer, with other and far more able reporters waiting for crumbs from the rich man's table—all was wonderfully exhilarating. Not that I had much time to bask at first, because the story had to be written and phoned and there was a lot of it to write. I was hard at it for more than two hours, and when I'd finally put the story over I went in search of Mollie. I asked the porter if he'd seen her and he said she'd gone out for a stroll more than an hour ago. She'd obviously got through her story much faster than I had. I still envied her her skill and craftsmanship.

It seemed unlikely she'd have gone back to the castle after all the unpleasant things that had happened there, but I walked up through the fields, just to make sure. I spotted her almost at once, down by the river, and quickly joined her. She was lying on the bank, lazily twiddling a bit of grass in her fingers and gazing down at the water. She gave me a warm smile when she saw me, and patted the grass beside her invitingly. It was the first time I'd seen her without a mob around her since we'd gone for the police.

She said, "Did you get your piece off all right?"

I nodded.

"How are the hands?" She inspected my knuckles, and made a wry face. "It was quite a fight, wasn't it? You were most impressive. . . . In fact, Hugh, you were rather marvelous all through."

I gave a modest shrug. "You weren't exactly inactive yourself."

"We were very lucky."

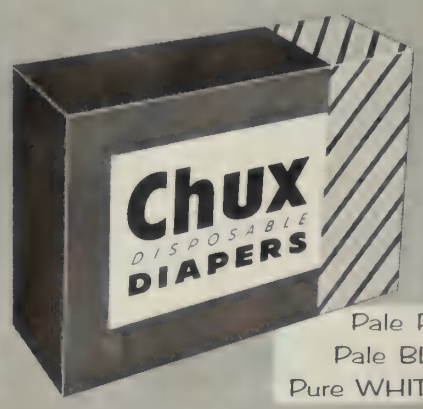
"We certainly were. What a story! How much did you send?"

"About half a column," she said.

I stared at her. "Half a column! You can't mean it. Why, I must have sent three columns."

"Fine! It was worth it. I hope you really put yourself across this time."

"I certainly did, but . . . Mollie, what's the idea?"



"It's your story," she said. "You earned it ten times over. I decided to leave it to you." She smiled. "I wanted to say 'Thank you' in some way and that seemed a good way. The greatest sacrifice a woman like me could make!" END

NEW
Chux®
DISPOSABLE
DIAPERS

Softer to wear,
yet never tear!

- Waterproof panty built right in!
- Medicated to prevent diaper rash!
- Absorbent as cloth diapers!
- Protective underpad—for nursery or sickroom!

Pale PINK...
Pale BLUE,
Pure WHITE, too

MADE BY A Johnson & Johnson COMPANY

CHIX BABY PRODUCTS DIV., Chicopee Mills, 47 Worth St., New York City

You bake it better with the "flower" of the wheat . . .

Gold Medal makes a "Flower" of a Cooky

CARAMEL REFRIGERATOR COOKIES
Another Gold Medal "Flower"
by Betty Crocker

Rich, crispy, and "double-quick" easy with dependable Gold Medal Flour. It helps you bake everything better, because it's the "flower" of the wheat.

1/2 cup soft shortening (part butter) 1 3/4 cups sifted GOLD MEDAL Flour
1 cup brown sugar (packed) 1 egg 1/2 tsp. vanilla 1/4 tsp. salt 1/2 tsp. soda

Mix well shortening, sugar, egg and vanilla. Sift together and stir in flour, salt and soda. Form into roll 2½" across. Wrap in waxed paper. Chill until firm. Heat oven to 400° (mod. hot). Slice ⅛" thick. Bake 8 to 10 min. on ungreased baking sheet. Makes 5 doz.

For variations, follow recipe above except make changes indicated Rainbow Rings – Shape in 2 rolls, 1½" across. Roll in tiny colored candies. Turn baked cookies upside down to show colored ring. Top with tinted frosting.

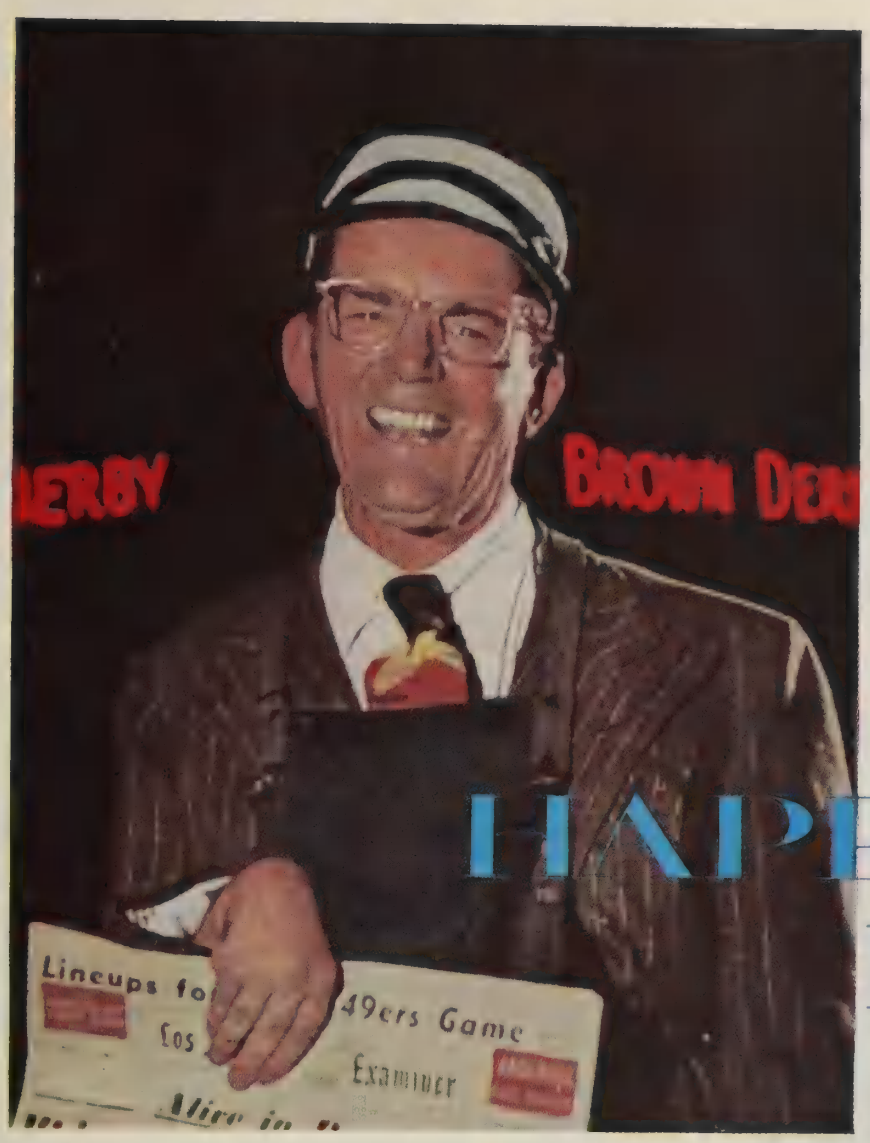
Chocolate Mint Circles – Add 1½ sq. unsweetened chocolate (1½ oz.) melted, with the shortening. Form into roll 2" across. Cut centers out of half the slices with thimble. Put cooled circles together with tinted peppermint icing. Makes 3 doz. Bake centers in threes to form Clover Leaves.

Ribbon Bars – Divide dough in halves. To one add ½ sq. unsweetened chocolate (½ oz.) melted. Form each half into 2 strips, 2" wide and ¼" thick. Pile strips, alternating colors. Press together.



Gold MEDAL

Bake it Better WITH Gold Medal

THE "Kitchen-tested" FLOUR

General Mills

HOW AMERICA LIVES

THE HAPPY MAN

On a corner in Beverly Hills you will meet a man crippled in body, but so strong in love the whole town loves him back.

By HELEN ITRIA

PHOTOGRAPHS BY WILLIAM READ WOODFIELD

This is the story of the happiest man on Wilshire Boulevard. He has everything he wants: love, success and good friends—famous friends.

He can be found any night except Saturday between the hours of six-thirty and two on or near the corner of Rodeo and Wilshire, in the heart of Beverly Hills, California. He is fifty years old and sells newspapers for a living. He feeds his soul, however, on laughter and good fellowship. He is a spastic.

His name is a long one—Melvin Offie Travioli—but his three hundred customer-friends call him Mel. Never Melvin the Spastic. They don't think of him that way. They don't see him that way.

Unless you know him, this is hard to understand. Because Mel is a startling sight at first glance.

Say you're a newcomer to the Beverly-Wilshire Hotel, and you want a late edition plus a breath of fresh air. You'll probably buy your paper from Mel. If he sees you coming, he will walk toward you, dragging his right foot. You'll have to pull out your paper from a canvas apron strapped around his waist. He can't do it for you. His left hand waves helplessly in the air. His right hand turns up with crooked fingers bent like claws, pressing one extra paper to his twisted body for display purposes.

If you have the right change, you drop it into a leather pouch around his neck. If you have a bill, you slip it into his left coat pocket and make your own change from the "bib."

He won't watch what you're doing. He's too busy studying your face, making up his mind about you. His eyes are sharp and alert, but spectacles fogged over with mist and headlighted by the street lamp give him the appearance of an inquisitive gnome.

He is searching for a key to your mood. Your character? Don't worry. When he says, "God made only good people; the bad ones I don't know," he means it. He'll find something good in you—even when you can't yourself.

When your transaction is finished, Mel will slowly raise his right hand to his cap and work his mouth until he manages to croak, "Good night, sir, and thank you."

Come back six months later and he will remember you.

You will usually find him surrounded by customer-friends. "That's why I like the night shift," he says. "People are relaxed then and like to clown around. They don't just buy a paper and run."

You may have to walk a little to find him. He sometimes wanders over to Frascati's restaurant a block away, or across the street to the Brown Derby for extra papers, or into the all-night drugstore on the corner. Maybe he's talking to Margaret Whiting and her mother under the hotel canopy, or grinning at Burns and Allen, or chuckling over George Jessel's muttering, "You got too good a thing here, kid. One o' these nights I'm gonna take over your corner, see?"

Douglas Morrow, who wrote The Stratton Story for the screen, often chides him, "You're a lousy businessman, Mel. How do you expect to sell your papers if you don't stay in one place?"

Mel replies with good humor, "I gotta keep moving to keep warm," ignoring the fact that his right foot is curled over a special three-inch cork-and-foam-rubber innersole and throbs painfully if he gains as much as four pounds.

He doesn't call these people to him or shout, "Papers, get your late papers!" He lets them seek him out—and they do. "I go to work with the thought that I'm going to see somebody I like," he says. "If I asked them to buy a paper they'd immediately think, 'Shucks, he doesn't want to see me, he just wants to sell a paper.' I want them to know that I like them and am happy to be with them."

As a "public servant," he considers it his duty to cheer up the many miserable, dispirited or dully bored folks burdened with stock-market problems. Monotony is the biggest enemy of his moneyed friends, and he wages constant battle against it;

A spastic at birth, Mel Travioli has an adoring wife, three children, hundreds of customer-friends.

They are good Mormons

The Traviolis' Electric Shopper is a regular Sunday sight at Santa Monica church. They tithe—put aside 10 per cent of Mel's earnings a day—a donation of $3 to $10 a week. In "spare time" Lea cleans and cooks for fellow members who are sick and "less lucky than me."

he learns their pet peeves, their favorite teams, their handicapping prowess, and keeps up running gags with them. He wears a different-colored, outlandish tie each night, switches rooters' caps by season, even grew a mustache once to give them something to talk about. Some of his customers enjoy their only casual conversation or chuckle of the day when they step out for their paper.

Even out-of-towners quickly succumb to his humor. For example, there is a dignified theater owner from India who always hunts up Mel whenever he is in town, just to hear him croak, "Hello, Sahib!"

When someone brings him a serious problem, however, all joking stops. One night a man told Mel despondently, "I'm going to blow my brains out. I'm finished. I just lost a million bucks on the stock market."

Mel frowned. "Did you ever buy a life with that money?" he asked sharply.

"No."

"Well, do you believe in God or is money your God?" he persisted.

No answer.

"As long as you believe in God you can repent. But if you take your life you can't come back to be forgiven." He added dryly, "It's too late to get your money back too!"

The man just glowered and left, but the following night showed up to shake Mel's hand.

"Mel does more good than anyone I know," Anthony Michael Padden, former manager of the Beverly-Wilshire Hotel, often stated. "Just meeting him is a lot cheaper than paying for a doctor's prescription, and twice as effective.

"He's part of the operation and stature of Wilshire Boulevard," he added. Five years ago, Mel was gone for three days, and Padden was driven frantic answering calls from people wanting to know where he was. Finally, out of self-defense he checked the newspaper to learn that Mel had been chased off his corner by a new route man. "We got that straightened out in a hurry," said Padden. "He'll be with us the rest of his life if he wants." When the hotel was sold last April, Mel's friends worried about his future. But in one week, Mrs. Evelyn Sharp, the new president of Beverly-Wilshire, Inc., recognized this man's courage and intelligence. Enthusiastically she concurs—Mel's job is secure.

News vendors—even popular news vendors—never get rich. Mel could supplement his nickel-a-paper income by "making book," but will not "because the customer never gets an even break." Nor will he ask for charity; if he hasn't the cash, he does without.

He used to shake his head at Douglas Morrow, who drives a convertible with the top down in all kinds of weather. To Mel, who had to spend three hours a day on buses to cover the miles between his low-rent district and Beverly Hills—with drivers chafing openly at the delay—a car was not a plaything. It was an impossible dream.

"Doug," he said one drizzly night, "I always thought you writers were smart fellows, but I've decided you're not so smart or you'd have sense to stay in out of the rain."

However, four years ago Mel had to retract his words. He saved up enough for the down payment on a bright red Autoette, a three-wheeled conveyance which ran on four electric batteries and achieved the breath-taking speed of sixteen miles per hour.

The night it was delivered, Mel drove up to the hotel, spotted Morrow and shouted, "See? I got a real convertible. I don't have a top to put up!"

He didn't sell many papers that night. All his friends—actors, producers, business executives—gathered round and insisted on demonstration rides in his "gocart."

Mel has not always enjoyed such popularity. As a youngster in San Bruno, California, he soon learned that he was considered a freak, a monster, by the neighborhood children. He was an object to be ridiculed, because the others had to prove to themselves they weren't afraid of him. They tagged him and ran like the wind. They tripped him and knocked him down. They made faces and taunted him with funny noises. What shriveled him most was the name "Corky," derived from the cumbersome cork-lined shoe on his right foot.

He could have turned into a whimpering, frightened individual, a future helpless ward of the state. But his mother converted his affliction into a proving ground for character. One afternoon Mel hobbled into the house, sobbing over being knocked down the ninth time that week. Gently his mother pried loose his grip of her skirt. Firmly she said, "Go back outside."

He stared at her disbelievingly.

"Go back outside," she repeated, "and don't come in until you've licked that boy."

"But I don't want to fight. I don't even know how!"

His mother said, "You can learn in a hurry. If you fight now you won't have to later on." She explained that the other children didn't mean to be unkind, they just didn't understand. It was up to Mel to make them like him—and he had to like them first. "You can't like your playmates," she said, "until you get over your fear of them and prove to them you're not so different after all."

Reluctantly, Mel returned to hostile territory in the street. He stood terrified as three children rushed him. He fell down. He stayed there a minute, then laboriously picked himself up as his mother had taught him to do. He stood his ground against another attack, then suddenly started flailing his arms wildly around in the air. One uncontrolled fist caught a boy on the chin and he dropped to the ground. The others paused uncertainly, and in that moment Mel felt a rush of sympathy for his victim. Gently he said, "I didn't hit you because I don't like you. I hit you because you hurt me."

The boy felt his jaw and grinned sheepishly. "Sure, Corky," he said. And the young world of Melvin Travioli began to change.

But with the new fun, life also held responsibilities. He began selling papers for a half-cent-a-copy profit at the age of eight. He hopped a streetcar and rode all the way to the South San Francisco packing plants, where he had no competition, catching his customers as they spilled out for home—trying to pay for himself.

Melvin's father was a strapping, six-foot steelworker by trade, who settled for anything he could get, by necessity. It was hard for him to reconcile Mel's "weakness" with his own great strength, and doctor bills were a wearisome load that grew into a mountain of frustration. Even normally, children cost money. And Mel wasn't "normal."

He could have been. But in 1907 doctors treated births more casually than they do today. The story is not a pretty one. His mother was very slight, weighing only ninety-five pounds while pregnant, and Melvin was a fifteen-pound baby, born butt first, with his heels behind his ears. The doctor made a quick decision, gave up on the baby and concentrated on saving the mother. He forced the child out with forceps and literally tossed him aside for dead. A nurse noticed faint signs of life and the doctor then reshaped the infant's mutilated head with his hands.

Mel was three years old before he could stand alone. As the pressed-together nerves in his head became stronger, their vibration caused his fingers, right arm and upper torso to shake uncontrollably. He describes it today graphically and without emotion as the messages from the brain getting mixed up or scrambled in a crossed network of nerves. "I was like an electric dynamo with a short circuit; I had no co-ordination." But he spoke clearly and his words were fluent.

Thirteen years passed before he entered grade school, but he made up for lost time. By listening and giving his answers orally, he crammed almost eight grades into four years. Afternoons, he sold papers at Tanforan race track.

In his seventeenth year, Mel went to the Sunshine School for Handicapped Children in San Francisco, upported by the Rotary Club. He remained there ust four months, long enough for the club mem-ers to single him out for his intelligence and desire o learn. Upon questioning, they discovered that he ad one ambition. He wanted to be a criminologist. But he could never achieve his goal in his present hysical condition. Perhaps an operation would elp.

Before Mel could receive his grammar-school iploma, he was sent to a hospital in Northern Cali-ornia. His emotions teetered between hope and ear. He chattered incessantly in his excitement. For the operation was successful, the Rotary Club romised to send him to Stanford on scholarship. f not —— He closed his mind to doubt.

It was too late to separate his nerves. But they ould deaden the nerves controlling his overly ac-ive right side, by alcoholizing the corresponding ortical center.

Melvin underwent two operations. When he woke the second time, he could not wait for the erdict. He rang for the nurse.

The moment she entered, his lips parted.

"R-r-rrrr!" he ground out, like a motor starting p on a cold morning. The nurse jumped and edged way.

He tried again, throat straining, mouth contorted, ut the words wouldn't come. "R-r-r-rrrrrrrrr!" he epeated frantically.

"Well, what is it?" demanded the nurse.

All he could manage was the same unintelligible, rinding sound. His forehead was wet with panic. His pleading eyes were enormous.

She glared at him, snapped, "I'm too busy to play ames!" and trotted away mumbling, "Boy, do hese kids get spoiled in a hurry!"

Melvin stared for long minutes at the closed door. He knew before the doctor came that he had lost omplete control of his voice. What did it matter ow? The operation was a success, they had dead-ned the proper nerves in his head. But they had lso, by accident, paralyzed the nerves leading to is vocal cords. He listened to explanations; they eant but one thing. Now he could neither write nor peak. College was out.

Back at home, Mel watched his mother try to run boardinghouse and care for a baby sister and rother fifteen and sixteen years younger than he. He did a lot of thinking and made his decision. He as not completely helpless. He knew how to sell apers. That would be his career, and he would be-in immediately.

He came to Los Angeles in 1927, where he started the bottom, working the "off spots" downtown, aking 70 cents to 90 cents a day off thirty-five or orty papers. During lulls, he read books over and ver, forming the words, fighting for some sem-lance of speech.

After "eating all the dirt spots," he worked his ay to the Beverly Theater in Beverly Hills, where made $2 or $3 a night for five years. In September, 933, he moved to the Brown Derby.

He turns a deaf ear on any criticism of Beverly ills citizens. "When I first came here," he says kwardly in his gravelly voice, "I couldn't speak anyone could understand me. I could say 'yes' nd 'no' and 'thank you,' but that was all. It took me teen years to relearn how to fashion sound into ords. But the people here gave me a chance to ake a physical living. That's all I ever asked."

Mel was no paragon of virtue. His outlet was quor. As one Beverly Hills detective says, "Mel ed to drink like a fish; he had whisky bottles dden in the bushes all around the restaurant where he could sneak a slug. Sometimes he'd get so drunk he couldn't stand up. Can't say I blamed him, stuck in cheap hotels, always worried about getting some-one to help him, folks stealing from him, and bus drivers giving him a bad time. But he's never cried about it."

Cry? He's more apt to laugh at himself. He de-lights in telling how he lost all his money on his one visit to the races. "I had six winners, including two long shots, but only on paper. My money went for liquor and I got so groggy I forgot to bet. I never went again. It was a waste of time for a jerk like me!"

Sometimes Mel's friends get carried away by his easy humor, then suffer embarrassment over going too far. He quickly covers up for them. One night, though usually scrupulously neat, he showed up for work unshaven.

"Boy, are you disreputable tonight!" shouted George O'Brien, turning scarlet immediately with the thought that Mel probably couldn't shave him-self.

Mel smiled gently. "I have a man who comes in to shave me every day, but today he's sick."

"Boy," kidded O'Brien uneasily, "pretty fancy!"

Mel's eyes lit up with an appreciative twinkle. "I used to go to a barber," he said, "but I shook so much I made the barber nervous. He was more scared than I was!" And O'Brien relaxed.

Mel had turned tragedy into a joke. For the great-est fear stalking him night and day was the fear that he could find no one to take care of his physical needs.

He was forced to hire anyone willing to take the job, no matter how shifty-eyed or unsavory. More than once he would awaken to find his helper gone—and with him, his money.

In 1933, when his mother died after divorcing his father five years earlier, Mel took over the care of his eleven-year-old sister Judy and ten-year-old brother Frank. He placed them in a Los Angeles boardinghouse, saw they were properly fed and clothed and sent to school. He found hospital care for Frank, who had been born three months pre-maturely and was crippled from the knees down.

To both Judy and Frank, Mel was their "mother and father and Santa Claus rolled into one." He took them to the circus and the movies and tried to make their Christmases fun.

Mel's heart ached for Frank and Judy, who were not, in his mind, so fortunate as he. They had not known their mother more than ten years, while he had had her advice and example for the first twenty-six years of his life. How could they form a charac-ter of their own without her love and wisdom for guidance?

Frank often talked bitterly of his own handicap. "I'll never have a decent job or be anybody," he muttered.

Mel replied, "What you do is not what you are. What you are is your soul. What you want to be, you will be." When Frank stared blankly, Mel ex-plained further: "Either you believe in God or you don't. This determines what you want to be and what you become."

Today Frank works at Goodwill Industries and is married. Judy, a beautiful young woman, lives in Arcata (in Northern California) with her husband Frank McGuire and two husky children.

Mel always found a way to bring happiness to others. But he had to content himself with casual friends, jokes, and pride in staying off relief. When Judy became a mother, he shared in her joy, know-ing this was the closest he would ever come to parenthood.

DICK MILLER

Mel revels in family life

When Mel comes home, Marrlee, Barney and Mike light up with joy. He plays with them, loves to show them how to look up words in dictionary, disciplines them when they need it.

Celebrities stop for a word with Mel

It is a nightly ritual for stars like Kim Novak to buy a paper, ex-change a quip with Mel. His fine, tapering fingers are so bent he is completely helpless to pick up a paper or lift a fresh stack into his apron rack. The Beverly-Wilshire doorman does this for him.

He had not noticed a shy, dark-haired girl who bought a paper from him occasionally for her Beverly Hills employers. And she was too concerned with the twelve rooms she had to clean and the clothes she must wash to pay attention to anyone—certainly not a spastic who would only emphasize her own problems to herself. Mel did not miss her when she disappeared from the area.

Elena Paulina Cherneff was five years older when they met again in 1944. Married, with one small son and another on the way, she lived at the same inexpensive, downtown Los Angeles residential hotel as Mel. And she was more frightened than ever. Her handsome husband, tired of family responsibilities, had run away. She heard rumors of another woman. She even heard he had divorced her secretly in San Francisco.

Bewildered as she was, Lea had learned one thing: appearances are like shopping bags, crammed with either fresh nourishing foods or loaves of day-old bread. You can tell only by looking inside. When she saw Mel now she not only felt a rush of pity, but received a lift from his high spirits. And she forgot her own cares in wanting to help him.

Mel returned her friendship gratefully. If what he felt was more than friendship, he hid it by telling her funny stories. Alone in his room, he composed romantic poetry which no one saw.

With Lea's second son born and still no word of her husband, she went to San Francisco. After two months she finally learned that her husband had been killed in an automobile accident. She also knew definitely that her sympathy for Mel had grown into love. She didn't question it; she only hoped he felt the same way.

Two months can be forever. Mel met Lea at the bus station, took one look at her after the long absence and blurted out a verse from one of his poems:

"Powdered Sugar, you're so sweet, dear,
That there's no one sweeter than you.
Don't ever, ever leave me again, dear,
'Cause you make me oh, so blue!"

Aghast, he turned several shades of pink and averted his eyes. But when seconds dragged into minutes, the silence grew unbearable. He had to know her reaction, much as he dreaded it. He stole a glance at her face, and his heart sank. She was crying.

He reminded himself heavily that he had no right. And he hated himself for being such a clumsy fool. Now he had embarrassed her and ruined their friendship. He opened his mouth, but before he could apologize she pulled him to her and kissed him. "Mel," she whispered, "I love you—so much!"

He was so shocked he could only stammer a proposal.

On October 13, 1945, Melvin Travioli became both a husband and father at once, in a hotel chapel opposite the Hall of Records. They were married by a minister named Strolling Tom.

On October 13, 1945, he also stopped drinking for good.

There was great joy for Mel among his customer friends. But Lea was regarded by her family as something of a martyr. "Martyr?" she scoffed weeks later. "That's silly. I love him. We'll never be rich, but I've got all I want. What Mel has done, taking the kids to his heart and doing for them—you don't know what that means to me." She added simply, "When he gets home he hugs and kisses me and says nice things. No one ever loved me like that before."

Mel was bursting with happiness. He told everyone of his great good fortune. And he could not see enough of the two boys, Barney and Mike. There wasn't much he could buy them—he made only $5 a night—but he spent long, patient hours filing down orange crates, fashioning them into toys. He could not grasp a knife, but he could prop a box between his knees, press his wrists against a file, and push back and forth.

Everyone figured he had hit his zenith. When, a year later, Lea presented him with a baby girl, Mel's friends were thunderstruck. And in their curiosity they hammered him with questions. Even the best-informed hesitated, but had to ask, "Is—is she all right?" until Mel grew belligerent.

"You're damn right she's normal!" he roared. "She's got everything in the right place and she's—she's"—tears filled his eyes and his voice softened—"she's beautiful!"

Then he handed out cigars to everyone who passed his corner.

He was correct. Marrlee, as she was named, was a perfect child. There was no reason why she should not be.

He now had three children, all of whom he considered his own, and all in the space of a year.

Having a family brought new responsibilities, however. His main problem was the same one, intensified, that had hounded him since he was seventeen—finding a place to live. They first packed themselves into a converted chicken coop partitioned into the semblance of rooms, with a cement floor. They had no running water and had to bargain for baths with the people next door. The $50 rent took almost half of Mel's monthly earnings.

They were evicted to make way for the Hollywood Freeway.

Their next abode cost $40 and had indoor plumbing, but tilted when they walked from one end to the other. There was a small yard, though, where the children could play, and Lea made ruffled curtains and kept it neat. They stayed on.

Mel had switched his corner to the Beverly-Wilshire Hotel side of the boulevard shortly after his marriage. His customers followed him across the street, congregating in the drugstore for extended bull sessions. During slow periods, Mel allowed himself to relax at the counter with a cup of coffee which he sipped through a special glass tube.

Early in March of 1953, he sat down without his usual cheerful greeting to the counter boy and stared glumly while cream and sugar were poured for him. A crony walked up, pulled out a paper for himself from Mel's apron and said, "What's new?"

Mel started to shrug, "Nothing much," then announced instead, "We're being evicted in thirty days."

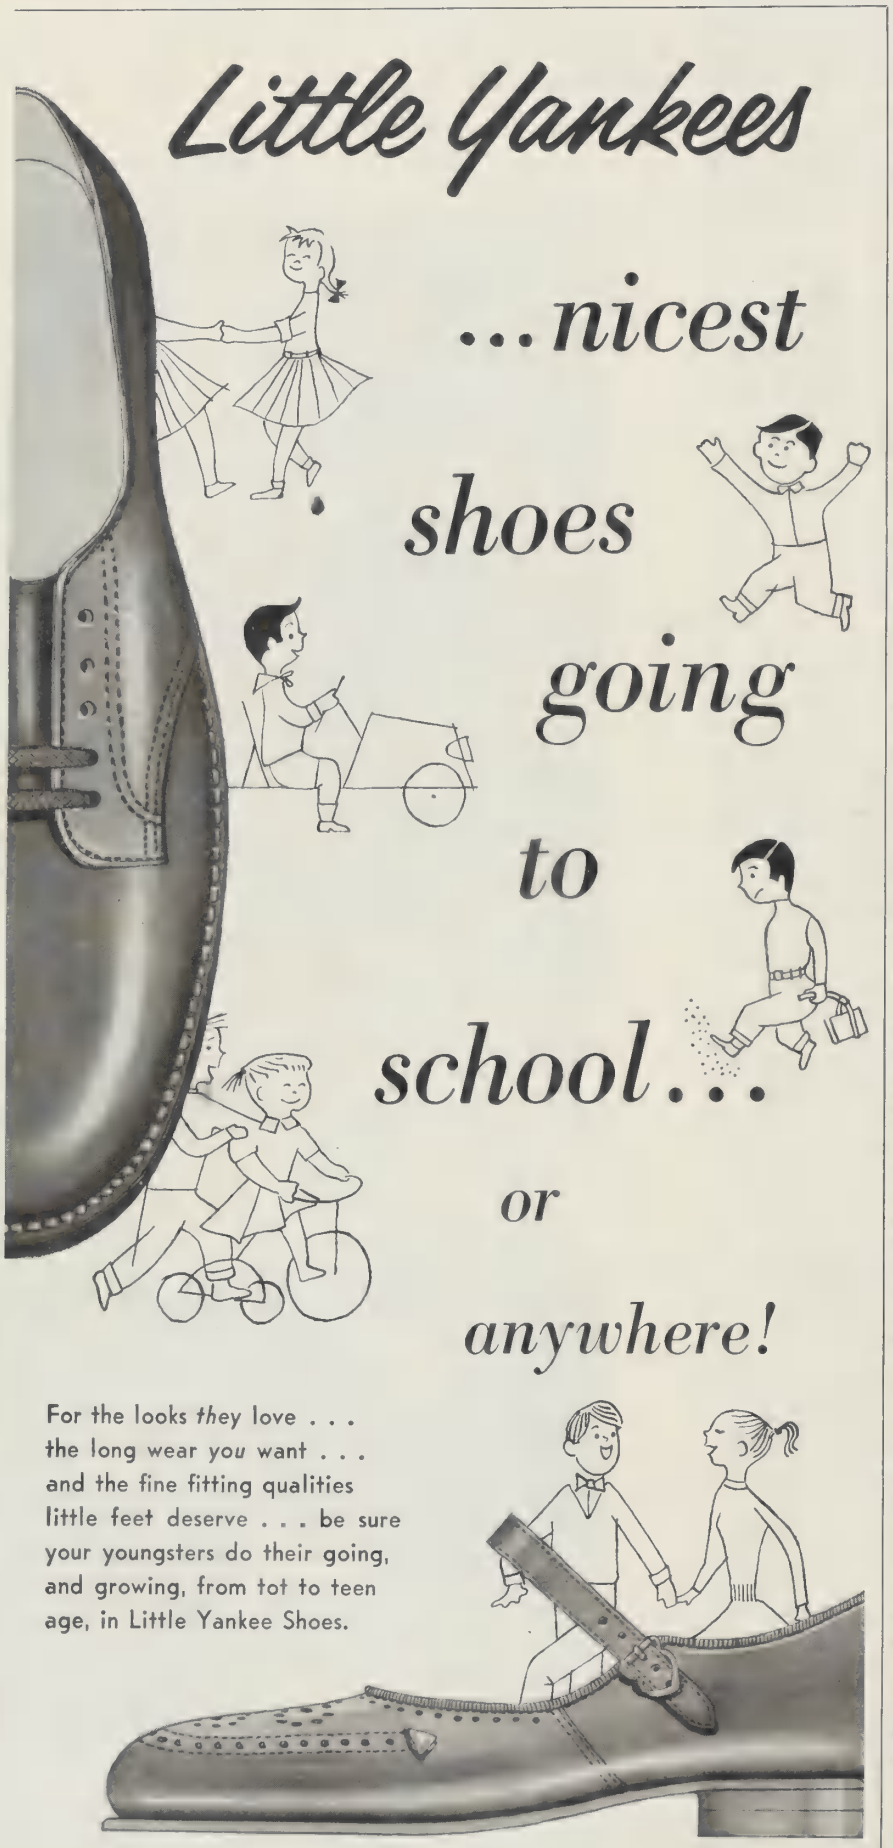
His friend dropped his paper and stared. "Why?"

"They're tearing down the place to build a warehouse." A slow grin spread over Mel's drawn features. "It'll probably be raining when we're out in the street, but we don't have much to get wet!"

His listener choked in the middle of a laugh. He thought of Mel's family and his struggle to make a living, and asked, "Aren't you frightened?"

"Sure," Mel admitted, "but what's the good of that?" He paused reflectively. "You know, when I was a kid, we had some chickens. One kept pecking away, trying to make a hole under the fence so she could escape. Well, one day someone knocked the fence down on the other side of the coop. That hen could have walked out so easy, but instead she just kept working at the same spot as usual. She was still pecking away after the fence was fixed." His eyes were twinkling now. "That chicken was too darned stupid to get herself out of trouble. But we're humans, with brains to work out our problems. At least"—he grinned—"I hope I'm smarter than a chicken!"

Melvin had little sleep after that, tracking down leads that disintegrated into demands for high rent, children not allowed. After fourteen days of disappointment, his philosophy threatened to crumble. Four people depended upon him for shelter that he was unable to provide. Even his ideas were saturated.



Concern for his family reduced him to panic. When a chance to buy a five-room home presented itself, he was beyond caution. The total price of $12,000 was disregarded. He could only grasp the low down payment—$250. This was an unbelievable stroke of luck! He hurried home to spill the news to Lea, and total up his assets. There the final shreds of his composure fell away. No matter how many ways he counted, the answer remained the same. All he could scrape together was $100—$150 short of security.

That night another regular customer, a stockbroker, found Mel crying. When he heard the story he exploded, "I don't care if you do find a hundred and fifty dollars somewhere, don't you dare buy that house. It's robbery!" He glared at Mel and his anger turned to rage—at himself, at landlords, at the world in general. "We'll put you into an

FIRST-BORN

By BEULAH FENDERSON SMITH

Petals of fingers
Softly unfold;
Warm and entwined,
Our hands belong.
Though helpless now,
With need to cling,
The years will make
The smaller strong.
When I am old,
May this hand hold
To mine, for my Last journeying.

apartment before we let you get cheated in a fishy deal like that. Now, damn it, stop worrying. . . . Oh, I'm so mad at you for not letting people know a few things!"

The broker stomped off and headed for the nearest telephone. In five days of phoning and buttonholing Mel's friends, he collected $700. A department-store owner from Louisville, Kentucky—also a regular customer of Mel's and confined to a wheel chair—joined in. Combined efforts totaled $1700, with contributions averaging $10. Mel had many friends, from prop men to top producers.

Naturally, Mel knew what was happening, but said nothing. As he told one person, "I never accepted charity before, but when you have three children and a wonderful woman counting on you, pride can be the most selfish thing on earth."

His benefactors next contacted a real-estate man in Venice, a suburb of Los Angeles, near the ocean. The realtor came up with a two-bedroom house, almost finished, in a new tract of homes. Selling price was $10,500, but he brought it down to $9250 by lopping off the broker's fee.

Then they hit a snag. Mel's present landlord refused to wait two more weeks until the new home was completed. "The hell with them," he said. "This place is being torn down in four days and out they go."

"Fine," he was told. "We'll get an injunction against you that will tie you up for at least three months. We'll haul you into court, and you can imagine how foolish you'll look to everyone in the whole county!"

The landlord hurriedly changed his mind.

On April 20th, Melvin loaded his family into the Autoette and set out for their new home. Once there, they stared at the neat, pale green stucco cottage, still sparkling with fresh paint. They gazed down the wide, uncluttered street. They could not speak; only their eyes told of their emotion.

Mel's altruistic friends not only solved his housing problem; they kept his pride intact. They paid $1000 down on the house, plus landscaping, plus the first four payments to cover amortization and interest. But the balance is Mel's responsibility, and he proudly pays $71.92 each month toward the day when he will own it outright. And that year, for the first time in his life, he paid a property tax of $114.76 (since grown to $142.50).

He had to override enthusiastic landscaping suggestions of exotic plants and flower beds. "Please keep it simple and easy to care for," he requested earnestly. "Lea works too hard as it is taking care of me and the kids." So a small lawn was planted, plus two trees—one avocado and one apricot.

However, it's Mel who is drawn by the lure of the outdoors, and it's Lea who does the worrying. The neighbors were startled at first to see Mel lumber about the front yard, laboriously pushing a rake over the lawn, making ditches for rose bushes, or fixing posts for other flowers. And they were convulsed when Lea called out, "Muscle man! Cut that out right now!" Now it's all part of the familiar scene.

"He thinks he's strong as an ox," Lea grumbled one day after bringing his gardening to a halt. "He even built a doghouse for our pet Wimpy. He's always filing away at something in the garage."

"Aw, Lea!" protested Mel. Then he reminded her of the twenty-four-hour-a-day job she has.

Lea's working day is a continuous spot check. The following is a bare outline of her regular routine:

4:00 A.M. Mel returns from work. Lea gets up to fix him a sandwich and Ovaltine.

4:30 A.M. Lea undresses Mel and helps him to bed.

6:45 A.M. She arises to prepare breakfast for Barney (13), Mike (12) and Marrlee (10), packs three lunches and takes them to school.

9:00 A.M. Lea does daily shopping.

11:30 A.M. Lea wakes up Mel, bathes him, shaves him, dresses him and fixes his breakfast. She cuts up his food, which he eats with specially shaped utensils that he twisted so he could grasp them securely. "Before that," he says, "I ate like a dog or cat."

HOW THE TRAVIOLIS SPEND THEIR MONEY EACH MONTH

Annual income for the last three years:
$3141 in 1954; $2508 in 1955; $2039 in 1956.

MONTHLY EXPENDITURES

Food, all household goods (shop daily because of small refrigerator, so miss out on quantity bargains)	$120.00	Clothing for Lea and children	13.00
Milk (pick up 6 half gallons from creamery every other day to save delivery charge)	33.30	Medicine (children get free attention at UCLA; Mel from his doctor. But "pain pills" for Mel's back, bought every other day at discount, are $1.25 a bottle)	18.75
House payments	71.92	Barber for boys, Mel and Marrlee	3.75
Property tax	11.88	Shampoo and set every other week for Lea (Mel's idea: "The budget can stand a dollar twice a month for your morale.")	2.00
Life insurance (policies on children amounting to $1250; $1000 on Lea; $500 on Mel—all he can get)	15.34	Entertainment (includes one movie a month for the family)	2.10
Gas, electricity and water	11.30	Larks for Marrlee; Boy Scouts for Mike and Barney	1.20
Telephone	8.00	Car repairs (average $200 a year, include replacement of 8 batteries @ $31 each every 18 months)	17.00
Clothing for Mel—gifts from customers, except for apron to hold papers which would cost $15 to buy; Lea makes them every 6 months)	.51	Church tithe	17.00
Shoe repair for Mel (he should have one pair of special shoes—cost $100—each year, but can't afford them. Gets old ones fixed and hopes they'll hold up)	.88	Total	$349.69
Shoe repair for boys	1.76

It is impossible for the Traviolis to live on Mel's income. Since the Beverly Hilton Hotel was built he gets less transient business. His income has also declined because he has been ill more often, and he loses time from work whenever Lea is laid up and unable to attend to his needs.

The Traviolis' budget is exceptionally tight, for they live in a high-cost area. Los Angeles, according to a report in Changing Times, the Kiplinger Magazine, ranks third highest in cost of living among the 20 large U. S. cities specially surveyed by the Bureau of Labor Statistics. Typical family expenditures there run to $376.50 per month, as against the Traviolis' record of $349.69, achieved despite Mel's special needs.

Church folks try to help out with food. The Traviolis also receive occasional gifts, and this past year when they were behind in payments and about to lose their house, a benefactor saved them at the last minute.

no more tears

from "soap in the eyes"

Won't burn or irritate eyes!

So gentle, pure and safe . . . this special formula won't hurt even the most sensitive eyes. Lathers so quickly, even in hard water. And rinses out easily!

Leaves hair silky-soft!

Johnson's not only gets hair clean . . . it leaves hair extra-soft, shining . . . easier to comb and manage. No wonder all the family like it. 29¢, 59¢ and 98¢.

Johnson & Johnson

3:00 P.M. Mel has dinner.

5:15 P.M. Lea gets Mel ready for work, sees him off, then worries until he phones from the drugstore. ("I never tell him I worry, but he drives that car like a demon scared out of hell!")

6:30 P.M. The children have their dinner.

8:00 P.M. An extended scramble trying to get three lively youngsters to bed. She is then free to watch television (her only form of entertainment), clean house, sew on a new canvas apron for Mel, mend clothes, and catnap.

In her "spare time" Lea also cleans house and cooks meals for fellow church members who are ill and "less lucky than me."

Someone once commented, "Boy, is Mel lucky to have a slave like you!"

Lea replied quietly, repressing her normally quick temper, "What I do for Mel seems like nothing. It's a habit, like smoking—and it's appreciated. I know he needs me, and I need him." She added thoughtfully, "I often think I need him more than he needs me. I don't know what I'd do without him."

Mel does not work Saturday, the big night. He could sell an extra hundred papers if he could handle them, but the Sunday bulldog editions are too heavy for him to carry, and are dumped at the corner in two parts. It would be impossible for him to insert the news sections, with his hands so crippled. "It works out fine," he says. "We can be together and Lea gets out this way."

After dinner the children clamber into the electric car and the family takes a long ride. If the night is warm, Mel heads for the beach, scooting down the boardwalk gaily sounding his horn at the gaping pedestrians. Other nights, they "explore" the southwest end of town.

Sometimes they shop together in the afternoon, but shopping brings humiliation. Salespeople address all their remarks to Lea, even when Mel has done the initial talking. "They act as if he isn't quite bright!" Lea fumes. "And they stare at me as if I've lost my mind. Well, let them. It's their ignorance, and someday perhaps they'll understand. I don't mind for myself, but I sure do for Mel."

Mel says nothing; he's used to it. He simply clings to the thought that three young faces will brighten instantly at the sight of him. They are his coat of armor. "When you love enough you can take anything," he says.

At home he joins in their games whenever possible, even playing baseball. He holds the bat under his arm and jerks his body to bring it around.

Always at the back of his mind lurks the apprehension that one day they will look upon him with cool, calculating eyes and think, "This man is not like other fathers we know." He wonders if they will be ashamed of him, resentful, or even repulsed. They have reached the age of comparison with unwavering affection. Big as they are, they still must be warded off; otherwise all three would be in his lap at the same time.

He had a shaky moment when Mike asked, "Dad, why are your hands different from mine?"

After a brief hesitation, Mel replied, "God made me that way. Everyone has some problem. This is my problem."

Mike nodded and apparently dismissed the thought from his mind.

A month later, his teacher sent him home with a note requesting to see his parents. Lea and Mel found her worried and a trifle embarrassed.

"I'm concerned about Mike," she began slowly. "He was really very bright at first, but the past few weeks—well ——" She flushed and faltered. How do you tell such parents that they have a backward child? Drawing a deep breath, she rushed on: "He talks funny, and doesn't seem co-ordinated at all. The other students are beginning to ridicule him."

The Traviolis were perplexed; this wasn't the Mike they knew. Finally Mel asked, "How does he talk funny? Does he lisp or what?"

"No, it's more a struggle for words, like you ——" She broke off, thoroughly mortified.

"Does he walk like me too?" Mel persisted.

The teacher nodded reluctantly.

Crazy kid, Mel mused to himself and laughed suddenly. "He'll be all right tomorrow, I promise you."

That afternoon Mel asked Mike, "Why do you imitate me?"

Mike reddened. "Well, gosh, dad, I just want to be like you, that's all!"

Mel's heart swelled, but he masked his pride. "You can only be yourself," he said. "Be glad you're strong—you'll need that strength to meet the problems you'll have someday."

"But ——"

"That's an order!" He patted the boy's head quickly and disappeared for an hour. How, he wondered, would Mike and Barney react when they learned that he was not their real father?

He knew Mike would respect his order. From the days when he looked after his brother and sister, Mel had learned that affection must be tempered with discipline if children were to develop into secure, responsible citizens. Lea often wonders how he can accomplish so much with so few words.

His daughter Marrlee perhaps taxes his patience more than the boys. Brown-haired, lively and radiantly affectionate, she inherited Mel's curiosity, high spirits and impish humor. The harshest punishment will not hold her down for long. Recently Mel commanded her to stand in a corner. After ten minutes he "released" her, secretly expecting defiance. Instead, Marrlee rushed to him, threw her arms around him and cried, "I love you, daddy!"

"I don't know what I'm going to do with her," he sighs. "She's too smart for me!"

He is more than a disciplinarian. He helps the boys with their Boy Scout lessons, teaches Marrlee her prayers, corrects their table manners. Though he must say, "Follow my advice and not my example," his instruction penetrates. He even showed Mike how to type since he spotted writing talent in the youth. Mel types himself, using sometimes a knuckle, sometimes a thumb, when getting out his monthly bills to credit customers.

In concerning himself with the children, he forgets himself completely. Two summers ago he noticed a giggly air of conspiracy about him, but attributed it to "kids' games." It did not occur to him that his approaching birthday might be under discussion. When he entered the house at 4:00 A.M. on July 8th, he was only thinking how tired he was. Suddenly he blinked and his weariness vanished as three small figures in rumpled pajamas burst into the room singing, "Happy birthday to you!" Lea followed them with a birthday cake. She was beaming. "Don't bawl them out," she said quickly. "They took naps today so I'd promise to wake them before you got home."

"Sit down, daddy," said Marrlee. "We're having a swing-shift party for you!"

Mel hardly touched his cake. He could only stare at the three young revelers who smiled back at him drowsily and fought a losing battle against falling asleep. . . .

The Traviolis are now established as Venice citizens. Children from all over the neighborhood congregate in their back yard, and adults have fallen into the sugar-borrowing habit.

Mel dreams of the day when he and Lea might travel somewhere. They had no honeymoon. In fact, Mel has not had a vacation in twenty-seven years. But that day is far off. Their needs are more immediate. When he gets the house paid off, he must add another bedroom for Marrlee.

And there are always current expenses—such as the time the four batteries in his electric car lost their pep. Three nights in a row there was not enough juice left to make it home. Once he had to push it two miles, unable to find a gas station open.

Since everything would fall apart if Mel could not get to work, they took a hard look at the family bank balance and tightened their belts some more. There wasn't much left to tighten. Though he now averages $10 a night, he works only 200 to 250 nights a year; the remaining time is lost in illness. Still, Lea figured out new economy measures so that Mel could trade in his Autoette for an Electric Shopper, to provide room for his family. Mel chose an orange one, for better visibility. "I was going to paint the other one anyway," he said. "I figured my customers were pretty bored with the color by now."

It is this attitude which causes customers to return, even when it means inconvenience to them. Some have been buying Mel's papers

NEXT MONTH

"I have found myself," says Ann Palmer. After a girlhood in foster homes, and a teen-age marriage which foundered after she had 4 children, she met Bob Palmer and started a second family.

SECOND MARRIAGE
By NEAL G. STUART

HOW AMERICA LIVES
in the September JOURNAL

Noreen

that's the beauty of it

Today, millions of women welcome the extra softness and sheen that comes from a Noreen hair rinse . . . the gleaming highlights and increase in the depth of natural color.

But Noreen can do so much more for those whose hair is more of a problem than a source of pride. If your hair is drab, faded or streaked with unwanted gray, a Noreen temporary color rinse will bring back its natural beauty by augmenting the natural hair color, blend in graying or faded streaks and give your hair a healthy youthful look.

And you can apply Noreen yourself at home next time you shampoo. It's safe, simple and temporary...washes out each time you shampoo. Try Noreen soon . . . make your choice from fourteen glamorizing shades and be proud of your hair's new beauty.

Write for literature and FREE sample offer: Noreen, Inc. 450 Lincoln Street, Denver 3, Colorado. Dept. 13.

Noreen

COLOR HAIR RINSE

at cosmetic counters everywhere also professionally applied in beauty salons for twenty years, others for twenty-five. They have moved away from Beverly Hills—out to the San Fernando Valley, or as far west as Pacific Palisades, thirteen miles away. Yet they still drive in regularly for their evening news and nightly chuckle.

Some living closer by walk for exercise. Douglas Morrow, who writes his screen plays late at night, often breaks up his time with a brisk stroll.

The other night he quit working at 1:30 and sauntered out wearing old slacks and a moth-eaten sweater. He left his wallet and identification cards at home. In well-patrolled Beverly Hills, a person walking alone at night is a prime target for cops on the lookout for vagrants. When a police car drew up alongside Morrow, he knew his appearance was against him.

"Where are you going, sir?" the officer asked politely.

"Just walking." He held his breath. If he was asked for identification papers, he was sunk.

"At this hour?"

"I'm going to the Beverly-Wilshire Hotel."

"What are you walking down there for?"

"To get the papers," Morrow replied.

The cop's suspicions grew. "All that way for the papers?" he asked, his voice loaded with insinuation.

Morrow gazed at him steadily and said, "You don't think I'd get them from anyone but Mel, do you?"

The policeman's face broke into a broad smile. "Well, why didn't you say so in the first place!" he said and drove off.

Morrow expressed the feelings of all who know Mel when he said later, "I might have been a tramp for all the police knew—but knowing Mel made me a citizen of Beverly Hills!"

PEACHES IN THE BANK

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 48

arose, because our husbands were talking about nothing else, and that was when Lou-Ella told us she had met him, to our complete astonishment.

"You mean," exclaimed Dolly Tolliver, "he was to your place at sunup?"

"He was," answered Lou-Ella. "I guess it must be true, all right, he started life as a farm boy."

"The Needle says his nickname is Handsome Ransom," said Alloina Batesby. "Is he really that good-looking?"

Lou-Ella nodded.

"From the way you tell it, though," said Rita Denninger, our Pineywood librarian and postmistress, "it seems to me you were a bit short with him, if you don't mind my saying so."

"I was, and I'm ashamed of it," agreed Lou-Ella. "I thought he was a Bible salesman. We have five Bibles in the house already. But partly it was because of his voice, girls."

"What's the matter with his voice?" we wanted to know.

"It sounds like that deep horn on the diesel locomotive that goes through after midnight," replied Lou-Ella. "Mournful and lonely, out there all by itself with the dark fields and fences flashing by, but saying 'Come on, come on, come along with me.'"

"Why, Lou-Ella," cried Alloina, "that's downright poetic, I do declare it is."

Mr. Ransom had a suite at the Pickett Hotel in Tecumseh, our county seat. The men who went down said there were wires all around it, connected to long-distance telephones, and automatic typewriters tapping out messages from Seattle and Minneapolis and Chicago, and a contrivance like a magic lantern that threw figures on a screen showing what the stocks and bonds were doing in Wall Street. What Mr. Ransom himself did, the men said, was bring the right people together—or, you might say, shout them together. He was a great shouter. "We need an engineer to design the plant," somebody would say, and John Cartwright Ransom would pick up a telephone, ask for St. Louis, and roar, "Harry, can you be here tomorrow?" Somebody else would say a chief chemist was needed, and Mr. Ransom would grab another phone, ask for another city, and say, "Dan, borrow Ted's plane and sit in on this, will you?" Every new expert that arrived—the Pickett was soon full of them, all three floors—brought new problems. Then Mr. Ransom knocked down the problems sping-spang-spinger, like a squirrel hunter at a carnival shooting gallery.

But every afternoon promptly on the dot of five he jumped into his big car that had arrived from Texas with a driver—pure white, the car was, with his signature on the doors in gold script—and drove out to Lou-Ella's tottery old white house, with the paint off its pillars and the gallery sagging, and ate his supper with Lou-Ella and her three young ones. He turned every day into a birthday for those children. He gave the little girl, Amy, a collection of dolls from every nation of the globe, and the younger boy, Champion, enough toy automobiles to open a garage. And he tried to give the older boy, Eddie, an engraved shotgun until Lou-Ella vowed she'd shut off the black-eyed peas if he abetted a twelve-year-old to blow his head off.

Mr. Ransom pleaded with Lou-Ella to let him make a moving picture of her driving the tractor and pruning her trees. He wanted to show it over his television stations. Lou-Ella said the very thought made her blush. "Then at least," said Mr. Ransom, "let me interview you. I have one station right nearby." (Tennessee was his idea of right nearby!) But Lou-Ella was too shy to do that either, saying she was afraid she would make a fool of herself.

They sat on the gallery steps after supper, whilst the kids played with their new toys or settled their tummies—as Yankee children, poor lambs, never can—floating up and down on the joggling board set between two stumps. The evenings were so clear you might have thought they were sifted through silk, the silk lifted gently afterward so that all the air below remained without speck or mote. As they talked Lou-Ella could count the knots in the boards of the mule barn: silvery old boards weathered away until they looked like the hide of an elderly elephant. The moss on the roof shingles was a brighter green than at midday, sponging up yellow light slantwise from the sunset. From the tip of a holly tree a cardinal bird spied a worm and dropped to it, flurrying out his wings at the last second; he came down like a spilt bottle of red ink, finishing off with a splash.

"My dear lady," said John Cartwright Ransom, "I'm afraid you don't see how important this is. What if, someday, this great land of ours is attacked? How will we be able to fight back, with the hardness and toughness we'll need, if we're spoilt by too much easy living?"

"Now, John," said Lou-Ella, smiling a little because the man simply could not open his mouth without delivering an oration. She sat there on the steps, fresh and cool, in a white cotton dress worn as thin as handkerchief linen. Nothing is softer than old worn cotton. "Now, John, I know there are folks that must have everything new they see in the ads, the newest model twice a year. It's silly and vain, but there have been silly, vain people since the world began. But as for their being spoilt, that's something else again. None of my neighbors are spoilt; they work hard for their living, a lot of them at things they don't like to do."

"How about all these lazy females that sit around with curlers in their hair while their washing machines do their laundry for them?" He snorted. "Pretty soft! Pretty soft!"

"Black old Aunt Toofie boils my laundry out back, in a caldron over chunks of pitch pine," answered Lou-Ella. "She stands there all day long poking the clothes with a stick. If that has value or virtue, I don't see it. I'll take an automatic washer any day of the week, and so will Aunt Toofie. . . . John, you're a bright man and you're a good man, but tell me—how much money do you have?"

"I don't know. And that's the gospel truth," replied Mr. Ransom. "I know I'm in the ninety-per-cent bracket, which means I just work for Uncle Sam. What's my money got to do with it?"

"Do you have ten million dollars?"

"I suppose I have, more or less."

"Well then, I'll tell you," said Lou-Ella, in that dry way she has. "When a man with ten million dollars goes around telling other folks what a fine healthy thing it is to be poor, I think he sounds a bit foolish."

It had been a long, long while since anybody had told Mr. John Cartwright Ransom he was foolish. He fell in love with Lou-Ella right then and there, so we girls think.

A woman knows. Lou-Ella saw the change in his face, heard the change in his voice the next evening at the supper table. That night, after Mr. Ransom drove away in his white ambulance that lacked only the red lights and the siren, she went into the children's bedroom and had a serious talk with them.

"Children, I want you all to listen to me," she said. "I'll have no more snatching up the phone and saying you want to talk to Washington, D.C. I'll have no more mimicking nor making fun of Mr. Ransom in any form or fashion, do you hear?"

"Why not, mamma?" asked Amy.

"Because Mr. Ransom is in love with me."

"What difference does that make?" asked Eddie.

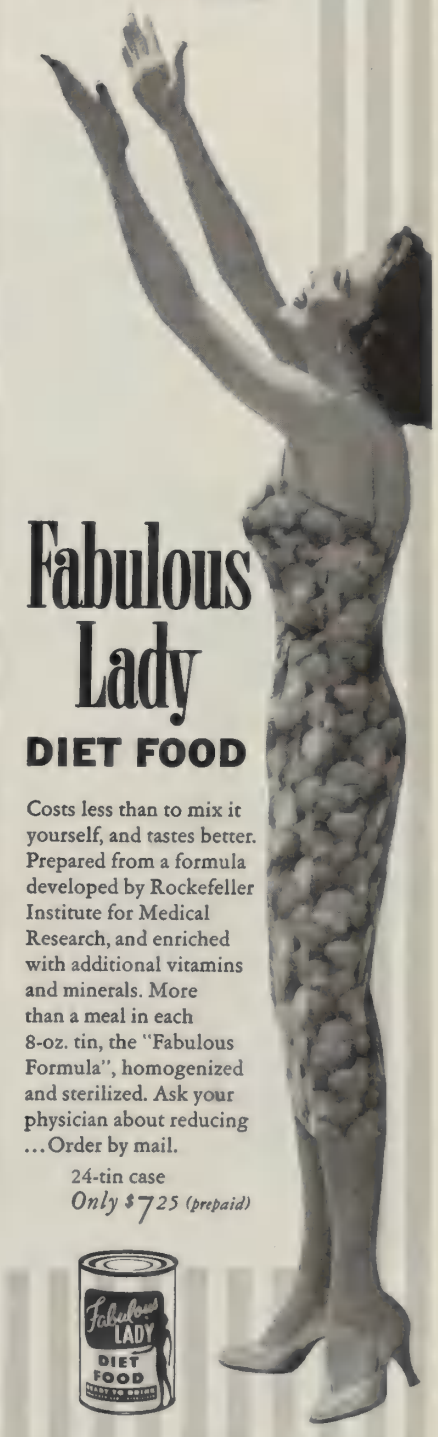
"I'll tell you," explained Lou-Ella. "I've taught you to be gentle with animals and crippled people, haven't I, and children that aren't as well-bred as you? Well, a person in love has to be treated gently, too, because he's opened his heart. When the heart is open we're easily hurt."

"Why is Mr. Ransom in love with you, mamma?" asked Amy. "You're old."

"I know," replied Lou-Ella with a nod. "I'm thirty-three, and to you that's as old as Aunt Toofie. But to Mr. Ransom I'm young and beautiful, baby daughter. When a person opens his heart, you see, a strange thing happens. Whatever he loves becomes beautiful in his eyes."

When you walk up Lou-Ella's brick path from the road, you pass between two chinaberry trees. The perfume is the fragrance of all the orange blossoms worn by all the brides of all the years, plus all the lemon blossoms in California and all the lime blossoms in Florida. The next night, when the children were asleep, Mr. Ransom took Lou-Ella by the hand and led her down the walk to the chinaberries.

It was a clear blue night, with mist creeping under the peach trees right down on the ground, as if it were on its hands and knees looking for something it had lost. Across the lawn, under a holly, a rabbit sat with his ears flattened, hoping they'd go away so he could sneak into the Colonel Bibb lettuce, never dreaming they could see him plainly in the lamplight from the house that turned his round eye into a little gold lamp in itself. Over the kitchen chimney, with its sweet pine smoke that no Southerner can ever be away from for very long, the stars and planets were out marching on parade: Orion with blinks of light flashing from his silver armor and his sword swinging down his thigh, and the Big Bear shuffling after him, and the Seven Little Sisters showing off the faint tiny jewels that were the best their sweethearts could buy for them in the way of engagement rings—all that perfect geometry up there, in sparkles of tinted fire, to tell us that the leastmost whisper spoken on the leastmost planet is important as any vast flaring sun.



"Lou-Ella, dear," said John Cartwright Ransom, "I'm anything but a blameless man, but one thing I can say to you in complete truth—I can tell you, on my honor, never in my life have I told a woman I loved her."

"That's a sad thing to hear, John," replied Lou-Ella.

"It is," agreed Mr. Ransom, "but now I'm glad of it, because I can say it the first time to

CONTINUED ON PAGE 121

NOW!
THE fabulous formula
READY TO DRINK!

Fabulous Lady
DIET FOOD

Costs less than to mix it yourself, and tastes better. Prepared from a formula developed by Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research, and enriched with additional vitamins and minerals. More than a meal in each 8-oz. tin, the "Fabulous Formula", homogenized and sterilized. Ask your physician about reducing ...Order by mail.

24-tin case
Only $7.25 (prepaid)

FABULOUS PRODUCTS, INC.
593 Market Street, San Francisco 5, California

Please send me ( ) cases of Fabulous Lady Diet Food at $7.25 each, including shipping costs. Check or money order is enclosed.
(No cash please.)

Name_____
Address_____
City_____ State_____

Californians note: please do not order by mail. You will find Fabulous Lady at your favorite grocery or supermarket.

the Fabulous Lady can be you

So much at ease...

. . . the new Kotex napkin with Wondersoft covering gives you such gentle softness. There's no rubbing or chafing. And what a reassuring kind of softness . . . for Kotex gives you instant absorbency, without fail. Moreover, this napkin fits perfectly.

To complete your comfort you'll want the new Kotex belt. It's made of woven, non-twist elastic and it has a special self-locking clasp that won't "dig in" like metal.

No wonder more women choose Kotex than all other brands.

Note to Mothers: Over a hundred thousand girls begin to menstruate before they are 11. Save your 10-year-old from needless worry—tell her now. Free booklet "You're a Young Lady Now" gives the facts she needs to know. Write Miss Jones, Kimberly-Clark Corp., Neenah, Wisconsin.

KOTEX and WONDERSOFT are trademarks of Kimberly-Clark Corp.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 119

you. I love you deeply, Lou-Ella. My heart, my fortune, my future are yours to command. I hope with all my soul you'll marry me."

Lou-Ella cried a little. "John," she said, "you're buying a penny licorice whip with a fifty-dollar bill. do you know that?"

"I don't think I am," said Ransom. "I don't make many mistakes."

"You're absolutely sure," asked Lou-Ella, "if I marry you it'll make you happy, truly happy?"

"As sure as a man can be sure," Ransom told her.

"I don't suppose it's a great thing to make one other human being happy. But it's no small thing either," said Lou-Ella. "If I can do it, I want to. I'll marry you, John. And I'll be the best wife to you that I know how to be."

She put her two hands, with adhesive tape around her knuckles where she'd banged them on the tractor, on his shoulders and kissed him first on his eyelids, then on his cheeks, then on his handsome mouth. She had to be the one to do it, for with all his shouting, and all his good looks, John Cartwright Ransom was too shy to touch her.

The very next day, the peach plantation had a hired manager. Lou-Ella and the young ones, only packing a few old-fashioned straw suitcases, flew off in the plane that had staterooms in it like an ocean liner. Lou-Ella never did deliver the paper she was preparing for our Ladies' Literary and Cultural Club on Longfellow, the Bard of the Snows.

Just that fast, it happened. Eleven days, all told. From rags to riches, as they say.

Exactly one year later, to the month, Miss Ethel Bowdoing traveled north on the cars from Pineywood to the big flower show in New York City at the Grand Central Palace. Much I imagine is where the mayor of the Yankee metropolis makes his residence. Miss Ethel is honorary past president of our garden club. The Bowdoings came originally from Virginia, and Miss Ethel has the fine thin Virginia nose and those clear gray eyes closely set together; now she's in her seventies she looks enough like George Washington to be his twin sister.

At the flower show Miss Ethel's camellias won the blue ribbon, as they always do, and this time garnered two red ribbons and a white as well. She was happy as a bear in blackberry patch as she toted her ribbons back to her hotel, and she was happier still when, just inside the door, she spied Lou-Ella, in a long mink coat with a little cap of violets on her head.

"Miss Ethel!" cried Lou-Ella, every bit as excited, hugging her so hard she lifted her off the floor. Miss Ethel is so teensy she could ride a cricket sidesaddle. "Miss Ethel, sit down with me this very instant and give me all the news! Where can we go? Here—come into the restaurant and have a cup of tea."

The hotel restaurant, according to Miss Ethel, was called The Poison Room, although she must be mistaken about that. All the Bowdoings are fuddy when it comes to names. Lou-Ella ordered a pot of tea and some pastries that were little boxes made of chocolate cups on four sides, filled with delicious mocha paste.

"The news from Pineywood," said Miss Ethel, "is that Alloina Batesby tried to bleach her hair and it came out cabbage-colored. But you're the one with news, Lou-Ella. We had your postal cards from Europe, but that's all we know of you and your doings. Where are you living, dear, and how are the children?"

"The house is in Dallas," answered Lou-Ella, speaking of it as if it were one of the empty, dead palaces she had seen on her honeymoon voyage abroad. "Amy and Champion are in school there. I try to be with them when I can—John likes me to travel with him. Eddie is at a private school in Connecticut, learning to say cahn't for cain't."

"Didn't you just love Europe?"

"I did. It's beautiful," said Lou-Ella. "They grow good peaches too. In Italy and France they prune the trees into vines and train them on stone walls."

"I declare, you'll ruin those handmade French gloves, dear," protested Miss Ethel, "if you don't take them off. Is it the latest style in New York to eat pastries with your gloves on?"

"I can't take them off."

Miss Ethel feared she meant she had burnt her hands, perhaps scarred them. "Oh, Lou-Ella!" she cried.

"Honey," asked Lou-Ella, "have you ever seen a six-carat diamond?"

"Never in all my born days, no!" Miss Ethel said.

"Well, shield your eyes," said Lou-Ella, and drew the embroidered white glove from her left hand.

Miss Ethel told us, when she got home, the sight of that diamond was like having a lawn sprinkler turned full in your face.

"John wanted me to have this for a wedding gift. It wasn't ready in time, so he gave me an itsy-bitsy two-carat thing to tide me over. Now you see why I wear gloves," said Lou-Ella bitterly. "I don't want anybody thinking I buy my jewelry at the dime store. But I don't want anybody to get the impression, either, that I think this sunburnt old carcass of mine is so special it has to be decked out with a hundred thousand dollars. . . . Oh, Miss Ethel, Miss Ethel—in Dallas I try to find pitch pine to burn in the fireplace, but it just doesn't smell the same."

Never, in all her years of hard work, had any of us heard Lou-Ella breathe so much as a word of complaint. When Miss Ethel returned to Pineywood and told us what Lou-Ella had said to her across the tea table with the tears misting her eyes, we knew her words had been wrung against her will from the very depths of her heart. We were stricken with sorrow, for we loved our Lou and it was clear that she was unhappy. . . . There, he it said, is something to think about. All you hear these days is money, money, money, and the more you earn the less it's worth. Everyone is sure that a million dollars would bring him joy. It never seems to enter anybody's head that it might bring just the opposite.

What would Lou-Ella do, we asked ourselves? What could she do? The Pineywood Needle had published pictures of John Cartwright Ransom's castle in Dallas, a copy of a huge Mexican hacienda. If Lou-Ella did not like her castle, if she did not like to leave the children there whilst she traveled, if she was not satisfied with Eddie's private school, we still did not see how she could afford to end the marriage. She had the children's future to think of. She had Mr. Ransom himself to think of, for that matter. She was not the kind to ask him for a divorce, because she would regard that as unfair, and if for any reason he asked her for one she would never accept alimony from him. Knowing her, we felt sure she would sacrifice herself and stay on. It made you laugh to think of those millions and speak of sacrifice, but it made you miserable at the same time.

The summer drew toward its end. One morning Alloina Batesby's phone rang two longs and two shorts. It was Rita Denninger on the party line. "Alloina," exclaimed Rita, "I just took some corn to the mill in the pickup. Guess who was at the Temple place when I poled by!"

"Who?" asked Alloina. "President Eisenhower?"

"Lou-Ella! Standing on the gallery in that sprigged wrap-around she bought at Feinberg's for two-ninety-eight. She hoo-hooed me in."

"What's so strange about that?" asked Alloina. "A body can come home for a visit, can't she?"

"This is no visit. The manager is gone, and Lou-Ella has little Amy with her," said Rita. "She's left Handsome Ransom, that's what. And no alimony, you can be good and certain, if she's back to wearing that two-ninety-eight wrap-around."

"Are you asking me, Rita Denninger," said Alloina, "or are you telling me? You're the one who's just come from Lou-Ella. What does she say?"

"You know how closemouthed she can be," Rita said. "She just says she's going to spray her peaches."

"Cha," said Alloina. "We'll have to wait and see what comes next, I guess."

What came next was John Cartwright Ransom himself flying in from Spokane, or maybe it was Seattle, in the four-motored plane with the staterooms. There was no taxi at the Tecumseh airport, and he was in a whopping hurry, so he telephoned to an auto dealer in town—Fred Woodley, I was—and had cast for a new pink-and-white convertible and drove himself out to the Temple place as fast he picked up two tickets for speeding on the way.

Lou-Ella was working on the tractor. She had on her dungarees.

"How can you do this to me?" John Cartwright Ransom asked her, not roaring, but in a voice that sounded the way the bass note on the melodeon in church does when it gets stuck. "I had to scoop up half a dozen vice presidents and bring them with me. They're busy fellows, Lou-Ella; they can't wait on me while I run around the countryside chasing after my wife."

"I left you a note, dear," said Lou-Ella.

"'Dear John, I am sorry but I have to go home.' Some note!"

"Well," said Lou-Ella, "I'm not talky and that was the simple truth of it. I got to worrying about the trees."

Mr. Ransom switched off his big white hat then and ran his hand through his curls and sat down hard on the gallery steps. "Peach trees," he said.

"You forget I lived with these trees a lot longer than I've lived with you, John," said Lou-Ella. "I know them so well I have names for them. There's even one named for you."

"There is? No kidding." Mr. Ransom laughed. "I never knew that. Which tree is it?" he asked.

"A tall skinny one that bushed out too much at the top. Whenever there's a breeze it bows right and left as if it's making a speech," answered Lou-Ella.

Mr. Ransom chuckled. "I do must have some that had there what you thought I talked too much," he said.

Lou-Ella sat beside him on the steps and leaned forward, her elbows on her knees and her chin on her hands. "Pardon me if I smell of gasoline," she said. "I think you're talking too much right now. Be still. Listen."

Bewildered, John Cartwright Ransom listened.

"What do you hear?" asked Lou-Ella.

"Nothing."

"It sounds awfully good to me, nothing," said Lou-Ella. "Take a breath. Tell me what you smell."

"Pines. The sun is cooking the oil out of the needles. I smell the gasoline on you too."

"Look. Look straight ahead of you. I mean. What do you see?"

"A country road an inch deep in dust. The road superintendent ought to gravel it."

"Don't you think it looks soft and fluffy, like flour?"

"Well, yes, it does," agreed Mr. Ransom, looking again. He rubbed that handsome chin of his. "I'd kind of like to pull off my boots and wade in it. I would for a fact. There's nothing like soft dust squishing in between your toes. Except wet clay mud. What is better. Dust is pretty good, though."

"At last I'm getting through to you, man," said Lou-Ella. "Go do it."

He turned to her in surprise. "Go do what?"

"Wade."

Mr. Ransom was shocked. "Lou-Ella Ransom. I'd make a pretty spectacle of myself!"

"What do you care whether you make a spectacle of yourself or not? There's nobody here to see you," said Lou-Ella.

"At my age? In my position? Lou-Ella, I can't."

"You see," said Lou-Ella, spreading her hands, "you say you're just a red-neck cotton farmer, just a hardscrabble farm boy from Culpeper County, but the fact of the matter is you're scared of a little dust."

"We'll see about that," said Ransom. He snatched off his boots and his cashmere socks and stamped at and down the road barefoot, sheepish at first and then grinning. "All right," he said. "I did it. Now it's be sensible. Put on a dress and get rid of those no-line tennis shoes, and we'll go meet the vice presidents. If you're going to worry your pretty head being over sixty acres of fuzzy peach trees we'll fullhouse 'em flat, that's what we'll do. I mark you away from here so you wouldn't have to struggle with peaches."

"I thought struggle was good for the soul," said Lou-Ella. "Thrift, self-reliance, hard work, simplicity, the values and virtues of our pioneer ancestors."

"Lou-Ella," said John Cartwright Ransom, "you are trying my patience."

"It appears to me," said Lou-Ella, not turning a hair, "that the values and virtues of our pioneer ancestors are all right for people you don't love, but for those you love, you want life to be as easy and sweet as it can be, with six-carat diamonds to wear on Sundays and two-carat ones to wear in the bathtub."

When he heard that, Mr. Ransom sat for a long while listening to the telephone wires along the road say mwingue, mwingue.

"Lou-Ella," he said at last. "I see why I married you. Because you're me. Only you're the real thing, the genuine article." He took her hand. The lacquer the manicurists had put on was already scratched, and two nails were broken. "My darling," he said, "the night I asked you to marry me I told you I loved you, but I didn't ask you if you loved me, because I knew you didn't. I refused to put you in a position where you might feel you had to give me a false answer if you ——"

"I love you now," said Lou-Ella. "Not only that, but I admire you. I'm not trying to whittle you down to my size, John. You'll never be a small man. And if I have to go on living in airplanes and hotels I will, if I can come here just once in a while."

"But your true heart would never be in it," said John Cartwright Ransom. "I'm a fellow who has sixty acres of peaches for a rival." He slapped his thighs with his hands. "There's only one thing to do, as I see it. The peaches can't come to me, so I'll just have to move in with the peaches."

"I can't ask you to give up your business," said Lou-Ella.

"I won't. I'll run an office out the mule barn. You can rent your dilapidated shack under the pecan tree."

"I'll buy a tent to cover it at night," said Lou-Ella, arising to flood the highways. "Let me change into a dress and drive into town with you. Amy's somewhere around, but we have to send telegrams to Champion and Eddie and call our boys to come home."

FOR I HAVE KNOWN YOUR LOVE

By ELIZABETH GRAHAM

I am gentler now, who once demanded
All of life enwoven in one mesh.
For I have known your love in fragile hours.
Felt your eyes upon my willing flesh.

And you to bend and soften prisoned me
Within your arms. I have known it clear,
As final shadows sank the
pillowed room,
None of life was life but what was here.

Now, wakened, gentler now for having loved,
I mark how subtle is the senses' leaving,
When spun into a moment's miracle, and used
Tenderly to solve the fact of being.

COSTUME BY SYLVAN RICH

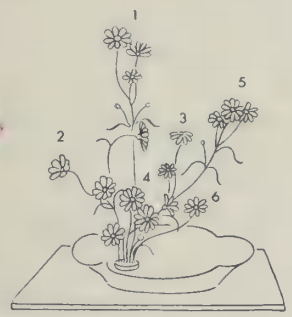
I dreamed I had Tea for Two in my maidenform bra

Maidenform is just my cup of tea . . . such a marvelous pick-me-up! Chansonette's unique spoke-stitched cups give me the lift of a lifetime. And Chansonette* Tri-Line* adds three-point miracle straps for extra comfort, extra accent, extra cling! Treat yourself today to one of these beautiful bras! A, B, and C cups. Chansonette—from 2.00. Chansonette Tri-Line—2.50.

© MAIDEN FORM BRASSIERE CO., INC., NEW YORK 10, N. Y.

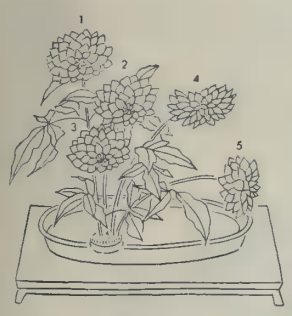
SIMPLY BEAUTIFUL

For a brilliant effect—red and yellow tulips. Here they stand in needled holder in a white bowl filled with clear water. Tallest goes in first, followed by others in order of their numbering, with stems curled, leaves furled for grace.



In these flower arrangements the beauty of pure line dominates. Only a few flowers need be used, combined with leaves or fern. The only essential tools are needled holders for each container. Diagrams show order in which flowers are inserted to build the arrangements.

Stalks of iris stand like three islands in a shallow earthen bowl. Three small holders are used, as shown in diagram. Water covers them. With no low leafage, pebbles can be used to cover the holders.



Many-colored cosmos—a delightfully fresh arrangement for a blue scalloped bowl. Needled holder allows you to place them on slants as shown here, with a cluster of fullness low and center.

Low and full mums go in a cool white bowl, and leaves plump out the arrangement. Small flowers could be single mums. An inch of water in bowl, always fresh and replenished, lengthens flower life.

A plan for your prize dahlias—gracious and dramatic. Only five are needed for this grouping. Placed on various levels, as shown, each bloom stands out distinctly. Curves soften arrangement.

Red, pink and white carnations amid fern are fragrant in a foyer, an indoor or outdoor room. Both fern and flower stems can be curved by gentle pressure in palms of hands before being placed in holder.

TRY THIS TEST--PASTE IS BEST

FIRST . . . sprinkle stained copper with any ordinary copper cleaning powder. See how powder spills and spots—how hard you scour no matter how much you use.

THEN . . . spread on creamy TWINKLE! See how easily, how fast stains disappear—and how evenly TWINKLE shines copper bright as new.

TWINKLE is tops for stainless steel, too! At grocery stores everywhere.

NEW! Twinkle COPPER CLEANER

CLEANS BRIGHTER!
CLEANS FASTER!
GOES FARTHER!
AND, THERE'S NO WASTE WITH PASTE!

Twinkle COPPER CLEANER FOR COPPER POTS PANS

Made by the makers of Drāno and Windex

Welsh Winkie "Hitch - Hiker"

When There Is More Than One Tot To Take Along

STROLLER–WALKER–SLEEPER
- AUTO SEAT
- BOOSTER CHAIR
- STROLLER FOR TWO!

Sold Separately

Wonderful new folding feature, the latest in folding mechanism. Exclusive spring seat—such smooth riding for baby.

Baby Grows Into—Not Out Of The Winkie

WELSH CO., St. Louis • World's Only Maker of "Boodle-Buggies"

As much fun as blowing out candles

. . . that's JACK and JILL Magazine! When you order a subscription for your favorite birthday boy or girl, you're giving 12 colorful issues of reading fun that lasts a full year! JACK and JILL is packed with games, puzzles, stories, Tiny Tales, cutouts and lots more. It's so easy to order, too! Just fill out and mail this coupon. A gay card will announce your gift—and we'll bill you later.

Prices (U.S., U.S. Possessions and Canada)
1 year $3.50 2 or more 1-year gifts from the same donor—$3 each.

Unconditional Guaranty. The Publisher agrees, upon request direct from subscribers to its Philadelphia office, to refund the full amount paid for copies of Curtis publications not previously mailed.

JACK and JILL Dept. 7308, Independence Square, Phila. 5, Pa.

My Name _____
Street or R.D. _____
Town _____ Zone ____ State _____
____ Bill me. ____ Payment enclosed.

Please send a JACK and JILL gift subscription to:

Name _____
Street or R.D. _____
Town _____ Zone ____ State _____
____ Birthday ____ Just a gift
Sign my gift card _____

You may write today's date on this coupon or paper.

A CURTIS MAGAZINE

CHICKEN, GOLDEN CRISP AND TENDER

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 65

standing over the hot range—no sputtering! Once ready for the oven, it cooks by itself. Its aroma and golden beauty on emergence create such eating anticipation that we advise you to double the recipe so that all can have a choice of cuts and second servings.

IMPERIAL CHICKEN

Remove the crust from a loaf of unsliced bread. Grate the bread into fine crumbs, using the coarse side of the grater. You should have enough to make 2 cups or so of crumbs. Spread them out on a flat pan or tray to dry overnight. When ready to cook, mix the crumbs with ¾ cup grated Parmesan or Romano cheese, ¼ cup chopped parsley, 1 clove garlic, crushed, 2 teaspoons salt and ⅛ teaspoon pepper. Chicken needs plenty of pepper, so don't settle for just a dash. Have a frying chicken or young capon cut up into serving pieces. Then dip each piece into melted butter (you'll need about ¼ pound in all), then into the crumb mixture. Be sure each piece is well coated. Arrange the pieces so they don't overlap in an open, shallow roasting pan. Dot with 2 tablespoons more butter. Bake 1 hour or until fork-tender in a moderate oven, 350° F. It will take a little longer for the capon. Do not turn chicken. Though 6 people can each have a piece from 1 chicken or capon, a hungry crowd will require a second chicken.

"First the blade, then the ear, after that the full corn in the ear." The all-year wait for fresh corn is over. It's everywhere this month and in abundance. In the country areas it is being picked by moonlight so it can be rushed to the market stalls in early morning—still with the dew upon it. Pull back a husk. If the kernels are plump and slightly damp it's moonlight corn, all right, and ready for the pot. Serve it on the cob with plenty of butter or, for a delicious, simple change, this way:

SUMMER PEAS AND CORN

Cook 1½ cups peas in a little salted boiling water until about half done. Then add 1½–2 cups fresh corn cut off the cob—however much you have from several ears. Simmer about 5 minutes. Add 1½ cups cream and salt and pepper to taste. Simmer in the cream a few minutes more. Garnish with crisp, sautéed bacon cubes or crumbled bacon strips.

From the garden: Shredded cabbage, scallions and raw white turnips fresh out of the garden combine to make a welcome salad change.

GARDEN SLAW

Shred 4 cups youthful green cabbage and crisp it with ice cubes for about 2 hours. Drain thoroughly and dry with a towel, or shake in a wire lettuce basket. Add 4 scallions or green onions, chopped fine, 1 white turnip, shredded, and 1 teaspoon celery seed (the misleadingly named seed that comes from a plant of the parsley family rather than celery). Pour ¼ cup vinegar over all. Toss, taste and season with 2 tablespoons sugar and enough salt and pepper to give it that just-right taste. When the flavor suits, you add a few tomatoes cut into quarters, and rings cut from 1 or 2 green peppers. Give it another toss and it's ready for the table.

Extras that count: Crunchy salt-bread sticks studded with caraway seeds seem just right to go along with this meal. And to drink—hot or iced coffee. Have whatever pleases you most, but have it hot before icing.

Beautiful to the eye, compelling to the taste is our summertime dessert: cooling pink peppermint ice cream in a shell of light, snowy angel cake accented with shaved chocolate.

PEPPERMINT ICE-CREAM CAKE

Bake your favorite angel cake, or use a prepared mix and bake in a 10" angel-food-cake pan. Cool. For the peppermint ice cream: Scald two 14½-ounce cans plus ⅔ cup evaporated milk (undiluted). Add ½ pound crushed striped peppermint sticks or striped peppermint wheels. They come in glass jars and can be bought in candy stores. They are the real old-fashioned kind. To crush the candy, put it in a clean dish towel and pound it with a mallet or hammer. Let the candy stand in the hot milk until fairly well dissolved. Add 4 cups heavy cream, unwhipped. Stir well and pour into two refrigerator trays. Freeze until almost firm. Scrape into a chilled bowl and beat the ice cream, using an electric or rotary beater. The mixture should be kept quite thick. Return to the freezing trays and freeze again until almost firm. You may need an extra tray as it increases in volume with beating. Turn into a chilled bowl and beat once again. This might seem like a bother, but your ice cream will have a smoother texture if you follow through. Freeze until firm this time. Remove the cake from the pan. Cut down into the cake 1" from the outer edge, leaving a substantial wall of cake 1" thick and 1" as a base at the bottom. Fill in the tube hole at the bottom with some of the cake that has been removed. (The cake removed may be cut into squares and served with fruit for another meal.) Spoon the ice cream into the shell, heaping it up on top. Garnish with shaved chocolate and, if you like, whipped cream. One more nice thing about this dessert: if you have a freezer, it freezes beautifully. Wrap in aluminum foil, freeze and bring out a little before serving so it won't be too hard to slice.

And so to your after-lunch siesta or after-dinner starlight walk—replete, replenished and refreshed. END

"Isn't he a little young to be suffering from insomnia?"

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 63

nd-jelly sandwiches, cheese and crackers, offee heavily sweetened with sugar and evap-rated milk. After lunch, more snacks to pass he dreary afternoons away: bowls of cream oup; more calorie-packed sandwiches. Din-er, always a filling and economical casserole ish, was followed with evening "titbits": astry or pudding or candy bars, or whatever as left of the evening meal.

Benumbed with fat and misery, I lost inter-st in everything. I deteriorated into the most areless of housekeepers. I used my father-in-aw as an excuse to avoid friends and decline ocial invitations. It wasn't until I was thread-are that I would bother to slip out of the ouse to pick up a $3 cotton house dress in ome neighborhood store. When I did catch a limpse of myself in a mirror—or when I ccidentally ran into a friend who tried to elp me—I would shrug my shoulders and ay, "What difference does it make?"

Poor Steff, with no one to come home to ut an irritable father and a complaining ife. Gradually, and understandably enough, e looked for interests outside his home. itiful, lonely interests. After work, Steff egan going to a neighborhood machine shop here, for 50 cents, he was allowed to tinker way his time all evening long. When he idn't have the 50 cents to spare, he whiled way his evenings at the corner newsstand elping the newsboys stack their papers. What life for a bridegroom! After my diet, Steff old me there were many times when he bit-erly regretted marrying me.

In less than three years, I managed to ac-umulate more than 100 pounds of excess eight. Occasionally, during that time, I made rief attempts to reduce, but I never found a iet I could stick to and when I looked at my ulging self and my bleak surroundings I be-ame too discouraged to try.

My father-in-law's illness lasted for six ears. He died in 1952. Once again I was free o go out into the business world, but it asn't easy for me to find a job. Aside from y unattractive appearance, my skills had ecome rusty after six years of "confinement." finally settled for part-time work as a typist. ettled? I was lucky to get anything!

Oddly enough, it was another heartbreaking xperience that forced me into my successful educing regimen. One morning, in February f 1954, I decided to have a permanent wave. ust making the appointment at the beauty arlor cheered me immeasurably. It was the rst forward step toward improving my ap-earance that I had taken in a long, long me. When the moment came for the operator o remove the permanent rollers and get me eady for a shampoo, I was as excited as a hild.

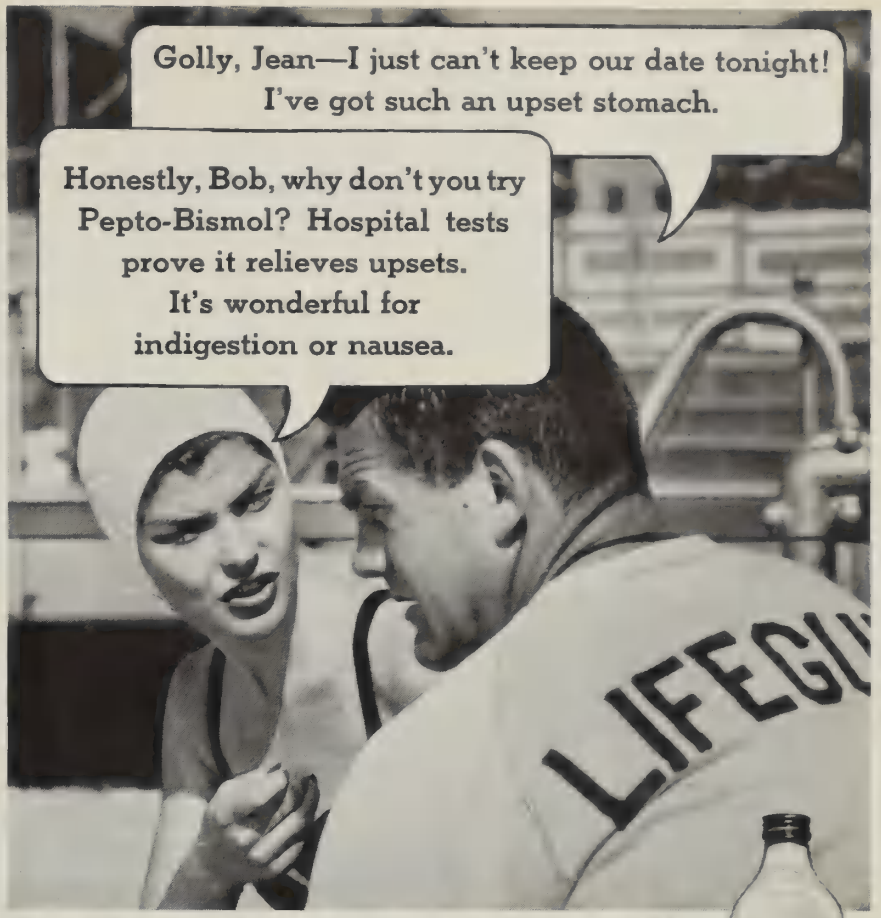
Then came the blow. As each roller came ff, a section of hair came with it. With the emoval of the last roller, the beauty oper-tor and I stared into the mirror. I was almost ald! I have never known exactly what caused y hair to fall out as it did. It could have been arsh chemicals, wrongly used; or the fact hat my health and the condition of my hair ere not good (I was anemic despite my 241 ounds); or a combination of both. In order or me to leave the shop, the operator had to uy a scarf which I tied around my head to ide my plight.

thought I would die. That night Steff, artled at the sight of me and at his wit's end ver the tragedies befalling us, blurted out, Cut your throat or live—but don't kill your-lf by inches!" He was right. I had hit rock ottom, and it was time for me to go com-letely to pieces—or to recover. I chose to cover. There was nothing to do about my air except wait for it to grow out. But I could o something about my monstrous size.

For dinner that night I had two hard-boiled ggs, salad and black coffee. The next morn-g I astonished my doctor by announcing I as going to stick to a diet until I had lost very last ounce of my excess weight. And ick to my diet I did, without a single lapse. here were times, in the beginning, when it ould outrage me to see other people digging into hearty helpings and rich desserts, but that lasted for only the first few weeks of my diet. It took me just ten months to scale down from a size 46 "superslob"—as the teen-age daughter of a friend once called me—to my present size 12 proportions.

I call my diet the "No-Will-Power Diet" because I worked it out, with the approval of my doctor, to be excuse-proof for me. For instance, to appease my craving for something rich and sweet I purposely included in my diet a cup of coffee with two level teaspoons of sugar and one tablespoon of light cream.

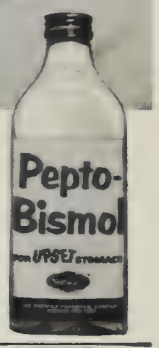
In common with many fatties, I never have had an early-morning appetite. But by mid-morning, I am usually hungry enough to eat the side of a house. So I planned my first solid food for somewhere between ten and eleven each morning, letting my fruit or juice and coffee sustain me until then. On working days, I took a hard-boiled egg to the office. On weekends at home my midmorning egg might be poached, soft-boiled, or scrambled in a double boiler. The egg (75 calories) turned out to be a most satisfactory substitute for such things as a peanut-butter-and-jelly sandwich (450 calories) and candy bar (350 calories) which I'd been in the habit of stuffing into myself at that time.



At lunchtime I almost invariably settled down to a salad. On working days I brought the salad from home in a plastic container and kept it appetizingly cold and crisp by stowing it in the cabinet of the water cooler near my desk. I had two reasons for selecting salad luncheons. First, you can pack an awful lot of salad into comparatively few calories. In addition, I was determined to guard against irregularity.

The principal reason I found it possible to hold down my diet's calorie count to under 1000 a day had to do with my choice of protein foods for the evening meal. I knew that my outsize appetite would never be satisfied with one itty-bitty lamb chop, or with a single three-ounce portion of chopped steak either. Not even if the meat was flanked by a large helping of string beans and another of sliced tomatoes.

It was among shellfish and variety meats that I found what I was looking for. In common with most other Americans, I had scant liking for either, except when they were all caloried up with rich sauces; but when I noted on my calorie chart that six medium-sized shrimp, without dressing, contained only 60 calories and that a large six-ounce portion of broiled sweetbreads contained a mere 175, I made up my mind that I'd learn to appreciate these heretofore neglected foods, as well as others in the same relatively low-calorie bracket.



And learn to appreciate them I did, particularly after I hit upon a few simple culinary tricks that transformed them into subtly flavored, appetizingly fragrant "specialties of the house." In fact, I learned to appreciate them so much that even now, more than two years after I succeeded in reaching my desired weight of 125, I still serve them several times a week. (This may explain why I no longer find it necessary to count calories in order to maintain that 125-pound weight level.)

When it came to desserts, I used fruit, mostly, either fresh or water-packed, and fruit juices in the form of gelatins and whips (made with a liquid noncaloric sweetener). I did this not only because I happen to be very fond of fruit of all kinds, but also because I wanted to include in my diet as many vitamins and minerals as possible. Had I been somewhat younger, the emphasis on proteins, vitamins and minerals might not have seemed so important to me. However, I'd seen all too many women in my age group try to get along on too rigidly restricted diets, and I hadn't liked what I'd seen. Almost invariably they'd appeared drawn and haggard, nervous and irritable, with far too little energy (except of the futile, fidgety kind) and far too great a tendency to feel sorry for themselves. Therefore I made absolutely certain (with my doctor's help) that my diet would be nutritionally

Pepto-Bismol works where soda and alkalizers fail!

For upset stomach, indigestion, nausea, or diarrhea—Pepto-Bismol's special medicinal formula soothes with a gentle coating action. It works both in the stomach and the intestinal tract—where soda and alkalizers never help. For children or adults, this wonderful pink liquid helps control simple diarrhea without constipating.

TAKE HOSPITAL TESTED PEPTO-BISMOL®...AND FEEL GOOD AGAIN!

WHY NOT EARN MORE?

You can easily earn extra money by selling magazine subscriptions in your free time. Thousands of our representatives made their start by asking for our generous commission offer. No obligation. Address ■ postal today!

CURTIS CIRCULATION COMPANY
■■ Independence Square, Philadelphia 5, Penna

CORNS

Removed by Mosco, also Calluses. Quick, easy, economical. Just rub on. Jars, 35¢, 60¢. At your druggist. Money refunded if not satisfied. Moss Co., Rochester, N. Y.

MOSCO ★CORN★ REMOVER

FREE

MONEY-SAVING STYLE CATALOG

NATIONAL BELLAS HESS
FALL & WINTER CATALOG
Bargains Galore for You and Your Family

See hundreds of smart fall fashions in glowing colors. Designed ■■ New York and Hollywood, style capitals of the world. Select from an exciting array of dresses, coats, shoes and accessories . . . fine home items . . . all first quality and offered to you at the lowest prices anywhere!

Shop by mail, and join the millions who save by buying regularly from the bright colorful National Bellas Hess Catalogs. Your choice of three convenient ways to buy: CASH, C.O.D. or CREDIT. Everything in our catalog is absolutely guaranteed—your money back if you are not delighted. Our 69th year.

NATIONAL BELLAS HESS

SAVE MONEY, SAVE TIME—ACT NOW!

NATIONAL BELLAS HESS
256-88 Bellas Hess Bldg., Kansas City, Mo.

Please send me, free, the new National Bellas Hess Money-Saving Catalog.

Name_____
Address_____
City_____
State_____

adequate. In addition, I did something else that I consider extremely helpful. I created for myself a program of spare-time activity that kept me so happily busy that it left me no time to think of my rapidly flattening tummy and of what, left to my own aimless devices, I'd probably cram into it.

With a group of like-minded friends, I helped to form a club whose 200-odd members devote themselves to promoting the welfare and humane treatment of cats and kittens. As secretary-treasurer of this organization, I had—and still have—so much mimeographing, bookkeeping, letter writing, meeting attendance to occupy me that I, who recently made a habit of eating virtually every hour on the hour, now frequently find myself having to make time for regular meals! And what's more, I thrive on it. It seems to me that to reduce successfully, and to stay successfully reduced, a woman needs to keep busy at something, something that interests her vitally.

As my excess pounds began to melt, I went about renewing old acquaintances, making dates with friends Steff and I hadn't seen for years. Steff, of course, is gloriously pleased for me, and for what the diet has meant to our lives. Sometimes we "remember when." But we don't look back very often. We're really too busy keeping up with the present—and planning happily for our future!

Mallory Baele's Reducing Diet—two weeks' menus with recipes for some of her favorite diet dishes.

FIRST WEEK

Monday

Breakfast	Calories
½ grapefruit	100
1 cup coffee with 1 tbsp. light cream	30
2 tsp. sugar	40
	170
Mid-A.M.
1 hard-cooked egg	75
Lunch
Shrimp salad (½ cup shrimp, fresh or frozen, celery, mixed greens, lemon juice and yoghurt dressing)	135
Tea, no sugar	0
1 large orange	100
	235
Mid-P.M.
1 rye wafer	25
½-oz. slice American cheese	50
	75
Dinner
Sizzling platter (6 oz. sweetbreads, precooked and broiled with 1 slice lean bacon and 1 whole tomato sprinkled with 1 tsp. grated Italian-style cheese, few grains garlic salt)	275
Coleslaw (½ cup) with yoghurt-and-celery-seed dressing	25
Coffee whip (½ cup coffee jelly made with noncaloric sweetener, plus stiffly beaten egg white	35
	335
Bedtime
1 medium apple	75
Total calories for day 965

Tuesday

Breakfast	Calories
Tomato juice (8 oz.)	60
Coffee (1 tbsp. light cream and 2 tsp. sugar)	70
	130
Mid-A.M.
1 hard-cooked egg	75
Lunch
Chef's salad (1-oz. slice American cheese, shredded; 1 slice luncheon sausage, shredded; mixed greens; chili-sauce-lemon-juice dressing)	200
1 medium apple	75
Tea, lemon	0
	275
Mid-P.M.
1 large orange	100
Dinner
Shrimp boiled en brochette (10 shrimp lightly oiled and seasoned to taste)	125
Steamed shredded cabbage (8 oz.)	25
Sliced tomato, with yoghurt-and-celery-seed dressing	35
½ baked grapefruit, 1 tsp. honey	125
	310
Bedtime
Nonfat milk (8 oz.)	85
Total calories for day 975

Wednesday

Breakfast	Calories
1 large orange	100
Coffee (1 tbsp. light cream and 2 tsp. sugar)	70
	170
Mid-A.M.
1 hard-cooked egg	75
Lunch
Chicken salad (½ cup chicken; celery; mixed greens; ½ cup pineapple, fresh or water-packed; pineapple-juice-and-yoghurt dressing (1 tbsp.)	200
2 rye wafers	50
Tea, lemon	0
	250
Mid-P.M.
Nonfat milk (8 oz.)	85
Dinner
Braised sweetbreads (6 oz. braised in canned bouillon with ½ cup canned mushroom caps)	185
String beans (¾ cup)	45
Tomato-green-pepper slaw (1 cup) with yoghurt-celery-seed dressing (1 tbsp.)	35
½ medium apple	40
Bleu cheese (½ wedge)	50
	355
Bedtime
Beef bouillon (1 cup)	20
Soda cracker (1)	25
	45
Total calories for day 980

Thursday

Breakfast	Calories
½ grapefruit	100
Coffee (1 tbsp. light cream and 2 tsp. sugar)	70
	170
Mid-A.M.
1 hard-cooked egg	75
Lunch
Cottage cheese (½ cup) with tomato, celery, green pepper, onion, chopped, seasoned to taste and served on lettuce leaves	130
1 rye wafer	25
Apricots (3, water-packed)	50
Tea, lemon	0
	205
Mid-P.M.
Nonfat milk (8 oz.)	85
Dinner
Large (6 oz.) serving chicken (lightly oiled and seasoned with orégano, then browned under broiler)	225
String beans (½ cup) with crumbled bacon (½ slice, crisp)	45
Mixed green salad, mock Russian dressing (chili sauce and lemon juice)	40
Fresh pineapple (1 slice)	50
	360
Bedtime
Rye wafer (1)	25
Beef bouillon (1 cup)	20
	45
Total calories for day 940

Friday

Breakfast	Calories
3 water-packed apricots with 2 tbsp. juice	50
Coffee (1 tbsp. light cream and 2 tsp. sugar)	70
	120
Mid-A.M.
1 hard-cooked egg	75
Lunch
Yoghurt (5 oz.) with wheat germ (2 tbsp.)	120
Rye wafers (2)	50
Fresh or water-packed blueberries (½ cup)	50
	220
Mid-P.M.
1 medium apple	75
Dinner
Large portion broiled flounder (8 oz.)	200
Steamed spinach (1 cup)	25
Finger salad (carrot sticks, celery curls, pepper rings, etc.)	25
½ grapefruit	100
Nonfat milk (8 oz.)	85
	435
Bedtime
Glass tomato juice, heated and seasoned if desired (8 oz.)	60
Total calories for day 985

Saturday

Breakfast	Calories
Blueberries (½ cup) with ¼ cup nonfat milk	70
Coffee (1 tbsp. light cream and 2 tsp. sugar)	70
	140
Mid-A.M.
1 hard-cooked egg	75
Lunch
Chef's salad (as on Tuesday)	200
2 rye wafers	50
1 large orange	100
Tea	0
	350
Mid-P.M.
1 cup bouillon	20
Dinner
Broiled lamb's liver (3 oz.) with 1 slice lean bacon and broiled onion rings (raw onions brushed with salad oil and seasoned to taste, ¼ cup)	235
Spinach (1 cup)	25
Sliced tomato with yoghurt-and-celery-seed dressing	35
Tea, lemon	0
	295
Bedtime
1 medium apple	75
Total calories for day 955

Sunday

Brunch	Calories
Chilled cantaloupe (½) or tomato juice (6 oz.)	50
3 strips broiled bacon, lean and well done	100
1 egg scrambled in 1 tsp. bacon drippings	100
1 bran muffin	100
1 small pat butter	25
Coffee (1 tbsp. light cream and 2 tsp. sugar)	70
	445
Mid-P.M.
1 medium apple	75
Bleu cheese (¾ oz.)	75
	150
Dinner
Quick kidney stew (medium serving: 2 sliced lamb kidneys, braised in canned bouillon with chopped green pepper, grated onion, sliced mushrooms and 1 tbsp. lemon juice. Takes about 15 minutes!)	150
Steamed rice (½ cup)	100
Carrot, raisin and celery slaw (½ cup)	50
Orange-juice gelatin (prepared with unflavored gelatin and noncaloric sweetener)	50
Tea, lemon	0
	350
Total calories for day 945

SECOND WEEK

Monday

Breakfast	Calories
Breakfasts throughout diet were varied slightly as in first week. Take your pick, and count on maximum of 170 calories. . . (approx.)	170
Mid-A.M.
1 hard-cooked egg	75
Lunch
*Lime-pineapple-yoghurt mold on crisp greens (large serving)	105
Rye wafers (2)	50
*Cinnamon tea	0
	155
Mid-P.M.
Banana (1 medium)	100
Dinner
*Veal cutlet Neapolitan	205
Steamed zucchini (1 cup)	15
Grapefruit-and-water-cress salad, 1 tsp. French dressing	110
Bleu cheese (½ oz.), 1 soda cracker	75
	405
Bedtime
*Fruit-flavored milk (8 oz.)	95
Total calories for day 1000

Tuesday

Breakfast	Calories
	170
Mid-A.M.
1 hard-cooked egg	75
Lunch
Chicken bouillon, hot or jellied (1 cup)	45
Cheese-stuffed egg salad (blend 1 tbsp. Cheddar cheese, 1 tbsp. nonfat milk with egg yolk. Return to egg whites, serve with chili-sauce-lemon-juice dressing on mixed greens)	195
Rye wafers (2)	50
Tea, lemon	0
	290
Mid-P.M.
1 medium apple	75
Dinner
*Chicken chop suey	200
*Asparagus salad, pimiento dressing	45
*Peach Freeze	65
Coffee, black	0
	310

*Recipe on page 129

CONTINUED ON PAGE 129

Teen-agers! Look sensational! Real medicated help for troubled skin...

SCRUB SET

1. CLEAN! Medicated Scrub Soap goes deep to rout out clogging grime, hardened oil and make-up. Special oatmeal ingredient stimulates surface circulation, helps rid skin of deep-seated impurities.

2. CLEAR! Medicated Refining Lotion keeps troublesome skin bacteria in check.

3. MEDICATE! Medicated Blemish Cream promotes healing of blemishes all night long.

IMPORTANT: Use your Scrub Set faithfully, every day, following each step exactly as . . . for a clearer, sensationally more attractive complexion. $2.85. In Canada, too.

For beauty the modern way Dorothy Gray

Beautiful Hair

B R E C K

8 ounces $1.00

THERE ARE THREE BRECK SHAMPOOS FOR THREE DIFFERENT HAIR CONDITIONS

It is important to use a shampoo made for your own individual hair condition. There are three Breck Shampoos. One Breck Shampoo is for dry hair. Another Breck Shampoo is for oily hair. A third Breck Shampoo is for normal hair. Select the Breck Shampoo for your own particular type of hair. A mild, gentle Breck Shampoo may be used as often as desired without causing dryness to the hair. A Breck Shampoo leaves your hair soft, lustrous and beautiful.

The Three Breck Shampoos are available at Beauty Shops and wherever cosmetics are sold.

Copyright 1957 by John H. Breck Inc.

JOHN H BRECK INC · MANUFACTURING CHEMISTS · SPRINGFIELD 3 MASSACHUSETTS
NEW YORK · CHICAGO · SAN FRANCISCO · LOS ANGELES · OTTAWA CANADA

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 126

Bedtime	Calories
*Savory tomato juice (8 oz.), hot or cold	60
Total calories for day 980

Wednesday

Breakfast	170
Mid-A.M.
1 hard-cooked egg	75
Lunch
Tomato stuffed with crab-meat salad on greens (½ cup fresh or frozen crab meat, mixed with 1 tbsp. chopped celery, 1 tbsp. chopped green pepper, lemon-juice-yoghurt dressing—1 tbsp.	155
Rye wafers (2)	50
*Spiced black coffee	0
	205
Mid-P.M.
Fresh pear	50
Bleu cheese (½ oz.), 2 soda crackers	100
	150
Dinner
*Baked brains Milanese	130
Stewed tomatoes (½ cup)	25
Chicory salad, 1 tsp. French dressing	45
*Lemon snow	15
	215
Bedtime
*Vanilla milk (8 oz.)	85
Graham crackers (2)	80
	165
Total calories for day 980

Thursday

Breakfast	170
Mid-A.M.
1 hard-cooked egg	75
Lunch
Hawaiian chef's salad: chicken (1 slice) and lean ham (1 slice) shredded into strips and mixed with pineapple cubes (¼ cup, water-packed) and mixed greens, yoghurt-lemon-juice dressing	275
Soda crackers (2)	50
*Spiced coffee	0
	325
Mid-P.M.
Bran-muffin half "buttered" with cottage cheese (1 tbsp.)	70
Tea, lemon	0
	70
Dinner
Lamb's liver with crisp bacon (1 slice)	185
Braised celery	25
Water-cress-and-endive salad (1 tsp. French dressing)	45
Strawberry gelatin with whipped cream (dietetic)	20
	275
Bedtime
Berries (½ cup) with nonfat milk (¼ cup)	65
Total calories for day 980

Friday

Breakfast	170
Mid-A.M.
1 hard-cooked egg	75
Lunch
Fresh fruit salad (¼ grapefruit, ½ orange, ¼ banana) with cottage cheese (3 tbsp.), pineapple-yoghurt dressing	205
Bran-muffin half with 1 small pat butter	75
*Cinnamon tea	0
	280
Mid-P.M.
Fresh apricots (3 small)	60
Dinner
*Savory fish roll-up	110
Shoestring beets (½ cup)	50
Mixed green salad, 1 tsp. French dressing	55
Pineapple-mint cup (½ cup water-packed)	65
	280
Bedtime
Nonfat chocolate milk (8 oz. with 1 tbsp. dietetic cocoa)	105
Total calories for day 970

Saturday

Breakfast	170
Mid-A.M.
1 hard-cooked egg	75
Lunch
*Tomato aspic with chicken salad (1 cup)	175
Rye wafers (2)	50
Tea, lemon	0
	225
Mid-P.M.
Fresh plums (2 small)	50
Dinner
Broiled veal cutlet	175
Zucchini baked with grated cheese	50
Mixed green salad, 1 tsp. French dressing	55
Cup custard (regular cup custard made with nonfat milk, noncaloric sweetener)	100
	380
Bedtime
*Fruit-flavored milk (8 oz.)	95
Total calories for day 995

Sunday

Brunch
Fresh strawberries (½ cup) with light cream (2 tbsp.) and noncaloric sweetener	90
Shirred eggs with mushrooms	150
Toasted English-muffin half, 1 small pat butter, 1 tsp. orange marmalade	115
Coffee, black	0
	355
Mid-P.M.
Fresh pear	50
Gruyère cheese (1 oz.)	125
Coffee, black	0
	175
Dinner
Broiled minute steak (large)	200
Steamed chopped spinach (½ cup)	20
Beet salad (pickled with vinegar, cloves, onion rings, noncaloric sweetener)	65
*Scotch surprise (½ cup)	55
	340
Bedtime
*Vanilla milk	85
Total calories or day 955

*Recipe at right.

Mallory Baele's Diet Recipes

LIME-PINEAPPLE-YOGHURT MOLD

Soften 1 envelope unflavored gelatin in ¼ cup cold water and dissolve 1 envelope dietetic lime-flavored gelatin in hot water according to package directions. Combine, stir until thoroughly dissolved and blended, and allow to cool. Refrigerate cooled gelatin mixture until slightly thickened or until it is the consistency of heavy syrup. Next, blend in 1 cup yoghurt and a dash of salt. Stir together until yoghurt and gelatin are thoroughly blended. Return to refrigerator until mixture is almost, but not quite, firm. Then add 4-ounce can water-packed pineapple titbits and juice, and blend again thoroughly. Return to refrigerator and allow to set for several hours. Serve on crisp greens. Serves 4.

CINNAMON TEA

To 1 pint water add 1 cinnamon stick, 2 or 3 cloves, and a shaving of lemon peel. Bring to a low boil and allow to simmer for 5 minutes. Strain cinnamon, cloves and lemon peel from water, bringing water to brisk boil, then pour over tea bags or tea leaves and allow to steep to desired strength. Strain out tea bags or leaves and add noncaloric sweetener and lemon juice to taste. Serve it hot, or chill it and serve it in glasses. Makes two 8-ounce glasses.

VEAL CUTLET NEAPOLITAN

Coat the bottom of a small frying pan with 1 teaspoonful salad oil and add a clove of garlic. Heat until garlic sizzles, then add 1 thinly pounded veal cutlet (3 ounces, trimmed of fat), searing quickly on both sides. Remove the garlic clove and add 2 tablespoons tomato juice in which ½ beef-bouillon cube has been dissolved. Cover and steam over low heat until the cutlet is thoroughly cooked. Remove the cutlet from the pan and sprinkle with 1 teaspoon grated Italian cheese. Put cutlet under broiler until cheese is crusty golden brown. Serve with tomato-sauce gravy.

FRUIT-FLAVORED MILK

To an 8-ounce glass nonfat milk add noncaloric sweetener to taste, and 1 teaspoon strawberry flavoring or 2 teaspoons juice from canned water-packed raspberries.

CHICKEN CHOP SUEY

Combine 1 can mixed Chinese vegetables and 1 cup shredded boiled or steamed chicken in a saucepan and heat. When ready to remove from the heat, add a pinch of garlic powder, and prepared mustard, salt and pepper. Blend thoroughly. Makes 2 servings.

PIMIENTO DRESSING

Mix together 1 tablespoon yoghurt, 1 teaspoon lemon juice, a pinch of onion powder, pinch of salt and a few slivers of pimiento. Blend thoroughly and serve on single salad.

PEACH FREEZE

Use a fork to mash 2 peeled sliced fresh peaches or 4 water-packed peach halves until they are light and frothy. Add 4 teaspoons lemon juice, grated rind of ½ lemon, pinch of salt, noncaloric sweetener to taste, and ¾ cup buttermilk. Blend thoroughly. Pour into freezing tray and chill. Just before the mixture has had a chance to freeze solid, remove from refrigerator tray and beat until it is light and foamy. Pour mixture into freezing tray and freeze until firm. Serve in chilled sherbet glasses. Makes 4 helpings.

SAVORY TOMATO JUICE

Season an 8-ounce glass tomato juice to taste with a pinch of onion powder, hot pepper or Worcestershire sauce, and lemon juice. Serve it hot or cold.

SPICED COFFEE

To 1 cup cold water add 1 cinnamon stick, 2 or 3 cloves and a few slivers of lemon or orange peel. Bring to a boil and then strain over 1 teaspoon instant coffee. Stir until coffee is dissolved and add noncaloric sweetener to taste. Can be served iced or hot.

BAKED BRAINS MILANESE

(Calves' brains should be healthy pink in color with clear red veinings.) Allow ½ medium-sized pair per portion. To prepare: Rinse the calves' brains in clear cold water and drop them into boiling water seasoned with salt and 1 tablespoon vinegar or lemon juice. Parboil for 5 minutes, then allow to cool for cleaning. To clean, remove outer membrane and any dark patches. Then rinse the calves' brains in clear cold water and lay on several thicknesses of paper toweling to drain. Preheat oven to 350° F. Lightly grease the bottom and sides of a shallow individual baking dish. Cut brains into bite-sized pieces and place them in the bottom of the baking dish, being careful not to cram the pieces of brain too closely together. Over the brains lay sliced canned mushrooms alternately with small pieces of green pepper and moisten with mushroom liquid. Sprinkle lightly with garlic powder and salt and dot generously with capers, adding a tablespoon of caper vinegar to the mushroom liquid in the pan. Place in oven and allow to bake for about 25 minutes. Serve immediately, with lemon wedges. An average 4-ounce serving contains approximately 130 calories.

LEMON SNOW

Beat 1 egg white, blending in a pinch of salt, noncaloric sweetener to taste, 1 tablespoon lemon juice, and grated lemon rind during the beating process. Beat until very stiff and heap into chilled sherbet glasses. Top with maraschino cherry and chill thoroughly in refrigerator. Serves 2.

VANILLA MILK

To an 8-ounce glass nonfat milk add noncaloric sweetener to taste and ½ teaspoon vanilla extract, or ¼ teaspoon vanilla extract and ¼ teaspoon almond extract. Serve it hot or cold.

SAVORY FISH ROLL-UP

For a medium-size fish fillet, chop ¼ carrot, ¼ medium onion, ⅛ green pepper, ¼ tomato and a sprig of parsley. Mix and season with ¼ teaspoon salt, freshly ground black pepper and pinch of dried tarragon or dill. Spoon mixture on fillet, roll neatly and secure with toothpick. Grease bottom of a baking dish and place the roll-up in the dish with a little water or clam broth in the bottom. Bake in an oven preheated to 400° F. for about 45 minutes, or until fish and vegetables are cooked through and most of the liquid in the pan has evaporated. Use two serving spoons to lift out the roll-up to avoid breaking it or spilling the stuffing. One serving.

TOMATO ASPIC WITH CHICKEN SALAD

Soften 1 tablespoon unflavored gelatin in ¼ cup cold water. Heat 1 cup tomato juice seasoned with 1 small bouillon cube, pinch of onion powder, pinch of mustard, dash of Worcestershire sauce, and add to softened gelatin. Cool and place in refrigerator until it is of a syrupy consistency. While the aspic is setting, chop green pepper and celery, enough to make 1 tablespoon each, moisten with 1 teaspoon lemon juice and mix with ½ cup chopped chicken. Add this mixture to aspic, stir well, and return to refrigerator until firm. Serve on mixed greens. Makes 2 generous portions.

SCOTCH SURPRISE

Prepare dietetic butterscotch pudding according to the directions on the package. Remove from heat, and while pudding is cooling blend ¼ teaspoon grated lemon rind, ⅛ teaspoon cinnamon, ⅛ teaspoon cloves and ⅛ teaspoon allspice with ½ tablespoon strong coffee. Add these ingredients to pudding and mix thoroughly. Pour into sherbet glasses and chill until firm. Sprinkle lightly with lemon rind. Makes 2 servings. END

How to Dress Well on Practically Nothing!

Even in August, Barbara J. has an air about her that is Exciting and New

By BET HART

With vacationing a happy memory and the return to work very much a reality, Barbara J. wants something to give her wardrobe, as well as herself, a whole new outlook. She looks for a costume to wear neatly and coolly on those still-summery days, and at the same time to have the look of a new season and exciting things to come. Her ever-present eye on fashion $'s is even keener now, for she knows she has several important investments approaching.

For a refurbished August look, Barbara invests (and very wisely so) a few fashion $'s to go a long way for right now and later on. Her choice: a slim black faille dress, $17.95—with even more for the money. The investment includes a detachable white dickey, matching cummerbund, and an added extra, a gold medallion and ribbon. Chosen especially for a cool and efficient return-to-the-city look, Barbara could wear the dress just as well at a Christmas party as at the end of an Indian-summer day!

EMMA GENE HALL

The practical side:

A midweek day, a highly polished look, Barbara's first appearance in her new dress. She wears it with the white dickey, gold pin and her narrow black belt, carries her beige clutch bag. The black bandeau? Her satin head clip from a year ago newly covered with velvet ribbon. The dress would also welcome color—almost any color—and Barbara refurbishes her brightest accessories for a neat contrast to sultry days.

The romantic side:

The dress is especially appealing for a Saturday-night theater date. Removing the dickey, she adds her own touch of lightness—a sheer, very sheer black overskirt tied to the front with a huge taffeta bow. (It would look equally well reversed.) The fabric: a filmy silk organza; the time in the making: 90 minutes; and the price: $3.75 for the three yards of fabric. Another evening with the same date (under the distinct impression it's a new dress), Barbara wears her white chiffon scarf folded ever so gently around the neckline . . . a huge oversize flower to accent the pretty neckline. This time, she wears the matching cummerbund to give the dress an even slimmer appearance.

MARIBETH

August Fashion $'s

Black faille dress, organza overskirt and black ribbon for headband . . $21.85

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 45

and the people who move through it. You never could tell, as the girl grew older, whom she would meet. Sometime through our big arched doorway a young man of affluence, charm, position—a young Jed—was sure to walk. Was sure to see Bets. To want her.

It was Sara's dream, I knew it with sharp surety. After all, it was my mother's dream too—and she made it come true.

So I aided and abetted. Primarily because it meant seeing more of Bets. It meant those lovely communicating times, when the flash and facets of her young mind drew my breath, no matter how calmly I went on with my knitting. And if Sara had her plans, I couldn't blame her. The simple truth Sara and I both had in common was the belief that nothing was too good for Bets.

Therefore, I found myself gripping the white phone beside my bed a little too tightly when Sara said that she was troubled this time, the first time really, about Bets.

She answered my questions with a sudden quick sob. My heart began to make a painful prickling beat in my chest. If anything happened to Bets, I thought. If anything happened to Bets ——

"Sara," I said loudly, "stop that caterwauling and tell me what's the matter."

She stopped with only the overtones of her tears touching her voice. "She's in love," she managed. "In love with the most horrible young man, and Mike and I can't do a thing with her. We've been trying for weeks—and she's stubborn and quiet—and tells me nothing."

"Then how do you know she's in love?" I asked.

"It's the way she looks," she said more slowly, as if she were thinking about it. "And last night I came downstairs and they were in the sunroom—kissing ——"

"Pooh. Kisses," I said brusquely.

"You know Bets," Sara replied simply. "You know her as well—even better than do."

I nodded, with no words in me. I knew Bets. She wouldn't want to be touched unless the hands, the lips, the arms were meaningful to her, permanent and serious. It's very bad to be touched closely by someone you don't love. I knew that. "Tell me about the young man," I commanded.

"He's big and gawky and he's going to the dramatic academy. He hasn't a dime and his hair is too long. Bets met him in a diner, of all places, the night she got a flat tire after the sorority meeting. He fixed it for her and came home with her for hot chocolate."

This was getting us nowhere. "What have you done about it?"

"We've blustered and beaten and asked questions and begged." The sob came back in Sara's throat. "It wouldn't be so bad, maybe—a passing thing, maybe—although the way she looks at us—as if we were a million miles away and cruel and stupid ——"

I waited for her to get control again.

"Except," she went on sturdily at last, "that young Collings has taken such an interest in her this past month ——"

Ah, the mother's dream, I thought.

Apparently the perfect young man had walked into our living room already. Young Collings was a friend of my older boy. There was nothing gawky and needing a haircut about young Collings. He was the crew-cut, plain-tie, born-to-his-place young man. I could see how Sara felt.

"What can I do?" I asked at last.

"We lay awake for hours last night, Mike and I. We talked and talked. You have so much influence with Bets, Frieda. If anybody can break this thing up, you can."

"So?"

"Well, you can," she said defensively. "We thought, Mike and I, that maybe—if you invited Bets away for the weekend? Maybe if you worked around to it slowly, and got her to talk—you could tell her how foolish, how wrong ——"

I considered this. I did not like it. But no matter how Sara worded it, no matter what antagonism I felt for her, she had a great and solid point here.

Bets was just eighteen. There was in her all the bright and wonderful things that lifted my heart. Should those things be nipped in the bud, frozen or starved or trampled, before they knew any sort of fruition?

It wasn't that I thought so much of young Collings. It was just that Bets needed the chance, the room around her, the comfort—yes, and the time, to find herself.

"All right," I said abruptly. "Tell her I called and want her to call me."

"We're so grateful, Frieda," Sara began to babble. "There's just nobody like you in the whole world ——"

It was rude, but I hung up. It just didn't seem quite loyal to Bets to go on about it so, until I had tried to get it from her own lips.

Bets called me at dinnertime that night. "You wanted me, Aunt Frieda?"

She sounded sweet and polite and I could see how it was going to be. Bets is smart as a whip.

"Yes, I did, dear," I said calmly. "I have tickets for the new play at the Hartford for Saturday night. Two tickets."

"Oh?"

"Yes," I went on. "And I thought it would be nice—sort of a special thing—if you drove me into the city on Saturday morning, and we spent the day looking around and shopping. Maybe going to the museum. Then dinner and the play—and all night at that fabulous new hotel."

I was talking too much. I should have stopped, but there didn't seem to be a place.

"Then—Sunday—I've wanted to go to the cathedral for years—and there's a really fine concert at the Bowl—and dinner at some nice place on the way home ——"

I stopped finally. That was enough bait to hook Bets into ecstasy a few months ago. I had no idea whether it was even vaguely alluring to her now.

"I'm sorry," she began, "but I don't think ——"

"Please, sweetie," I said, surprised at my intensity. "Your aunt isn't as young as she used to be—and with the boys away, and your Uncle Jed in Chicago for over two weeks

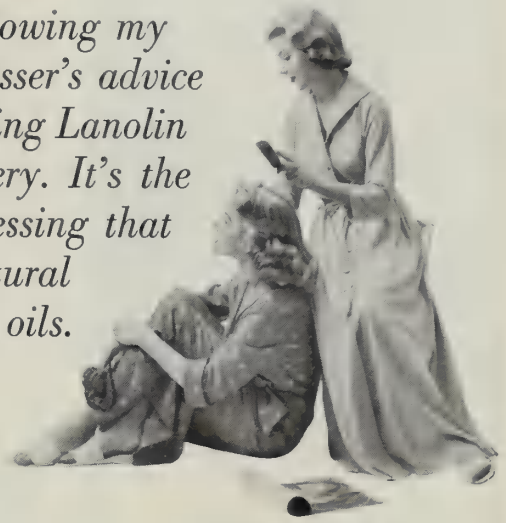
YOUNG DEMOCRAT

By ROBERT P. TRISTRAM COFFIN

His dungarees list hard to port,
Freckles hide his nose,
Nearly half of him is ears,
Half, elbows and big toes.

The earth has stained his knees and mind,
His clothes let summer in,
There is a yawning holiday
In his easy grin.

But under the corn silk of his hair
And the dirt and tan,
Under his rents and carelessness
Is an American.



He is a sawed-off Jefferson
Playing at pioneers,
Wisening to weather and the wind
In his thoughtful ears.

And he will grow up to fine clothes
And Grecian porticoes
Once he has soaked democracy
Up through his bare toes.

ENDS DULL DRY "THIRSTY" HAIR

Q: How do you make your hair so lustrous and shining?

A: By following my hairdresser's advice and using Lanolin Discovery. It's the greaseless hairdressing that replaces natural beauty oils.

Q: What's the difference between Lanolin Discovery and other hairdressings?

A: Ordinary hairdressings "coat" your hair —make it oily— Lanolin Discovery's misty fine spray is absorbed into every hair right down to your scalp.

To enhance the natural color of your hair—to get a shimmery satiny sheen with deep fascinating highlights, just spray on LANOLIN DISCOVERY Hairdressing and brush a little. In just seconds, you get the same beautiful results as brushing your hair 100 strokes a day.

Helene Curtis Lanolin Discovery®

THE NEW HAIRDRESSING IN SPRAY FORM

$1.25 and $1.89 both plus tax

Used and recommended by leading beauticians. Available wherever cosmetics are sold

"How I use Murine to rest my eyes"

Mary Margaret McBride

Author, Lecturer and Radio Personality

"Just a couple of drops of Murine give my eyes a comforting 'break' ", says Mary Margaret McBride. "Murine is such a pleasant way to relieve that tired feeling caused by all the reading my eyes must do." Whenever your eyes feel tired after reading, sewing or figuring, try Murine. Just two drops soothe your eyes, gently . . . make them feel comfortable again. Now with new unbreakable dropper.

MURINE

*for your eyes

now ——" I made a shamed little laugh. It wasn't entirely faked: I didn't like reminding her of our affection, of her obligation to me. "Well, Bets," I finished lamely, "I'm lonely."

"I'm sorry," she said. She sounded herself, and worried; the kind of girl who loved people.

"Unless you have some really big plans?" I ventured.

She was quiet for a moment. "No," she decided finally. "Nothing special. Nothing that couldn't wait until Monday. If you really need me."

"I really need you," I said quietly.

"All right," she said, with equal quietness. Like a promise. Like a woman knowing exactly what she is going to get into, not seeing how she will face it precisely, but marching ahead just the same.

"I'll pick you up," I said quickly. "Let's get an early start. Around eight, and avoid the worst traffic. Don't bother to bring many clothes. It's time you had a new party dress."

I didn't care for those words. Bets is too good for blatant bribery.

Thursday and Friday were not easy for me. I tried to figure out why. I had it pretty clear by the time I put my bag into the back of the car, swung down our long winding drive and onto the highway toward Bets'.

I had no desire to put it into words, but it lay in the back of my mind—the knowledge that since I had been as young as Bets I had worked very carefully on an edifice. It was high and pretty, with a lot of lacework, so that I could look out at the world from the tower I'd made myself. It was also, because of the very slowness and painfulness of its building, made of firm, tough material. It was a place that shut me in, a sort of emotional retreat.

What concerned me was a panic that perhaps I would have to tear through some of this protection, if I were to communicate fully with Bets, draw her out and do what I must to keep her from making a permanent mistake.

When I turned up the little street where Mike kept his family in comfort in a three-bedroom ranch house (which Sara deplored because of its similarity to the others around it) I saw a motorcycle before the house. When I stopped I looked toward the porch. Bets' bag was sitting there. Bets stood beside it. Next to her was a gawky young man with long hair and a black leather jacket.

Bets picked up her bag, the young man took it away from her. They walked stiffly, a good distance apart, and yet terribly, terribly together, down the path.

"Aunt Frieda," Bets said, still standing away from the young man physically, but somehow with him in spirit, "this is Mark Novack."

I watched her as she said it, then I switched my gaze quickly to this Novack boy.

I never saw such a stubborn chin. I never saw such a vital mouth. I have never, in all my years of living, seen such vulnerable eyes.

"How do you do, Mark," I said formally.

He nodded somberly. Strangely, it was a question asked, a plea made, an ultimatum threatened, all in the downbeat and uplift of a shaggy head.

He opened the car door. Bets slid in. She looked straight ahead, even when he tucked the bag in beside mine in the back seat.

"I'll see you Monday," he said. His voice was as dark and somber as his face.

Bets said, "Yes."

I gunned the motor and skidded away from the curb. From the corner of my eyes I was aware of a figure on the front porch. For once, I thought, Sara showed real tact, keeping in the background. And it couldn't have been easy.

"He'll be a very good actor, I think," I said five minutes later, after we were on the freeway.

"You know?" Bets asked quietly.

"Your mother told me." It was only fair to let her know that much, to verify her guess that much.

We rode in silence most of the way into the city. It was the way we walked sometimes, Bets and I. Up to now it had always meant that when the silence was broken we would have something of value to share with each other. I prayed it would be that way this time.

Ask any WOMAN

By Marcelene Cox

If a young girl hands herself too many bouquets, she may never walk up the aisle carrying the bride's.

Parents should work together as efficiently as two book ends.

One way to get a child to mind
Is to approach him from behind.

"No wonder a mother-in-law is frequently jealous of her son's wife," observes a reader. "She just gets him through all the 'phases' when another woman acquires him."

Some persons never draw the line until adding up what they've spent.

Ah, yes, it's incontrovertible:
Son shines best in a convertible.

That which, in a mother, is called firm discipline in a stepmother is frequently termed harsh.

"If, as they say, the first year of married life is the hardest," writes our black-haired daughter from Hawaii, "then we are destined for a glorious life together."

There's a time when a growing boy seems to have no more ambition than a blade of grass in a dry August.

Note to wives: If the account is joint, don't be too quick on the draw.

An adolescent always seems to know something about everything—except what he's been taught at home.

A friend writes, "Whenever I feel like running away from it all I'm always restrained by remembering the condition of my clothes closets and dresser drawers."

"Well, whether or not you stick to a diet, it always does furnish food for conversation."

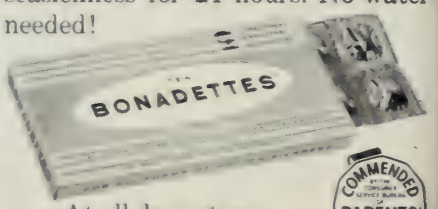
Why is it that grandmothers-in-law never seem to be a problem!

Parent of adolescent children, showing pictures: "And here's one of my husband and me, taken a few years ago when we were much smarter."

Overheard: "I'm so depressed; maybe if I could figure out why, I'd be happy!"

Young parent: "Before I was a mother I thought you just had children and told them what to do. I didn't think they told you."

An important ingredient for a successful marriage: high fidelity.



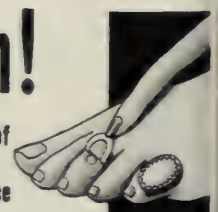
BONADETTES®

STOP CAR SICKNESS

nausea, dizziness, vomiting in cars, planes, trains, boats!

Just one dose of delicious, melt-in-your-mouth BONADETTES prevents carsickness, airsickness and seasickness for 24 hours. No water needed!

COMMENDED PARENTS MAGAZINE



At all drug stores . . .
Get 24-hour relief with
TRAVEL-TESTED BONADETTES

TINY TV Salt and Pepper Set FREE ON 15-DAY OFFER

To Start You Earning up to $150 With MIDWEST Christmas Cards
Show friends our fast-selling Cards and Gift Novelties. You keep as much as 50c to $1.25 profit per item. No experience needed. Get samples on approval with free Personal Christmas Card Album and TINY TV. Write NOW.
Send No Money
MIDWEST CARD CO., 1113 Washington, Dept. 466-J, St. Louis 1, Mo.

Corns, Callouses Go Fast, Pain Gone, Forgotten!

All this now yours one of the quickest ways known to medical science

No waiting for action when you use soft, soothing, cushioning, protective Dr. Scholl's Zino-pads on corns, callouses, bunions or sore toes. You get super-fast nerve-deep relief. And when used with the separate Medications included, corns or callouses lift right out! Zino-pads also stop corns or callouses before they can develop! New skin matching color, stay on in bath. Try them!

Super-Soft Dr Scholl's Zino-pads

FEET HURT, BURN?

Dr. Scholl's Foot Balm quickly relieves foot discomfort caused by exertion. Very soothing and refreshing. Costs but a trifle. Try it!

Dr Scholl's FOOT BALM

The fabulous new hotel was really some-ng. Bets grinned at me when we were met, sed over, propelled silently to a top floor, ered into a room so modern that nothing ked like what it was, and shown the pink conv overlooking the swimming pool. I nned back. And there was ease in the azing room.

The shopping was fun. I ordered things for ristmas quite recklessly, although the sea-n was months away. I persuaded Bets to let buy her a red taffeta thing that pulled rich nts from her dark hair and eyes. We had ch and came back to the hotel to rest, and owered and put on the clothes we'd bought d went to the roof for dinner.

Everything was smooth and calm and cov-d. Our talk was of nothing and everything. ere lay underneath the knowledge that ne moment would come when the purpose the weekend would be brought into the en. I had no idea when. Neither, I'm sure, l Bets. But being together put a layer of ialness, of comfort over the day. We waited the proper time with no impatience and alarm.

Then we went to the play. The lights went wn. The stage stood out. The actors began move about. For a little while it was acting d illusion. Then it became reality.

There was so much youth up there on the ge. So much love pushed over the foot-nts. Such a problem in human suffering and man divinity and human sacrifice, that by end of the second act I was shivering as if ere cold. As if I had been cold for a long ne.

It was the same with Bets, who slid her hand o mine as the third act began. Bets, young d less controlled and more sensitive to pain, the tears slide down her cheeks in a slow peless sort of rhythm.

I have never felt so close to any human ng as I did to that eighteen-year-old girl h her hand in mine, there in the dark, tching her own situation capsuled into ee acts on a medium-sized stage.

There was real silence between us all the y back to the hotel and while we made dy for bed.

"Good night, dear," I said finally, switch-g off the light.

"Good night, Aunt Frieda," Bets answered. I heard her roll over, her back toward me, d I felt the stillness of her lying. I stayed on r back and looked up toward the ceiling I uld not see. This was the time, I told my-lf. Now, in the dark, sharing a room to-her, sharing the day and the play and the od. Now was the time to talk to the child oved.

I hunted for the words I had subconsciously en hunting for all day.

You have only one life, I tried silently. Bets, n older than you and I know —— Darling, u think this is all the world now, but let me l you ——

Nothing fitted on my tongue, against my s, in my heart.

Bets began to talk softly, sliding her words smoothly into the darkness that she had d her first sentence before I realized what s happening.

"You go along," she said dreamily, "being ung and having funny thoughts drift into d out of your mind. Some days you wake so happy you try to bring the sky down ar enough to touch. Or you reach for the n, to see if it will burn. Other times you en your eyes and the grayness of being ung is all through you like fog. Either way, hurts."

I closed my eyes against sudden pain.

"Aunt Frieda," she said, a little louder, ll mostly whisper, but direct now, "Mark oked at me, and fixed a tire, and drank ocolate in the breakfast room. We walked wn Main Street, and up into the hills. I de on the back of his crazy motorcycle clear the beach. We swam in the ocean and it s very cold."

She seemed to be waiting. I said thickly, es?"

"And he talked to me," she finished.

My mind jumped, a little frantically. This as something I had to stop. I wanted every lessed second of it, but I had to stop it, so that Bets would understand, and not make a mistake. Not mess up her whole life.

"Talked to you about what?" I found myself asking.

"About himself some, of course. The orphanage. The job he has nights so that he can go to the drama school. But more"—I could hear her swallow this time—"about how we—we have to reach for the sun. About how it should hurt to be alive. About how it is important for an actor—for anybody, everybody—to feel large and beyond himself and into the hearts of everybody else. Oh, I could never tell you. Never in years."

"Try," I whispered.

"All those things he gave me. He made himself part of me, before he ever touched me. And when he kissed me—we were already one person."

A terrible sound came out of my throat. Dry and harsh. She didn't seem to hear it; she laughed, low, indulgent.

"Maybe I was thrown off a little," she went on. "I know how it looks. The motorcycle. The—that ridiculous jacket. But Mark says you can't wear out a jacket like that! And a cycle gets him there when he can't afford a car."

"What," I managed, "what do they say about his acting? It's a very precarious ——"

"The day he kissed me he took me with him. He stood up there; no props—nothing but a kitchen chair and a funny little ragged-hair sort of girl ——" She stopped. "I sat way back. Quiet as a mouse, Aunt Frieda. There was just an overhead hanging bulb for light on the two of them. The teacher—all the rest—they sat on the rim of the light and leaned forward ——"

I lay there in my bed in the hotel room and lived it with her.

She sighed finally. "It was beautiful. Simple and pure and beautiful. Afterward we went to the diner where we met. Mark said, he said, 'Today I was good. For you. Because

SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES

THESE ADVERTISERS WILL BE GLAD TO SEND LITERATURE. WRITE THEM DIRECT, STATING YOUR SPECIFIC INTERESTS.
LADIES' HOME JOURNAL, 555 FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK 17, NEW YORK

Business & Secretarial

katharine gibbs secretarial
BOSTON 16, 21 Marlborough St.
NEW YORK 17, 230 Park Ave.
MONTCLAIR, N.J., 33 Plymouth St.
PROVIDENCE 6, 155 Angell St.
Outstanding training. Three practical courses.
One-Year Secretarial
Liberal Arts-Secretarial (two years)
Special Course for College Women
Catalog: ADMISSIONS DEAN

SHORTHAND IN 6 WEEKS
Famous SPEEDWRITING shorthand. 120 words per minute. No symbols; no machines. Uses ABC's. Easiest to learn, write, transcribe. Lowest cost. Over 350,000 graduates. Typing available. 34th Year. Write for FREE booklet to:
Speedwriting® Dept. 9908-7, 55 W. 42 St., N. Y. 36, N. Y.

Bryant College Earn your B.S. in 2 years! Executive Secretarial Course: majors in Admin., Legal, Acctg. or Med. Sec'l. Also 2-yr. degree in Bus. Adm.; 4-yr. degree in Bus. Teacher Tr.; 1-yr. Sec'l diploma. Coed. Traditional campus life. 24 bldgs. Dorms. Self-help. Veteran approved. Register Early! Catalog: Ruth West, Bryant College, Providence 6, R. I.

Retailing

Tobé-Coburn School for Fashion Careers
Prepare for a career in buying, advertising, fashion coordination, radio/TV. Field trips, cultural activities, store work with pay. One and Two Year Courses. Lifelong placement service. Begins September 4. Ask for catalog L.
851 Madison Avenue, New York 21, New York

Home Study Schools

Calvert School You can educate your child at home with famous Calvert School-At-Home Courses. Kindergarten—9th grade. Accredited. Easy-to-follow teaching manual; lessons, books, supplies. No experience needed. Guidance by Calvert teachers. Start any time. 52nd year. Catalog. Give age, school grade.
Calvert School, 858 E. Tuscany Rd., Baltimore 10, Md.

American School High School at Home. Many Finish in 2 Years. Go as rapidly as your time and abilities permit. Prepares for college entrance exams. Standard H. S. texts supplied. Diploma awarded. Credit for H. S. subjects already completed. Single subjects if desired. Free Bulletin.
American School, Dept. HC3, Drexel at 58th, Chicago 37

Chicago School of Interior Decoration
Home study training. Approved and supervised. Fine starting point for career. No classes. No wasted time. Text and work kit furnished. Diploma awarded. Send for free booklet.
Chicago School of Interior Decoration, 835 Diversey Pkwy., Dept. 137C, Chicago 14

HIGH SCHOOL at HOME
You can still finish High School—at home, in your spare time. No interference with job, or social life. Win more pay, a better job, social recognition. Take only the subjects you need. Complete lesson and answer service. Personalized instruction. Low cost. Diploma to graduates.
I.C.S. is oldest and largest (257 courses). Write today for 3 free books: (1) 36-page "How to Succeed," (2) sample lesson (Math), (3) Career Catalogue—indicate course desired.
INTERNATIONAL CORRESPONDENCE SCHOOLS, SCRANTON 9, PENNA. DEPT. 39112G

Vocational

Hotels Call for Trained Women

You can qualify at home, or through resident classes in Washington for well-paid position in hotels, motels, clubs, and apartment house projects. Thousands of Lewis graduates, both young and mature, "making good" everywhere. Get into this fast-growing field offering sound, substantial opportunities, fine living, luxurious surroundings. Previous experience proved unnecessary. Registration in Lewis National Placement Service FREE. Send today for FREE Book.
Course approved for ALL Veteran Training.
LEWIS HOTEL TRAINING SCHOOL, Room CM-549, Washington 7, D. C. 41st SUCCESSFUL YEAR

Boys' Schools

FORK UNION MILITARY ACADEMY

★ Our ONE SUBJECT PLAN of study in Upper School (grades 9–12) has increased honor roll 50%. Develops concentration.
★ Fully accredited. ROTC highest rating. 17 modern buildings, 2 completely equipped gyms, pool. Splendid environment, excellent health record. Junior School (grades 4–8) has separate buildings, gym. Housemothers. 59th year. For ONE SUBJECT PLAN booklet and catalog write:
★ Dr. J.C.Wicker, Box 868, Fork Union, Va.
★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Manlius
Founded 1869. For boys. Accredited. Grades 7–12. Complete college preparation. ROTC. Highest U.S. Army rating for over 50 years. 126-acre campus. Remedial reading. Sports. Band. Summer session. Tutorial assistance. Catalog.
Robert A. Weekes, The Manlius School, Manlius, N.Y.

Judson School in Arizona
A ranch school for boys 6 to 18, in healthful, warm, dry climate. Small classes. Accredited to all colleges. Riding & polo included in tuition. Tennis, swimming, pack trips, fishing, rodeos, riflery, music. 29th yr. For Catalog, write
H. J. Wick, D. M. Ashley, Dirs., Scottsdale, Arizona

PEEKSKILL MILITARY ACADEMY
124th year. Successful College preparation. High Achievement records in College and Life. Non profit. Small classes. Personal interest in each boy. Athletic teams for all, intramural & varsity. Expert coaching. Rifle & Swim Teams. Swimming pool, Band, Glee club, Camera club, etc. Grades 6-12. Summer session. For illustrated catalog write:
Headmaster, Box 408, Peekskill-on-Hudson 4, N.Y.

Rumsey Hall
Junior School for Boys. 80 miles from N.Y.C. Grades 1 thru 8. Small classes. Boys learn to study. Country environment. Well coached team sports. Fishing, Skiing, Skating. Riflery. Mention age & grade. For booklet address:
Mr. David J. Barr, Headmaster, Washington 6, Conn.

Cheshire Academy Junior School. Grades 6 to 8. Thorough grounding in subjects anticipating college preparatory study on same campus. Emphasis on fundamentals. Flexible program for each boy develops good habits of concentration. Separate classes, dormitories, activities. Remedial instruction. Arthur J. Sheriff, Headmaster, Cheshire, Connecticut

Croydon Hall
For boys, Grades 3 through 12. Sound college preparation. Small classes. Strong remedial education program. Individual guidance and testing. Team sports. Riding, tennis, golf. Field trips. 45 acres. 40 miles from N.Y.C. Summer Session.
Dr. John J. Carr, Pres., Atlantic Highlands, New Jersey

VALLEY FORGE MILITARY ACADEMY
"At the Nation's Shrine" Prepare your boy to enter leading colleges and at the same time be trained for a commission in the Armed Services. Small classes, highest academic standards. Prep, School and Jr. College, fully accredited; ages 12-20. All sports. Arty., Cav., Infantry, Band. Senior Division ROTC. Catalog. Radnor Rd., Wayne, Pa.

New York Military Academy
Develops today's Youth for tomorrow's world by building mind, body, character, leadership. R.O.T.C. Graduates all colleges. Infantry, Cavalry, Artillery. Band scholarships. Grades 1–12. Catalog.
17 Academy Ave., Cornwall-on-Hudson, N. Y.

St. John's Military Academy Where boys become self-confident men. Accredited college preparation under the famous St. John's System. Grades 7–12. Inspired teaching. Small classes, individual attention. Reading Clinic. ROTC. Fireproof dorms. Sports. Summer Camp. Catalog.
Dir. of Admissions, Box 387, Delafield, Wisconsin

The Sewanee Military Academy
Division Univ. of the South. Fully accredited. Grades 8–12. Small classes. Individual attention. Boys Taught to Study. ROTC Highest Rating. All sports; gym, indoor pool. 10,000-acre mountain domain. Episcopal. 90th year. Catalog.
Col. Craig Alderman, Supt., Box L, Sewanee, Tennessee

Missouri Military Academy and Separate Junior School. 69th year. Grades 4–12. Fully accredited. Senior ROTC. Friendly and inspiring teachers. Small classes. Strong remedial reading and guidance program. All sports. Riding. Golf. 5 athletic fields. 226 acre campus. Catalog.
Col. C. R. Stribling, 187 Main Street, Mexico, Missouri

Fishburne Military School
Grades 9–12. Distinguished College Preparatory School. Fully accredited since 1897. Small classes. Friendly, home-like atmosphere. ROTC Highest Rating. Sports; gym, indoor pool. Constructive recreational, social programs. Catalog. Colonel E. P. Childs, Jr., Box E, Waynesboro, Virginia

Greenbrier Military School
145th yr. The School of Achievement. 7th & 8th grades & H.S. and P.G. Dept. ROTC. 2300 ft. elev. White Sulphur Springs' golf & swim pool. Modern gym & new Rifle range. Athletics. Band, Glee Club. Summer Camp. For Catalog write D. T. Moore, Box J-608, Lewisburg 6, W. Va.

Girls' School

Kemper Hall
Gives girls mental, spiritual, moral and physical training for gracious, successful living. College preparation; opportunities in Music, Dramatics and Fine Arts including Ceramics. Jr. School. 87th Yr. Under direction of Sisters of St. Mary (Episcopal). Write Box J, Kenosha, Wis.

Coeducational Schools

Cherry Lawn School
For academic distinction and personality development. Coed. Accredited. Grades 6–12. College preparatory. Small classes. Dramatics, music, art, riding.
Christina Staal, Ph. D., Dir., Box 27, Darien, Conn.

The Arnold School Trains boys and girls, 6–18, for self-reliant living. Work, study, play program. Stress on fundamentals. Thorough college preparation; also general, agricultural courses. Guidance. Family atmosphere. 165 acres. Operating farm. Sports, hobbies for all. 26th year. Write for catalog.
Nathan H. Arnold, E. Pembroke, Mass.

Special School

Trowbridge For unusual children. Vocational exploration. Psychologist. Brain injured accepted. Medical and psychiatric supervision. Home atmosphere and individual training. Summer Program. Reasonable rates. Pamphlet. John A. Moran, M.S.S.W., Dir., Box G, 2827 Forest Avenue, Kansas City 9, Missouri

Music School

Sherwood Music School Train for a successful music career. Two- and three-year certificate courses and four-year degree courses. Faculty of distinguished musicians. Member Nat. Assn. Schls. Mus. State accredited. Coed. Well-equipped building on lakefront. Dormitory for women. Founded 1895. Write for catalog. 1014 S. Michigan Ave., Chicago 5, Ill.

Dramatic Arts

American Academy of Dramatic Arts 73rd Year. Thorough preparation for the Theatre, Radio and Television. In Senior Year public performances on B'way. 2 yr. day courses approved for Korean Veterans. Part-time evening courses. Saturday teen-age groups. Rm. 195, 245 West 52nd St., N.Y. 19.

Goodman Memorial Theatre School of Drama Art Institute of Chicago. Acting, Directing, Radio, Television, Scene and Costume Design. B.F.A. & M.F.A. Degrees. Acting Company 260 shows annually. Write:
Registrar, Dept. L, Goodman Memorial Theatre, Chicago 3

Fine & Applied Arts

New York School of Interior Design
Four Months' Practical Training Course starts October 2nd. Faculty of leading N. Y. decorators. Period and modern styles, color schemes, all fundamentals. Send for Catalog 7R. Home Study Course for those who cannot come to N.Y. Starts at once. Catalog 7C. 29 East 72nd St., N. Y. 21

Ray-Vogue Schools
Fashion Merchandising with Modeling. Dress Design. Fashion Illustration. Interior Decoration, Commercial Art. Photography. Coed. Attractive residence for girls. Enter Sept. 4; Oct. 7. Write Registrar, Room 706. Specify course
Ray-Vogue Schools, 750 North Michigan Ave., Chicago 11

Art Institute of Pittsburgh
More jobs offered our graduates than we can fill. 18-month Diploma courses in Commercial Art; Fashion Art; Dress Design; Interior Design. Veteran approved. Co-ed. 35th Year. For King Size Factbook, write
Willis J. Shook, Director, 635 Smithfield St., Pittsburgh 22, Pa.

Medical Technology

Franklin School of Science & Arts
Nationally famous for excellence in training in Medical Technology—12 months; X-Ray Technology—6 months. Medical Secretary—12 months. Top paying positions waiting. Coed. Free Placements. Approved. Founded 1919. Send for Catalog A. 251 S. 22nd St., Phila. 3, Pa

College of Medical Technology
Medical & X-ray Technicians in demand, excellent pay. Free placement service. Intensive 9–12 mo. courses for medical offices, labs. State year H.S. grad. Two leading colleges. Catalog L. 1900 LaSalle Avenue, Minneapolis 4, Minn. 1004 Truxillo, Houston, Texas

Air Lines School

Grace Downs TRAINING BRINGS GOOD POSITIONS AND RAPID PROMOTIONS

Major airline executives rate Grace Downs School as the finest in the country. Here, young men and women learn during day and evening classes in a stratosphere cabin. Students simulate flying in the school's giant Link Trainer. Airline executives interview prospective employes right in school premises. In 1956, Grace Downs placed 99% of its graduates. FREE placement. State Licensed. Get book MC
GRACE DOWNS Air Career School
1055 Fifth Ave., New York 28, N. Y. EN 9-1460
Supervised Dormitories in School Building

"She's so lucky...has 3 phones!"

Pat: Really! Where?

Peg: In the kitchen, den and bedroom.
She says she couldn't do without them—they save her time and so many steps.

Pat: But what do they cost?

Peg: Just a little bit more each month than one phone alone—and they're color phones, too.

Pat: Wonderful! Think I'll do that.

Peg: Do what?

Pat: Call the telephone business office about convenient phones for our home.

Working together to bring people together
BELL TELEPHONE SYSTEM

you were there. Because I love you. I've been good ever since I met you.'"

Suddenly she was out of the bed, her bare feet tearing into the thick rug. Suddenly she threw her young body next to mine and her face against mine and through the quickness of it, the amazement, I heard the muffled cry.

"I love him," she cried. "I love him and he loves me. Don't let them hurt it. Don't let them touch it. They'll listen to you. I love him."

My arms were tight and instinctive around her. In the light of what I had been that Saturday morning and the days and years and aeons that had gone before, it was a silly, mawkish, sentimental, embarrassing scene in the dark.

It didn't go on for very long, because I wouldn't allow it, nor would Bets. She dried her eyes, and I said:

"It will work out, Bets. All things work out one way or the other."

It was all I could say. All I knew to say.

The next day we went to the cathedral and I could almost feel Bets praying beside me. We went to the concert, and I could almost see her lift on the music.

We drove home slowly. We stopped for dinner, and neither of us ate much. When I let her off at her house it was full dark.

"Tell your mother I'll call her tomorrow," I said. I didn't look at her. I turned on the ignition.

"Aunt Frieda?" she asked hesitantly.

I looked at her then. "Bets," I said quietly, "I love you."

The winding drive up to the house seemed very long and lonely. The front door seemed big and cumbersome. The rooms stretched infinitely, empty even of servants. I paced through all of them.

I took my time. I looked at everything I owned and everything that Jed, generous Jed, had given me. Even my bank account, and the jewel case in the wall safe, which I opened for only special occasions.

I covered the ground floor and walked slowly, too heavily for my age, up the wide curving staircase. I examined the room where I had come as a bride. I touched all the mementos I left in the boys' rooms. I hesitated only a moment before I opened the door to the third story.

Those steps I climbed even more slowly. At the top of them I had to stand a moment to catch my breath and steady it. Then I walked directly, as if it were a path I had made by daily excursions, through a labyrinth of trunks and boxes to a small chest under the far window.

I pried open the lock with a nail I found on the floor. I opened the chest and reached past the fluffiness of my wedding dress, the stiffness of my wedding petticoats, the softness of the boys' first sweaters and bootees, to a small box on the bottom in the farthest corner.

It felt warm and familiar in my hands. I set it down and shut the chest, and walked with the box in my palms to the attic room.

I sat down on the bed and pulled the cord on the lamp above its head. The box turned to color suddenly. Splattered green, with little nubbins of white on it and an oval picture of Dutch girls in wooden shoes, framed in the center. The cardboard was frail to my touch. It seemed strange that the box felt like a relic, was yellowed like one, while I could still almost taste the tiny chocolates it had once contained.

I lifted the cover. Inside there were three letters and a note.

I didn't need to spread them out on the bed to know that. But I did spread them, neatly, in chronological order. Then I reached in again for the slim gold ring with the stand-u tiny opal. The thin little gold chain with th heart locket. And the small chipped vase.

The bed lamp circled them all, put them i an aura. Like the actors on the stage of th play. Like Mark Novack, with a kitchen cha and an overhead dangling bulb and a ra gedy girl.

Like the heart—the pure center—of m life.

I read the letters. The asking one. The wor dering one. The angry one. I read the not

I watched you be married today. I watched i It didn't kill me. But I wish it had. Howeve let's observe etiquette, as your mother alway says. Here is a wedding gift. A vase for one ros with all my good wishes. And Frieda—an darling ——

I threw myself on those lost treasures a Bets had thrown herself on my bed the nigh before. What happened to me started fro that circle, that core, and it ripped and to and sobbed. It went on for a very long tim

When stillness came at last, I put all th things in the box again Not even looking i the locket, sure tha the likeness, so sma there, would be ye lowed too. I did neatly.

I put the box into th small Franklin sto in the corner an started the fire. didn't look toward t blaze at all.

I went back and l down on the be turned out the lig and let the stillne crawl all through m Then I fell asleep.

The next mornin I awoke freshened an quite happy. I bathe downstairs in my ow room, and dresse carefully. Then picked up the phon and called my broth er's wife.

"Oh, Frieda," Sa called at once, "I've been so upset. I calle you after Bets went to bed last night and no body answered ——"

"I was . . . away," I said.

"Oh. Well—I have to know. Tell me—d she talk to you? Did you persuade her? Ol Frieda, we're so anxious ——"

I said, "Sara, I want you to know—you an Mike both—that I will do everything in m power—anything and everything ——"

"Bless you," she cried. "I knew you woul You've always helped us ——"

"To see that Bets and Mark Novack a married."

The gasp was very weak on the other en of the line.

"Married," I repeated, in my most reg most autocratic, most wealthy-relative ma ner. "Soon. Before anything touches the Before anything is spoiled." I hung up an walked away.

I walked away and away for hours. Th lightness was in me. It didn't leave, as I w afraid it might. It didn't leave, I understoo at last, because Bets is me.

And when Bets marries Mark, when th stand there together, and pledge themselve and then turn and walk up the aisle toward all, it will be happening to me.

At last, at last, I will in some strang undefined way be marrying the boy whom loved.

With that accomplished, I can walk safe and surely through the spacious rooms of m own home, the known paths of my own lif Perhaps I can even do more than that. Pe haps I can see—with eyes no longer impe turbable, with aloofness gone from me, an that which was hidden and my very own n longer inside me—that there is in my boy and in Jed, something I have never tried discover.

At the moment it seems well worth th trying. EN

HOW TO LEARN

Once upon a time a young man went to Socrates and asked him, "How can I gain knowledge?"

Socrates said, "Follow me."

The youth followed him to a body of water where Socrates waded in up to his waist. He turned, grasped the lad by arm and head and thrust his head under the water. When the youth was gasping desperately for air, Socrates dragged him to the shore.

"My boy," said he, "when your head was under water, what did you most desire?"

The youth replied, "Air."

Socrates said, "Go your way. When you want knowledge as much as you wanted air when you were under the water, you will get it."

Printed in U.S.

OME
BER
35c

JOURNAL

THE MAGAZINE
WOMEN BELIEVE IN

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY

CHANEL

LANVIN

IVENCHY

RBAS of PATOU

SVEND

CHRISTIAN DIOR

PARIS FASHIONS

DIOR
CHANEL
GIVENCHY
SVEND
CASTILLO-LANVIN
PATOU

Ten pages of Paris accessories . . .
exclusive designs for Ladies' Home Journal . . .
and American fall fashions

IERICA'S 10 RICHEST WOMEN—WHO ARE THEY?

CONDENSED NOVEL THE UNFORGETTABLE MISS JONES BY DOROTHY BLACK

Ladies' Home Journal

CONTENTS

VOL. LXXIV NO. 9 SEPTEMBER, 1957

JOURNALITIES

LEONARD

Norah Lofts

"Writers usually die in garrets," NORAH LOFTS' mother told her when she was twelve and had just had her first story published. Fortunately, the warning did not deter her and she has since written a great many short stories and novels—possibly setting some sort of record with twenty-one books in nineteen years. Scent of Cloves, the four-part serial beginning on page 54, is her latest. The author counts among her blessings "the inestimable advantage of a country upbringing in Norfolk, England, and the tutelage of a father who was a great reader, a wit and raconteur." As a child, she occasionally produced her own magazine—manuscripts of her stories carefully stitched into cardboard covers, which she presented to her family. And she does not live in a garret. She lives in Bury St. Edmunds, England, in a house built on the wall of an ancient Benedictine library.

Laura Date Riley

In the midst of ferreting America's Ten Richest Women (page 60), LAURA DATE was overcome with a desire to change her name. She is now Laura Date Riley, which leads friends to pun that she is "dateless" and living the life of. "Maybe it was all that talk of yachts, homes, jewels that made me want my own hunting lodge, with bluebirds and whippoorwills outside my window, by a lake in North Carolina—or maybe it was just a guy named Bill." She was graduated from the School of Journalism at the University of Missouri, free-lanced and worked as a reporter and bureau manager for the United Press in Herrin, Illinois, and Ft. Wayne, Indiana, before joining the JOURNAL—"a part of my life for as long as I can remember, since I used to cut paper dolls from its fashion pages." Now the eleventh "richest" woman in America, she has a talented black cat that will sit up, shake hands and roll over on command, and a new husband who won't.

Sally Edwards

Only a few years ago SALLY EDWARDS, now twenty-seven, climbed down from the chinaberry tree in the back yard of her grandfather's house, where she says she spent her childhood, and began to write "in earnest" in the guesthouse of her parents' home in Spartanburg, South Carolina. While nesting in that chinaberry tree she did a lot of thinking she thinks may have shaped her life. "Later," she writes, "I investigated the local schools and college, then strayed to New York for a weekend and stayed five years. I wrote advertising copy and had a fine time, but my sense of loyalty to the Confederacy made my return to the South inevitable. I never wanted to do anything else but write—even though I hate to sit still while doing it. But when someone like 'Princess' turns up, I don't mind." You'll meet the Princess in The Educated Heart, page 58.

Condensed Novel Complete in This Issue

THE UNFORGETTABLE MISS JONES, Dorothy Black . 56

Stories

SCENT OF CLOVES (First part of four), Norah Lofts . 54
THE EDUCATED HEART, Sally Edwards . 58
SHE LOVES ME—SHE LOVES ME NOT, Jane and Glen Sire . 80

Special Features

FOR THE FIRST TIME IN MAN'S HISTORY, Dorothy Thompson . 11
WHY I'M REWRITING MY BABY BOOK, Benjamin Spock, M.D. . 22
CHILDREN CROWD THIS SUNDAY SCHOOL . 43
MORE THAN "BABY-SITTING," Margaret Hickey . 43
AMERICA'S TEN RICHEST WOMEN—WHO ARE THEY?, Laura Date Riley . 60
FOLK ART IN AMERICA . 74
WHAT MAKES YOUR HEAD ACHE?, Dr. Stewart Wolf and Dr. Harold G. Wolff . 82
CAN THIS MARRIAGE BE SAVED?, Dorothy Cameron Disney . 83
FIRST WEEK, FIRST GRADE, Margaret Parton . 122
HOW AMERICA LIVES: SECOND MARRIAGE, Neal G. Stuart . 157

General Features

OUR READERS WRITE US . 4
DIARY OF DOMESTICITY, Gladys Taber . 34
UNDER COVER, Bernardine Kielty . 40
THERE'S A MAN IN THE HOUSE, Harlan Miller . 46
MAKING MARRIAGE WORK, Clifford R. Adams, Ph.D. . 51
FIFTY YEARS AGO ▪ JOURNAL ABOUT TOWN . 53
ASK ANY WOMAN, Marcelene Cox . 97
REFERENCE LIBRARY . 139
THIS IS A CAN'T-COUNT-ON, Munro Leaf . 178

Fashion and Beauty

MAGIC FORMULAS FROM PARIS, Wilhela Cushman . 62
THE JOURNAL'S FALL FASHION REPORT TO YOU, Wilhela Cushman . 66
THE JOURNAL'S ENDURING GEM OF A WARDROBE, Nora O'Leary . 70
"I'VE GAINED BACK 110 POUNDS!", Dawn Crowell Norman . 72
WHY DIETS FAIL . . . AND WHAT TO DO ABOUT IT! . 73
HOW TO DRESS WELL ON PRACTICALLY NOTHING, Bet Hart . 126

Food and Homemaking

WONDERFUL CHEESE DISHES . 84
COLLECTOR'S ITEMS: IN THE RAW . 86
1900 HOUSE—1957 KITCHEN, Margaret Davidson . 110
CONVERSATION PIECE, Ruth Mills Teague . 116
MRS. WIZARD, THAT'S YOU, Liane Waite . 172

Architecture, Gardening and Interior Decoration

A BIG FAMILY ROOM IN A BIG-FAMILY HOUSE, Cynthia McAdoo Wheatland . 78
WHAT DOES THE GARDENER DO IN FALL?, The Gardener's Assistant . 168
TOMORROW HOUSE WITH A YESTERDAY LOOK, Carol L. Crane . 184

Poems

Berenice Thorpe 95 ▪ Elizabeth Barkins 109 ▪ Elizabeth McFarland 124
Alice Boyd Stockdale 147 ▪ Elizabeth Coatsworth 154 ▪ Philip Booth 165
Thelma Ireland 182

Cover Design by Wilhela Cushman
Photograph by Meerson

CHANGE OF ADDRESS

At least 30 days before a change is to take effect please send your complete name, new address and a mailing label from a recent issue. If this is not possible, write us your old address and send it with the new one, including zone number. Address the Ladies' Home Journal, Independence Square, Philadelphia 5, Pa. The post office will not forward copies unless you provide necessary postage. Duplicate copies cannot be sent.

Ladies' Home Journal, © 1957 The Curtis Publishing Company in U.S. and Great Britain. All rights reserved. Title registered in U.S. Patent Office and foreign countries. Published on last Friday of month preceding date by The Curtis Publishing Company, Independence Square, Philadelphia 5, Pa. Entered as Second-Class Matter at the Post Office at Philadelphia, Pa. Entered as Second-Class Matter at the Post Office Department, Ottawa, Canada, by Curtis Distributing Company, Ltd., Toronto, Ont., Canada.

The names of characters in all stories are fictitious. Any resemblance to living persons is a coincidence.

Subscription Prices: U.S., U.S. Possessions and Canada—1 Yr., $3.50; 2 Yrs., $6; 3 Yrs., $8.50; 4 Yrs., $11. Costa Rica, Cuba, Dominican Republic, Guatemala, Haiti, Mexico, Nicaragua, Panama, Republic of Honduras, Salvador, Spain and South America (except the Guianas)—1 Yr., $4. All other countries—1 Yr., $7. Remit by Money Order or Draft on a bank in the U.S. payable in U.S. Funds. All prices subject to change without notice.

Unconditional Guaranty. We agree upon request direct from subscribers to the Philadelphia office, to refund the full amount paid for any copies of Curtis publications not previously mailed.

The Curtis Publishing Company. Robert E. MacNeal, President; Mary Curtis Zimbalist, Sr. Vice Pres.; Cary W. Bok, Sr. Vice Pres.; Benjamin Allen, Sr. Vice Pres. and Director of Circulation; Donald M. Hobart, Sr. Vice Pres. and Director of Research; Edward C. Von Tress, Sr. Vice Pres. and Director of Advertising; Brandon Barringer, Treasurer; Robert Gibbon, Secretary; Richard Ziesing, Jr., Vice Pres. and Advertising Director of Ladies' Home Journal. The Company also publishes The Saturday Evening Post, Jack and Jill, and Holiday.

"Best drying story you ever heard"

DRY FASTER
Indoors or out

WASH EASIER
Stains disappear like magic

MORE ABSORBENT
Thirsty surgical weave works wonders

LONGER WEAR
Last entire diaper period—and more

Curity diapers are softer and smoother, even after countless launderings, when washed in quality cleansers like Ivory Snow or Ivory Flakes. Buy Curity—whites, pastels, gay prints and double-duty night diapers for sleep or travel—at infants shops and departments, everywhere.

Also Curity
DISPOSABLE DIAPERS
•
NIGHT DIAPERS
•
DIAPER LINERS
•
Mail the Coupon

THE KENDALL COMPANY
Kendall Mills Division, Walpole, Mass., Dept. J897

Enclosed is 25c (coins only) for full-size Curity Diaper and literature on Curity Nursery Products. (Only one diaper to a family.) Print clearly.

Name _____

Address _____

City _____ State _____

Good in Continental United States and Hawaii.

Add your favorite fruit!*

Light as a bubble!

It's fluffy-light

...so easy to digest—never, never heavy. No other pudding is so delightfully different.

It's nourishing

...with fresh eggs 'n milk, but not loaded with calories. Kids love it!

It's so versatile

...especially good with fresh fruits—featured at your grocer's now. New, quick recipe on box!

A fine product of General Foods

TODAY'S QUICK-AND-EASY

MINUTE TAPIOCA CREAM

OUR READERS WRITE US

Family Friend

HAMILTON WILLIAMS

Who will wind up with the ice-cream cone? (The corner store is the safest place to eat goodies.)

Bambi also enjoys a visitor's bread and jam. And she doesn't need an invitation to help herself!

A "salad" of fuchsias and morning-glories is a lovely luncheon and distracts Bambi from pudding.

Bambi is always on hand for a bedtime story—and especially if it concerns her famous ancestor.

All tuckered out, the little fawn dozes off on "her" hooked rug, carefully rumpled into shape.

Should Women be Drafted?

Los Angeles, California

The "miracle" that Dean Gildersleeve hopes for, that will "produce a supply of visiting angels," might be expected when housekeepers, cooks, laundresses and the rest are treated with dignity—and are not charged with responsibilities and sacrifices that rightfully belong to members of the family they serve. The basic cause of domestic and nursing shortage is, it seems to me, in the uncharitable hearts and undisciplined minds of those who cry "Help!"

HELEN W. WAITE

Brooklyn, New York

Drafting for civilian jobs is wasteful as well as cruel. Women who must drop their own jobs, postpone their own childbearing won't make good nurses or teachers—because these jobs need kindness, patience, enthusiasm, qualities not found under compulsion. I am not competent to say where the complete answer can be found, but surely part of it will come with more housing projects for the aged, more voluntary projects like the Friends', better pay and living conditions for workers abroad and for teachers and nurses here. These things cost money, but so do the examining, training, housing and feeding of draftees. When the time comes that we can handle our welfare needs in no other way, then America will be morally poor indeed—and I, for one, am not pessimistic enough about American skill and humanity to believe that time is here.

MRS. MYRRIL LEVY

CONTINUED ON PAGE 6

Speedier shine—more free time—with

New BRILLO soap pads

Polish off pots and pans fast—have time for things you really enjoy

There's special soap with Jeweler's Polish in every pad!

Pans get twice the shine in half the time—because only New Brillo Soap Pads contain special soap with jeweler's polish! New, stronger, tighter-knit Brillo cleans faster. Whisks away scorch, grease and stains like lightning! Nothing shines aluminum like New Brillo Soap Pads. Only Brillo guarantees results! You get a new utensil free if New Brillo Soap Pads fail to clean!

Brillo Soap Pads (red box)
Soap-filled metal fiber pads
Brillo Cleanser (green box)
Metal fiber pads plus cake of soap

P.S. to husbands—
Brillo speeds up your clean-ups, too!

THRIFTIER! 5 and 12 pad boxes!
BRILLO "Big 12" box gives you 2 extra pads!

Brillo Mfg. Co., Inc., Brooklyn, N. Y.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 4

New Lexington, Ohio

Dean Gildersleeve, your article is one of the finest I have read in a long time, but you are not naïve enough to think your wonderful dream will ever come true, are you? Women have the vote now. They are sophisticated and glamorous; they are emancipated and progressive. Some of them felt sorry for each other when they couldn't vote, but evidently they don't feel sorry for each other any more. Surely you don't expect them to return to the ways of the poor benighted pioneers who helped each other out in all kinds of emergencies! Emerson said that whenever we gain we lose something; and when we gained the vote and the right to compete with men in all fields of endeavor, we lost our sense of usefulness to each other.

MRS. N. A. DAVIS

I Married at Forty

Dear Editors: What really scared me was the approach of my thirtieth birthday. As any girl in the same boat knows, there are few eligible males around. The choice has simmered down to: the bachelor who was scared to take on responsibilities when he was younger, and is even more scared now; the divorced man who, chances are, made a mess of his first marriage and would do no better with another; the widower with young children who wants a housekeeper more than a wife; and the older man with money. (At 30 or 35, you would never fill his requirements.)

So—how to get a man! Magazines and newspapers—columns and columns of advice—how to dress attractively, how to become an interesting talker (or listener), how to be a femme fatale! I read all and followed some of the advice. One could not help improving after such concerted effort on the part of so many experts! I grew—I matured. But my deepest longing was unsatisfied—to belong somewhere, to someone, to be married.

In New York you see droves of lonely, unattached women everywhere, at resorts, at dances, on the golf course, on cruises; and they all have that yearning, searching look. It's a dog-eat-dog affair, and I was beginning to feel that my chances of marrying were nonexistent. There were so many smarter, prettier, better-dressed, wealthier women.

Worst of all, my married friends were getting worried about having an unattached female around. One night one friend said, "You know we love you dearly, and you're always welcome here, but you should try to meet new people."

"Where can I go?" I asked. "To dance halls?"

"Is that worse," she wanted to know, "than going on year after year alone?"

I thought this over for several days, and then gritted my teeth and went to a "dance," hoping with all my heart that no one would pay any attention to me. And not a soul bothered me. But now I became dogged in my determination to do something practical. I began to attend lectures that ended with a social. I joined organizations and went to meetings regularly—sometimes with another girl but more often alone.

Much to my surprise, it was not difficult to meet people. I soon learned to recognize the opportunists and anglers (like the one who told me, as soon as we started to dance, that he was looking for a girl who would take him home with her). I had fun. I met nice men, some of whom I dated pretty regularly. The important thing was not to spend lonely weekends at home, to keep moving. Within two years I had five proposals—none acceptable. I found it true that any woman who is anxious to marry can find a man—but what kind of man?

Then I met Sam. He was "anxious to settle down"; he had money; and it was obvious I had made a great hit with him. He proposed marriage on our third date. But he had no attraction for me whatever. I told myself that I was probably being a fool; and even my sister tried to talk me into marrying him, assuring me that I would learn to like him—that "love" was not necessary at my age. This, she felt sure, was probably my last chance. But I gave Sam up.

Six months afterward, when I was feeling tired and ill, I allowed a friend to drag me to a dance. And it was just like "South Pacific"; across that crowded room I saw him—I couldn't help it because he was staring at me! He came over and introduced himself and in two months we were married. One little sentence sums him up. When my sister met him, she said to me, "It's just like a miracle—out of [illegible] million people, how did she ever meet someone like you?"

We have been married three years, and not once have I felt that there was anything silly or ridiculous about our love, even though it came so late in life for me. The man I married was a widower who had a very happy first marriage. Because of this, some warned me that I would never stop hearing the praises of his first wife; but this has not been true. I do my utmost to make him happy, and I don't try to compete for his love.

Our marriage has warmth, understanding and compassion. If I were young I would probably take my happiness for granted. But because I came so close to missing it, I am deeply grateful to God who gave me the strength to wait. There are many women who didn't, who got panicky and grabbed—just for the sake of being married—as I nearly did. It is to the still unmarried girls that I want to tell this story, to say to them, "Love is worth waiting for."

Name Withheld

SECOND NOTE TO OUR READERS

The response to our request for "Why I Love My Husband" and "Why I Love My Wife" letters has been so great that our mail bags were still full when this issue went to press. We are reading these wonderfully warm and often humorous letters as fast as we can, and will have a final report for you soon. ED.

Be a Foster Parent

New York

Dear Editors: This is Foster Parents Plan's twentieth year of giving food, clothing and love to needy youngsters overseas.

Among the 600,000 Americans who have financially "adopted" children are two men in a Michigan prison, six-year-olds in a California grade school, an 85-year-old Chicago grandfather, underprivileged children in a N.Y. City Welfare Center sheltered, fraternity men at an Ivy League college, the crew of a Navy destroyer, a major general, an Iowa bachelor and the mother of seven in Pennsylvania. All these Foster Parents have sent "their children" to France, Greece, Italy, Belgium, Spain, Korea, West Germany and now Viet Nam. For $15 each month, corresponded with them and exchanged photographs and gifts. The help is personal: a Midwestern advertising man gave his Foster Child a flock of sheep so he could become self-supporting; a California couple bought prosthetic limbs for their Foster Child who was crippled during the war.

We wish to salute all those who have not only rehabilitated thousands of children but also spread American goodwill to the far corners of the globe. We hope that during 1957 others will open their hearts to a needy child and become Foster Parents.

Sincerely,
LENORE SOR[illegible]
Associate Director
Foster Parents' Plan, I[nc.]

It Burns Me Up!

Lodi, Californ[ia]

Hardly a week goes by that I don't read something about locking medicines away out of the reach of small children. But medicine cabinets just are not made with locks, or even made so that a lock can be attached. The best mothers can do is to put the most dangerous things on the top shelf—and there's certainly a limit to what it will hold.

Why don't manufacturers of bathroom equipment make a medicine cabinet with an inner door that can lock over one section of the shelves? The rest could be left free for nondangerous items.

Hopefully yours,
MRS. CARL S. UNDERWOOD,

take a tip from nature . . .

GET A FRESH CONTAINER FOR YOUR MILK, TOO!

Just as the egg's natural goodness is sealed in by its protective shell, fresh milk is protected from vitamin and flavor destroying sunlight by the Pure-Pak carton. This carton is sterilized just seconds before being filled. Best of all, these convenient cartons are used only once, only for dairy products, only by you. Ask your milkman for this modern milk service today!

See the wonderful "NEW STORY OF MILK", a new full-color 16 mm sound motion picture narrated by Bob Considine, famous reporter, radio and TV star. Call your dairy to arrange a showing for your church, school or civic group; or write directly to Pure-Pak.

The modern Pure-Pak milk packaging method is a product of the Pure-Pak Div., Ex-Cell-O Corporation, Detroit, Michigan

20 MILLION TIMES A DAY, SOMEONE BREAKS THE SEAL OF A FRESH PURE-PAK CARTON

It sprinkles as you iron!

New General Electric SPRAY, Steam and Dry Iron

Now—for the first time—an iron that does your sprinkling for you—as you iron!

Just press a button on the handle and the new General Electric Spray, Steam & Dry Iron sprays the fabric . . . with just the right amount of pleasantly warm water for perfect ironing.

Saves pre-dampening heavy cottons, linens and starched fabrics that no ordinary iron can ever properly moisten. You pre-dampen only your very largest pieces—such as tablecloths.

It's actually three irons in one: a spray, steam and a dry iron. Changes instantly from one to another. Turns out the loveliest, satin-smooth ironing you've ever seen.

And it's all so simple . . . so easy to use! See it now at your General Electric dealer's.

NEW SPRAY, STEAM & DRY IRON

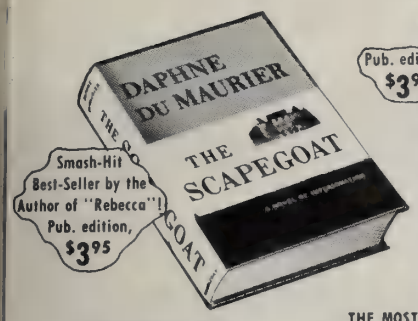
$19.95* Manufacturer's recommended retail or Fair Trade price.*

Sprinkles as you iron. Saves pre-dampening heavy cottons, linens, starched fabrics. Erases stubborn wrinkles. Makes knife-like creases!

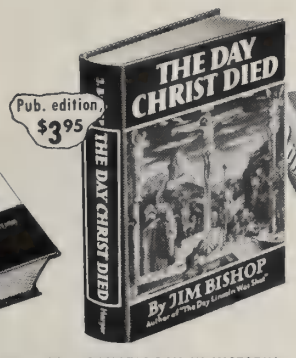
Just press the button. Sprays exactly the right amount of pleasantly warm water for perfect ironing. Not too much . . . not too little.

Steam or dry iron. Changes instantly from "steam" to "dry." Visualizer Fabric-Dial selects the right temperature for every fabric.



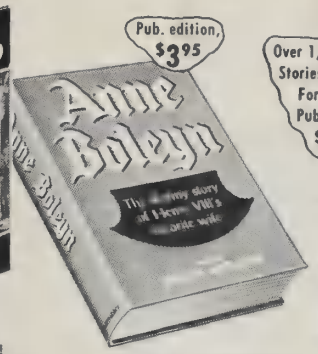
So light . . . so easy to use. Cord-Lift for right- or left-hand ironing. Extra-large soleplate covers more fabric in less strokes.

General Electric Company, Portable Appliance Department, Bridgeport 2, Connecticut.



Progress Is Our Most Important Product

GENERAL ELECTRIC

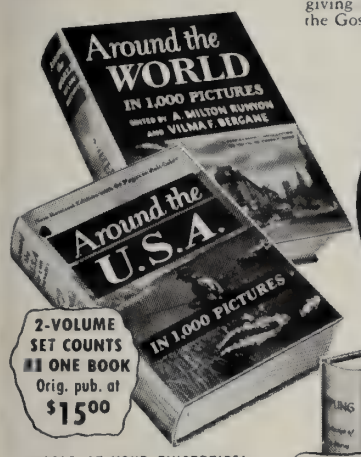


The Literary Guild's Amazing 30th Anniversary Offer!

HE EXCHANGED LIVES WITH A TOTAL STRANGER!
He woke up to find himself living another man's life—with a strange wife and mistress! Exciting new smash-hit best seller!

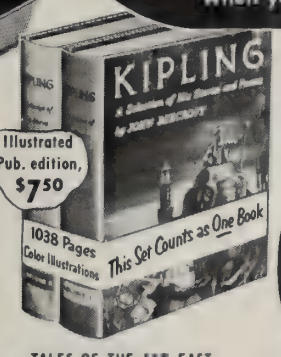
THE MOST DRAMATIC DAY IN HISTORY!
The powerful and inspiring drama of the most important hours in the history of the world—Christ's last day on earth! With astonishing realism and with deep reverence, the author describes in detail every incident that happened during those fateful hours, giving us new insight and understanding of the Gospels of Christ!

SHE MARRIED HENRY VIII
A brilliantly vivid novel about Henry's second wife — the real story of her love for him and for her daughter Elizabeth—and the moving courage with which she faced her final tragedy!

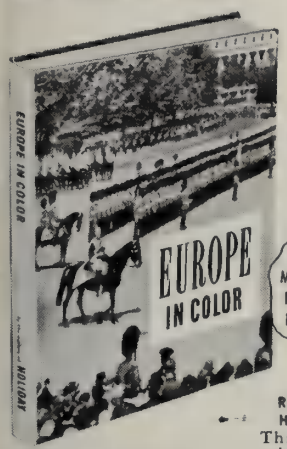


COMPLETE CHILDREN'S LIBRARY
A big, comprehensive collection of the world's finest stories and poems for children of all ages—from Mother Goose to latest classics! 250 pictures. 1024 pages.

THE BIBLE IN PICTURES
75 beloved, inspiring stories from the Old and New Testaments presented with great beauty and reverence. 80 big drawings, 8 color paintings, 193 photos.

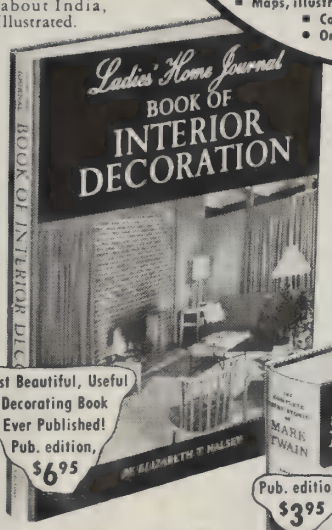


WORLD'S FINEST HOME DICTIONARY!
1957 De Luxe Edition. The only all-new quality comprehensive desk dictionary with handsome life-time binding, with many new words not found in other dictionaries. 2 volumes.



WORLD AT YOUR FINGERTIPS!
Trips to all 48 states (in a new, revised edition) and 10 thrilling "tours" around the world—all in 2,000 superb photographs, many in glorious full color!

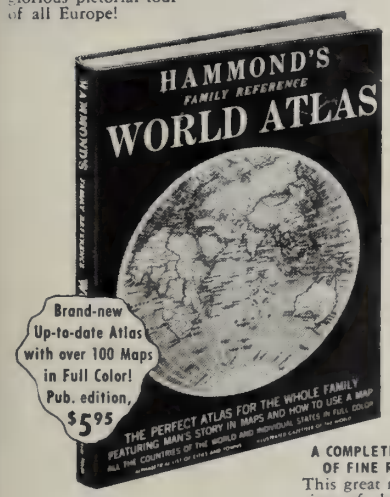
Any 3 OF THESE FINE BOOKS yours for only $2.00



when you join the Literary Guild and agree to take as few as 4 selections during the coming twelve months

TALES OF THE FAR EAST
This great writer's finest stories, including Kim, the immortal Jungle Book, and the famous tales and poems about India, land of mystery! Illustrated.

FROM GLAMOROUS PARIS TO THE GOLDEN HORN!
Nearly 200 magnificent full-color photographs take you on a glorious pictorial tour of all Europe!



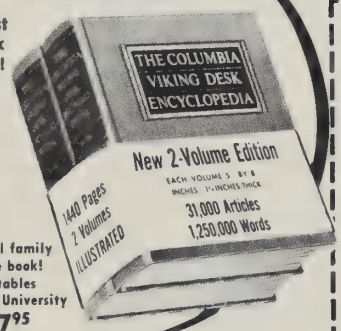
REDECORATE YOUR HOME FOR PENNIES
This big, beautiful volume will help you solve every decorating problem — from floor plans and color to table decorations! 237 pages, over 400 illustrations.

A TREASUREHOUSE OF HUMOR
Now — for the first time, here are all sixty of this famous humorist's delightful and beloved short stories collected for your pleasure in one beautiful volume!

DELICIOUS MEALS IN MINUTES!
A marvelously new and easy approach to cooking! More than 2,000 superb recipes, plus help in planning your meals and shopping for food. Hundreds of wonderful food pictures.

STORY OF MAN IN MAPS
The best, most complete new home Atlas, with full-color maps of every state and country, unique "Story of Man in Maps", latest census figures and gazetteer.

A COMPLETE LIBRARY OF FINE READING!
This great new collection of the world's greatest reading entertainment contains 6 complete novels, 5 parts of novels, and 28 great short stories! 2 volumes; 60 illustrations; 832 pages.



NEVER MAKE A SOCIAL ERROR
America's foremost authority now shows you how to be socially correct always — engagements, weddings, visiting and entertaining, correspondence, etc. 704 pages.

Plus "COLUMBIA-VIKING DESK ENCYCLOPEDIA"

FREE as your first Bonus Book in advance!

Guild members regularly receive a Bonus Book for each 4 selections they accept, but under this offer, you will receive this Encyclopedia as your first Bonus in advance — together with the other three books you select from this page.

- 2 handsome volumes
- Over 1,000 pages
- 31,000 articles
- Maps, illustrations
- The ideal family reference book!
- Charts, tables
- Compiled at Columbia University
- Orig. 1-vol. edition, $7.95

Yes, you actually receive four fine books — at once — for only $2.00 — during this amazing 30th Anniversary Offer! Read at right the advantages of membership in the Literary Guild — then choose the 3 books you want. SEND NO MONEY! Pay later — after your 7-day free trial examination! Mail the coupon NOW.

VALUE $19.80 to $44.95 IN PUBLISHERS' EDITIONS

THE LITERARY GUILD OF AMERICA, INC., Publishers
Dept. 9LHJ, Garden City, N. Y. IP-CV

I accept your offer and I understand that

YOU AGREE

1 . . . to send me at once the THREE books I have checked at the right.

2 . . . to allow me to examine these books 7 days free, after which I may return them if not satisfied; otherwise, you will bill me only $2.00 plus shipping charge for all three.

3 . . . to send me FREE each month your magazine "Wings".

4 . . . to offer me as many as 60 outstanding books during the coming year from which I may choose my selections.

5 . . . to bill me only $2.00 plus shipping (occasional extra-value books slightly higher) for each book I accept, regardless of the publishers' prices of $3.50, $3.75 or even $4.00. I will receive them as soon as they are published, and will pay for them only after receiving them.

6 . . . to send me a valuable Bonus Book FREE with every 4th selection I accept.

7 . . . to send me now — as my first Bonus in advance — the 2-volume "Columbia-Viking Desk Encyclopedia" — absolutely FREE.

In return,

I AGREE

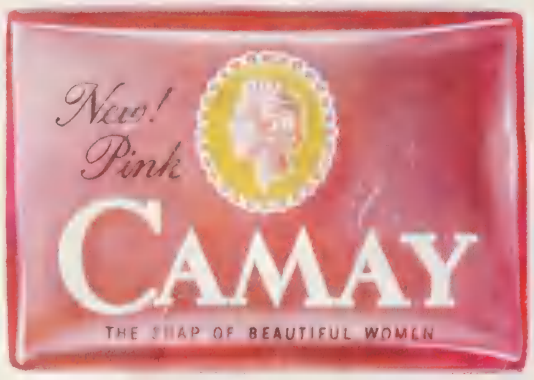
1 . . . to advise you in advance on the form provided when I do not wish to receive a selection.

2 . . . to accept at least 4 Guild selections or alternates at $2.00 each, plus shipping, during the coming 12 months, after which I may cancel my membership at any time.

CHECK THE 3 BOOKS YOU WANT AND MAIL THIS COUPON

- ☐ Amy Vanderbilt's Etiquette (4)
- ☐ Anne Boleyn (215)
- ☐ Around World & Around U.S.A. in Pictures—Set (8)
- ☐ The Bible in Story and Pictures—Set (18)
- ☐ The Complete Short Stories of Mark Twain (28)
- ☐ The Day Christ Died (213)
- ☐ Encyclopedia of Cooking—Set (3)
- ☐ Europe in Color (10)
- ☐ The Family Treasury of Children's Stories—Set (51)
- ☐ Hammond's Family World Atlas (5)
- ☐ Kipling—Set (33)
- ☐ Ladies' Home Journal Decoration (7)
- ☐ The Scapegoat (205)
- ☐ Stories to Remember—Set (80)
- ☐ Thorndike-Barnhart Dictionary—Set (9)

Mr.
Mrs.
Miss (Please Print)
Street and No.
City
Zone..... State.....



TO RESIDENTS OF CANADA: Selection Price, $2.20 plus shipping. Address LITERARY GUILD (CANADA), 105 Bond St., Toronto 2, Ontario. Offer good in U. S. A. and Canada.

THIS OFFER GOOD ONLY DURING THE LITERARY GUILD'S 30th ANNIVERSARY

New and lavish

PINK CAMAY

Probably the most lavish soap
that ever pampered your skin
(yet costs no more than ordinary soaps)

Kept fresh and fragrant in Pink Pearl foil

© The Procter & Gamble Co.

LADIES' HOME JOURNAL
BRUCE GOULD
BEATRICE BLACKMAR GOULD
EDITORS

FOR THE FIRST TIME IN MAN'S HISTORY

By DOROTHY THOMPSON

Some weeks ago an editor of the Christian Science Monitor spent a day cruising on the USS Seawolf, the American Navy's second atom-powered submarine. The editor, Mr. Erwin Canham, got in on this first visit of civilians as a member of the board of directors of the National Chamber of Commerce, and chairman of its Committee on Commercial Uses of Atomic Energy. Most of the members of the party were officials of companies that have big stakes in atomic development, so it was really a demonstration of how atomic energy works as a source of fuel power.

I found Mr. Canham's description of the Seawolf fascinating indeed. The heart of the ship is, of course, the reactor room where, in a small space, enough power was being produced via an atomic firebox and adjacent fluid circulators to meet the domestic needs of a city of 32,000 people, the fuel being a little core of enriched uranium.

Heavy shielding protects the crew (and in this case passengers) from the deadly atomic radiation. The craft was quiet, "the smoothest you could expect to sail in," moving "without a tremor or vibration."

And, throughout, it is a luxury vessel. Quarters are spacious, food excellent, and in the mess hall TV, an electronic organ and a jukebox entertain the crew. It is air-conditioned, the living and working spaces have been designed by ingenious interior architects and painted in decorator colors. If one can conceive of preferring to travel under the sea instead of atop it under the sky, it might, by the description, be recommended for pleasure cruises.

In this extraordinary alliance between war and comfort there is a new and entirely modern incongruity. Never before has war been so deadly, and never has it promised to encompass so many nonbelligerents as in the age that opened with the dropping of the first A-bombs on two Japanese cities and the end of the last war. Even before the perfection of the A-bomb, "conventional" bombs of nonfissionable material reduced beautiful cities to wastelands and buried old and young alike in the rubble, leading Winston Churchill to remark dryly on the advent of the atomic bomb, "The existing means of destruction are sufficient for my taste."

The Seawolf and its only companion as yet are weapons of war, solely and exclusively. If or when the time should come, the ship will release the most destructive torpedoes ever known, also carrying atomic heads, to sink surface craft carrying perhaps nothing but food cargoes to blockaded and starving peoples, or to bombard coasts and harbors. And since we may assume that every major navy will have such submarines, the sea war will spread destruction (and pollution) in high-sea waters once considered inviolate, and free to all, in peace or war.

But modern man—at least modern Western man—must have his comforts, even luxuries, in war no less than peace. He is called upon to sacrifice, perhaps, his life, but not his hot breakfast, his bath, his rich meals and his entertainment. The armed forces maintain an enormous live entertainment industry putting on plays, comedy acts, musicals—a peripatetic Broadway. Every attempt is made to normalize life—or make it supernormal. For the fact is that thousands of American recruits never have been so well fed and well clothed as they are in the armed forces.

Even uniforms are designed not only for comfort and durability but as an example of what the well-dressed man and woman should wear. Those of Wacs and Waves come from the drawing boards of the most famous designers, and their materials are also first class. When, during World War II, I was briefly a war correspondent (and "simulated" officer), I acquired a suit, raincoat, shirts, and a pair of brown oxfords that will not, I think, ever wear out.

I suppose if or when the Seawolf's torpedoes are fired nobody will be watching Jack Benny or Bob Hope, or listening to a jukebox, though of the latter I am not sure. Is it not clear, however, that American civilization assumes that men must be compensated for serving in war far beyond the moral compensation of performing an essential national duty? Or is it important that their minds should be taken off war, lest they become disturbed by too many questions?

Russia does not so treat her soldiers. The instinct for political obedience has, apparently, been so successfully created that the desire to question why has all but perished—though only in Russian ranks was an entire army, that of General Vlasov, led to mutiny in World War II. But the Russian training concentrates on conditioning and accustoming men to every form of the most severe hardship: to wet, cold and even near-starvation; to living not only without comfort but without many of Russia's own primitive civilian necessities.

The American Army depends less on the toughness of men than on the terrific power of their weapons. Which would prove superior in a showdown would, I think, depend upon the type of war that was fought or that the war might develop into. Atomic weapons are obviously useless for civil wars, or for wars of "liberation." To liberate a people into kingdom come?

So far in Soviet and Communist history all expansion or captures of nations by force have occurred within the framework of international wars not started by the Soviets. According to Communist theory, all such wars are imperialist-capitalist and must be turned into civil wars at the appropriate moment. This is the history of Soviet capture of power in Russia and China.

Even Chiang Kai-shek, who still hopes for a last chance to invade mainland China, as revealed in his book published last June, rules out the use of nuclear weapons in such an adventure.

Therefore what form a future great war might take would determine the effectiveness of the weapons. And there is also this to consider: thermo-

CONTINUED ON PAGE 16

Executive Editor: Mary Bass Special Projects Editor: Laura Lou Brookman
Associate Editors: Hugh MacNair Kahler, Bernardine Kielty, Wilhela Cushman, William E. Fink, Richard Pratt, Louella G. Shouer, Mary Lea Page, Dawn Crowell Norman, Margaret Davidson, Nora O'Leary, Donald Stuart, Tina S. Fredericks, Helen Everitt, Peter Briggs, Anne Einselen, Margaret Parton, Cynthia McAdoo Wheatland
Contributing Editors: Gladys Taber, Gladys Denny Shultz. Margaret Hickey, Ruth Mills Teague, Barbara Benson
Assistant to the Editor: Nelle Keys Perry
Editorial Associates: John Werner, Ruth Mary Packard, Ruth Shapley Matthews, Alice Conkling, Joseph Di Pietro, Elizabeth Goetsch, Nancy Crawford Wood, Jean Todd Freeman, Eileen Sharpe, Betty Coe Spicer
Assistant Editors: Victoria Harris, Alice Kastberg, Virginia Price, Dorothy Anne Robinson, Albert Serwazi, June Schwartz, Carol Crane, Liane Waite, Joyce Posson, Neal Gilkyson Stuart, Ruth Imler, Elizabeth Hart
Editorial Assistants: Lee Stowell Cullen, Patricia Martin, Flora Casparian, Alberte Wright, Simone Smith, Hazel Owen, Corinna Wildman, Isabel Blythe, Helen Olchvary, Olivia Donovan, Abbot Mills, Sally Platt, Marley Marseilles

Finally! A home permanent that never needs re-setting!

it's bliss!*

NEW CONDITIONING CREME WAVE IN A TUBE WITH APPLICATOR TIP!

Unwinds into soft, natural-looking curls right from the curlers! You just brush out and go out!

bliss! Smooths on from easy applicator-tip tube!

Other waves may take a dozen messy steps, but not bliss! This fabulous new fragrant creme formula eliminates forever all dab, all drip, all bowls, all bother! Just wind and rinse, that's all you do . . . when dry, brush out into glory. It's bliss!

bliss! Breaks the oil barrier . . . curls from inside out!

This wave contains never-before-used penetrants! It gets past the natural oil that resists deep curling, and curls the heart, not just the 'wall', of each strand! You get a soft, natural-looking hair-do the moment you brush out. No more re-setting—it's bliss!

bliss! Secretly conditions as it goes!

Your hair is cared for—retains a healthy balance of oil and moisture, and even on damp days stays silken-soft and manageable! The only wave especially developed to let you brush out and go out—no more frizz, no more trying to get lasting curls from temporary hair sprays—day after day it's bliss!

Self-neutralizing! Recap the handy applicator-tip tube, save for next wave, extra end-curls, too!

$2.00 PLUS TAX

Only 3 short steps to a glamorous finish—wind, rinse, brush out—it's bliss!

PHOTOGRAPH OF SUZY PARKER BY RICHARD AVEDON

©1957 LAMBERT-HUDNUT DIV. *TRADEMARK

GOT A HEADACHE?

Do what I do. For really fast, safe relief take Bufferin.®
Believe me, it acts twice as fast as aspirin to relieve pain.
And it won't upset your stomach as aspirin often does.

Bufferin's exclusive formula combines aspirin with two special antacid ingredients ed Cross Shoes designed for and inspired by . . .

TODAY'S AMERICAN WOMAN

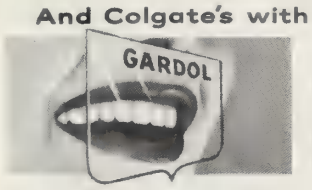
ILLUSTRATED: THE PATRICIAN

LA BOHEME

REMBRANDT

Fashion points to pretty bows and tapered toes

They're autumn's true loves, they're fashion's two loves . . . the gentle, tapered toe . . . the poised and pretty bow. And they're so sure to be your loves . . . for all the days and dates of autumn and winter. For these are Red Cross Shoes. Which means they feel as pretty as they look.



Largest selling brand of fine footwear in the world. Styles from 10^{95} to 13^{95}

THIS PRODUCT HAS NO CONNECTION WHATEVER WITH THE AMERICAN NATIONAL RED CROSS • THE UNITED STATES SHOE CORPORATION, CINCINNATI 7, OHIO

Brush Your Teeth with COLGATE DENTAL CREAM... Brush Bad Breath Away!

And Colgate's with GARDOL Fights Decay All Day, Too!

Colgate Dental Cream with Gardol stops mouth odor all day for most people . . . with just one brushing!

Of all leading toothpastes,* only Colgate's contains Gardol to form an invisible, protective shield around your teeth that fights tooth decay all day . . . with just one brushing!

Gardol's invisible shield fights tooth decay all day . . . with just one brushing.

*THE THREE BRANDS AFTER COLGATE'S.

GARDOL IS COLGATE'S TRADE-MARK FOR SODIUM N-LAUROYL SARCOSINATE.

CLEANS YOUR BREATH WHILE IT CLEANS YOUR TEETH

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 11

dropped from planes or launched by guided missiles, favor the aggressor—the power that launches the first knockout blow. Hence the proper emphasis of the United States on the necessity of inspection controls against such an eventuality.

But in considering this whole problem we find a curious lack of synchronization between the mechanical, technological instruments of modern war and their purpose. It is almost as though men were adopting the insentient, insensate and disengaged nature of their instruments. The guided missile with the atomic warhead neither thinks, feels nor is concerned with the logic of purposes. Beyond the creation of the thing and its push-button launching, no human hand or endeavor is involved. And it is this which lends a peculiar horror to them. In Britain the appearance of guided missiles toward the end of World War II created a quite different reaction from that accompanying bombardments from humanly piloted planes. People said, "The pilot and bombardier in a plane are human beings. They are risking their own lives, and they may even be sorry if they miss a target and kill a lot of civilians, or destroy a lovely cathedral, or, confronting a concentration of fighters, they may simply fly off. But to be attacked by disembodied mindless devils is unendurable. You can never see them coming, they move so swiftly. Only after you've heard the explosion do you know whether you're alive or dead. If you don't hear it, it has hit where you are."

But these carried explosive power far, far below those being presently designed.

We do not like to think about another great war, because it boggles the mind. These weapons will never be used, we say to ourselves, because their use would mean co-annihilation. The fact that three great powers have them means that none will dare use them.

But this is completely illogical. Everything made in this world is made to be used, or its creation is totally preposterous. If we, the Russians and the British are spending tens of billions of dollars annually to perfect weapons that we won't use, we are taking leave of our senses. Only intention to use them justifies the three powers who have them in producing them at all, in testing them, and in training men to handle them. Clearly all the powers who have them are calculating on using them under certain circumstances.

So one is compelled to ask oneself: Under what circumstances do we intend to use them? And, are there any circumstances under which any power can use them without entailing consequences unprecedented in the history of warfare?

This is what we are compelled to think about. It involves a completely new probability—new in the whole experience of mankind.

All wars heretofore have affected only the already living. The generation that waged the war has paid its full price in death and human destruction. Battlefields have left corpses; hospitals have garnered in the maimed; bombardments have killed innocent children; blockades and destruction of crops have starved populations; and children have not been born to fathers killed before their begetting. There have, of course, been unfortunate biological consequences. Part of the healthiest stock of nations has been reduced and failed to reproduce itself. Nevertheless, the human race has always re-

CONTINUED ON PAGE 18

© WALT DISNEY PRODUCTIONS

Jiminy Cricket shoved a thumb under his lapel, pushing up a large, prominently displayed badge. "OFFICIAL CONSCIENCE," it read. The expression on his small face was hopeful.

The director leaned back in his chair. "Well," he said, "about needing a conscience, I'm not sure. You see ——" He paused. "The job is to surpass last year's record contributions to the United Fund."

"And the hours?"

"All you can give," the director said. "Last year, we had seventeen million volunteers."

Jiminy Cricket was impressed. "Well, as I often tell my friend Anon—Anony Mous, that is—'Conscience never sleeps.'"

The director smiled. "It's a big job to get our United Fund message to everyone in the country. Could you manage it?"

Jiminy Cricket pulled himself upright. "As Official Conscience I am no 'still small voice!' Furthermore," he went on blandly, "as I told my friend Willie—Willie Shakespeare, that is—'Conscience has several thousand tongues.'"

The director, too, sat straighter. "And millions of hearts!" he said positively (like a man with a good conscience). "Twenty-six million, three hundred thousand people contributed $379,100,000 to the United Fund last year—an average of $14.40 per person."

Jiminy Cricket blinked bright, approving eyes. "'Conscience has millions of hearts,'" he repeated. "That's very good. Who said that?"

"I said it," the director said firmly.

"Oh."

"And, because it is a united fund, the people who gave had to give only once. One donation to support the work of more than 25,000 agencies."

Jiminy Cricket nodded in agreement. "'All for one and one for all,' eh? A fine motto for a united effort. But I'm not sure you need me. It sounds as if Americans already have a conscience."

"Most of them do," the director said warmly. "But some still don't see the need."

"Ah!" said Jiminy. "And we want them all to see it?"

The director nodded.

Jiminy Cricket flourished his small umbrella briskly. "All," he said. "That's one hundred and seventy million Americans, isn't it?"

The director nodded again.

Jiminy Cricket looked thoughtful. "All," he said again. "That brings to mind a quotation I once gave my friend Willie. He got it a little wrong someway, I always thought. At least, wrong as it applies here. He should have written: 'Conscience does make heroes of us all.'"

SUPPORT THE UNITED WAY OF GIVING—

ONCE A YEAR FOR YEAR-ROUND COMMUNITY SERVICES

FREE

Max Factor's new hi-fi Lipstick

75¢ size

when you buy Max Factor's new hi-fi Fluid Make-up...

the new make-up discovery that makes you look naturally lovely in any light... day or night

Here is full Hi-Fi beauty for you! Hi-Fi Fluid Make-up is different from any make-up you've ever used. It transforms your complexion to its loveliest in seconds! And when you try it—you'll receive a generous size Hi-Fi Lipstick absolutely free!

There never was a make-up like Hi-Fi! From his make-up research for color TV, Max Factor created an entirely new range of true complexion tones . . . so natural, so radiant, that you always look your loveliest . . . in any light—day or night.

$2.50 value, only $1.75

And how you'll love your Hi-Fi Lipstick! It's Max Factor's new kind of lipstick—gives you everything you want, all in one lipstick: vibrant Hi-Fi color that glides on, stays on till you take it off. No blotting or waiting to set—yet it never dries your lips.

Today—buy a bottle of Max Factor's Hi-Fi Fluid Make-up. Your 75¢ size Hi-Fi Lipstick is absolutely free. And you pay only 1.75 for both . . . the price of Hi-Fi Make-up alone! But don't delay . . . this special offer is on sale for a limited time only.

Formfit Bras
also available in handy
pick-up packages

You're so much a part of the beautiful scene when your strategy begins with Formfit. For this is the bra creation that puts you confidently . . . beautifully into any fashion . . . any fashion picture with that "I know I'm beautiful" feeling. Start with Formfit . . . at fine stores everywhere.

Start this strategy with "Romance" Bra 566 in fresh White Cotton. Circle-stitched with "Nylo-Braid" for forever-after uplift. Sizes 32A to 38C. $2.00

THE FORMFIT COMPANY • CHICAGO • NEW YORK • CANADIAN PLANT, TORONTO

DRESS BY OLEG CASSINI HAT BY MR JOHN

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 16

produced itself, as the statistics of population growth show.

But now, for the first time in the history of the human race, another great war, fought with the weapons that men of genius have devised out of fissionable material, threatens to take its toll of the unborn, of the not yet living, and not of one generation but of all future generations. The question is not only whether the race will reproduce itself, but what kind of race it will reproduce.

On this question there is no difference of opinion among the genetic scientists. The explosion of thermonuclear weapons releases radioactive particles into the air, the seas and the earth within a wide radius of the explosion. Radioactive substances are absorbed by bodily exposure, and by eating food that has also been exposed. Overexposure to radioactivity, in whatever form, brings about mutations in the genes that transmit characteristics. These forcible mutations are invariably bad. Children begotten by and born to overexposed parents are physically weak, with a reduced life expectancy, may be deformed physically and mentally, and these weaknesses and deformities are passed on to their progeny, whether there is further overexposure or not. An infinite chain reaction has been started. On this all geneticists are agreed.

This is the basis of all the discussion about fallout from thermonuclear tests. On the one hand, members of the Atomic Energy Commission and others say that the amount of radioactivity released by the tests adds only a negligible amount to the radioactivity present in Nature itself, and is so minimal as to produce no such mutations. They further assert that scientific advances are further purging away fallout. The weapons are "cleaner." The geneticists themselves support this view in a way because they are unwilling to commit themselves on what degree of increased exposure will bring about the dire results they describe. They can't—because they don't know. They could not know accurately without making tests on human beings under strict controls and then checking their offspring for several generations.

But nuclear fallout or radiation from weapon tests is quite another matter from fallout or radiation that would accompany a thermonuclear war. The tests are made one at a time, with intervening periods, under carefully controlled conditions, from far-distant islands, in unpopulated deserts, or in areas from which the scant population has been removed. In making the tests, every precaution of which science is cognizant is taken to prevent injury to anyone.

But, as we have said, these weapon tests, like the weapons themselves, are made for the sole purpose of waging war. And the object of war—and more than ever of modern war—is to do the greatest possible damage to the enemy. Were thermonuclear weapons employed in war, they would not be used

CONTINUED ON PAGE 188

ARE YOU MOVING?

If you are moving to a new home, the best way to be sure that your subscription to the LADIES' HOME JOURNAL reaches you promptly is to send us the new address at least 30 days before you move, together with the old address label cut from your magazine.

● Each year about 2,300,000 subscribers to Curtis magazines change their addresses and ask us to send the magazines to their new homes. We are happy to do this, but equally unhappy when delays occur. Sending us the label from your magazine will cut in half the time required to place the new address on our lists. Please send the old label and the new address at least 30 days before you move.

VARICOSE VEINS

Tired Legs, Leg Cramps Relieved By The NEW

Dr. Scholl's Super-Sheer

ELASTIC STOCKINGS

NYLON • FULL-FASHIONED • FULL-FOOTED

So sheer, they look just like regular nylons. No over-hose needed. Give comfortable, uniform support to varicose veins, tired, aching legs. Help prevent leg trouble during pregnancy. Colors: French Nude, White, Black. At Dr. Scholl's Foot Comfort® Shops, Drug, Department, Surgical Supply Stores. For leaflet and booklet on Foot and Leg Care, write DR. SCHOLL'S, Dept. E-2, Chicago 10, Illinois.

BOWLING BALL

YOU can easily earn one of these nationally advertised Mineralite Bowling Balls, bored to fit your hand, within one week.

Send us six 2-year Saturday Evening Post subscriptions at $10.00 each or eight 2-year Holiday subscriptions at $8.00 each. All subscriptions must be sold outside your own home at the full price. Both new and renewals count, but not your personal or personal gift subscriptions.

Write subscribers' names and addresses on plain paper and mail with your own name and address and full remittance.

Offer good in continental U.S. only, until November 30, 1957. Sorry, no bowling balls may be sold for cash.

CURTIS CIRCULATION COMPANY
215 Independence Square
Philadelphia 5 Pennsylvania

Now Many Wear
FALSE TEETH
With Little Worry

Eat, talk, laugh or sneeze without fear of insecure false teeth dropping, slipping or wobbling. FASTEETH holds plates firmer and more comfortably. This pleasant powder has no gummy, gooey, pasty taste or feeling. Doesn't cause nausea. It's alkaline (non-acid). Checks "plate odor" (denture breath). Get FASTEETH at any drug counter.

TINY TV Salt and Pepper Set FREE ON 15-DAY OFFER

To Start You Earning up to $150 With MIDWEST Christmas Cards
Show friends our fast-selling Cards and Gift Novelties. You keep as much as 50¢ to $1.25 profit per item. No experience needed. Get samples on approval with free Personal Christmas Card Album and TINY TV. Write NOW.
No Money
MIDWEST CARD CO., 1113 Washington, Dept. 467-K, St. Louis 1, Mo.

A. Valera—B. Carmella—C. Mandy—D. Julia—E. Colleen—F. Belle

Vitality's slenderizing fit dramatizes your foot

Dramatizes indeed, for Vitality's narrow heels shape to your heels—
Vitality's sleek topline fit hugs your foot! The more perfectly a shoe is fitted to your foot, the more slenderizing the effect! Choose your favorite styles from a wealth of Vitality Shoes—that feature Vitality's wonderful fit and the new slender look. Most styles are available in colors and leathers other than those illustrated.

VITALITY SHOES famous for fashion and fit

10^{95} to 13^{95}

Vitality Shoe Company, Division of International Shoe Company, St. Louis 3, Mo.

Vitality Wanderlust Shoes, from $8.95 • Styled for the young and young in heart

Suddenly DOVE makes soap old-fashioned!

Soap dries your skin, but new DOVE creams your skin while you wash.
DOVE is one-quarter cleansing cream!

You use DOVE like soap—in your shower, tub, and washbasin. But DOVE is a brand-new formula. DOVE creams your skin while you wash!

DOVE is one-quarter cleansing cream. It leaves your skin deliciously soft and smooth—with none of that tight dry feeling you get from using soap.

You can feel the cream in DOVE. You can smell its creamy fragrance. DOVE is good for your skin.

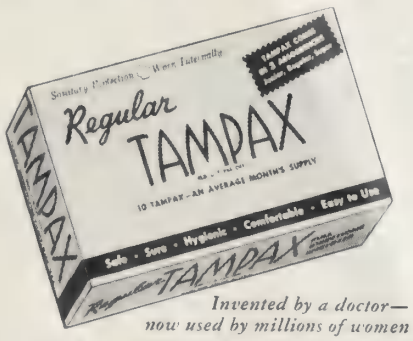
Lever Brothers unconditionally guarantees that DOVE is better for your face, your hands, all of you than any soap. If you don't agree, we'll give you back every penny you paid.

One-quarter of every bar of DOVE is rich cleansing cream. New DOVE makes the richest, creamiest lather you've ever seen—even in hard water! And DOVE never leaves a bathtub ring!



yours... that look of

CONFIDENCE

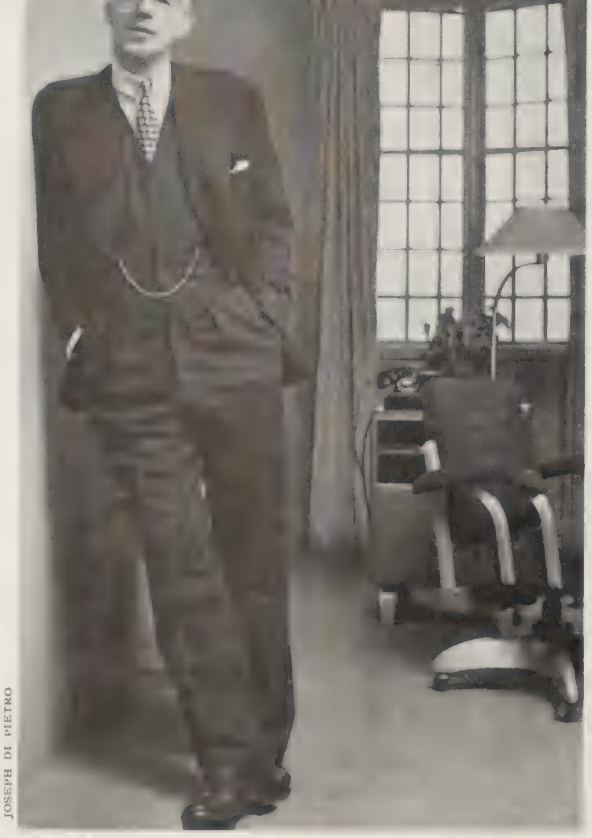
From the top of your Paris-inspired hat to the tip of your Italian-toed shoes—you're calm, poised, sure of yourself. Anybody looking at you would know—you're a woman of convictions—not just about the clothes you wear, but the things you do, the things you believe in doing.

No wonder you were the first among your friends to use Tampax. No wonder you won them over to Tampax! Simply and confidently you told them how Tampax® internal sanitary protection brings you such freedom and confidence on "those" days. For Tampax is invisible and unfelt when in place. It can't show or cause odor. Can't chafe or bind. Tampax frees you of messy disposal problems. Makes "light" of carrying problems. (A month's supply tucks away in your handbag!)

On sale wherever drug products are sold, in Regular, Super, Junior absorbencies. Look for Tampax Vendor in restrooms throughout United States. Tampax Incorporated, Palmer, Massachusetts.

Invented by a doctor—now used by millions of women

TAMPAX INCORPORATED
Palmer, Mass.



Please send me in plain wrapper a trial package of Tampax. I enclose 10¢ (stamps or silver) to cover cost of mailing. Absorbency is checked below.

( ) REGULAR ( ) SUPER ( ) JUNIOR

Name_____
(Please print)

Address_____

City_____ State_____

JOSEPH DI PIETRO

DR. SPOCK

WHY I'M REWRITING MY BABY BOOK

By BENJAMIN SPOCK, M.D.

"I think that being a parent is hard work, that most parents do a fine job, that most children have a few unappealing characteristics or phases and that some children have a lot of them, and that practically all parents, including the very best, can't help being impatient or antagonistic toward their children at times."

I'm not sure that I would have had the courage to write Baby and Child Care in the first place if I had had any idea in 1943 how long it would take. I told the publishers I thought I could do it in six or eight months. Jane, my wife, half groaned, half grinned her total disbelief, but I refused to be discouraged. The only way I ever got things done was to be blindly optimistic in taking obligations and then to struggle to get them done, long after they were due.

People have often asked me how I happened to decide to write a book in the first place, as if they thought that that would be the hardest step to take. But to me that seemed no trouble at all. Another publisher had asked me—several years earlier—to write a child-care book and I had readily agreed to do it "someday," when I'd had more experience. I was already convinced then that a book should be written which would combine both the physical and psychological aspects of child care. It would make clear that the child himself wants to grow up—more than anything else in the world—and that the parents don't have to force him but need only to guide him. Furthermore, I felt the book should not scold parents or scare them but would simply talk with them in a friendly way. Having strong opinions and a teacherish inclination, it would never have occurred to me not to write a book if given the chance.

What actually jolted me into action was a call early in 1943 from Donald Geddes, an editor for a book publisher, who said they wanted to publish a paper-covered child-care book and they would be able to sell it by the hundreds of thousands if it was any good at all. That sounded like a worth-while number of parents to reach and I was ready to start.

During the depression years I had had a summer job at Honnedaga Lake in the Adirondacks, which gave us a delightful and very inexpensive vacation. In August of 1943 we arrived there with reams of typewriter paper, boxes of pencils and Jane's old portable typewriter. Instead of boating and fishing and playing bridge in our spare time, we would retire to an unused porch of the boathouse. There I would hold my head in my hands, trying to compose a sentence; and when it finally came out, Jane would take it directly onto the typewriter. That's how we got started. It didn't take us long to realize that it would be a slow, hard job.

Back in New York in September, we settled into a grim routine. Through the day I practiced pediatrics, and also carried out part-time jobs as school physician and as teaching consultant in the health department. I always planned to be through my house calls and home for supper at 7:30, but those were busy days for doctors not in the service and I usually didn't get home until 8:30. After supper the reluctance to get to work closed in like a fog. I would "just glance at the newspaper," sharpen pencils, look over the table of contents for a topic which seemed easy. By about 9:30 or 10 I'd have myself steeled to begin and Jane would sit down at the typewriter. I'd pace the floor for minutes at a time, without producing a sound. Then I'd start a sentence and stop in the middle. When I did finish a sentence I often asked Jane to x it out. It was painful work for me, but at least my mind had something to chew on. It was worse for Jane, who had to sit there for hours with her chin in her hands and her elbows on the desk, just waiting. What was most remarkable of all was that, though she had perfectly good opinions of her own about child care, she never made suggestions about how to say it until I asked for help.

We'd knock off work at 1 A.M. For a while we continued to see friends once a week. But when we realized how slowly the work was progressing, we gave up all evening distractions completely (except for New Year's Eve).

I had been turned down for a commission in 1942 because of flaws in my past medical history. But a couple of years later the services had got over all that fussiness and were taking any doctor who was still breathing. The Navy took me in April, 1944. Fortunately I was stationed in a naval hospital near New York for sixteen months. This meant I could get home for seven-o'clock supper and an early start on the evening's work. Though the manuscript was piling up, there was no end in sight. Each chapter I wrote suggested at least one new one that I hadn't thought of previously. Jane was not only typing the first draft. She was experimenting with various techniques for making formula, to see which one produced the least scum; boiling various waterproof materials for sheeting and pants, to see if there was one which would not disintegrate. She was constantly taxiing different pieces of the manuscript around New York: to a stenographer for copying, to a surgeon, to a schoolteacher, to the six pediatricians who generously checked the book.

After about a year and a half the manuscript seemed to be ready for rewriting. There were literally thousands of suggestions from the doctors and educators who had read it. I had discovered during the writing that I would become completely stalled if I tried to express my thoughts in a form suitable for final publication. For instance, when I was dealing with the problem of the occasional practical nurse who bullies the inexperienced mother, I found that I had to use insulting language. If I felt like trying to be humorous I had to let myself go or I couldn't progress to the next paragraph. But when it came time for rewriting I had no trouble cutting out the inappropriate remarks. I eliminated so much that was opinionated or angry or joking that I was surprised and pleased—after the book came out—to have people remark how personal and lighthearted it was in spots. I had thought I had boiled all the flavor out of it.

At one stage in the revising of the manuscript I found I had to go right through the book taking out the excessive repetitions of the word "get." I eliminated several thousand of them and yet there were still too many left.

After two years of work and after redoing the manuscript three times, I sent it to the publishers. I spent a half day dumping stacks of old manuscript down the incinerator of our apartment house, enjoying the roar of the flames and feeling like a new man. In August, 1945, I was handed a set of galley proofs from which to make an index, just as I was getting on a troop train which was to take our hospital unit to California, presumably to be shipped directly out into the Pacific. I was somewhat panicky about completing this job before setting sail, because I very much wanted to do the indexing myself. I was afraid that no gives curls that last a year!

CONTINUED ON PAGE 25

NEW! Only child's home permanent with SQUEEZE-COMB EASE...

Curls really take because comb-tip squeeze bottle saturates hair far more thoroughly than any other way.

Now, no need to take chances using Adult Permanents on your child's hard-to-curl hair. Lilt Party Curl really overcomes problems of curling young hair. And Party Curl is so much easier, faster for you to apply on a fidgeting child. "Squeeze-Bottle Ease" ends messy dip-dabs for you. Now just squeeze on lotion from comb tip on bottle. Hair is so thoroughly saturated, soft curls last even a year!

© 1957, Procter & Gamble Co.

Fragile ... handle with Johnson's

Skin so delicate, you stroke it in wonder... and want to protect it with the purest, safest skin care there is... soothe it with the powder that has a special Chafe-Guard Ingredient... cleanse it with the gentlest oil in the world...
Johnson's.

MRS. RICHARD NEY, Houston, says:

"I wouldn't think of giving my children any other brand but St. Joseph Aspirin For Children"

Mothers trust the safe, gentle action of St. Joseph Aspirin For Children and children accept it readily because of its pure orange flavor. It's America's mother-and-child favorite, approved by more doctors than any other brand. Accurate dosage assured. Buy it.

World's Largest Selling Aspirin For Children

"...for adult needs, I always buy St. Joseph Aspirin"

200 Tablets 79c • 100 Tablets 49c • 12 Tablets 12c

CORNS also Calluses. Quick, easy, and economical. Just rub on. Invisible. Jars, 35¢ and 60¢. At drug stores.

REMOVED BY MOSCO

Your money refunded if not satisfied. The Moss Company, Rochester, N.Y.

Clarinet Saxophone Flute Trumpet

Which Musical Instrument Should Your Child Play?

Get Dr. Sigmund Spaeth's Revealing New Booklet "YOUR CHILD IS MUSICAL"

In this booklet Dr. Spaeth, outstanding authority, discusses the lifelong rewards music can bring, and reveals the "personality" of various instruments to help you and your child make the right choice. Twelve pages, profusely illustrated.

For your Free copy, write

Selmer Elkhart, Indiana, Dept. M—91

DISCOURAGE

THUMB SUCKING NAIL BITING

THUM TRADE MARK

Just Paint on Fingertips 60c at your drug store

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 22

professional indexer would know just how to list topics so that mothers could find what they wanted. It took a week to cross the continent. The train was hot and dirty and noisy. The officers and men were in a mood to enjoy themselves as best they could, since they were expecting to say good-by to civilization for many months. While they drank and told stories and sang, I sat with my lap full of three-foot-long strips of galley proof, putting index words on cards. My worst distraction was a middle-aged officer in the opposite seat who went to sleep after each meal. Step by step his snoring would build up, from a gentle whistling and purring to, eventually, a horrible sound of strangulation. When he got to that stage I couldn't work and I couldn't stand listening to him. I'd wander through the train with my arms full of galleys and cards, looking for the least riotous place to settle down.

In California we were stationed in a huge embarkation camp set up in the middle of the race track at San Bruno, while the authorities were trying to decide what to do with a wartime Navy when the war was suddenly over. Some of our doctors were shipped out as replacements and the rest expected it any day.

Working on the index had brought to light all kinds of repetitions and minor inconsistencies in the text. (When you've been reading the same stuff for two years it all sounds repetitious.) Since the book except for the index was already at the printers', I was supposed to telephone the corrections to Jane each night. This proved difficult. After finishing my day's work in the clinic I hurried through supper and over to the telephone center to put in my call, along with a hundred other sailors. After an hour's wait the operator would report: "Because of busy circuits your call will be delayed about two and a half hours." I'd sprint the mile from the telephone center to the Bachelor Officers' Quarters, work frantically on the index for a couple of hours and then run back to the telephone center. Sometime in the following hour I'd be connected with Jane, who would have been waked up in New York about 2 A.M. After I was sure she was awake I'd begin to dictate two dozen fussy corrections: "Galley page ninety-seven, paragraph four, line five, delete the words 'A baby normally wants' and substitute 'A relaxed baby may want.'" Every few minutes the operator would interrupt to remind me that others were waiting for the line, and I'd plead urgent business. Having been brought up to think of a long-distance call as a great luxury, for rare emergencies, I felt guilty talking across the continent for half an hour, every night, for two weeks straight. I was amazed and relieved that the bill came to only $150.

When a man dies he clutches in his hands only that which he has given away in his lifetime. ROUSSEAU

Finally the correcting and the indexing were finished. I startled the man in the post office when I put five dollars' worth of airmail stamps on the package and sent it off. I telephoned Jane to ask one of my sisters to take care of the two boys for a couple of weeks in New York so that she could fly out to join me for a celebration, and my sister agreed. We rashly bought a jalopy, lived in a Quonset hut like an irresponsible childless couple and toured California on the weekends.

The book came out in both editions in the spring of 1946, a month after I was discharged from the Navy, and I waited apprehensively to hear how it would be accepted. I was delighted to begin getting letters of appreciation from parents, and I was tremendously relieved to find that doctors did not object to the strongly psychological emphasis in the advice, some of which ran counter to pediatric traditions of that period. In fact, the doctors were as gracious as the parents.

After the book was published I was able to make only small changes in the text every

CONTINUED ON PAGE 29

Today she's . . .

Rescued by a prince

Whether her hero arrives on a white charger . . . or in his father's car . . . Carter's knows the way to her dreams! These dainty Dresden print pajamas are smocked and ruffled with the young-lady air she loves. And they're no-iron ...machine-washable...like all Carter's soft cotton knit sleepwear and underwear. What a lovely gift for a young dreamer!

ABOVE: DRESDEN PRINT PAJAMA. Brushed knit. Blue, pink. 3-16 yrs. $4.00. RIGHT: SKI PAJAMA. Striped knit trim. Azure, pink, red, yellow. 3-16 yrs. $3.00. All are Carter-Set so won't shrink out of fit.

Carter's

THE WILLIAM CARTER CO., NEEDHAM HEIGHTS, MASS.

If you had cavities
the last time you saw your dentist, here's good news for you

Are You A Fatalist About Cavities?

BY MARGUERITE HIGGINS
Noted Journalist and Pulitzer Prize Winner

How many times has it happened to you?

You sit down in the dentist's chair for a check-up. You feel that trouble is coming. And you're right.

After the dentist has looked over your teeth, you hear him say—

"Uh—uh, I'm afraid you've got a couple of brand-new cavities!"

And his drill swings into action.

"I guess I'm fated to have cavities," you say to yourself.

No, you're not. Not any more. You can stop some of those cavities from ever getting started. For today there's an exciting new way to prevent decay.

Today there's a new toothpaste that actually strengthens soft spots where cavities start. For both grownups and children, this toothpaste stops soft spots from turning into cavities.

The toothpaste is Crest with Fluoristan. If you had cavities the last time you saw your dentist, Crest is the toothpaste for you.

To get the proof, I talked to scientists who gave me facts and figures on Crest's amazing record of decay prevention.

In one test, grownups who brushed with Crest for one year had 42% fewer new cavities than those who brushed with standard toothpaste.

In another test, children had 35% fewer new cavities.

"These are impressive figures," I said. "But who ran the tests? And where were the results published?"

The scientists showed me detailed reports in official dental journals. There I read that the tests were conducted by dentists of national reputation.

The tests established a record of decay prevention for Crest never equaled by any other toothpaste.

Of course, no toothpaste can promise complete prevention of decay. But quite frequently regular brushing with Crest has meant no new cavities between dental checkups. This is the happy result that Norman Rockwell has dramatized on the opposite page.

Yes, I'm convinced you no longer need be a fatalist about cavities—either for yourself or for your family!

* * *

For an informative, attractively illustrated booklet of 30 pages, "How to Care for Your Teeth," send your name and address with 10¢ to: Director, Division of Dental Research, Procter & Gamble, Dept. A-1, P. O. Box 182, Cincinnati 1, Ohio.

Answers to your questions about CREST

What is Fluoristan?—Mrs. Carl Falck, West Palm Beach, Fla.

Fluoristan is a stannous fluoride formula especially developed for Crest. As you brush, Fluoristan strengthens teeth against decay. Fluoristan works for both grownups and children.

My teeth feel perfectly hard. Why do your television commercials say I've got soft spots in my teeth?—Mrs. P. J. Carroll, New York City

A "soft spot" is any part of the tooth surface where a cavity is likely to begin. Crest with Fluoristan strengthens soft spots and makes them more resistant to decay.

Does Crest do anything about mouth odor?—Mrs. James J. Buckley, Jackson Heights, N. Y.

Yes. Crest's ability to stop mouth odor is unsurpassed by any toothpaste. Crest's pleasant flavor refreshes your entire mouth.

How long did they test Crest?—Mrs. John Walsh, Dedham, Mass.

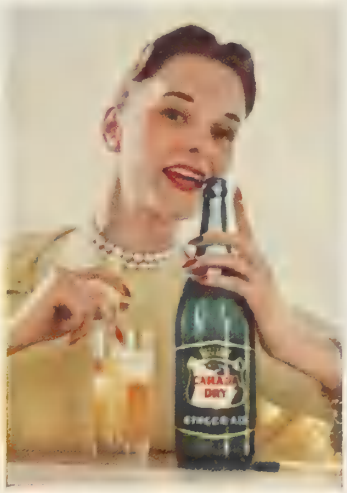
Over a 4-year period, about 5,700 adults and children took part in repeated tests on Crest. This is the greatest "in-use" testing program ever made on a toothpaste.

Please address your questions to: Director, Division of Dental Research, Procter & Gamble, Box 182, Cincinnati 1, Ohio.

A DENTAL HEALTH MESSAGE FROM PROCTER & GAMBLE, MAKERS OF CREST TOOTHPASTE

"Look, Mom—no cavities!"



Crest Toothpaste stops soft spots from turning into cavities—means far less decay for grownups and children.

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

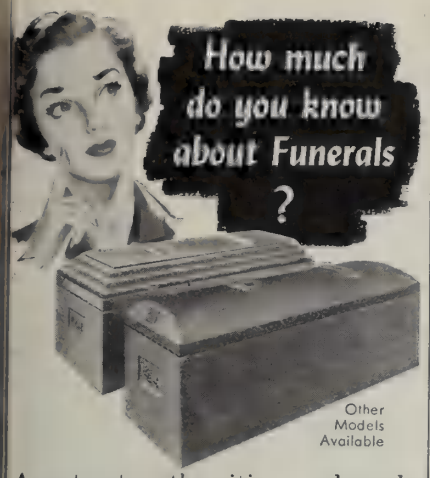
Fluoristan is a trademark for Procter & Gamble's exclusive fluoride tooth decay fighter.

©1957, The Procter & Gamble Co.

The day Jimmie went shopping... he got enough sparkling Canada Dry Ginger Ale and the 10 tempting flavors to last his family two whole days!

Sparkling Ginger Ale "Mom says it's light, dry, less filling!"

True Fruit Orange "Billie bet he could drink a gallon!"



Old-Fashioned Root Beer "Sis loves hat rich, creamy flavor!"

Hi-Spot Lemon "Pop really goes for that lemony taste!"

CANADA DRY

A FLAVOR FOR EVERY TASTE

As a trustworthy citizen and good neighbor, your funeral director is professionally qualified to supply competent advice and counsel. For peace-of-mind protection you can rely on him when he recommends the WILBERT burial vault, made of thick, precast asphalt and reinforced concrete. Over 1¼ MILLION interments have been made in . . .

Wilbert BURIAL VAULTS

Write WILBERT, Box 147-J, Forest Park, Ill., for FREE booklet, "Facts Every Family Should Know . . ."

WILBERT—the foremost name in burial vaults

®Trade Mark Wilbert W. Haase Co.

NON-SLIP

CAT'S PAW

Rubber Heels • Soles

AT ALL FINE SHOE REPAIRERS

"GET $50-$100 AND MORE WITH MY EASY SUCCESS PLAN"
Says RUTH J. ELLIOTT

NO EXPERIENCE NEEDED. Get extra money for yourself, your school, church or club. IT'S EASY! Just show Elliott Prize-Winners to friends & other folks. When they need CHRISTMAS & ALL OCCASION Greeting Cards (Tall or Regular), Imprinted Cards & Stationery, Gifts & Gift Wrappings, YOU send in their orders. That's all there is to it.

FAST SERVICE GUARANTEED

EARN TOP PROFITS plus BIG CASH BONUSES. Folks like you are getting $50, $100, $200 and more. Send your name & address today! I'll rush (ON APPROVAL) everything you need to get started making money at once. Thousands have succeeded, so can YOU! IT COSTS NOTHING TO TRY!

ELLIOTT'S 25th ANNIVERSARY

FREE GIFT for promptness

ELLIOTT GREETING CARD CO.
424 RIDGE STREET • ELYRIA, OHIO

Ugly broken, split nails... BEFORE made lovely in minutes WITH Jiffy Nails AFTER —a new liquid preparation that hardens into long, glamorous finger nails. Now you can change broken, split, bitten nails into strong beautiful nails—stronger than your own nails.

Stops Nail Biting.

Will not break or crack. Stays on until your own nails grow out. Can be filed, trimmed and beautifully polished. Each nail is made in one minute. You can do any type work while wearing these nails. No preparation like it.

DELUXE KIT $1.50

If not available at your favorite store, send $1.65 to:

JIFFY NAILS Chicago 44, Ill.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 25

year or so. If I wanted to insert twenty-three words in one place I had to remove twenty-three words from the same page, so as not to disturb subsequent pages. It was like doing crossword puzzles. Several mothers, for instance, wrote to me that there was nothing in the book on the care of the circumcision wound. So I carefully inserted a few sentences in which I prescribed a gauze dressing "the size of an airmail stamp." No sooner had this got into the book than the Post Office Department greatly reduced the size of the airmail stamp and I had to reword it again.

By 1953 I was sufficiently dissatisfied with many parts of the book to want to begin a major revision. (As usual, I was sure it would take only a few months.) First I wanted advice from pediatricians, public-health nurses and parents. It took time to have notices inserted in professional journals and more time before I began getting responses. Eventually I received the benefit of staff discussions that were held in dozens of city health departments. Hundreds of letters from JOURNAL readers came as a result of an appeal in 1954. To get a better cross-sectional view of present-day practices, I sent a questionnaire, on formulas and introduction of solid foods, to all the pediatricians whose names began with A. I quizzed colleagues on their experiences in toilet training. In the end it took a year and a half to assemble these data, and nearly two years more to sort them out in my mind and do the writing. As previously, this had to be done at night, because of a full-time job.

There are half a dozen words, all one-syllable ones, that are as valuable as diamonds. Use them frequently. They are: "Please," "Thank you," "I love you." Toss them into your daily doings.

From MARRIAGE MANNERS by Marjorie Woods & Helen Flynn, copyright © 1955, used by special permission of the publishers, The Bobbs-Merrill Company, Inc.

This time I didn't torture Jane any more with dictation. She read on the couch or occasionally went to movies or concerts with friends. I sat on a high stool at a drafting table (better than a desk for backache), scribbling in large letters on smooth typewriter paper with a mechanical pencil. By midnight my table was always coated with crumbled eraser.

Many small changes in the text were made necessary by advances in medicine: for instance, the preventive measures now used for rheumatic fever and polio, and drugs for treating TB. Medical practices had changed in regard to such matters as better-tasting vitamin preparations, simplification of formulas, earlier introduction of meats. I largely revised breast feeding, bowel training, crying in infancy, and I wrote new chapters on pacifiers, grandmothers and twins (the last with the help of letters from JOURNAL readers).

But the principal reasons I wanted to do a real revision of the book were not connected with these topics I have just mentioned. When I wrote the first edition in the early '40's, the problems that turned up in child rearing seemed to me to be due mainly to inflexible infant-feeding schedules, rigid diet lists for young children generally, efforts to force weaning to the cup by a certain age, attempts (usually unsuccessful) to stop thumb sucking, arbitrary, forcible and often very early toilet training, the suppression of symptoms of jealousy of the new baby, the squelching of aggressiveness in young children, the pushing of children in school. It is quite clear to see that in the book I was trying to do my part to counteract these rigid tendencies, which ignored so largely the nature of childhood and the differences between individual children.

In the past ten or fifteen years there has been a widespread change in the philosophy of infant and child care. I think the greatest impetus was given by the introduction (first by Doctor McLendon and Mrs. Simsarian) of the flexible or "demand" feeding schedule, the shoe that understands children...

the shoe that knows they were never meant for sitting still, or keeping quiet, or being anything but their bright and busy selves
. . . this is the shoe that's known everywhere for outstanding quality, fine and lasting fit . . .
the shoe that goes to school the country over,
wherever children do!

THE STRIDE RITE SHOE

Green Shoe Mfg. Co., Boston, Mass.

Mothers... meet the Roy Rogers
"Testing Laboratory!"

Here are our seven lively children. They give their clothes and toys a real beating at the Double R Bar ranch. That's why every product bearing our name is "tested" first by our youngsters. When we are sure the items can stand up under the rugged wear and tear of ranch life, we know they'll give your family equal satisfaction. Only then are they marked with our brand.
This is our pledge to all parents.

Roy Rogers Dale Evans

YOU PAY NO PREMIUM for the Roy Rogers name, found on 50 different kinds of children's clothes, toys and school supplies. Featured at most leading department stores.

Roy Rogers-Frontiers Inc., 357 No. Canon Drive, Beverly Hills, Calif.

and by the writing of Dr. C. Anderson Aldrich, which reassured doctors that irregularity in amounts and timing would not upset babies' intestines. Rather suddenly, flexibility and permissiveness won out over strictness.

Nowadays the problems about which I am consulted by parents (and also by the interns and medical students whose cases I supervise) more often involve babies who get carried around all evening long because they object so strenuously to being put to bed, babies who are still waking for a couple of bottles each night at the age of a year, young children whose parents have been hesitant to suggest toilet training, older children who are disobedient and rude, adolescents whose parents are afraid to make definite rules. I don't mean that these problems are very prevalent today, and I realize that there were some undisciplined children back in rigid times. I'm also aware that many of us by the time we're growing older develop a tendency to view the younger generation with alarm, and I try to discount that in myself. But after making due allowances, I think it's fair to say that more parents today are getting into jams because of overpermissiveness than because of overstrictness, and this was one of the two main reasons I felt I had to try a revision. I still wanted to discuss child nature and child care in such a way that parents could understand and trust their children's inherent desires to grow up, but at the same time I wanted to try to make it clearer—to those who are uncertain—that parents have to provide the standards, the inspiration and the firm guidance.

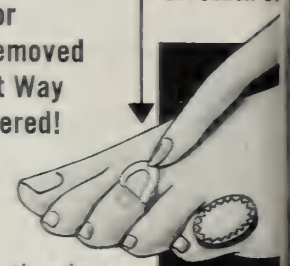
More persons, on the whole, are humbugged by believing nothing, than by believing too much.

P. T. BARNUM

The other main reason for revision had to do with parents also. Though many readers had said complimentary things about the friendly tone of the book, two mothers (one of whom I talked with in Philadelphia five years ago, the other of whom wrote me from Texas) made very discerning comments which made me realize that friendliness to parents is not always enough. They said, in effect, "This book emphasizes so strongly the natural goodness of children that it throws the entire burden of successful rearing on the parents. This may not be noticeable to the mothers and fathers who have an unusual degree of inner security. But it can be constantly oppressive to those overconscientious parents who are too aware of their own imperfections, especially of their moments of antagonism toward their children. To them the book seems to imply (by its silence) that worthy parents never become impatient or angry, that they can be perfect if they try hard enough and that any sign of maladjustment on the child's part should be a reproach to them."

I am sure most of you know me well enough by now, through these talks, to know that I don't really believe any of these things. I think that being a parent is hard work, that most parents do a fine job, that most children have a few unappealing characteristics or phases and that some children have a lot of them, and that practically all parents, including the very best, can't help being impatient or antagonistic toward their children at times. Nevertheless, I realized that if the book made some parents uncomfortable, it must have been lopsided. So I've tried to balance it with a fuller presentation of the parents' point of view and with more visible understanding of their feelings. Whether this will make it a more satisfactory book to most parents or whether they will think it morbid, I have no idea.

As I read the new edition over for the twenty-fifth time before sending it off to the publisher I decided it was still too bossy in places, and it still had too many "gets" in it. But these faults will have to wait for another revision.

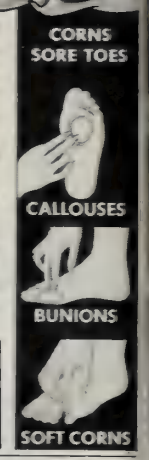


Dr. Spock regrets that it is impossible for him to answer letters personally. However, he is delighted to receive suggestions of topics of truly general interest.—ED.

Corn, Callous, Bunion Pain Stopped

You Get Fast NERVE-DEEP Relief With Dr. Scholl's!

And Corns or Callouses Removed the Quickest Way Ever Discovered!



World's Largest Selling Foot Reliefs

No waiting for action when you use soft, soothing, cushioning, protective Dr. Scholl's Zino-pads. You get super-fast nerve-deep relief. Used at first sign of irritation, they stop corns or callouses before they can develop . . . ease new or tight shoes.

Zino-pads also remove corns and callouses one of the quickest ways known to medical science when used with the separate Medications included. New skin-matching color. Get a box today. At Drug, Shoe, Department, 5-10¢ Stores.

Dr Scholl's Zino-pads

HOT, TENDER FEET?

Dr. Scholl's Foot Powder quickly relieves hot, tired, tender, perspiring, odorous feet. Eases new or tight shoes. Get a can today!

Dr Scholl's FOOT POWDER

What Do 3 Out of 4 Doctors Recommend to Relieve Pain?

A survey shows 3 out of 4 doctors recommend the famous ingredients of Anacin Tablets to relieve pain of headache, neuritis and neuralgia. Here's why Anacin® gives you better total effect in relieving pain than aspirin or any buffered aspirin:

- ACTS INSTANTLY: Anacin goes to work instantly. Brings fast relief at source of your pain.
- MORE EFFECTIVE: Anacin is like a doctor's prescription. That is, Anacin contains not one but a combination of effective, medically proven ingredients.
- SAFER: Anacin simply can not upset your stomach.
- LESSENS TENSION: Anacin also reduces nervous tension, leaves you relaxed, feeling fine after pain goes. Buy Anacin today.

Make $62.50 EASILY on Just 50 CHRISTMAS CARD Assortments

Best Spare-Time Plan Anywhere!

Yes, you make $1.25 on every Fine Arts box! You can't help but make extra money quicker with this fast-selling, big profit Christmas Assortment. You don't need experience. New ideas in Slim, Religious, other most popular Cards at 21 for $1 up, stationery, inexpensive Gifts you'll enjoy showing to friends. Over 200 amazing values.

GET SAMPLES NOW!

Up to 65c of each $1 is your cash profit. Samples start you earning at once. Send no money. Get gorgeous Personalized Christmas Card Album FREE. Bargain List, other Samples on approval. $1.25 Gift FREE on 15-day Offer. Write now!
Boulevard Art Publishers, Dept. 527-B
235 South Wabash Ave., Chicago 4, Illinois

FINE ARTS
Special Assortment
Ultra-fine quality cards, sold up to 35c each. You sell for 8c and make $1.25 on box of 25 for $1.95

KILL ROACHES
SILVERFISH
WATERBUGS
CRICKETS

Now! Keep your home free of these insects with this different insecticide. Bait in sanitary tube attracts insects. They eat it and die! Long-lasting—bait never loses killing power. Round-the-clock protection. Clean, easy to use; no mess, no odor. If your store has none send $1 for 9 Hives to DeSoto Chemical Co., Dept. 29, Arcadia, Florida.

GATOR ROACH HIVES

Money Back Guarantee!

FOR THEIR HAPPINESS...TODAY...AND ALL THEIR TOMORROWS

There's nothing like a piano...

and ACROSONIC gives you more!

FINEST TONE...SMARTEST NEW STYLING...MORE LASTING VALUE!

Now you can insure the happiness of your youngsters...today...and for years to come. The Acrosonic Piano by Baldwin is the right instrument to help you attain your goal—to help your loved ones develop happily—to mature into a popular, poised and well-adjusted adult life.

And why do we say the Acrosonic gives you more? Because here, truly, is the finest spinet or console piano modern research and craftsmanship have created... responsive, full-toned, meticulously fashioned and built to give a lifetime of pleasure. Don't just take our word for it. Ask a music teacher or any professional musician about Acrosonic quality. And remember, the Acrosonic is made only by Baldwin, builders of the incomparable Baldwin Grand, choice of today's great artists.

Act now. Take advantage of the Acrosonic RED TAG SPECIALS now available at your nearby Baldwin Dealer. Visit him today, or write for complete information to The Baldwin Piano Company, Bldg. L-3, Cincinnati 2, Ohio.

YOUR BALDWIN DEALER IS NOW FEATURING ACROSONIC RED TAG SPECIALS

ACT TODAY AND SAVE!

Baldwin

PIANOS • ORGANS

America's first family in music

SEE YOUR BALDWIN DEALER TODAY!

BUILDERS OF: BALDWIN, ACROSONIC AND HAMILTON PIANOS; BALDWIN AND ORGA-SONIC ORGANS

Romanticism returns . . . in new

'Ballad'

pattern in

COMMUNITY

THE FINEST SILVERPLATE

Now at last . . . a new elegance in the modern manner of today's loveliest homes finds expression in truly fine silverware! Every detail of "Ballad,"* from the delicately perfect roses to the gently contoured handle, reflects the mastery of Community* silver craftsmanship. See "Ballad" flatware, and beautiful matching hollowware, today at your jeweler's or fine silverware department. When you do, prepare to lose your heart, for this is silverware in the great tradition. Created in the Design Studios of Oneida Silversmiths.

SPECIAL INTRODUCTORY OFFER!

8 serving pieces free (a silver drawer full) when you buy 8 place settings for $88.

Handsome drawer chest, complete with 56 pieces of "Ballad," for the price of 8 place settings alone. Save $24, the entire cost of the 8 serving pieces shown below. (Chest in mahogany or blond finish.)

*TRADEMARKS OF ONEIDA LTD., ONEIDA, N. Y. ©1957, ONEIDA LTD.

Chest includes: 16 teaspoons • 8 place knives • 8 place forks • 8 place spoons • 8 salad forks • 1 sugar spoon 1 butter knife • 1 cold meat fork • 1 gravy ladle • 1 table spoon, pierced • 2 table spoons, regular • 1 pastry server

ANOTHER FINE PRODUCT OF STANDARD BRANDS INC.

This coffee tells you it's fresher

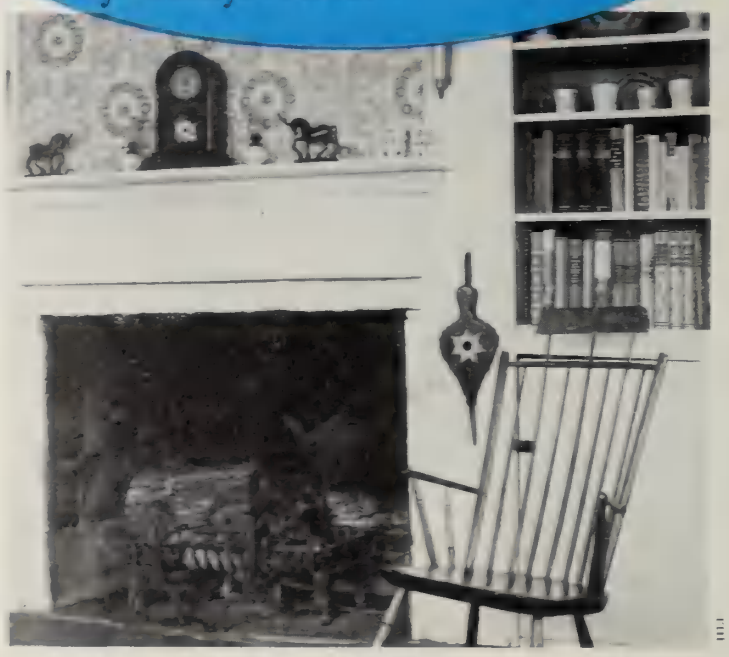
It greets you with a louder whoosh and the livelier aroma that forecasts fresher, fuller-flavored coffee in each satisfying cup. Why? Because Chase & Sanborn Coffee is the only leading brand that's pressure packed. And pressure packing preserves coffee freshness and flavor better than any vacuum can or bag.

Chase & Sanborn Coffees are served by more fine hotels and restaurants throughout America than any other brand.

Chase & Sanborn

Fresher because it's pressure packed

Give yourself a FLAVOR BREAK



INSTANT CHASE & SANBORN—the full-bodied coffee

YES, THAT'S DONNA REED . . . SEE HER IN "BEYOND MOMBASA," COLUMBIA RELEASE

DIARY of DOMESTICITY

By Gladys Taber

When September hints of frost to come and the maples begin to color, we return gratefully to the familiar hearth.

Jill dug potatoes this morning. There is a trick to it, for it is easy to chop a nugget in two with an unwary stroke of the fork. The potatoes come rolling from the hill, pinkish and damp. Scrubbing them brings out the color and the skins seem to glow. We forget all about the battle of the potato bugs which has gone on all summer.

Cooked with a mint leaf in a very little boiling salted water, the new potatoes are fork-tender, delicious. They are not at all like the potatoes we buy in winter, tough, with wrinkled skins and a flat taste. Of course potatoes are supposed to ship well and keep well, but they lose their flavor almost as corn does.

A garden is a luxury. By the time you plow, plant, weed, fertilize and fight the bugs, you have spent, in time and money, incredible sums. But what is more rewarding than your own succulent vegetables and fruits, from the truly ripe glowing tomatoes to the golden nut-sweet corn?

Waiting for the black frost, we scurry out to bring in everything that would spoil. And I reflect what a pleasant vegetable is the parsnip, which will sit comfortably until the ground freezes. Carrots and cabbage, lettuce and chard can be left until later, but the tide of peppers and tomatoes and grapes overflows the kitchen. And the flowers must come in, the occasional rose, the brilliant zinnia, the last dark delphinium.

When we walk down the winding country road, I think "and straight was the path of gold for him," because the goldenrod is blazing along the split-rail fences and by gray stone walls. I learned from Edwin Way Teale's Autumn Across America that the English call it "farewell summer," and this is what it should be called. It truly is farewell to summer. If you gather the spikes just as they open and hang them upside down in a cool dark place until they dry, they make winter bouquets that brighten the dark days.

The joe-pye weed frosts the meadows with rosy violet. This is lovely in an old stoneware jug. The first swamp maples begin to turn color, and I always think them the banner of autumn.

The clarity of light persuades Jill to take pictures. Recently she acquired a gift of a camera that produces prints almost instantly and sallied forth to try it. She also took her old favorite, slung around her neck, and her color camera, slung from her shoulder. She naturally had to have her light meter around her neck. The flash gun, just in case, went in the camera bag, which is a big old case we used to take to dog shows.

After a few experiments with the new camera, she went back and got her stop watch, because you have to count sixty seconds and neither of us came out even counting. She decided to use me as a subject, because I would prop myself up while she tried to figure out the new gadget, but the dogs sped dizzily in front of her.

The shade on the lawn was spotty, so she had me move here, move there, look sideways, look front. I took on the silent glare with which I always greet a camera.

A fringe of racing cockers and Irish was around me. "Either get out or get in," said Jill fiercely to Jonquil. "I can't take just half a dog."

She snapped the picture finally, just as my eyes began to glaze. Then she consulted the book, set the stop watch. Suspense had mounted. "Now I pull the tab," she said.

She pulled, she wrenched, she bent backward and hauled. The tab broke half off. She rushed to the house and came out with a nail file, with which she hoped to catch the tab. Then she went back to get the pliers so I could pull the other end.

About once a year I have an intelligent surmise, and now I had mine for this year. "Maybe there's something to push?" I asked doubtfully.

There was. She pushed it. The remains of the tab and the picture flew out like a rocket. She mopped her face.

I was dimly to be seen, emerging from a sea of fog and with a dark lake around my feet. While we got our breath, Jill took some regular shots of Especially Me, Sister and Holly. And an easy color shot of a maple branch.

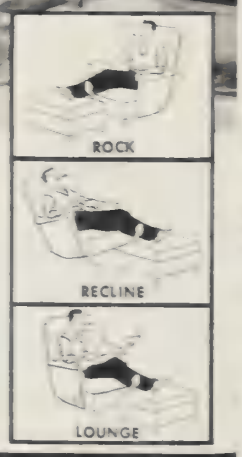
CONTINUED ON PAGE 36

Try the field-fresh flavor of Del Monte® plantation pineapple

Flavor like this takes a lot of growing, a lot of knowing—and we specialize in both on our own DEL MONTE pineapple plantations. Each plant is watched over by experts until it's perfectly sun-ripened, and the flavor is a delicate balance of tart and sweet. Then we harvest and can at peak speed! That's why—if you want all the natural field-fresh flavor of the finest pineapple—you'll buy DEL MONTE PINEAPPLE—the brand that always puts flavor first!

5 fine styles–tender SLICES, dainty TIDBITS, bite-size CHUNKS, handy CRUSHED, refreshing JUICE

DOES THE LION'S SHARE...



—the detergent specially designed to clean FLOORS, WALLS, WOODWORK

Soilax does the hard part . . . actually picks up and holds all the dirt from your floors! You never have to scrub . . . a light stroke wipes away even ground-in grit! No rinsing! Dust-absorbing Soilax removes every trace of sudsy scum or dulling film . . . surfaces dry bright! Ideal way to clean walls, woodwork too! Now in handy and economical 3 lb. packages

ECONOMICS LABORATORY, INC.

NOTHING BOTHERS THE MAN IN THE BERK-LOCK

Neither sweepers nor weepers will bother the man in the Berk-Lock . . . he's relaxing in America's favorite comfort chair! This 3-in-1 rocker-recliner-lounge (available with swivel, too) provides sublime comfort, fades away tensions, soothes tired bodies. The whole family will love it! Many styles available — at low, low prices.

THE BERKLINE CORPORATION, MORRISTOWN, TENNESSEE

WORLD'S LARGEST MANUFACTURER OF PLATFORM ROCKERS

SITTING IS BELIEVING

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 34

"It's all a matter of getting used to it," she said, heaving up the new camera and getting me back in focus. This time we either pulled too soon, or too late, and the picture was perfectly blank. But Jill had to go in the house and get a damp sponge because her hands were sticky from the developing fluid.

"Guess I need a trunk," she said.

In the end, she achieved a picture that came out, and came out in sixty seconds, all printed and amazingly good.

Flushed with triumph, we went back and sat down to rest. "It's merely a matter of understanding a new mechanism," Jill explained, and tried to close the camera. It would not close. So we read the book again, and pushed and shoved. Half an hour later, Jill lifted a small tab, and the camera snapped its jaws.

These modern miracles do take a bit of experience. I can remember learning to drive father's car. Since I forgot to fill the radiator (which had to be done every few miles), it went dry. When the motor began to steam and smoke, I decided the oil was the trouble and with the help of my beau removed the plug and drained out the oil. By the time this was completed, the motor started, because it had cooled off, and we drove happily home. It cost father a good deal to repair the car. What he said to me was very educational.

Now birds wheel in the sky at dusk, practicing for the long flight. The air is busy with wings. I always hope they will make their migration safely, but they seem so small to brave distance.

We do not get ready to migrate, yet we are as subject to the ebb and flow of the seasons as the birds are. As the nights grow cool, and the days are filled with soft blue haze, there comes a change in our own rhythm. There is a quickening of the blood, a feeling of change. Possibly we instinctively react to the change in light, as well as the changing colors in the countryside.

When you get to the end of your rope, tie a knot and hang on.

We are full of projects, which I suspect is merely our spiritual migration toward the bitter days. The men come with the firewood, and as they do not stack it, stacking is a project. Kindling must be laid in the woodshed. The cellar window which was broken last winter really has to be replaced now the screen comes out.

When the line storm comes, it expresses something profound in us. Wind whips away the laziness of August, rain sluices the air. Branches fall. Windows rattle. Smoke backs down the chimney. The dogs get as close to the fire as possible, and Especially Me gets in my lap, for he does not like storms.

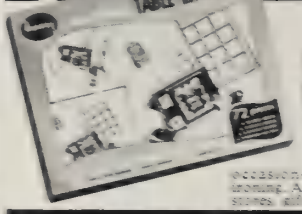
The soup kettle hangs in the big fireplace, and the air is savory with salt pork and onions. Yes, summer is over, and the end of anything is sad. Now the heart remembers roses, and forgets the Japanese beetles.

But the storm belongs in the scheme. And after it has gone, the air is sweeter than ripe purple grapes, the sky is colored infinity, and every grass blade is polished. I am changed too. Whatever anxieties or griefs that came with summer, as always they must come, are now beaten away by the wind and rain. My heart is suddenly light and young. I feel like climbing a mountain and speaking to the first star that shines in the deepening twilight.

No, I cannot lift wings and seek the air currents and undertake the perilous, exciting journeys the birds take. But this is a new world I stand in, fresh-minted and dazzling. I can put summer away, folded like a rose in the pages of memory, and step steadily toward winter because I, too, am a part of Nature, a small piece of the universe.

Tomorrow the world begins all over again. I feel as hopeful as Holly, who feels that she is now going to catch that rabbit. And as hopeful as the rabbit, who knows she never will!

END



NORCROSS GREETING CARDS

They say the things you want to say (and say them in the nicest way)

FOR EVERY OCCASION

© NORCROSS INC.

More fun-less work when you entertain

18 SETTINGS (72 Pieces)*

Beautiful place mats, napkins, coasters. Add color for every occasion—and washing, ironing. At grocers, variety stores, gift shops

Hallowell DIVISION THE KVP COMPANY KALAMAZOO, MICHIGAN

Juicy Steak

seal in delicious, juicy flavor, brush both sides with POMPEIAN Pure Virgin Imported OLIVE OIL 2 oz. to 1 gal.

A naturally unsaturated oil. It's better for you.

Free recipe book. Dept. L9 Pompeian, Balto. 24, Md.

KEYSTONE MUSHROOMS

For "picked this morning" flavor, serve . . .

KEYSTONE MUSHROOMS "it's the Quality Pack"

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

MORE CASH FOR YOU!

YES, you can have more cash in your pocket if you'll put your free time to work. Write a postal today for full details on our money-making plan. No obligation.

CURTIS CIRCULATION COMPANY
214 Independence Square
Philadelphia 5 Pennsylvania

COMPARE

Stradivaro SEWING MACHINES FULLY AUTOMATIC ZIG-ZAG AND STRAIGHT SEWER

Also: President, Modern, etc.

for name of nearest dealer write MODERN SEWING MACHINE CORP. 302 Saratoga Ave B'klyn. 33, N. Y.

BIG NEW WHOLESALE CATALOG FREE!

WRITE TODAY FOR FREE CATALOG SEND POSTCARD

NOW! Save Up to 50% on Nationally Advertised Gifts

See this big, new FREE CATALOG to buy all kinds of gifts and merchandise for yourself, family, friends, neighbors. Terrific saving on big-name items. Also, make money spare time taking orders from others!

EVERGREEN STUDIOS

Dept. 37 Box 846 Chicago 42, Ill.

LIPS SORE?

Blistex

POCKET SIZE 39c

BEST FOR COLD SORES CHAPPED LIPS FEVER BLISTERS

...MAKES YOUR PUDDINGS

Create your own—in endless variety. Smooth, light Chocolate Pudding (vary with a dash of mint or spice). Candy-flavored Butterscotch. Nut Chocolate—richly chocolate—topped with a walnut half. Elegant Vanilla (alone or with orange or mocha extract)

...MAKES YOUR PIES

Take any pie shell (cracker-crumb shell—or, new, bake shell from a cookie mix). Line with sliced bananas (or any fruit you have). Crown with creamy My-T-Fine Pudding. It's a pie for a party!

...MAKES YOUR PASTRIES

For a small family—or buffet—make tart shells. Or bake cream puffs from a new quick mix. Fill with My-T-Fine Pudding. Vanilla, Chocolate, Butterscotch, Nut Chocolate—why not a choice of flavors?

MY-T-FINE
PUDDING AND PIE FILLING
5 Famous Flavors

MY-T-FINE MAKES YOUR BEST DESSERTS

P.S. Only My-T-Fine gives you added iron you need daily.

CHOCOLATE • NUT CHOCOLATE • VANILLA • BUTTERSCOTCH • LEMON • INSTANT AND REGULAR

What will Betty Crocker think of next!

New! Puddin' Cakes!

Make them with your favorite Betty Crocker Cake Mix

NEW! Double Chocolate Puddin' Cake!

YOUR SECRET: Pour Betty Crocker Chocolate Devils Food Cake Mix batter into ungreased oblong pan. Pour hot prepared chocolate pudding over batter. Bake 35 to 45 min. at 350° (325° for glass pan). Serve warm with thick cream. Rich, moist, wonderful!

NEW! Peach Spice Puddin' Cake!

YOUR SECRET: Prepare 1 package lemon pie filling (not instant) as directed on package and spread in oblong pan. Arrange no. 303 can sliced peaches, drained, over pudding. Add Betty Crocker Honey Spice Cake Mix batter. Bake about 50 minutes at 350°. Serve warm, cut in squares and turned upside down in dessert dishes.

"I guarantee a perfect* cake—cake . . . after cake . . . after cake!"

Betty Crocker

* PERFECT! Yes, every mix we make for you is guaranteed to come out perfect or send the box top to Betty Crocker, Box 200, Minneapolis, Minn., and General Mills will send your money back.

General Mills

NEW! Ginger Puddin' Cakes!

YOUR SECRET: Prepare Betty Crocker Gingerbread Mix according to package directions. Fill 10 custard cups two-thirds full. Tie on foil caps; steam 30 min. in 2″ water. Serve with hot canned or freshly made apple-sauce—spiced with raisins and cinnamon. Country-good!

NEW! Cherry Puddin' Cake!

YOUR SECRET: Use your favorite fresh-fruit filling or no. 2 can cherry pie filling. Bring to a boil with ¼ cup water, 1 tsp. lemon juice, ¼ tsp. cinnamon. Place in 1½-qt. baking dish and top with 1 cup Betty Crocker Yellow Cake Mix batter. Bake 35 to 40 minutes. Serve oven-warm. Heavenly! Bake rest of batter in 9″ sq. pan.

UNDER COVER

By Bernardine Kielty

THE SATURDAY EVENING POST

"Here we see the start of our trip abroad."

Clean fresh air on a high plateau, hillsides terraced with gardens, and the white magnificence of the Himalayas above and beyond—that is Nepal.

Instead of reporting on many books this month, let me tell you about a journey—a journey to Nepal, to the other side of the world in more ways than geography, and far more entrancing than a visit to the moon. Here is a land and a people untouched for over three hundred years. Not a civilization from which the people have fled, like that of Angkor Vat; nor one that has been instantly destroyed, like Pompeii's. But an active, vital civilization still going strong, geared to the seventeenth-century tempo.

Nepal has always been apart from the rest of the world. She is an unconquered mountain kingdom lying between Tibet and India, a rectangle 500 miles long and 100 miles wide, with about 8,000,000 population. Her capital is Katmandu, a fabulous old city near the center of a high valley that is completely farmed, and has probably the most ideal climate in the world. The Himalayas protect her from Tibet on the north—the caravans carrying salt and wood and wool have to cross a 19,000-foot pass to reach Nepal. And she is cut off from India on the south by a vast impenetrable jungle of tigers, wild elephants, rhinos, dangerous snakes and the most devastating malaria in the world.

Moreover, up to 1950, foreigners were forbidden to enter. When Japan and China closed their doors to the West, back in the seventeenth century, and turned out the missionaries and the traders, Nepal did the same. The difference was that Nepal—until now—never relented. Before 1950 not a missionary had been admitted, and perhaps not more than a couple of hundred Westerners ever set foot on Nepalese territory. A trickle of explorers, scientists and mountain climbers got special permission from time to time, as their books in the library testify. But of these the Nepalese were innocently unaware.

It is this almost complete isolation of a whole people that makes Nepal the most fascinating spot in the world today.

The revolution which spun Nepal round into our own day and age was a reversal of history. This time it was a king who rebelled. For over a hundred years, although the country had a king, it was ruled by a powerful family of hereditary prime ministers who kept the king prisoner in his own palace. Now triumphant, the young king wants to be friendly.

A small plane now flies over the jungle, visitors are welcomed. Nepal is represented in the U. N., education is getting a start. But there is still no direct representation in any countries except India, Burma and England, and Nepal is not yet a member of the International Postal Service. Her one little stamp carries a letter to her border, no farther. Though vaccination has been introduced, you still see fresh offerings before the altar of the smallpox goddess.

And the people are unchanged. The men in their tight long trousers of white, like jodhpurs, white shirts tied in front, and soft caps worn a little to one side, are debonair. Hand in hand they walk unself-consciously, like figures in an old tapestry. The women are open-faced and ready to smile. They jingle their bracelets and wear sashes twelve yards long, wound round and round their middles. In these they carry everything from a hen to a bag of rice to a baby.

Only the thinnest of threads link that ancient civilization to our own, and one of them is cars. Yes, Nepal has automobiles—to travel the few roads that radiate for about fifteen miles from the capital. But the most up-to-date (that we saw) was a 1935 touring car.

The trick about having cars in Nepal is that each one has had to be carried in on the shoulders of men, for man is the only beast of burden in Nepal. First they constructed a frame of poles, put the car on it, removed wheels and bumpers, covered it, and then sixty men stooped down, lifted the frame and proceeded through the dense jungle and up the stiff steep pass to Katmandu!

As you jog along from the little airport to the city, the roadway is lined with people—men, women, children—bowed down under their loads; everybody always carries something. But they are not overburdened spiritually, and give you a wide smile if you smile at them. You pass pink brick farmhouses, wheat fields, rice paddies, and big-horned gray cattle that in the distant valleys are crossed with yaks.

Katmandu itself is a true medieval city. Its streets are narrow and twisted, with high wooden houses leaning over them. The bazaar is lined with tiny shops entirely open to the street, where the customer sits cross-legged, fingering a piece of cloth, and an old woman in a doorway smokes a big cumbersome wooden pipe.

The half million or so people tightly packed into Katmandu live without plumbing. The women carry water from the public fountains in their highly polished brass vessels. And sanitation is left to the dogs. All night long their howls sound through your sleep.

The Nepalese live intimately with their religion, which is a mixture of Buddhism and Hinduism. No ranking Nepalese can eat with an unbeliever. To mingle with Westerners is to be contaminated. When the first powerful Rana prime minister took it upon himself to cross the ocean to visit Queen Victoria, he and his family and all his retainers had to make a six-month pilgrimage to the holiest Hindu shrines for penance. On our own visit to Nepal we met a Brahman whose work throws him in with foreigners such as ourselves. But after each of these contacts, his wife and his mother-in-law refuse to let him enter his own house. He must take off his clothes, put on a loincloth, and eat alone on a board outside the door.

The Nepalese die young. That is medieval too. It is rare in the bazaar to see a face over forty. But they live happily because they know no other way to live. They are only 4 per cent literate. And they are still untroubled—at least 96 per cent of them—by the problems that wear us down.

They have the eternal satisfaction of people to whom religion is a living reality. And they have—above and behind all—their mighty mountains.

We saw the long gleaming range of the Himalayas in all its glory—sharp peaks rising 23,000, 26,000, 28,000 feet into the blue heavens, all the length of the horizon. We flew toward them in the cockpit of a small bucket plane—nothing below or around us—and ahead, Anapurna in her incredible magnificence. Every fold and crevice of the great massif shone dazzling white in the sun. And it seemed to us the nearest glimpse of paradise that man in his life can ever hope to get. It was godly, yet bound to the earth as men are—a paradise that seemed almost attainable.

END

EWING GALLOWAY

Mt. Everest, top of the Himalayas.

No "nylon gray" for these college girls—they use LA FRANCE.

Out of the blue . . . the whitest, brightest nylon ever!

WOMEN EVERYWHERE are discovering the wonders of La France. It's detergent, nylon brightener and bluing all in one handy box.

White nylons stay white and new-looking . . . when you wash them in New La France Bluing right from the start.

What's more, if other washing products have left older nylons gray-tinged . . . you can restore their fresh brightness and whiteness in just five La France washings. And La France won't turn fabric yellow like most bleaches will.

P. S. La France is perfect for all your family wash, too . . . no special bluing rinse needed. Another fine product of General Foods.

La France is detergent, nylon brightener and bluing all in one handy box.

Works 5 ways to help create the Texture of Youth

SATURA

Look for results in days!

1. Special elements steal dewy moisture from the air to guard against drying by wind and weather.
2. Estrogenic hormones work beneath the surface to cushion against sallowness and lines of age.
3. Special formula humidifies directly to create petal smoothness.
4. Vitamin A guards staunchly against flaking typical of an older skin.
5. Emollients retard excessive evaporation to counteract aging lines.

Tonight and every night, smooth on silken, pink Satura. Disappears instantly — starts working instantly. Use it regularly under make-up, too. Cream $3.50 and $5.00. Lotion $5.00.

In Canada,

For beauty the modern way

Dorothy Gray

DAVE DAVIES

Teen-agers' plea to be "a real part of our church" means welcome aid to busy teachers. Blessed by sunny climate, this "fastest-growing church in the fastest-growing community" holds classes outdoors year round.

CHILDREN CROWD THIS SUNDAY SCHOOL ...Van Nuys, California

More Than "Baby-Sitting"

By MARGARET HICKEY

Every Sunday morning in churches across the land the shuffling of pint-sized chairs into neat rows mingles with the chatter of young voices. A friendly hand is raised to signal silence, and everyone settles down to await the first chord of the opening hymn. Thus begins for several million American children the tradition known as Sunday school.

For long years some parents who brought or sent their youngsters thought of this hour as nothing more than a good "baby-sitting" service. Others hoped their children would learn basic religious tenets so that they themselves might be spared answering "difficult" questions. Other parents thought it was "the thing to do."

But today many individual churches, as well as their national denominations, have been taking a hard look at the Sunday school, its leadership, its curriculum and its participants. And they are unanimous on one point: that it must be only part of a wider religious experience for young people—an experience that includes the whole family. Now, through new programs, many parents realize that delivering their boys and girls to the Sunday-school door is not enough.

At Covenant Presbyterian Church in Los Angeles, California, for example, fathers and mothers register in Sunday school right along with their children. The adults talk with the class leader about the study program, about quarterly parents' meetings, sometimes held in church members' homes. St. John's Lutheran Church in Linthicum Heights, Maryland, reports that parents meet every month with teacher and pastor; many are conducting devotional services and Bible readings with their youngsters at home.

St. Matthews' Episcopal Church in Wilton, Connecticut, holds a special 9:30 family church service for parents and children. Afterward, youngsters go to Sunday-school class while 75 to 100 adults meet in small groups to think through together what their religion means to them and how to practice their principles effectively at home. A Family Resource Book is inspiring parents at Christ Church in Orville, Ohio, to take time to learn and have fun with their children. The book, containing suggested prayers, games and stories to read aloud, is prepared quarterly by the United Church of Christ. As one mother said, "For the first time I realized that it is my job, more than anybody else's, to teach faith to my children." END

Seasonal but unusually heavy rain had poured down all day Saturday and Saturday night, leaving many streets in the San Fernando Valley flooded. The rain had stopped by Sunday morning, but the leaden sky still threatened. A little before nine o'clock a car pulled into the parking area of the Church of the Chimes in suburban Van Nuys and four people got out—a man, a woman, a teen-age girl and a small boy.

"Well, we found the place," the man said cheerfully. "Our new neighbor's directions were easy to follow, even with the storm and those confusing California freeways we heard so many jokes about back home."

The Blaines—George, Mary, teen-age Kathy and nine-year-old Jack—are newcomers to Southern California, Ohioans transplanted to the fantastically booming Los Angeles area by George's job as an aircraft technician. For a moment they stood looking around uncertainly. They saw other parked cars nearby, but no people. Pretty Kathy looked suddenly discouraged.

Her mother patted her hand reassuringly. "Don't you worry," she said. "Yesterday, when I asked the lady next door about our nearest Congregational church, she said that the Church of the Chimes is 'the friendliest church in town.' She said that it has special programs for teen-agers and we should look for the program director, Miss Marjorie Likins."

As she spoke, Kathy's mother hoped she was right. This move to California represented real job advancement for her husband, George. Nine-year-old Jack had already made friends with every youngster on their block. But the move had been hard for teen-age Kathy. Kathy missed her friends back home, the familiar school and Sunday school she had attended ever since she could remember. So Mary Blaine hoped with all her heart that her new neighbor was right about the Church of the Chimes and its "friendly" teen-age program.

The Blaines walked past a stone-and-redwood chapel and a sprawling rectory with wide porches and terraces. Rounding that, they found themselves in a big, tree-shaded patio almost completely enclosed by buildings. Some of the buildings were new (wide-windowed classrooms and 450-seat Fellowship Hall where adult worship services are held until the vast new sanctuary can be translated from architect's drawings into reality) and some were old (a garage and a garden-tool shed remodeled to house other classes of the church school). In the center of the patio a fenced swimming pool looked just a little chilly under today's gray sky.

There were people in the patio, the Blaines saw, laughing and chatting and hurrying about in a pleasant sort of organized confusion. Two young men were building a fire in an outdoor fireplace and bringing out chairs and a big urn of coffee for the Sunday "Kaffeeklatsch" meeting of parents. Four boys were setting up folding tables and chairs on porches, terraces, sidewalks and driveways. (One of the boys was tall and sandy-haired and he reminded Kathy Blaine of the boy she'd gone to the Junior Prom with, back home.)

Two teen-age girls busily distributed signs on the tables as fast as they were set up—"Junior High, Ninth Grade"; "Sixth Grade"; "Fourth Grade," and others.

As the Blaines were to learn, not an inch of space can be wasted at the Church of the Chimes on Sunday mornings. All classrooms are crowded, as are the living room and the church offices in the rectory. The rectory dining room ("and sometimes the kitchen and breakfast nook!") is lined with cribs for the youngest churchgoers of all—the babies.

The church—called "the fastest-growing church in the fastest-growing community in the world"—started with a Sunday-school enrollment of 31, but attendance has risen so fast in its short seven-year history that it must now hold classes outdoors and divide its 1300 young students into 9:30 and 11:00 "shifts" each Sunday.

This unprecedented growth brought shortages. When the young church took over its present site—a large estate which seemed to the church's founder, youthful-looking Reverend Walter Staves, to be exactly right for the sort of church he had dreamed of since his own school days, "a campus church, open to youngsters all the time"—it appeared that they had all the space they could ever need. "Now we are close to outgrowing the site," Doctor Staves says. "All our building must be very carefully planned and we are already sponsoring 'baby' churches in some of the more distant parts of our big parish."

So many new students—"We average twelve to thirteen a week," says Marjorie Likins (whose actual title is the Reverend Miss Likins,

CONTINUED ON PAGE 45

"makes such a difference"

The new Wondersoft covering on Kotex napkins makes such a difference to your comfort. This gently woven covering won't rub, won't chafe, won't bunch. And you're so confident with Kotex, for you know this softer napkin provides absorbency that's both instant and complete.

For even greater comfort you'll want the new Kotex belt. It has a special, self-locking clasp that won't "dig in" like metal, yet never lets the napkin slip or slide.

No wonder more women choose Kotex than all other brands.

Memo to Mothers: Every year over 100,000 girls begin to menstruate before they are eleven. So it's not too soon to tell your daughter at ten. Our free booklet, "You're A Young Lady Now," helps give the facts she needs to know. Write Miss Jones, Kimberly-Clark Corp., Neenah, Wis.

KOTEX and WONDERSOFT are trademarks of Kimberly-Clark Corp.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 43

Minister of Christian Education) soon made it clear that the church school faced a shortage of trained teachers too. It was this teacher shortage that resulted in the Teen Aide program. "Actually it wasn't a planned program in the beginning," says brisk young Miss Likins. "We needed assistants to help carry the load of extracurricular work for our teachers so that they would have more time for classwork itself. For some months our teen-agers had been telling us, 'We want to be a real, working part of our church. What can we do?' We felt that they needed to be needed—we needed their help. The Teen Aide program came as naturally as breathing, one need simply answering another."

Selected for their reliability, warmth and the genuineness of their interest, the Teen Aide volunteers have indeed become "a real, working part" of their church. "I don't see how we'd get along without them now," praises one teacher, Mrs. Arthur Prater. "They all love working with children and they are just wonderful with them."

As the Blaines watch this morning (a little hesitant to interrupt) Marjorie Likins is directing all the organized confusion of an average Sunday morning at the Church of the Chimes. She is supervising placement of the folding tables and chairs, greeting early arrivals, checking to see whether the storm has made it impossible for any of her teachers to get here this morning (it has), surveying the sky for signs of more rain (she is relieved to see none), making sure the junior choir is getting into choir robes, finding electric heaters to take the unaccustomed chill off the classrooms before the children arrive.

The two Teen Aide girls finish placing identifying signs on the outdoor classroom tables and dash into Miss Likins' office to bring out file boxes of blue attendance cards to set up on a smaller table. "Register Here," a sign on this table requests all newcomers. (Cards marked "Blaine, John" and "Blaine, Katherine" will go into those file boxes this morning.) Then one Teen Aide—slim, blond and very pretty in a crisp cotton dress and white sweater—hurries over to ask, "What can we do now, Miss Likins?"

Marjorie Likins shifts an armload of papers and hands over a double handful of pencils from a bulging pocket of her tweed suit. "Thanks, Dede," she says gratefully. Seventeen-year-old Diane Roscoe is so consistently called "Dede" that even close friends have to think twice to remember her given name.) "Could you pass out these exam papers and see that all the classes have enough pencils? Oh—and because of the storm we're two teachers short for the nine-thirty classes. You and Pat can fill in with me supervising, can't you?" Eighteen-year-old Pat Snow is the second Teen Aide.

As do all Teen Aides, Dede and Pat love children, like nothing better than to "really teach" instead of just assisting, rarely get a chance unless an emergency like today's storm delays regular teachers. Dede snatches a quick glance at the sky. It looks a little brighter. "Can we get all our classes under cover if it rains again?"

"I don't know," Marjorie Likins says cheerfully. "We've never had to do it. It hasn't rained on a Sunday morning in five years."

As Dede hurries off on her errands, Miss Likins sees the Blaine family waiting nearby. She goes to meet them.

"Hello," she smiles. "It's nice to see you. I'm Marjorie Likins. This is your first Sunday with us, isn't it? Are you new to Van Nuys?"

This is no magically accurate guess, though many newcomers think it is. Miss Likins already knows a lot about the Blaines. They are almost a composite picture of the 10 to 12 new families who come to the Church of the Chimes every Sunday.

To Marjorie, these new people are "really fine. They are mostly quite young and have two, three or four children. They are working people with good jobs and promising futures but—right now—more enthusiasm than money. They've moved to Southern California from all forty-eight states and they all feel a little strange at first. They all face the same problem—building a new life in a new community. Even when they haven't been regular churchgoers back home, they seem to feel that here church gives this new life a sort of familiar rallying point, that it's a good way for them—and even more for their children—to get acquainted with their community. We're happy when these new people come to us."

Have the courage to face a difficulty, lest it kick you harder than you bargain for. KING STANISLAUS OF POLAND

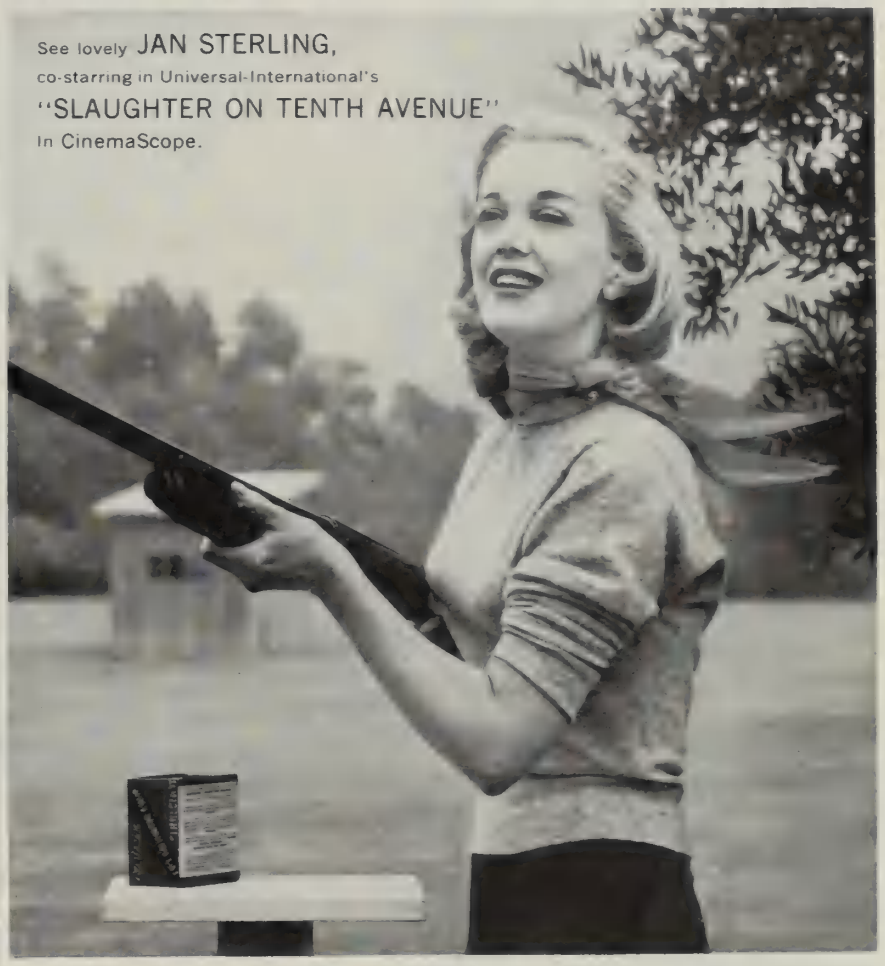
George Blaine introduces himself and his family. Moments later Kathy and Jack are at the registration desk filling out their cards, George and Mary are on their way to meet some of the church members before the services begin. Sweet-faced Pat Snow takes nine-year-old Jack off to find the class he will attend. And, at Miss Likins' suggestion, Dede takes Kathy in tow.

"Do you like being a Teen Aide?" Kathy asks a bit shyly as she paces fleet-footed Dede on her pencil-and-paper-distributing chore, then waits while Dede locates a missing book for a teacher. By now, children of all ages are streaming in to Sunday school. Kathy watches little girls in stiffly petticoated Sunday dresses, little boys spoiling their Sunday shoeshines with quick, surreptitious forays into puddles along the driveway. (Puddles in Southern California are rare enough to be enticing.) Other Teen Aides help new students to register and find their classes. From the chapel comes the sound of thirty young voices raised in song as the Junior Department begins its worship service. The tall, sandy-haired boy Kathy had noticed earlier hurries past on his way toward Fellowship Hall. He is wearing a choir robe now, Kathy sees. Kathy used to sing in the choir back home. It's one of the things she misses.

Then Dede comes back to explain, "I love being a Teen Aide. Our whole bunch does. We like other church activities, too: choir, Chime Players (that's the drama group), discussion meetings, holiday dances and special programs, swimming—we use the pool a lot when the children's swim classes aren't in session."

Parents say that when Dede's "bunch" gathers around the pool on a sunny afternoon it isn't hard to see that churchwork like the Teen Aide program does indeed come "as naturally as breathing." Talk—even unself-conscious argument—turns as easily to spiritual and philosophical questions as it does to dates, hot rods, football or rock-and-roll vs. calypso. (Question: "Why do people fight? Is 'peace on earth' just words?" Answer that rates the most nods: "People fight because they don't know and understand each other well enough. If we had understanding we could have peace.") Two of the boys plan to enter the ministry, several girls have asked Miss Likins how to go about preparing for a career in religious education.

One current nationwide survey asking "Are teen-agers serious about religion?" found the answer to be "Yes" from 71 per cent of the boys interviewed and 67 per cent of the girls. But a few of them did feel that some churches were ignoring the needs of their teen-age parishioners, "being harsh and demanding rather than loving and forgiving." A number agreed with the eighteen-year-old Southern girl who said "more church programs should be organized for teens."



"It's a fine thing they've got going here," one enthusiastic father of a Church of the Chimes Teen Aide says. "A healthy approach to a problem that worries most of us who have kids these days—juvenile delinquency."

Dede takes Kathy for a peek into the nursery. "My first job as a Teen Aide was helping look after the babies," she says. However busy other chores keep her, Dede still manages a quick visit every Sunday morning and "nursery duty" remains a favorite

CONTINUED ON PAGE 113

New Spray-Set
by the makers of
Lustre-Creme...

SETS HAIR TO STAY THE SOFTEST WAY!

SUPER-SOFT
LUSTRE-NET HAIR SPRAY

Loved by Hollywood Stars because it's non-drying... contains no lacquer... mists hair with Lanolin!

HOLLYWOOD FOUND IT FIRST—NOW IT CAN BE YOURS!

There are 2 types of Lustre-Net. Super-soft for loose, casual hair-do's. Regular for hard-to-manage hair. 5½ oz. can—a full ounce more! Only $1.25 plus tax.

for the world's most precious heads!

EAGLEKNIT®

THE NAME BRAND IN KNITTED HEADWEAR

• Why not buy the finest knitted headwear for your children? Eagleknits are so attractively styled, the shapes are so becoming, the colors so right. "Knit to fit"—they give the cozy protection youngsters need! At stores everywhere.

EAGLE KNITTING MILLS, MILWAUKEE 4

THERE'S A MAN IN THE HOUSE

By HARLAN MILLER

"I wish there was something we could do about your being middle-aged."

Our lunch-table's autocrat finds a new alibi for sharp-tongued men: If they needle mothers-in-law and other winsome examples of the lovely sex, it's only a twitch: they're so often targets for wives, kids and corny comics at home.

This is my hundredth page in this peerless magazine; it seems like nine years instead of only eight and a third. But I haven't become broader or more tolerant; I weigh the same, and I'm more convinced than ever that fifty-foot lots are too narrow.

Our goal of 100 outdoor meals this summer is in the bag. I've bought a newfangled electric lighter for charcoal. I plug it in and presto, in three or four minutes our grill is filled with glowing coals.

Evolution of the modern small boy:
1930: "My dad is richer than your dad!"
1940: "My dad can lick your dad!"
1950: "My dad knows more than your dad!"
1960: "My dad is dumber than your dad!"

Just a horseback judgment (one man's opinion): Nine out of ten of the girls seen publicly in short-shorts would look better in flaring, roomy skirts.

My Dream Girl has got us convinced (herself more than me) that the sweetbreads she prefers are far more elegant than the gizzards I like. Can I make her change her tune by becoming a sweetbread fan myself?

My favorite matron next door declines to go window-shopping with her husband, his pet form of outdoor exercise. "It's just a trick," she says; "anything I admire in a window he can scorch in a few well-chosen words."

I often nudge my Lady Love into rationalizing the medicine cabinet with one dire threat: If it isn't thinned out and tidied up by Sunday I'll empty the whole mess into a wastebasket.

Only in England does a man look smartly dressed if his clothes are too skimpy and tight; it's traditional, sleeves too short and curves overemphasized. In this rebellious colony of ours a man looks better in loose clothes.

My wife tends to be awed by authoritative saleswomen. I remind her that though a little sales resistance is a dangerous thing, a lot of it may help us save enough money to travel around the world someday.

If a woman's facial expression isn't the most important thing she wears, it's one of her three greatest charms. I think a woman in a house dress with a sweet, pleasant face undercuts a woman in mink with a petulant, racetrack look.

My proudest boast (they can carve it on my headstone) is that when I take my family (three, four or five of us) into a cafeteria to dine my check is usually the lowest.

At our town's snazziest country club the crowd that loiters in the locker room for a few drinks after a killer eighteen holes of golf thinks it's choicer than the crowd that changes clothes and goes home. (Luckily, each looks down on the other.)

"I have the answer at last!" proclaims Peter Comfort, hanging up on a tree his new iron house number. "In this jittery world it isn't safe for a boy to be really rude to anybody except his own father."

Since it's agreed that nine out of ten couples quarrel two or three times a week, why don't the home builders equip each residence with a small, comfortable doghouse?

My lawyer who vacationed in Washington says the upstarts some states elect to Congress are an insult to their sister states. "We ought to send 'em Bronx cheers on picture post cards," he says in disgust.

If we men devoted as much time and thought to our beauty and clothes as the women do (argues our lunch-club wit), there'd be either more love triangles or fewer.

Because of the massive prestige of Ivy League colleges and their grads' clothes, husbands' bosses seem more relaxed with employees who wear dark, conservative duds. (I think men in tan or green sports coats are actually just as reliable.)

Twice recently our daughter's Patrick needed stitches in his head: once he edged a radio off a table onto his cranium, once he uncoiled fast under an auto-license plate. Someday he'll be as cautious as his mom at three, twisting her neck to see where she was sitting down.

When we were newlyweds I had a silly idea: to buy two small houses on adjoining lots (not fifty-foot lots), one for our children, one for ourselves, an arcade between. How often I've regretted I didn't yield to the wisdom of this silly notion!

Has Emily Post ever reversed her outmoded decision? I mean her ruling that a wife can invite attractive extra males to a party, while a husband apparently dassn't invite decorative females? Don't be selfish, Emily.

Our neighbors are breathing easier: in a few days teachers once again take over part-time the task of spoiling their children, ignoring their bad manners. (And at salaries far lower than individual baby sitters'd total.)

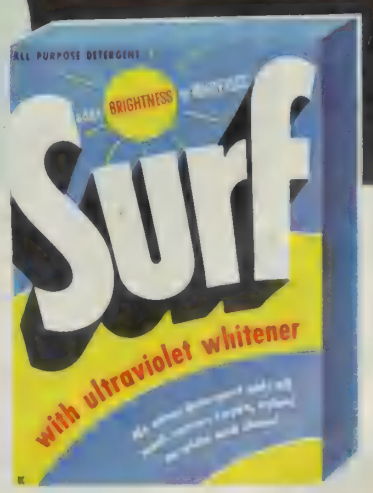
I've altered my opinion since my first column, when I estimated three kisses a day (twice as many on Sundays) might keep a marriage happy. I up my figures to seven kisses plus ten smiles ■ day.

Friends invited twenty couples to a party around their new swimming pool. Some brought suits, nobody went swimming. Nobody got pushed in. "I wish I'd mortgaged the house and built this pool," said the host, "when our children were little."

My ever-hungry neighbor across the street agrees to quit raiding the icebox if his wife will O.K. a three-in-one range-refrigerator-sink in his bedroom. "So I can fix us some coffee each morning," he explains virtuously.

I marvel at the superhuman brains reflected in the supermarket designs, until I discover that I have to ask three or four execs to find out where they keep the sugar-free pop.

. . . When I discover our youngest has memorized the Edna Millay poem that hangs above my shaving mirror,
. . . And our daughter appears to have grown up without a trace of extravagance in her make-up,
. . . Or Junior continues studious even as an Air Force flier in Japan,
. . . And our young in-laws turn out as enchanting as our friends' sons- and daughters-in-law we've admired,
Then I lie on the chigger-infested grass and gaze up at the stars a long, long time, deeply thankful.



SURF ADDS BRIGHTNESS

(yes...even to perfect whiteness)

New Laundry Discovery!

A wash that's merely white is no longer the best you can do. Now all-purpose Surf has a special brightener that puts ultra-violet rays (like those in sunshine) to work for you. Surf actually adds brightness—even to perfect whiteness. Brightens colors, too. Try today's Surf and see. If you don't get the whitest, brightest wash ever, Lever Brothers will refund every penny.

Now! Even humdrum hair can seethe with excitement!

NEW DuBARRY COLOR GLO

- Foams new living color right into your hair!
- Washes right out with your next shampoo!
- Looks so natural it's your own exciting secret!

There's never been hair color like DuBarry Color Glo! Not a rinse—not a color shampoo—but a whole new way to color your hair. This fabulous foam gives a new color-lift to every shade of hair under the sun!

Foam in Color Glo after your next shampoo, and rinse. That's all! No mixing, no fixing, no fussing. It's fun, fast... and fool-proof! Color Glo stays on evenly... conditions while it's on ...shampoos out completely.

With Color Glo you can accent and intensify your own hair color ...or you can have a dramatic new color this very night! With Color Glo, blonde isn't bland... it's brilliant! Black isn't flat... it's fiery! Red isn't raging... it's radiant! And gray is never, never drab... it's pure shimmering silver! After your next shampoo, foam fabulous color into your hair with new DuBarry Color Glo!

Choose from these newest, truest-to-life colors...

Golden Leopard puts golden gleam in blonde hair, a twinkle in brown hair.

Midnight Panther deepens black hair to sparkling jet. Gives brown velvety depth.

Red Cheetah lifts red hair to fiery brilliance. Gives brunettes a burnished glow.

Brown Jaguar adds richness and warmth... makes brown sparkle with highlights!

Silver Mink gives a fresh silver shimmer to faded white, gray or ash-blonde hair.

DuBARRY COLOR GLO 1.50 PLUS TAX

New Palmolive Soap Gives New Life to Your Complexion!

JUST ONE BAR WILL PROVE IT! BECAUSE NEW PALMOLIVE BRINGS OUT BEAUTY WHILE IT CLEANS YOUR SKIN!

New Lather!

Think of the softest, creamiest lather!
It's yours in New Palmolive. Rich, white lather that actually soothes as it cleanses... helps your true complexion beauty come through!

New Fragrance!

Think of the most fabulous French perfumes!
They were the inspiration for Palmolive's haunting new fragrance. So fresh, so clean, so heaven-scented!

New Color!

Think of the fresh green of spring!
That's the color of New Palmolive... all pretty and new for a prettier you!

New Wrapper!

Wrap them all up in gleaming emerald foil —and there you have the exciting New Palmolive Soap ... the best news your complexion ever had!

There's never been a beauty soap like this before... NOT EVEN PALMOLIVE!

"We both admit we're unhappy together—we don't seem capable of real sharing."

By CLIFFORD R. ADAMS, Ph.D.
Pennsylvania State University, Department of Psychology

WHAT DOES HE WANT?

"My husband is twenty-six, I'm twenty-three. We have no children. We've been married three years, but I still don't know what he wants from marriage, or from me. We don't think alike, and don't seem capable of real sharing.

"I enjoy my job, but he wouldn't like me to work except that he saves more money that way. We can't agree about going out or staying in, what television show to watch, what to do for recreation—even table manners and the way I dress. He says I'm vain, unappreciative, a poor housekeeper, too talkative. We both admit we're unhappy together, but feel we'd be even worse off apart.

"I'm more and more rebellious inside, but I'm too confused to know what to do. I suppose everything would be all right if I could give in to him more. But I don't think as he does, and feel that I would destroy my real self if I did."

Though many of this wife's complaints may appear trivial, continuing disagreements over even minor matters can destroy the couple's pleasure in day-to-day living, and can prevent or disrupt harmony between them. However, unless their differences are rooted in fundamental conflict, they can probably find ways to resolve them. (I have referred them to a competent counselor for help.)

But it is quite possible that what the husband really wants in a wife is a person his real wife never was, never can be and does not wish to be. Some men (more often than women) do have rather concrete and limited ideas of the role they want their wives to play. Unfortunately, they sometimes choose—and are accepted by—a girl not suited to the part.

Some men want a wife who is essentially a Hausfrau—highly domestic, conservative and rather self-effacing, more concerned with the duties and skills of keeping house than anything outside her home. A girl interested in combining marriage with a professional career would be miserable as the wife of such a man.

Another man may want a wife who will perform for him very much as his mother did—anticipate his needs, indulge his wishes, protect him from his mistakes. He may look to her for leadership, willingly allow her to manage the marriage, make most decisions and assume most of the responsibility. A dominant, mature and self-reliant woman could be happy in this role, but a timid, inexperienced girl who has always depended on others for guidance would be overwhelmed.

Then there are men who definitely prefer their wives to have careers. Such a man takes for granted satisfactory domestic arrangements, is not much interested beyond that; prefers urban surroundings and pastimes to a house in the suburbs, likes to discuss news of the day or business developments with his wife rather than home affairs. An extremely domestic, subservient girl would bore him, but he would resist domination or "mothering."

There is nothing wrong with any of these mental images of a wife's role, provided the girl who undertakes it has the aptitudes and inclination to fulfill it. The time for a couple to find out whether they want and expect the same things from marriage is before the marriage takes place.

But what about the woman already married who fears she and her husband are incompatible? The possibilities of mismating we have sketched are extreme examples. After all, the average man is not so inflexible that he wants only a Hausfrau, a mother substitute or a career woman. He does want a wife who is interested in her home but not obsessed by it, a partner who will share his responsibilities but not usurp them, a companion who loves and respects him and values their relationship more than any career, whether or not she pursues one.

These goals are not beyond the reach of any woman who loves her husband, assuming their marriage was based on something more than infatuation or expediency. She need not submerge her "real self," but she can emphasize and expand the areas of agreement between her and her husband.

Be adaptable—to his moods and needs, his faults and failures as well as his virtues and successes. Mutual acceptance is essential to harmony in any partnership.

Be trustworthy. A man wants to know that he can depend on his wife to perform whatever duties she has undertaken. A job does not excuse her from fulfilling responsibilities she has accepted.

Be sociable—a willing hostess, an appreciative guest, a good listener. He wants you to look your best in public, but does not want you to attract attention by spectacular appearance or unconventional behavior.

Be companionable. Doing things together that you both enjoy will not only bring you pleasure, but will strengthen the bonds between you. Start now to cultivate an interest in activities that appeal to him.

Be communicative. Be willing to talk, to listen, to laugh at his stories. He won't find time to talk things over if he has to listen to a recital of complaints.

The things that matter most to the couple next door may mean little to you. The vital principle in compatibility is that husband and wife agree, share, think and feel alike. Differences between you should become smaller with every year of marriage. They will, if you try.

REWARD—OR RETREAT?

Last week a friend came into my office for a seemingly casual chat. But there was something on his mind. "You know, I'll be retiring in three weeks, and I'm not ready for it. I've been so busy that inactivity frightens me. I suppose I'll make out, but I don't know what I'll do with myself." Like many men of sixty to seventy, he had failed to plan ahead.

In a sense, most wives "retire" in their late forties, several years before their husbands. When the children are grown and on their own, a woman's most demanding responsibilities are fulfilled. This empty-nest stage can be a period of great strain for her (and her husband) if she allows herself to become inactive, to dwell on memories of the past instead of plans for the future, to conclude that her days are meaningless and she herself of little use.

But "retirement" need not and should not mean stagnation and withdrawal. The woman who has thoughtfully anticipated the empty-nest stage can make her life as meaningful and rewarding as ever, though in different ways. She will find new opportunities for service to friends and community, for exercise of talents, for sheer enjoyment. And the better her adjustment now, the better equipped she will be to help her husband make the transition when his turn comes.

Long before actual retirement, husband and wife should be planning for it, preparing themselves to make full and productive use of the greatest measure of freedom they have known as adults. Here are some questions they will find answers to together:

How will we manage financially? Even with Social Security, insurance benefits and perhaps a pension, income will undoubtedly be reduced. But so will responsibilities. The important point is to adapt your manner of living to your present means and requirements, rather than clinging to an outmoded scheme of things. A big house, a second car, many things that seemed essential when the children were at home can be eliminated now without discomfort.

What will we do? Perhaps one or both will want part- or full-time employment. If so, start now to study various job requirements, to acquire or perfect marketable skills. But don't allow a job, present or future, to become your sole interest in life. Cultivate hobbies, pursue a course of study, explore community activities. The person with a wide range of skills, experience and acquaintance seldom need worry about passing the time.

Where will we live? Your answer need no longer be determined by employment or proximity to the children. Perhaps you will prefer familiar surroundings, but you now have the option of seeking a more agreeable climate, a more picturesque landscape or lower costs. But if you decide to move, it is wise to postpone permanent commitment, such as buying a home, until you have tried out the new locale on a temporary basis.

Oddly, few husbands prepare for retirement (except perhaps in financial terms) unless deliberately encouraged to do so. That is why the wife must take the lead. If she has lived constructively in the years since the children were grown, she has learned to appreciate the rewards of a different way of life. Her attitude has helped her husband look forward to retirement as a reward, not a deprivation.

DO YOU AGREE?

Do many girls marry before twenty?

In one third of all first marriages, the bride is either eighteen or nineteen years old.

ASK YOURSELF:

Are We Compatible?

The compatibility of any couple is best evaluated by the expression of feelings of each spouse toward the other. In taking this quiz, first answer the questions as they stand. Then change them so you can answer them a second time as though they applied to you. Be absolutely fair in judging both yourself and your husband.

Where You are Concerned
Does Your Husband Usually:

1. Maintain control of his temper?
2. Go along with your decisions?
3. Behave assuredly and confidently?
4. Praise and commend rather than criticize?
5. Confide in you in most things?
6. Credit you for some of his success?
7. Compromise rather than argue strongly?
8. Laugh at funny things you tell him?
9. Talk over important matters before acting?
10. Get over anger quickly?
11. Act pleasantly and good-humoredly?
12. Not seem jealous or possessive?
13. Seem interested in your friends?
14. Treat you as an equal partner?

Count up the "Yes" answers. If the total of your first set of answers is 11 or more (the average is 9), then you appear to be fulfilling your husband's wants. If the total of your second set of answers is 12 or more (the average is 10), then your husband would seem to be meeting your wants. Now add the two scores together. If the total is 24 or more, you two should have a very compatible marriage (the average couple gets 20 to 21). Should the total be 18 or less, there is some area of incompatibility in your marriage. The article above should help you find it—and correct it.

Unretouched photo of the hands of Mrs. Fran Miggins of New York City. Jergens Lotion was applied to the right hand only.

Reach for Jergens... and stop "Detergent Hands"

The answer to rough, red hands is right at your fingertips! Over 450 women proved it in a scientific test.* They soaked both hands in detergents 3 times a day. In several days, left hands not treated with Jergens Lotion became coarse and red. But right hands, treated with Jergens, stayed soft and lovely. No other lotion similarly tested kept hands so soft, smooth. Jergens stops all chapping and dryness. It doesn't "glove" hands with sticky film... it penetrates to help replace natural moisture lost to summer sun and wind, indoor and outdoor chores. Only 15¢ to $1.

*Notice to doctors and dermatologists—for summary of test write The Andrew Jergens Co., Cincinnati, Ohio

Journal ABOUT TOWN

Gossip about people you know,
editors you like,
and what goes on in New York

FIFTY YEARS AGO IN THE JOURNAL

The world's largest liner, the Lusitania, arrived in New York on her maiden voyage in September, 1907. Paris decreed new "tender" fashion colors, copied from Watteau canvases, of blue gray, gray violet and "tea green." Wisteria, ferns and ribbons trimmed the new drooping mushroom or scoop-shaped hats. The Merry Widow had its première in America and for a time the waltz swept into the background the fox trot, turkey trot, the grizzly bear and the bunny hug.

"At almost any railroad station of any small town or city you will see a bevy of young girls, showily dressed, with uncovered heads, often with bare arms and necks, whispering and giggling and engaged in flirtations," remarks Editor Bok disapprovingly in the September, 1907, JOURNAL.

In this issue a JOURNAL reporter tells of visiting 150 churches in New York, Brooklyn and Boston to see if they would welcome a stranger. Results: hardly a smile, friendly nod or glance from ministers or parishioners. Next month, the Midwest!

"The maid of all work has struck, and struck for good," remarks The Plain Country Woman. "I used to hire a good cook, who also did all laundry work and cleaning, for $2 a week. Now I could not hire such a cook for $10."

Asks a young girl, "I expect to enter college this autumn. Will I have any need for a sweater?"

"Fresh sprigs of sage spread on the pantry shelves will drive ants away."

"I must have a dressy evening gown, but am in deepest mourning and no lace or embroidery is allowed," states Desperate. Solution: "Choose a soft, pretty material and trim it with tucks."

"To lessen the heat in the kitchen, partly cook your dinner vegetables at breakfast. Then when you start the fire for dinner at noon, a short time finishes the cooking."

An Elementary Lesson in Fancy Sewing includes hemstitching, rolling, whipping, buttonholes and buttonhole loops.

"Can I wear a black straw hat with black ostrich plume and a bow of black velvet ribbon during mourning?" "No," decrees the JOURNAL'S fashion editor. "Neither trimming is permissible."

Anne Einselen, chief explorer of the Discovery Department, and half a day's prospects.

To show how amazingly productive authors are, we asked Anne Einselen if she'd pose for her picture with one day's pile of unsolicited manuscripts heaped on her Discovery Department desk. But it didn't work. We couldn't see Anne behind them. So we reduced it to a half day's deluge of roughly forty novels, novelettes, short stories, articles and smaller pieces which total to over 22,000 a year, all of them read eagerly by Anne and her staff, and responded to by Anne whenever a spark emerges. So it's possible that more aspiring authors have Anne to thank for encouragement and accomplishment than are indebted to any other editor anywhere. For instance, the lady in Texas to whom Anne wrote suggesting that if she revised her story the JOURNAL just might be interested. How was Anne to know the lady would leap into the next plane and appear at Anne's desk, pencil in hand! "This couldn't happen again in a million years—I hope," said Anne. "But we bought the story."

Footnote to the above: Unsolicited manuscripts received last year—21,822. Accepted—16.

Just five years ago we polled the people here on whom they considered the four most popular living persons in the world, and have now done so again. We were delighted by the constancy it demonstrated when it turned out that the same four names came out on top this time too: Churchill, Schweitzer, Eisenhower, Eleanor Roosevelt. . . . Bruce Gould put down five questions he would like to ask Sir Winston. 1—Do you mind dying? 2—What would you like to be remembered for? 3—What was your greatest failure? 4—Who was your greatest opponent? 5—Who was your greatest contemporary? Questions, we thought, as provocative as the great man's answers would be illuminating.

On a recent whirlwind trip to Paris in which she got world-famous couturières to design advance fall accessories for JOURNAL readers (see pages 62 to 65), Wilhela Cushman spotted Castillo of Lanvin's engaging pink rose headdress and had Meerson photograph it for a cover. Elizabeth Taylor saw it, loved it, ordered it for herself. Guillaume, who has dressed the crowned heads of Europe and created coiffures for most of the beautiful women of the world, did this new short smooth bouffant swirl especially for the cover photograph. The black taffeta evening coat with the wonderful silhouette neckline was designed by Castillo.

Like many teen-agers, Dorothy Lundquist thought sleeping a waste of time. Except that she examined this scientifically. First, she went altogether without sleep for 64 hours, then interspersed periods of sleeping 3 hours, 5 hours and 7 hours a night, with periods of normal sleeping. Each time, she tested her mental and physical alertness with various ingenious devices of her own contriving, arriving at the conclusion that to be at her best she needed 8½ hours a night. Naturally, this got out, and she became the hit of the annual meeting of the American Medical Association here, where she kept thousands of doctors a day awake describing her methods, and delighted Gladys Denny Shultz. "How's your alertness now?" asked Gladys. "Oh, dear!" said Dorothy. "I've been explaining about sleep so much to these doctors, I can hardly keep my eyes open."

Gladys Denny Shultz and sleep experimenter Lundquist.

PHOTOGRAPHS BY ABBOT MILLS

Neal Stuart, Jean Culp, Don Brennan and hot-off-the-press Journal.

Jean Culp and Neal Stuart came stumbling into the office after having been taken by Don Brennan through our printing plant that covers 108 acres at Sharon Hill, outside Philadelphia. "Why, they print enough magazines a day to make eighteen stacks as high as the Empire State Building!" Jean gasped. "Just the JOURNAL alone takes forty-four hundred tons of paper a month, for which Don says we maintain our own forests." "And everything happens so fast," said Neal. "If you don't watch where you're going, you're liable to be picked up, printed, trimmed, bound, stamped and mailed on the same page as one of your own stories."

Julia was going to a life she had never known. She would be mistress of a plantation in the Spice Islands— married to a man she had never seen.

Scent of Cloves

BEGINNING A NEW SERIAL

By NORAH LOFTS

When the dream reached its horrifying climax she began to scream, and woke herself and lay for a moment with the sound of her own voice and the screaming which had shrilled through the dream mingling in her ears. Then she was fully conscious, in her own bed, and the night all quiet about her. Just another dreadful dream.

She hoped she had not awakened the child in the next room, or poor old Maire, already so frightened, and Edward, who usually woke at her first whimper. She moved in search of the comforting solidity of his body and found his place beside her empty and cold. For a moment fear clamped down again. No, only a dream; nothing has happened yet.

There was the difference between this waking and all the other times when she had come out of dreams of terror to find herself safe and unthreatened. By this time tomorrow the dream might well be accomplished fact.

Only an archway, hung with a curtain, separated the two rooms, and now from the inner one came the sound of a voice.

"Lady, what is it? Have they come?"

One must not show fear before servants. "No. I was dreaming, Maire. Go back to sleep."

A mumbling grunt answered her, and then a faint glow of light that outlined the curtain and that presently pushed aside to show the old woman, fully dressed, the newly lit candle wobbling in her unsteady hand.

"The sleep has gone from me," Maire said. She shuffled forward, shielding the candle with one brown, wrinkled hand, reached the bed table and carefully transferred the flame to the other candle there. She set her candle beside the other and dropped on her knees by the bed, clutching the clothes with her hands.

"Lady, I could lead you and the little one to the caves at Cloonmagh and we should be safe there till the trouble is past."

"We are safe here," Lucy said steadily. "Where could we be safer than in a castle, with strong walls, and a moat, held by the best soldier in Ireland?"

"They took Drogheda," Maire said.

Copyright © 1957 by Norah Lofts

Lucy had said the same to Edward, and he had laughed. "And who held Drogheda? A mob of Irish, without loyalty or conviction, and a few politicians with tongues sharper than their swords."

"Drogheda was different," Lucy now said. "Here we are all of one mind, and under one command. Sir Edward will never let Cromwell take Arghama."

"Sir Edward is a bold gentleman . . . but, lady dear, in the night I was thinking. This Cromwell is going from Drogheda to Wexford, they say; he's not likely to leave this strong castle and a bold gentleman in it, standing behind his back. And him with a great army. Lady, in times of trouble it's safer to be in a secret place. And I'm thinking of the caves at Cloonmagh. In the ancient times when the men came in the long ships and burned and robbed and killed, the people in Cloonmagh took to the caves and were safe. And in the days of the pirates too. They say, 'Safe as the caves at Cloonmagh.' Sir Edward did me a wrong, taking up the bridge so sudden. . . . Lady dear"—her hands scrabbled for Lucy's through the bedclothes—"do you suppose, if you begged him, he'd let it down for just so long as I could run across? I'd be blessing you and praying for you all the rest of my days. Though you'd do well to come with me, you and Little Miss."

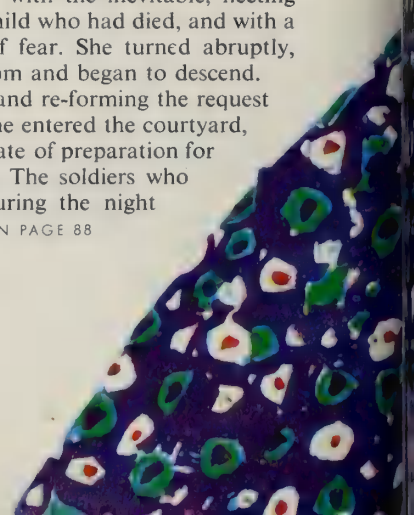
"I don't think anything would persuade Sir Edward to lower the bridge again," Lucy said, "and you wouldn't be safe outside, Maire. You might meet the soldiers."

"Not the way I would take. I know a safe, secret way. Lady dear, for the love of God, will you ask him?"

"I could ask," Lucy said unwillingly. "But I know I should waste my breath."

"Most times the master is anxious to pleasure you," Maire said, "and rightly, too, for a sweeter lady never lived." Suddenly, disconcertingly, she burst into tears.

"I can guess," Marie cried, clutching the roses to her breast. "It's our turn." But Julia looked as if she had received a mortal blow.

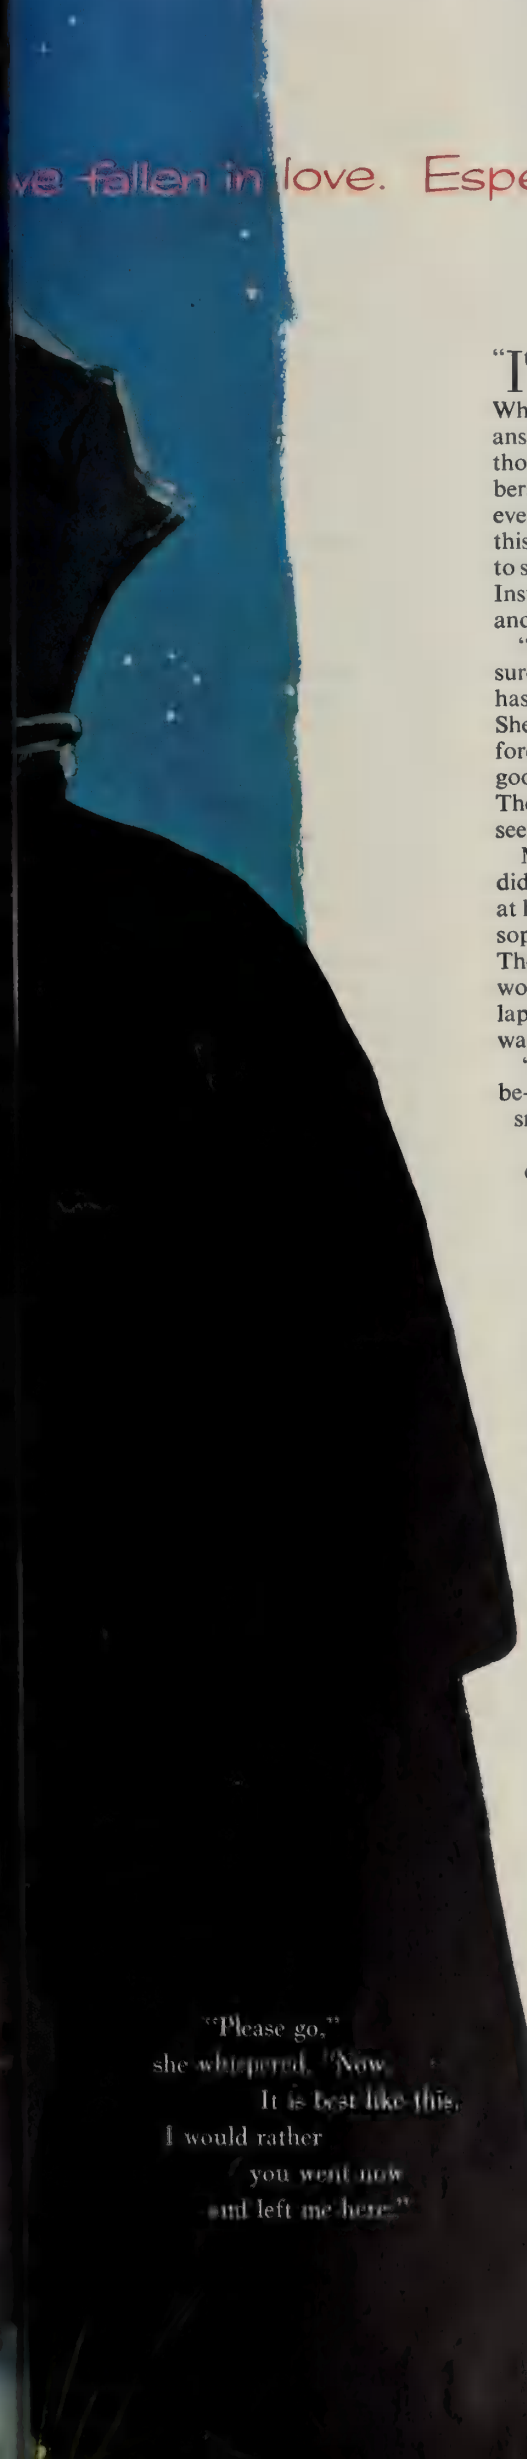


Following so hard upon the dream, this was unbearable. Lucy said, "Maire, be quiet. I will ask about the bridge in the morning if you will be quiet now. Be quiet and go away."

She lay awake after Maire had gone, thinking of many things, but chiefly of her own fears, her shameful lack of courage. She thought of all the stories she had heard of women who had acquitted themselves with astounding valor, holding castles and manor houses for weeks on end during the absence of their husbands. And she was so cowardly that she woke screaming from a dream, and thus precipitated a scene with old Maire and gave a promise the keeping of which, in anticipation alone, filled her with dread.

The window lightened at last, and down in the courtyard the first cock cried. She rose, moving quietly about the room, dressed and did her hair carefully. No sound came from the inner room, and when she was ready she pulled the curtain aside and went in. Maire was sound asleep and the baby was sleeping, too, snug in the heavy oak cradle which had already rocked four generations of Ashleys. Lucy stood looking down on her daughter with love, with the inevitable, fleeting regret for another child who had died, and with a fresh upspringing of fear. She turned abruptly, crossed her own room and began to descend.

She was forming and re-forming the request she must make as she entered the courtyard, where the castle's state of preparation for a siege was evident. The soldiers who had stood guard during the night



CONTINUED ON PAGE 88

Engaged in espionage, she should not

The Unforgettable Miss Jones

ve fallen in love. Especially with the spy she was ordered to uncover.

By DOROTHY BLACK

"It isn't a pleasant job," said Major Sandford. "It may well be dangerous." He thought her far too young. When they offered to send him a policewoman who had answered the call for volunteers, he had expected one of those square women the war had produced in such numbers. Women guaranteed to arouse no speculation whatever in the male mind. He disliked them heartily, but for this particular assignment he would much have preferred to see one of them sitting on the hard chair opposite him. Instead of the girl with pretty eyes and neat, sleek hair and long slim hands—who looked far too young.

"She is older than she appears. Twenty-one," they assured him from headquarters over the telephone. "She has done extremely well during her period of training. She had a few months at the Dramatic Art Academy before she came to us, which would no doubt stand her in good stead. Incidentally, she has no ties, no relatives." There had been a short pause. "Anyway, no one else seems to fancy the job—she was the sole volunteer."

Major Sandford hung up. He had to take her, but he did not like it one bit. He knew that what they told him at headquarters was true enough: her guileless air of unsophisticated innocence would be her greatest asset. There was a war on and in that year of grace young women were expendable. There she sat, her hands in her lap, quietly listening to his preposterous proposal. In no way shaken or surprised.

"You understand what it is all about? You will have to be—er—made over; a new hairdo, different clothes." He smiled sourly. "I don't suppose you will care for the clothes. We will give you an entirely new identity card, life history, passport and papers."

She said, "Lys Halliday will disappear and who is it will take her place?"

He consulted the dossier beside him. "Er—Laurel Jones is the name they have chosen."

The corners of her mouth twitched, but she said nothing.

"If you can get us the information we want—and it won't be easy—you will have done a wonderful job for your country. Someone is coming and going—someone is getting in and out and smuggling information verbally. We can't at the moment get any line on who it is. And at this particular moment, as you probably know, there is something it is most essential should not get abroad under any circumstances."

She nodded, looking down at her slim, folded hands, and again he thought, It's wicked to send her into a show like this. But there was nothing he could do about it, so he went on:

"Our guess is that certain women are getting hold of young soldiers, persuading them to talk, and passing the information on. We want to know to whom the information goes. Two women in particular are being watched—you will be given their names. We think there is someone behind them, the master hand pulling the strings. Find out who it is. We'll take over from there."

She had taken off her policewoman's cap, and put it on her knee. She fingered the silver badge thoughtfully as she listened. She should, thought Major Sandford angrily, have been going to dances, at her age. Making dates, having fun, not taking on this sort of thing at all. In his heart he cursed the war.

"All right," he finished, his voice brusque because he hated what he had to do. He scrawled a note and handed it to her. "Take this to Inspector Trenton's department. He will brief you. But first take a few days' leave. After that, as you know, until this assignment is over you must not communicate with anyone or visit any of your old haunts." He held out his hand. "Good luck to you, and God bless you."

He opened the door for her and watched her tall, slim figure move toward the lift. It's wicked, he thought. She ought not to be allowed to go.

Lys went out into the sunshine, feeling wonderful. It had been raining and little puddles glistened in the road like broken mirror. She was delighted that she had got the job. It was romantic and exciting compared with the rather dull routine jobs most women were doing—driving ambulances, cutting sandwiches, handing out cups of tea. This was imporant. She would be right in the front line—as the men were, doing something necessary and dangerous for her country.

She was just twenty-one. Nobody had ever kissed her. There had hardly been time.

They cut the sleek, bright, dark hair short and tinted it a terrible golden red. They tortured it into a collection of frizzed sausages.

"It will grow out when I'm through with all this, won't it?" she asked unhappily, some of the excitement and glamour fading.

"Don't worry—three months and it will be gone, but I don't see why you want it to. You look ever so nice," said the girl in the hairdresser's shop who was too young even for the call-up.

When Lys saw herself in the mirror she wanted to cry. She collected her new wardrobe, her false papers, faked identity card and new name.

"Practice using it until it becomes second nature. Write it out a hundred times," Inspector Trenton told her. He did not like having to do this. He had daughters of his own. They've no right to send a kid like that out on such a job, he thought angrily—but they had to do it. Preparations were afoot for the Normandy landing. Everything hung on these events' remaining secret and somewhere there was a leak. Information was getting across. They had to stop it.

So Policewoman-in-training Lys Halliday vanished and in her place appeared a brash young woman, badly made up, with an excruciating wardrobe of cheap clothes who called at the Golden Globe Employment Agency (Hotels and Domestic) in Soho.

There was nothing in the Golden Globe's office to encourage optimism or confidence in those looking for employment. The dirty windows were shrouded in rags of black cloth that at night made the blackout. An unkempt cat sat hopelessly among the empty milk bottles on the stairs. Miss Conn, the proprietress, had time-defying coal-black hair, dull sultana-colored eyes—and smelled vaguely spirituous, although it was only ten o'clock in the morning. She looked Lys up and down in such an experienced fashion that Lys felt certain her disguise wasn't good enough, that Laurel Jones had been seen through and discovered at the outset.

Miss Conn, however, had not seen through her. She opened an immense tome CONTINUED ON PAGE 129

THE JOURNAL'S
COMPLETE-IN-ONE-ISSUE CONDENSED NOVEL

© 1957 by Dorothy Black

The Princess was making her comeback.

And the crowd was waiting tensely—ready to jeer her off the stage, or cheer her to fame.

The Educated

The night Lester Brannon picked up his telephone and arranged a comeback date for Princess Matthews, the world of jazz turned upside down. The bulletin was released to the press the next morning. By midafternoon the public had been alerted and a nucleus black market for tickets set up in a delicatessen on Ninth Avenue. Sales managers in the fourteen record companies that had handled the Princess signed orders for re-pressings of every master cut. By five o'clock and the end of the business day, the machinery for publicity and television coverage had been set into motion and was working in the smooth crescendo fashion that Lester Brannon had made his trade-mark.

The Princess was big news. Presumably dead and buried, the name that had been a watchword for style was quickly resurrected. The news that she was singing at all would have caused stir enough, but the fact that Lester Brannon was presenting her in a solo concert at Olympia Hall stimulated an excitement that roared through the jazz world like a new hurricane.

Every ticket was sold, ranging in price from $1.80 low to $125 top, and every square foot of standing room carefully portioned out. Trade fever reached a pitch that reverberated from many corners. Professionals met after hours and traded stories about the legendary, regal-toned Princess; then considered her chances of a comeback with the accuracy of neurosurgeons.

For one thing, the Princess had had it. There were abundant rumors to explain the silence that obscured her career, but none was ever verified: she had disappeared into a nameless hospital, she was an alcoholic and a drug addict, she had had an argument with Lester Brannon about money, she had fallen victim to an obscure disease of the blood. Whatever the rumor, the Princess was box-office poison.

But there was also the fact that Lester Brannon was never wrong. Lester Brannon knew music and music makers. He knew what people wanted before they knew themselves, and managed to find both the art and the artists to nourish them.

So the odds bounced from Gimme Ghoul's on Lexington Avenue to the Virgin Vale in Sheridan Square. Two stage hands at Olympia Hall showed how even the odds were. Mike Shasta, who weighted the sandbags that held the curtain level, and Clancey Fallon, who weighted Mike, made a two-dollar bet. Clancey said the Princess wouldn't show up. Mike sai she'd not only show up, she'd rate a Dail News extra. Both men had cleaned up afte success and failure for thirty-five years.

The rehearsals were closed. The press neve figured out whether they took place in Smok Devereau's apartment on Sixty-Third Street o on Lester Brannon's Pennsylvania Dutch farn in Connecticut. Lester hired Smoke Devereau' combo to background the Princess becaus Smoke had written the arrangements tha brought her to full bloom.

Other than hiring Smoke, Lester kept hand off. He didn't supervise the combo seating, th flowers, the Princess' gown, the layout for th programs, the cocktail party for the critics. H didn't attend rehearsals. His private secretary accustomed to his forgetfulness, placed hi ticket in his hatband to make sure he'd re member it.

Saturday night Olympia Hall's main en trance was so jammed with limousines an autograph hounds, Lester walked underneath fire escape and in a side door. He exchanged joke with an usher he knew and slipped int his seat unobserved. He sat quietly, watchin the landscape of personalities with the eye o a connoisseur. He smelled the excitement: th yearning for blood in the front rows, the in difference in the mezzanine, the yearning fo release in the bop crowd in the first balcony The teen-agers had come to annihilate a styl that was rumored to be sweet and clean an cool, competing with the clutter and raw harassment of the music they currently pre ferred. And he remembered the last balcony the crow's-nest. Here in the quiet rows where programs didn't crackle was the final verdict. Here were the people who believed the note was there, and who expected Princess Matthews to find it.

As the house lights dimmed and the spotlight drew a bead on the center of the curtain. Lester nervously caressed the silver rabbit-foot on his watch chain. The curtain swished open and the audience noise suddenly stilled. Smoke Devereau's left hand snapped off the piano keys and gave the downbeat for the theme that was somehow more familiar because it had been forgotten. The spotlight danced to the wing and led the Princess on.

Her appearance, in a plain black street dress with a single strand of pearls around her neck, brought the audience up as one person and the applause began with the crack a strong rope gives when it breaks. The spotlight splashed over the raven-colored hair and high forehead, moved across the smooth copper skin, intensified the glow in the dark flashing eyes, and widened the round beauty of her mouth. The single, shining figure brought the applause to its full weight.

The Princess tossed her head skyward, and the sweet impossible blue note went spinning into the air.

The serenity and confidence with which the Princess accepted the ovation wasn't a mask. She looked up to the last balcony and felt her fingers tingle. There was no difference between the gilt-encrusted dome harboring the dimmed chandelier and the wide soft summer sky she remembered as a child, just as there was no difference between the silent rows of shadows and the blurred faces of the mother, the uncle and the two brothers who had been the first audience. She moved back to stand in the curve of the piano and signaled Smoke to begin.

As he rippled into the vamp of the first number, she heard the end of the music in its beginning. She closed her eyes and waited for the one note and wondered if Lester Brannon was in his usual fourth-row aisle seat. She felt the pearls gleaming on her throat. Lester would notice the pearls.

The note appeared in the next chord. She tucked it in her ear and opened her eyes. She looked at the direct center of the crowd, then tossed her head skyward with the old magnificent freedom, and as the piano paused for the upbeat and the soft whir of the snare drums moved in to support it, her throat moved and the sweet blue impossible note went spinning into the air like the first rocket at a Fourth of July picnic. It soared, high and enchanted as a kite in sea wind. Just before it sailed beyond capture, she pulled it into the lyric with the clean, neat discipline that had made her famous.

The Princess felt the audience reach out and take it. She knew that now she could talk to them, but each person would hear the note differently. It would say something to Smoke, but Smoke remembered the silver years and how they sounded, and Smoke had known all along that the loss was in her heart and not in her voice. It would say something else to Lester Brannon, and now he was probably turning his head to the left and straining after it and losing it at the very moment when not knowing, not trying to know, would give his dream resonance. And the others, who had forgotten the silver years, would acclaim a new style and she would be headlined again and everything would be better than before.

The truth belonged only to her. They couldn't know how CONTINUED ON PAGE 119

Heart

ILLUSTRATED BY ROBERT C. HARRIS

HERT MORGAN

Mrs. C. S. Payson

As a girl she eked out her allowance picking blueberries. Later she shared in one of the largest estates ever filed for probate. She has four children and a handsome red-haired husband, and with her brother, U. S. Ambassador Jock Whitney, owns one of the world's most successful racing stables.

HERT MORGAN

Mrs. Horace Dodge, Sr.

When her late husband won his suit against Henry Ford he asked her, "What would you like for a present?" She decided, "Pearls." The next day she had the most magnificent rope of pearls in existence, once worn by Catherine of Russia.

Mrs. Frederick Guest

She just missed becoming first woman to fly the Atlantic. But life held compensations. She married a handsome Englishman with a fortune as large as her own and has found adventure in African jungles and discussing international problems with heads of state.

UNITED PRESS

WIDE WORLD

Mrs. Mary G. Roebling

She is one of the nation's few women bankers, president of the solid Trenton Trust Company—and loves beautiful clothes and jewels. She thinks it's time to elect a woman U.S. Vice President. Her late husband's family built the Brooklyn Bridge.

America's 10

Who are They?

They have fabulous jewels, exquisite clothes, custom-made cars . . . but a few have not found that most precious niche for a wealthy—or any—woman: a place "where she can feel needed and wanted."

By LAURA DATE RILEY

Who are America's ten richest women? They don't know, themselves. Nor do their lawyers know; nor can they, their lawyers or their investment counselors say down to the last dollar or even the last ten million, just how wealthy they are.

But their combined wealth could run the U. S. Departments of State, Justice, Labor, Interior and the Post Office for more than a year, pay for the Empire State Building dozens of times over, or buy every woman in the United States a new hat.

They own some of the world's most fabulous homes, and the greatest concentration of them is along a ten-mile stretch of North County Road outside Palm Beach, Florida, where they are so well disguised by artful landscaping and modest gatehouses that the uninformed motorist could drive by and never know they were there.

The ten richest women in America can buy just about anything they want. What do they buy? Clothes by Christian Dior and Balenciaga. Jewels worth tens of millions of dollars. Priceless paintings. Custom-made cars and solid-gold dinnerware, and yachts. Vast holdings in real estate, oil lands and corporations.

And—they spend far more to help crippled children, find the causes of various diseases, promote understanding among people, relieve poverty and raise educational standards than they ever spend on themselves. Actually, they could give away about $80,000,000 every year in combined income from their total assets invested conservatively, and leave the principal forever untouched. But they give away more than that.

Four are in Who's Who in America. Two have been named to best-dressed lists. One was Woman of the Year in her home town.

Only five of the ten were born to fantastic wealth. One made all her money herself and the others grew up in only moderate to well-to-do circumstances. Of these, the women who came into wealth during their lifetimes have enjoyed their money far more, been less burdened by a sense of responsibility for it, than the heiresses to great fortunes.

Who are they? The list must be arbitrary to some extent, assets estimated in round figures from stock holdings, real estate, banks, investment houses, industrial interests which change from time to time. Many of the large fortunes of a half century ago have been broken up among large families, or by inheritance taxes, or set aside in trusts or charitable foundations. Sometimes it is difficult for the wealthy themselves to ascertain at any given moment just how much of their money is "untouchable"—in trusts or tied up in properties which cannot be readily converted—and how much they could actually call on at a bank—if they needed to write one huge check for all.

Certainly among the wealthy women in the United States are Mrs. William Hale Harkness, of New York, whose late husband's father helped found Standard Oil; Mrs. Ailsa Mellon Bruce and Mrs. Alan M. Scaife (Sarah Mellon), Pittsburgh steel heiresses; Barbara Hutton von Cramm, of the Woolworth millions; Mrs. Buddy Rogers, who as Mary Pickford made millions as "America's sweetheart" and still more producing her own films; and Mrs. Margaret Emerson, whose father put Bromo Seltzer on the market, and who acquired another fortune when Alfred G. Vanderbilt, her second husband, died in the Lusitania sinking.

Marion Davies—now Mrs. Horace Brown—ex-actress and long-time friend of the late publisher William Randolph Hearst, has tens of millions in real estate. Mrs. Perle Mesta inherited oil money from her father and a machine-tool fortune from her husband, and now has about $75 million; and there are the Walter Chrysler daughters, Mrs. Edgar Garbisch and Mrs. Byron Foy of New York; Mrs. Margaret Carnegie Miller, Andrew's daughter; Mrs. Anne Reynolds Tate, of Southern Pines, North Carolina, heiress to Reynolds tobacco money; Mrs. Adolph B. Spreckels, San Francisco sugar heiress; and the daughters of the late John T. Dorrance, of Philadelphia, who devised the formula for Campbell's Soup.

WIDE WORLD

Ford Motor Company and the J. L. Hudson department store—she has only recently emerged as a lighthearted participant in society and "she's like a debutante," friends say. "People had forgotten Eleanor Ford was a lovely woman."

WIDE WORLD

Mrs. Alfred duPont

She was a quiet Virginia schoolteacher when she met—and fell in love with—Alfred duPont, dynamic industrialist who united one of America's largest wealthiest corporations and then disunited it with scandals stirred up with his first two wives.

BERT MORGAN

Mrs. Merriweather Post

She spends lavishly on herself and on others; is one of the world's legendary hostesses whether throwing a ball for diplomats or hiring a circus to entertain neighborhood orphans. Her father invented the common plow blade, men's cummerbund suspenders and Post Toasties.

Doris Duke

The most publicized and reputedly richest girl in the world—with the multimillion-dollar Duke tobacco fortune—she has tried marriage, travel, war work, yoga, but has yet to find personal fulfillment.

WIDE WORLD

Richest Women

t probably the very richest women in the United s are:

oris Duke, who on her twenty-first birthday be- the "richest girl in the world" when she came the American Tobacco Company fortune of her r, James Buchanan Duke. She has an estimated million.

's. Edsel Ford, widow of the late president of the Motor Company and mother of its present head, was heiress not only to Ford millions but to a Detroit department-store fortune and is believed ve nearly as much as Doris Duke.

's. Merriweather Post, whose father, C. W. Post, ted and popularized not only a new kind of fast food—Post Toasties and Grape-Nuts—but v way to promote them, inherited many millions h her sharp business acumen rolled up to prob- around $250 million now.

's. Horace Dodge, Sr., widow of the motorcar ufacturer, is believed to have another $250 million, Mrs. Frederick E. Guest, whose father was er of Andrew Carnegie, about $200 million.

acketed somewhere between $125 and $200 mil- re Mrs. Alfred I. duPont; Mrs. Charles Shipman n, the former Joan Whitney who with her er Jock Whitney shared a fortune based on on and oil; and Mrs. Mary G. Roebling, of ton, New Jersey, one of the few women in bank- who has substantially increased the wealth left soon after her marriage, by her late husband e family built the Brooklyn Bridge.

's. Chauncey McCormick, of Chicago, has an ated $120 million; and Helena Rubinstein, the only self-made woman, has a personal fortune ved to be up around $100 million.

ost of these women are publicity-shy in the ex- , and for good reason. Because of their money cannot marry, have children, divorce or even a big check without getting public attention, n usually means hundreds of letters asking in- ntly, "Why do you have so much money?" or, tively, "If you have so much, why can't you give 100,000?" or even "just one million?"

hen Mrs. McCormick (to her horror!) was chosen n of Chicago society several years ago, in a poll ucted by Chicago Daily News society editor Athlyn Deshais, she received thousands of letters from all over the world, including one from a young man in Afghanistan asking her please to set him up in trade with a string of camels. Mrs. McCormick is a gentle white-haired lady who feels an obligation to answer personally any letter she receives, and replied to all. It took the better part of a year.

But probably the biggest problem of a woman of immense wealth is more personal. It is, according to one New York society woman, "finding a place where she can feel she is needed and is doing something worth while enough to be interesting. It is harder for a woman with that much money to feel needed than anyone else in the world"—largely because there is nothing in the world she has to do.

Most of these women have found such a place. All the happiest ones have.

Mrs. Merriweather Post is one of the world's legendary hostesses. Mrs. Ford's life has been one of devotion to her family and to countless personal works of charity. Mrs. Guest has taken an active role in world affairs, sports and big-game-hunting interests of her husband, the late British Air Secretary, and her sons, Raymond and Winston Guest. Mrs. Jessie duPont for years sat in an office next to her husband's, and now puts in a full office schedule administering their joint interests.

Amid all this activity Mrs. Horace Dodge, now in her eighties, seems almost an anachronism from a bygone era. Philanthropies have never monopolized her thoughts, and although she has allotted a proportion of her money to good works, her personal planning has gone into gaiety and fun, and an ever-more-elaborate scale of living. Never was this more clearly seen than at her farewell party in February for that grandest of Palm Beach palaces, Playa Riente, "Laughing Sands." Bought for $2,000,000 in 1926, six years after the death of Horace, Playa Riente was her introduction to Palm Beach society at a time when the Dodges—and the Fords, too, for that matter—"were considered just rich mechanics," a Palm Beach socialite recalls. Mrs. Dodge stocked its

CONTINUED ON PAGE 176

WIDE WORLD

Mrs. Chauncey McCormick

Intensely publicity-shy, she was horrified when a newspaper poll elected her queen of Chicago society, pointing out she was "farm equipment on both sides" (the McCormick reaper and Deering plow fortunes). She was deluged with letters asking for money.

Helena Rubinstein

Beauty is like money, says this woman who is an expert on both—to get the fullest advantage out of either you have to know the basic psychology behind them.

MAGIC

formulas

from

PARIS

RICHARD AVEDON

The single color, winter mauve: a broadcloth afternoon suit, with the new open off-the-neckline collar, chiffon blouse, a cascade of crystals sparkling with amethyst tones, a softly crushed fur-felt hat, long gloves, small suède bag with a ribbon bow—even her shoes are the same shade. The entire costume by Christian Dior.

Dior has selected the most delicate mauve imaginable for his suède pump with faille ribbon pointing up the square toe and heel. Vanity case of gold scrollwork and multicolored stones.

STILL-LIFE DRAWINGS BY RICHARD HANLEY

The JOURNAL this fall presents many of the new Paris accessory ideas—the magic touch for you to follow or adapt in your own clothes. Each designer has a theory. Dior believes that "the woman dressed in one tone has greater elegance . . . the very choice of her favorite color, head to toe, brings out her personality." Chanel, too, advocates the single-color costume because it has "greater simplicity and becomingness . . . there's unity and a finished look about a dress or suit with matching hat, bag, gloves." Svend has a conviction about "black, the most distinguished fashion in the world"; and Givenchy likes the imaginative use of contrast in color and fabric "to give the greatest variety and interest to any fashion." Paris has always stood for this perfection of detail. Thoughtfully chosen, the accessory is the jewel of the costume—each one becoming part of an adored collection in any woman's wardrobe, worn again and again with many costumes.

By WILHELA CUSHMAN
Fashion Editor of the Journal

WILHELA CUSHMAN

MEERSON

Ribbon and veiling: a fanciful dream of a hat. French as Paris itself, but universally becoming. By Svend. To be worn at once, or any month of the year, with the right little black dress. The coiffure was created by Guillame.

Fur and jersey: black sealskin turban worn for town with an overblouse dress in gray wool jersey, one of the wonderful easy basics of the season by Hubert de Givenchy. Small sealskin scarf matches the turban. The bag in russet brown reverse calfskin. Gold-and-diamond clip brooch by Cartier.

MAGIC

formulas

from

PARIS

WILHELA CUSHMAN

The fur-and-suède idea, shown by a mink coat in the new color, emba diadem; the suède cloche in powder brown with gloves to match, the bag in suède and calfskin. All by Christian Dior.

Buff leather bag with button-on handle by Roger Model. Short gloves and gold bracelets.

The color from Dior—powder brown. A button slipper of calfskin and suède that echoes the past. Agate jewelry in colors of blue green, amber and brown. Christian Dior.

STILL-LIFE DRAWINGS BY RICHARD HANLEY

WILHELA CUSHMAN

Dark mink-brown velvet in a new profile pillbox with a jeweled pin to wear on the back of the head, by Patou. It is worn here with a dark mink stole and a short dinner dress in winter-white crepe, also by Patou.

The sweetest bag of the season—all white and gold and just as big as a minute. Givenchy adds his beautiful red-rose and sea-green petal pins, the inevitable white kid gloves.

MEERSON

The fashion of veiling by Givenchy, to wear at night in wine red with a black taffeta dress and pearls.

Chanel's giant stitched navy bag with a bold faille lining and gold chain handle. Sunburst pin also by Chanel.

RICHARD AVEDON

The new checks, the new rose red, the fashion of a bag and beret in the same fabric as the suit. It's a tweed lined with jersey and a jersey blouse, all designed by Chanel. Worn with a ruby leaf by Van Cleef and Arpels.

The Journal's

FALL

Costume beginning with a fur-lined coat which can be the focal point of a winter wardrobe. Pale beige tweed with soft broadtail-processed South American lamb, a matching tweed skirt, cashmere sweater by Arthur Jablow. Black velvet beret by Miss Alice, broadtail bag by Greta. Rhinestone pin at the neckline by Albert Weiss.

One-color fashion—coat in blue-red tweed with a yoke back, worn over red jersey dress with matching gloves, by Nettie Rosenstein. Cone hat by Mr. John.

The fashions on all these pages are presented to you because they show you the trends of the season and serve as a guide as you shop. You will find many of them in stores throughout the nation. However, if you do not find identical styles in your local shops, we believe similar ones will be available.

If asked for the news in three decisive words, those words would be: COSTUME, ONE-COLOR look, and RED.

There's great variety and imagination . . .

apply it to your own plans.

FASHION

report to you

The belted suit—in brown-and-gray plaid, Arthur Jablow. Bag, Fernande Desgranges.

FASHION THINKING begins with the costume this year. It may consist of a coat and dress, coat and suit, jacket and dress, fur coat and dress. The same wonderful tweed coat could go with a jersey dress, a tweed suit or a satin dress and thus round out the day. The more elements that match, the better, and that includes jewelry, hats, bags, gloves, shoes.

THE NEWEST COATS sweep backward, free of the body, some on gathered yokes, some flaring like a bell. Others are slim, many belted. There's a whole new category of coat lengths—seven eighths and three quarters—and an entirely new classification of SUITS WITH LONGER JACKETS, lower belted waistlines. The suit with a fur collar is flattering, important-looking. The unbelted OVERBLOUSE DRESS comes in wools, silk, velvet and satin. The blouse-back dress is in for day, the low-back for night.

FURS are often dyed for the costume. Navy-blue furs are newest. The fur-lined coat has every element of fashion. Waist-length jackets and cardigans are made for wool dresses.

RED IS THE COMPELLING COLOR, especially rose and ruby reds, but this is also the year for black, blues of great brilliance, almond green, spice browns, pale and deep violet. CONTRADICTION is the fashion in fabrics—jersey used in more formal costumes, satin and velvet made in almost casual styles, chiffon blouses put with almost every tweed suit, tweeds worn every hour of the day and night.

SHOES OF FASHION have long pointed lasts or slightly squared toes, straighter heels. SKIRT LENGTHS involve the inch that is right for you. Some are as short as 17 inches from the floor, others mid-calf. Each woman judges her own.

By WILHELA CUSHMAN
Fashion Editor of the Journal

WILHELA CUSHMAN

Fur-collared suit—black tweed with sable, easy straight jacket, slim skirt by Larry Aldrich. The velvet hat by Emme, gloves picking up the hatband color. Pin and earrings by Alice Caviness.

WILHELA CUSHMAN

Single-tone dress and jacket costume in claret-red basket-weave wool by Larry Aldrich. Hat by Miss Alice, moleskin bag by Walter Katten.

A bag of garnet cut velvet on linen. Garnet tie pump or one of black suède with a grosgrain buckle. Compact by Seaman Schepps.

Pale mauve wool bias-cut dress by Pauline Trigere, pale fox scarf and hat.

The Journal's

FALL

Knitted seven-eighths coat, Miguel Dorian. Velvet hat, Toby Coppock.

STILL-LIFE DRAWINGS BY RICHARD HANLEY

Moss-green leather bag, pleated leather pump or high-buckled slipper. Bracelet by Seaman Schepps.

Longer jacket suit by Christian Dior, New York, with belted lower waistline. Brown calfskin bag by Barra.

A black jersey suit worn with a printed chiffon blouse, by Phillipe Tournaye. Persian lamb beret by Sally Victor.

Blue tweed suit, by Adele Simpson. Moleskin hat and scarf.

Golden metal cloth in a dinner suit by Christian Dior, New York.

Red tweed costume, Claire McCardell. Hat, John Frederics: bag. Guiletta d'Alessandro.

Broadtail leather sling pump; pump with a strap. Crown pin. Victoria Stone.

FASHION

report to you

A sapphire-blue bell of ■ coat, matching hat and dress. By Pauline Trigere.

Wool jersey dress and jacket by Larry Aldrich. Hattie Carnegie's fur beret.

Pleated skirt, belted jacket in taupe wool, Christian Dior, New York.

Mink-trimmed suit by Arthur Jablow.

The Journal's Enduring Gem of a Wardrobe

LEOMBRUNO-BODI

HAT BY ELIZABETH MARKS

The only new design we have added to this wardrobe is this coat. It boasts the same qualities we have stressed in other coat "Gems." Made in a beautiful red fleece, it goes comfortably and prettily over everything else in the wardrobe. Vogue Design No. S-4822, 10–20.

CHAIN AND PIN BY EDGAR ROEDELHEIMER; BELT BY BEN KING

You first saw this design on our pages in November, 1951. We repeat it because of its timeless beauty, its classic simplicity. The four-gore skirt has easy fullness in the front, a back zipper. Vogue Design No. 9284, 12 to 20.

"What is a gem, in terms of fashion? The JOURNAL believes it to be any fashion that has beauty of its own, adds to yours and is so classic it smiles at the term 'out of date.'"* All the clothes on these pages are "gems," we feel, and one of the designs dates back to 1951. This seems like a true test of the timelessness and lasting beauty of a good design. We believe your investment in fine fabrics and the time and effort you expend in making your clothes are of enormous importance. Therefore, we boast about the enduring goodness of our wardrobe stories and feel that those of you who have been guided by them in the past will wear them with confidence in the future. By NORA O'LEARY

Pattern Editor of the Journal

* From "Gem of a Wardrobe," August, 1953.

Other Views, Sizes and Prices of Vogue Patterns on Page 187. Buy Vogue Patterns at the store which sells them in your city. Or order by mail, enclosing check or money order,† from Vogue Pattern Service, Putnam Ave., Greenwich, Conn.; or in Canada from 198 Spadina Ave., Toronto, Ont. Some prices slightly higher in Canada. (†Conn. residents please add sales tax.) These patterns will be sent third-class mail. If you desire shipment first-class mail, please include 5c additional for each pattern ordered.

© VOGUE

These patterns have been reissued by Vogue in their new Printed and Perforated Patterns.

RHINESTONE JEWELRY BY HATTIE CARNEGIE

Do you remember seeing this dress on our pages in 1955? In beige re-embroidered lace with a turquoise satin cummerbund? We love its new look in red lace. The scallop edges the neckline, sleeve. Add a satin belt. Vogue Design No. 9028. 10–18.

HAT BY JOHN [redacted]

An extra skirt always extends the life of a suit. (You saw this same design last year in a printed silk.) This gay tartan (of washable wool and Orlon) is pleated all around. Wear with a yellow sweater and Sally Victor's snood. Skirt. Vogue Design No. 9052, 25–34 waist.

In 1954 this suit first appeared in the JOURNAL. Now, in suiting-weight wool jersey and brass buttons with a white piqué touch at the neck. The nicest thing about this suit is the way it takes to a pretty blouse or a bright scarf. Vogue Design No. 9285, 10–18.

Before, 295 pounds.

"Wow! Look at the neck and chest, not to mention all those chins."

GENEVIEVE NAYLOR

After, 135 pounds.

Miraculously emerged from her "mountains of fat," Helen felt as "glamorous as a movie star."

Now, 245 pounds.

"It isn't pretty or comfortable up here; I'm going back down."

HELEN FRALEY dieted and lost 160 pounds, but . . .

"I've gained back 110!"

In August, 1952, we published the fascinating story of how Helen Fraley reduced from a monstrous 295 pounds to a fashionable 135. Today's news is that Helen has eaten her way back to 245 pounds!

On learning of poor Helen's plight, we checked with all the other dieters you have met on JOURNAL pages to find out how they were doing. We're happy to report that 80 per cent have maintained their reduced weight. Here is Helen's letter telling about her return trip, and (opposite) a scientific explanation of such roller-coaster weight travels, and how you can avoid them.

By DAWN CROWELL NORMAN
Beauty Editor of the Journal

Dear Dawn Norman: They say, "Confession is good for the soul," so by writing you this letter maybe I will receive some help. In recent months you have sent me three letters in which you asked about my current weight. Here's the confession: I was too ashamed to answer you. The fact is, I've gained back 110 pounds of that ugly fat that I so proudly lost in 1951. I hate myself, but that doesn't bring back my precious weight loss.

I can just imagine thousands of JOURNAL readers gasping in horror or sympathy and asking, "But why?" That's a big question, but I'll try to answer it. I think my mental attitude is responsible. My husband's health started failing three years ago, and he hasn't been able to work for two years. My worries over Sam, combined with having to assume the full financial burden for our household, have made me adopt a "what-the-heck's-the-difference" attitude. I know I shouldn't, but I did. When I was slender, I had a glamorous part-time job selling cosmetics. But at 245 pounds, I wouldn't be a good advertisement for "beauty," would I? Instead, I am now working for a pizza company, of all places! (Before you think that I put my weight back on, for free, with the pizza pies, I have to tell you that after two or three months of seeing nothing but pizza eight hours a day, I lost interest. You couldn't make me eat one now, delicious as I know they are.) But otherwise eat I did; and it's hard to keep weight down on "poor man's food"—starchy casserole dishes. At least I find that a good excuse. When I really think about it, I could have cut down on portions, couldn't I?

I didn't gain my weight back quickly. It's been a gradual, steady increase. I stayed at 135 pounds for two years. Then I went up to 150 pounds, and at that weight I actually looked better than I did at 135 pounds. People told me I looked younger, and I felt peppier. If only I had had the will power to stay there!

When my weight reached 180, I couldn't wear any of my pretty dresses or suits in size 14 or 16—in fact, an 18 was mighty snug. So I sold my "slim clothes" at a fraction of their original cost, in order to buy cheaper dresses in sizes to fit. How I loathe having to wear matronly clothes again. Giving up my slacks, pedal pushers and gay plaid blouses has been a crush; but then that sort of garb just isn't for fat Fannies—or Helens, either.

Carrying this added weight around is no joke. I get so tired during the day. After work all I can do is flop, exhausted, onto the living-room sofa!

When I had reduced to 135 pounds, many lifelong friends didn't recognize me. When they did they were thrilled and showered me with praise and compliments. Now some of the townspeople once again don't recognize me. When they do, no compliments! Instead they convey feelings of pity or disgust, cluck their tongues and say, "Isn't it a shame about poor Helen Fraley?"

It isn't easy to tell all your wonderful JOURNAL readers about gaining weight. In fact, it's downright humiliating! What a contrast to that time in 1952 when I was telling how I had lost 160 pounds. In those days I was bubbling over with happiness and wanted to share my success as a dieter with everyone. Recently I showed a picture of myself, at 135 pounds, to a friend who hadn't known me when I was slim. She said, "Helen, you look like a movie star; wouldn't you like to look like that again?" Naturally I do, more than anything else in the world. And I will!

Last week I had a thorough medical checkup and my doctor tells me I'm in perfect health, and that I can diet again because, really, there's nothing wrong with me that less food won't cure. I'm encouraged by this news—and just having this chance to put my reasons for gaining weight down on paper, in black and white, has helped me realize where my trouble lies.

I've just started my new diet and have already lost eight pounds. I do hope all the JOURNAL staff and readers will wish me luck in this second venture. I would appreciate letters of encouragement, even criticism. Hope once again I can truthfully sign off "a very happy ex-fat lady," but right now I am,

"just plain miserable,"

HELEN FRALEY
Blair, Nebraska

HELEN'S MEASUREMENTS

	BEFORE	AFTER	NOW
WEIGHT	295	135	245
HEIGHT	5′6½″	5′6½″	5′6½″
BUST	60″	38″	50″
WAIST	52″	30″	46″
HIPS	59″	37″	52″
DRESS SIZE	60	14 or 16	48

Why Diets Fail... and what to do about it!

Why is it possible for some people to reduce and stay reduced while others, no matter how hard or how often they try, fail miserably in their diet attempts? Dr. Hilde Bruch, associate professor of psychiatry, College of Physicians and Surgeons, Columbia University, and author of the book "The Importance of Overweight," gives us her answers, based on her twenty-five years of experience in helping overweight people.

The story of how Helen Fraley dieted and lost 160 pounds and then gained 110 pounds back is a familiar one to any physician who specializes in dealing with overweight people. Quite naturally, the people who cannot undo their weight problems are the ones doctors continue to see.

We have had a chance to discuss these special cases with Dr. Hilde Bruch, an attractive, trim-figured psychiatrist, whose overweight patients make up a garden variety in age, shape, nationality and personality. Their problems range from those which are mildly disturbing all the way up to others which are serious and complex. Despite such variation, Doctor Bruch can distill her philosophy about dieting into this single conviction: "The success of a reducing regimen depends less on the diet itself than on whether an individual is psychologically ready to reduce. When the time is ripe, an overweight person with a sound and solid goal has every reason to expect long-range success with a diet."

Ready—or Not?

Doctor Bruch points out that "people who go on a diet with the reasonable expectation of looking more attractive and being in better health are justified in their hopes that they will enjoy life more fully when their reducing has been accomplished. But they realize, too, that their lives may continue along the same fundamental lines."

At times the unreasonableness of the goal is quite obvious. Doctor Bruch once asked a seven-year-old girl why she wanted to reduce and she answered cheerfully, "Because when I get skinny I can eat all the chocolate I want to." Frequently things are more complex. The girl or woman who diets in the unrealistic hope that her secret fantasies will come true may be in for bitter disappointment. When she finds her reduced weight has not turned her into the scintillating beauty of her imagination, has not brought Prince Charming to her door, has not been the only passport she needed to obtain the job or the social life of her dreams, her dejection and what's-the-use attitude may prompt her to give up, and go back to her old eating habits. Doctor Bruch tells of an overweight teen-age girl with unusual acting ability who gave up after having dieted for many months. Her explanation was, "Why should I try and try to reduce when nobody will promise me, even if I stay slim, that I'll be a star and always get top billing?" It stands to reason that reducing and being slim, in themselves, are no guaranties of outstanding success as an actress—or in any other field of endeavor. It wasn't until this girl was able to differentiate between her two completely different goals that she could hope for continued success with a diet.

Fortunately, weight problems are often less complicated. In these milder situations, reasons for weight gains are readily apparent. Perhaps the pounds have added up as a result of too much party food; too little exercise; insufficient attention to your weight after the birth of your baby. Maybe there has been a lonely interlude in your life during which too much importance has been focused on food. Boredom is another breeder of overeating. Sometimes a physical upset (an operation or a confining illness, for instance) or some emotional crisis in your life can precipitate temporary preoccupation with food. By recognizing and correcting such underlying reasons for your weight gain, you have an excellent chance to diet away your extra pounds even though this, too, takes discipline and self-restraint.

For some people, however, overweight looms as a depressing and seemingly insurmountable problem which interferes with physical health, emotional outlook and social acceptance. In them, reasons are not always readily apparent and easily coped with, but are often buried in a mire of inner conflicts and emotional problems.

Commenting on these more serious situations, Doctor Bruch says, "The problem is too often approached by putting the cart before the horse. Obesity, itself, is looked upon CONTINUED ON PAGE 178

Of the dieters whose stories we have published in the past 5 years have maintained their reduced weight!

80%

JOENNE VOORHEES
BEFORE—185 AFTER—125
NOW—135, 8 YEARS LATER

MARGIE WEBB
BEFORE—250 AFTER—150
NOW—140, 8 YEARS LATER

ANNE BACHNER
BEFORE—250 AFTER—[illegible]
NOW—135, 2 YEARS LATER

BETTY DE ROCHE
BEFORE—[illegible] AFTER—[illegible]
NOW—[illegible], 1 YEAR LATER

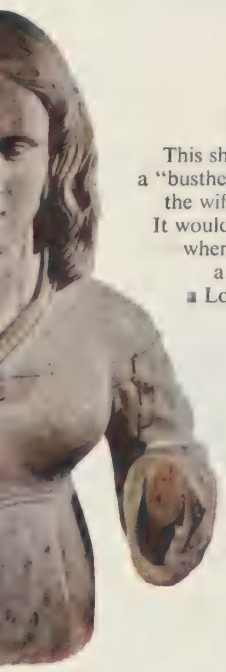
LYLE SALEH'S
BEFORE—270 AFTER—[illegible]
NOW—230, 3 YEARS LATER

JEAN ADAMS
BEFORE—250 AFTER—[illegible]
NOW—150, 6 YEARS LATER

DORIS McFALL
BEFORE—[illegible] AFTER—[illegible]
NOW—[illegible], 2 YEARS LATER

PETE MARTIN
BEFORE—227 AFTER—[illegible]
NOW—192, 1 YEAR LATER

LINDA RAND
BEFORE—171 AFTER—[illegible]
NOW—130, 5 YEARS LATER



MARY ROBERTS
BEFORE—[illegible] AFTER—[illegible]
NOW—135, 9 YEARS LATER

ISABEL ROBERTS
BEFORE—[illegible] AFTER—[illegible]
NOW—[illegible], 9 YEARS LATER

VENUS DRAWN BY DOVES was painted in water color on silk about 1815. The artist, now unknown, first painted the picture and then cut the stars, rims and wheels of the carriage and the collars and wing tips of the doves from gilt paper and applied them to the background.

This ship's figurehead, known as a "busthead," may have portrayed the wife or daughter of the owner.
It would have cost about $10 when it was carved from pine around 1825, probably for use on a Long Island Sound schooner.

In Pennsylvania's German communities ornamental woodcarving was much used on furniture as well as for decorative objects such as this rooster 10½" high, circa 1875.

FOLK ART IN AMERICA

The Abby Aldrich Rockefeller Folk Art Collection, containing these and many more delightful examples, is now on permanent public display at Williamsburg, Virginia. "It has been more than 25 years since my mother began to acquire these pictures and artifacts," says Winthrop Rockefeller, Chairman of the Board, Colonial Williamsburg, Inc., in expressing the hope "that everyone who visits the collection will enjoy it as my mother did."

THE OLD PLANTATION. This unique water color, painted about 1800, depicts a slave dance on a plantation which is said to have stood between Orangeburg and Charleston, South Carolina.
The skilled characterization of faces and figures indicates that the unknown artist must have had some professional training.

MRS. PEARCE. Black dots of paint suggest the eyelet borders for the collar in this oil portrait (circa 1835) by Erastus Salisbury Field. Field was a versatile and prolific artist, without formal instruction except possibly three months with the noted artist-inventor Samuel F. B. Morse.

The unknown artist who painted
LYDIA AND TABITHA (oil on canvas) about 1835 was probably a furniture decorator who did portraits to increase his income.
Prices for portraits then varied from about $3 to $ Profiles, which required less time "to take," cost around $1.

...tless speed and balance are ... displayed in this weather vane,
...bly homemade, from about
...middle 19th century. The horse, 39″ long, is made of pine;
...ndian of sheet iron.

LEFT BEHIND. Mourning pictures, or "family mortuary grounds," with their stock elements of tomb, weeping willows and mourners, hung in almost every home in the early 19th century. Painting a mourning picture was sometimes a routine school assignment. This one is painted on velvet.

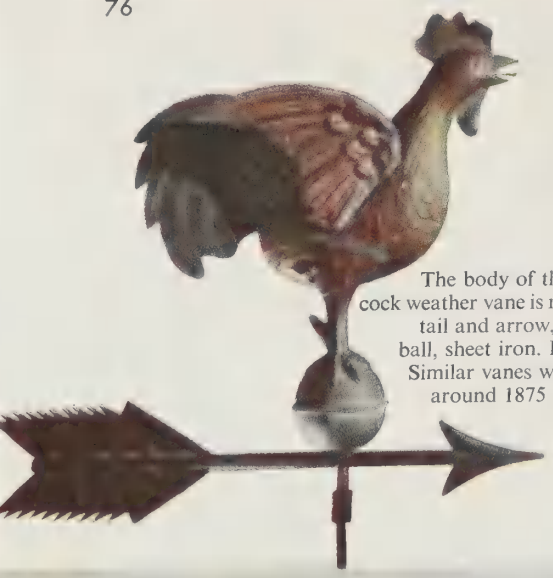
SPRING FISHING, c. 1825. Here the unknown artist appears to have embellished a familiar scene with artistic touches, such as the bridge, probably copied from a book. Water color on paper.

Reuben Law Reed, 1841–1921, was a house painter who executed pictures in his leisure time. He painted, about 1860, this oil of WASHINGTON AND LAFAYETTE AT THE BATTLE OF YORKTOWN from a description given him by an eyewitness, who, it is said, was pleased with the "realistic effect" of the picture.

Brilliantly designed floors were frequently added to family pictures for interest, as in THE TILTON FAMILY of Deerfield, New Hampshire, water color by Joseph H. Davis. More than 100 pictures are attributed to Davis, who signed only three, one with the added inscription, "Left Hand Painter."

This lamb, carved in pine, may have marked the shop of a wool merchant about 1800.

Folk art—a people's art, not the art of the chancelleries and palaces but of the towns and villages and the countryside—is a singularly delightful and instructive road into the life and times of our fathers, our grandfathers, and their forebears.



Here are the figureheads from their ships, the weather vanes from their barns, the needlework from their parlors, the sometimes severe and often "primitive" portraits that looked down from the walls of their houses, the sentimental calligraphic writings that delighted, and the romantic scenes which touched their hearts.

Here, also, we see the crosscurrents of national origins that flowed together into the great mainstream of America. Much of this American folk art is naïve, most of it is unsophisticated, some of it is crude, but all of it is moving, and touched by the influences which shaped us as a people.

Young and old who make their pilgrimage to Williamsburg will find here, just a little way from the restored area, another inviting doorway through which to step out of the Present into another and different time and place. It, too, may help the Present to learn from the Past.* KENNETH CHORLEY

President, Colonial Williamsburg

*From "The Abby Aldrich Rockefeller Folk Art Collection," a Little, Brown & Co. book, available at bookstores; price, $17.50.

The body of this crowing-cock weather vane is made of copper; tail and arrow, brass; ball, sheet iron. Height, 20⅜″. Similar vanes were sold around 1875 for $35.

THE PRODIGAL SON RECLAIMED, c. 1815.
One of a series of four water colors illustrating the parable. Rather than attempt a Biblical flavor, the unknown artist used backgrounds and clothing contemporary to his own envi

WOMAN WITH SEWING BOX, 1850–60.
Artist unknown. The subject of this oil on canvas is tentatively identified as Miss Appleton of Ipswich, Massachusetts.

THE RESIDENCE OF DAVID TWINING, 1787, in Bucks County, Pennsylvania, looks much the same today as it did circa 1845, when Edward Hicks painted this scene in oils. The Twinings had taken Hicks as a baby to live with them after his mother's death; in his later years as the foremost artisan-painter of his day he painted several versions of their farm. The Twinings' daughter, Beulah, stands in the doorway of the stone farmhouse. David Twining is at the gate; his wife, Elizabeth, sits reading from the Scriptures to little Edward Hicks; daughter Mary and her husband Jessie Leedom are shown with their horses, and all around are the outbuildings and farm activities of a prosperous Pennsylvania homestead.

THE NAVIGATOR'S WIFE and THE NAVIGATOR, c. 1830.
Artist unknown. Oil on canvas. The fashionably lacquered high loops of the lady's hair were known as "Apollo's knots."
Calipers and globe suggest the calling of the husband.

The ultimate step for the expert penman of 19th-century America was calligraphic drawing, which sometimes approximated engraving. The unknown artist who executed this spirited LEAPING DEER (c. 1840) with a steel pen was evidently a master of his art.

Probably a fashionable young lady's sewing box from the 1820's. Paper panels with varied painted flowers were applied to the wooden box, edged with gilt strips. Detail of the river landscape on the cover is shown above.

It was fashionable in the 1850's for boys to wear plaid and pose for their portraits with some object of masculine interest such as the whip and hobbyhorse in this oil painting.
Girls usually held fruit or flowers. Artist unknown.

EBEN DAVIS' HORSE, c. 1850. Eben P. Davis was a Massachusetts carpenter and a beautiful penman.
He did this picture with a combination of carefully ruled pencil lines and freehand drawing overlaid by water color.

BAPTISAM OF OUR SAVOUR, c. 1840. Ann Johnson tried to create a Biblical atmosphere by drawing the camel's-hair raiment of John the Baptist and palm trees in background. Artist's name and title are lettered on black glass mat under water-color picture.

Ruth Henshaw Bascom, 1772–1848, was the wife of a minister whose calling took them to several Massachusetts towns, where many of her pastels have been found. In "taking profiles" she traced the shadow and then filled in details.
In this portrait, for which she received 20c, the features are drawn in pencil and the remainder in pastel.

On the back of this oil painting is inscribed "Alexandr Boudro[u] Painter 1851 No. 7."
The subject is tentatively identified as A. DICKSON ENTERING BRISTOL IN 1819.
A Bristol Township Inn is known to have been situated on Second Street in McCartersville, Pennsylvania, now a part of the city of Philadelphia.

After the Statue of Liberty was unveiled in New York harbor in 1886, it became a popular patriotic symbol.
This copper weather vane is 41″ high.

A Big family room in a Big-family house

Young marrieds with a large family found their solution to today's housing problem in an old house. The living room has plenty of space for entertainment, play, books, music and sentimental collections.

By CYNTHIA McADOO WHEATLAND

Interior Decoration Editor of the Journal

End table near piano conceals four little extra tables folded up inside. Pretty old desk provides work spot out of traffic path.

Cool blues accented with white mark this gracious, comfortable room. Natural advantages such as lovely mantel, good floors, high ceilings, French windows are made the most of. Window treatment is particularly practical: curtains are of washable cotton damask, with flat heading for easy ironing. These are hung on rods that swing open with the doors, letting in the most sun and air.

Nowadays, with building costs so high, many young marrieds who have, or hope for, large families are finding new value in big roomy houses 40 to 60 years old. Usually extremely well built, such houses tend to have large rooms and closets, full basements, attics, porches—all plus values for an active, rowing family. They are often in pleasant, acces-ible neighborhoods with well-established trees and ›lanting.

FOWLER

Our young couple found that such a house was the ›nly one they could afford, big enough to hold their ›ig family, and actually costing less than a new four-›edroom ranch house.

True, some gingerbread usually needs to be tripped away, some late-Victorian taste must be nodernized. On the other hand, some of the trim-nings have charm, character, and most certainly in-lividuality. For instance, the wide entrance hall has wooden lace framing the stairway which will not be ampered with. But eventually the dining room, ›aneled in dark wood with the high plate rail of our grandparents, will be redecorated. For the moment, the new owners' main efforts were directed toward the kitchen* and the living room pictured here.

They loved the beautiful wood floors, high ceilings, French windows, but the size, 16′x25′, was a mixed blessing. They had to furnish it. Left over from their previous small house were a good sofa, two big, comfortable chairs, a table or two, that was all. They needed a new color scheme, new coverings, curtains, carpet and more furniture. Family attics were raided to produce the desk, among other treasures, and they were made happy by the gift of a no-longer-used baby-grand piano.

Actual remodeling in this room consisted in removing old wallpaper, some moldings, and building the cabinets and bookshelves at one end. They had decided to paint the walls, but discovered roughened plaster underneath, so a solid paper in the blue they wanted was the answer. Their sofa was in fairly good condition, as were the large armchairs. This group was treated to minor repairs and slip-covered in a fresh flowered chintz. As a practical measure, the yardage for this was preshrunk and siliconized. Carpeting an area this large might prove rather hard on their budget, but a wool 12′x12′ rug could be managed. It defines the conversation groups, and shows off the dark parquet floors. The striped rayon hearth-rug is just for fun and can be tossed into the washing machine. Favorite collections are housed in the bookshelves out of reach of little hands. A group of vacation-gathered shells is especially safe and effective under glass in an inspired coffee table built to house them.

* For kitchen remodeling, see page 110.

Laurie was pulling all the strings— but Sammy was no puppet.

by Jane and Glen Sire

The day I came home and found Marsh Hammond sitting on my front porch I was wearing my terrible blue jeans and Sammy's old sweat shirt. (It seems to be one of the absolutely dependable rules of my life that whenever anything exciting happens in it, I am wearing my terrible blue jeans and Sammy's old sweat shirt.) This time I was also carrying an enormous bag of groceries, of all repellent things (I had just been to the store for mother), and when I came around the corner and saw Marsh sitting there, I quietly went right back around the corner again and sank weakly down on the curb behind a friendly palm tree. It was partly shock, and partly the fact that Marsh Hammond is not the kind of boy a girl wants to be carrying a bag of groceries when meeting. Marsh Hammond is, to put it simply, the best-looking boy I have ever seen in my life. I couldn't have been more surprised if I had found Ulysses sitting on my front porch in a loincloth. I mean, I had never met either.

I simply sat there for a moment, letting the full shock of it spill over me, and wondering whether I had lipstick on. (Though I have been in love with Sammy Hastings for many years, there is a certain basic effect that a boy like Marsh Hammond has on any girl, if she is a girl.) Then I peered cautiously around the palm. Maybe, I thought, it's a hallucination. (Marsh Hammond was the type of hallucination any sensitive, normal young girl might very easily have.) But he was still there, lounging magnificently across our front steps in an Ivy League jacket, a deep tan and an air of negligent amusement. Just looking at him was an experience, and for a moment I just sat there, sort of drinking him in.

Then a new thought struck me. Sammy! What would he think? Nervously I peered past our house to the Hastingses', next door. There was no sign of Sammy, but he might appear at any moment, and suddenly, beautiful as Marsh was, I wished passionately that he were not sitting on my doorstep.

In the week that he had been at Glendale High (his family had moved over from the other side of town) Marsh Hammond had had a violent and rather terrifying effect on the love life of the entire school. Girls who had gone steady for years had taken one look at Marsh Hammond and gone quietly but definitely ape. Norma Gillison had followed him about the halls for three days at a slow dogtrot, and when Tom Lea, who had gone with her since junior high, finally got jealous and objected, Norma had absent-mindedly given him his ring back and told him she would always think of him as a friend. And Norma and Tom weren't the only ones either. In the last week three different couples had broken up in fights over Marsh Hammond, to say nothing of those who were still going together but not speaking. If Sammy came out and found Marsh Hammond sitting on my doorstep, he would absolutely flip. Actually, I had no idea why Marsh was there—I didn't even know him—but Sammy would never believe that. He would kill me!

Just thinking about Sammy was enough to make up my mind. I picked up my groceries and hurried back around the corner and down the walk. Marsh Hammond, I decided firmly, would have to go.

I came briskly up to the house, smiling a cool, unwelcoming smile and trying to look poised, or as poised as possible while glancing nervously over my shoulder at the Hastings house.

"Hello," I said.

He didn't get up, just grinned up at me. "Hi," he said, in the lazy, don't-care way of a man who is sure he is so attractive that it doesn't matter the slightest bit what he says.

I climbed the steps, my legs practically brushing his nose, but he didn't move. I looked down at him. "Are you tired?" I said politely.

He just laughed.

"I don't mean to pry," I said coolly, "but do you mind telling me what you are doing on my porch?"

Marsh climbed gradually to his feet. "I'm Marsh Hammond," he said simply, as though it explained everything.

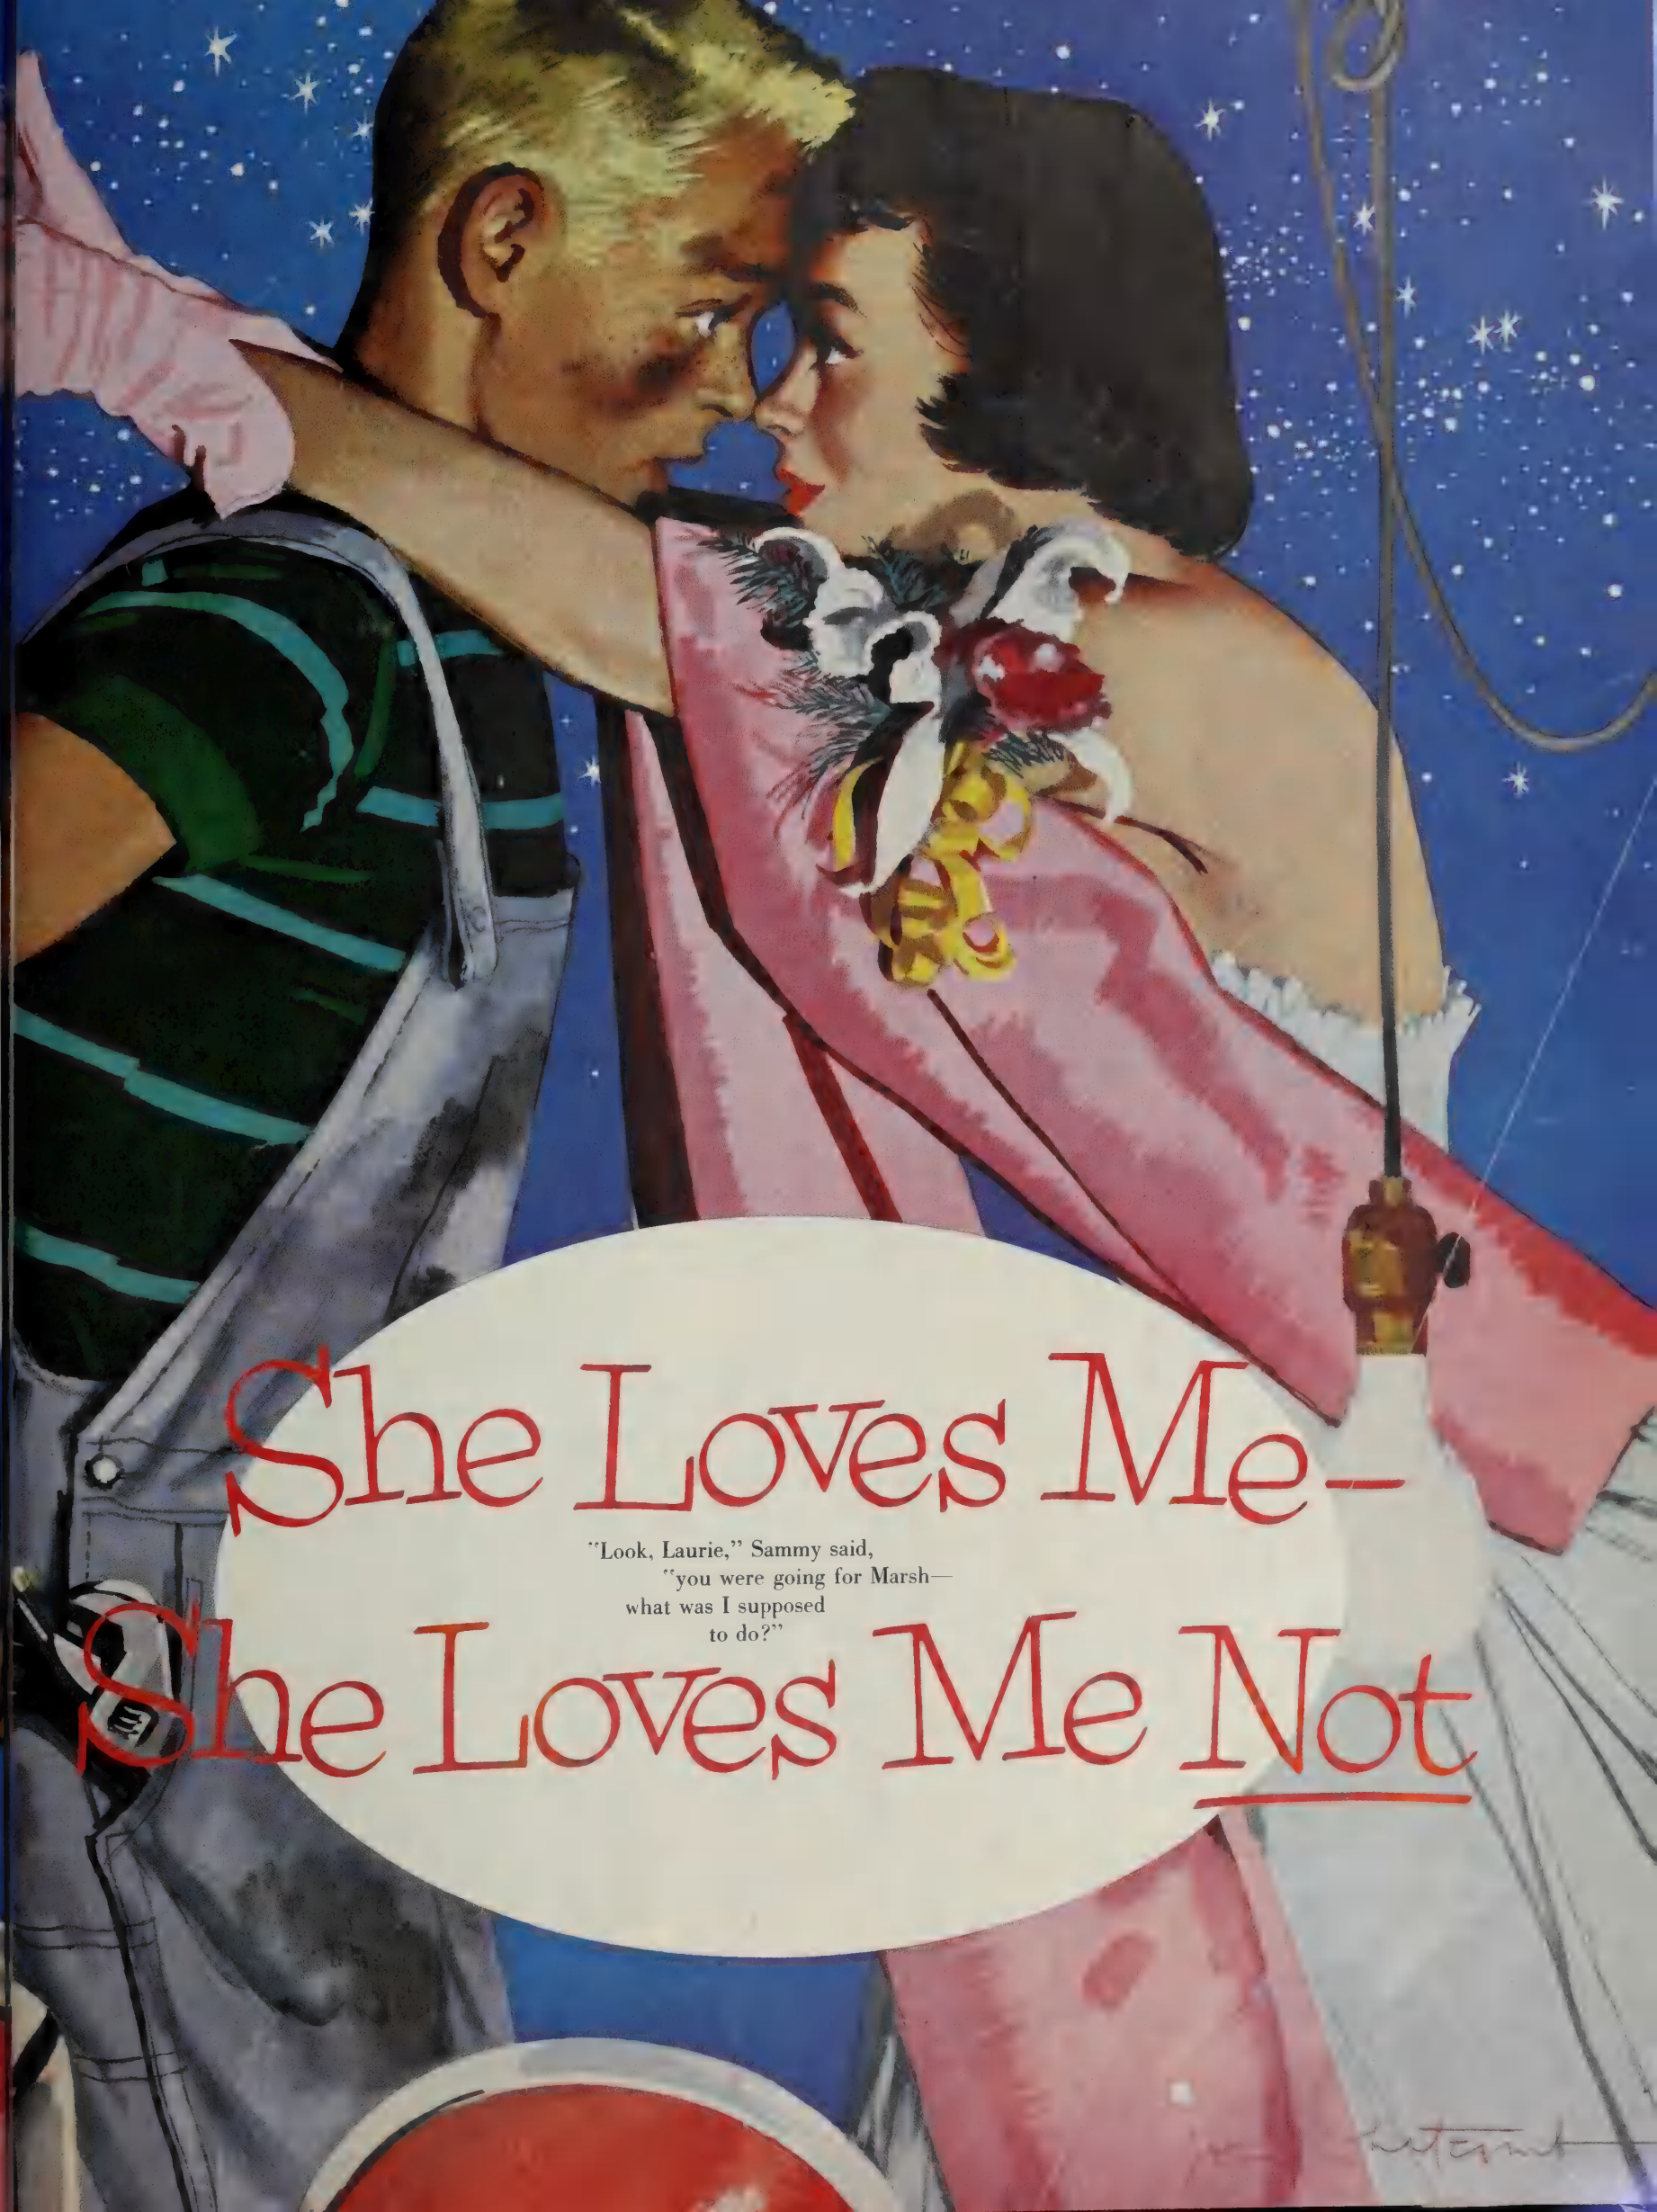
"That's nice," I said. I waited.

He looked at me curiously. "You know," he said, "I get the feeling that you don't like me much." I could see that, to him, it was an astonishing thought.

"Well," I said, "I wouldn't worry about it. I'm sure dogs and children are crazy about you."

I turned and swept haughtily into the house, which would have been quite effective if I hadn't tripped on the sill and practically fallen on my face, except that actually it wouldn't have been my face but the other way around, if Marsh hadn't caught me. Well, it is hard to be haughty when a man is holding you in his arms, especially a man like Marsh, so for a moment I just relaxed and enjoyed it. He had thick black hair, and lovely, coffee-colored eyes.

It was a fascinating moment when absolutely anything could have happened, and then something did.



"Hey, man!" said this familiar voice. "She seems to have given you quite a tumble."

I gasped. There, not six inches away, was Sammy's interested, freckled face, peering at me over Marsh's shoulder!

"Oh," I said, rather weakly, I suppose. "Oh—oh, hello,

CONTINUED ON PAGE 150

© 1957 by Jane and Glen Sire

She Loves Me—
She Loves Me Not

"Look, Laurie," Sammy said,
"you were going for Marsh—what was I supposed to do?"

ESTHER BUBLEY

The pain of a migraine may be as intense as any that we are called upon to endure—yet many doctors believe that the sufferer brings on his own headache.

WHAT MAKES YOUR HEAD ACHE?

Is it nerves?
Fatigue? Heredity? Ambition? Conscience?
Knowing the cause
may not lead to the cure, but it can help prevent future headaches.

By DR. STEWART WOLF
and DR. HAROLD G. WOLFF

If you often have a headache, chances are that you did better than average in school. You are probably a worth-while person who takes responsibility well—but criticism poorly. The chances are, too, that one or more of your parents or grandparents had headaches. You have probably been to see several doctors and doubtless have been told, after a more or less detailed survey, that there is nothing wrong with you. That is hard to take when the pain of headache may be as intense as any pain that man is called upon to endure.

Like the pains of labor, headache pain may be very intense and yet compatible with good health and a high degree of productivity. A very high proportion of the population has occasional headaches, probably about 60 per cent. Very few people have never had one. In headache, the severity of the pain tells nothing about the underlying cause. An extremely intense pain does not indicate an ominous trouble. Neither does a mild headache reflect a benign condition.

Few laymen realize that the brain itself cannot feel pain. It certainly seems when you have a severe headache that the whole inside of your head is signaling distress. Actually, the nerves that transmit pain exist almost exclusively in the blood vessels and the nervous system. For all the apparent and widespread anguish, the places where you actually hurt are minute, almost invisible.

When your head aches in the back, the greatest possibility is that the muscles leading up from the neck are in distress. Muscle tightness for whatever reason is painful. Your neck muscles have probably tightened involuntarily. You are, for the moment, excessively alert or apprehensive. That fat man in the theater; a long time at the wheel, concentrating on the fast highway; worry about the rent five days overdue: situations like these may cause you to tighten up. The tightness squeezes off the blood supply to the muscles themselves. And your head aches, oh so badly. If you can relax, the headache may go away. If not, you resort to one of the basic analgesic compounds, such as the one used in aspirin.

The analgesics act by interfering with your ability to feel pain. The various analgesic compounds—aspirin, phenacetin and acetanilide—are all about equally useful as painkillers. (Aspirin does have the additional virtue of being mildly sedative.) Besides using drugs, you can often treat muscle-tightness headaches successfully with heat lamps, hot baths, cold packs or massage.

If your headache is periodic, severe and often predictable, you may be suffering from the famous "migraine."

Migraine often comes on weekends. It may suddenly shift sides. Often it wakes the sufferer early in the morning with a severe pounding. Usually there is nausea. Often, too, there are spots before your eyes and peculiar sensations in one arm. By evening, frequently, it will be gone, followed by a feeling of extreme well-being. Migraine headaches very commonly run in families.

The mystery of the migraine was solved with the discovery that some arteries are pain-sensitive. The pain occurs from the stretching or distention of the artery walls. Stated most simply, the migraine sufferer brings on his headache by means of a nervous condition so intense that it increases the flow of arterial blood into the head.

Most people who get migraine headaches are not obviously "nervous." As a group they are hard-working and ambitious. They like to be thought well of and dread the idea of criticism. The chances are that they are sensitive, perfectionist, rigid and reserved. They are people who have tried to do better than their fellow men. As they grow older, they find it difficult to keep up with all the demands they make on themselves. Because they have worked hard, because they are unusually conscientious, they keep acquiring responsibilities. But instead of deriving satisfaction from their achievements, migraine people become bitter and resentful because no one, not even their superior selves, could possibly do as much as they demand.

Migraine people usually "live according to plan." They dislike uncertainty. They are unhappy unless they always appear at their best. Headaches often occur just before or after a party, when the demands for a superior performance are greatest. Many sufferers, too, can predict migraines on their days off, when there is no opportunity for achievement. The various names for migraine headaches—Sunday, menstrual, inventory and so on—give a hint of the pressures that bring them on.

Migraine is often said to be inherited. The chances are that inheritance is not the whole story, but equally important is the learning in a family where the emphasis is on "doing things better," where children learn an undue emphasis on being careful, being polite, being conscientious. What the sufferer has inherited is not a bad head. On the contrary, he has probably inherited a very good head.

Many migraine sufferers cannot be convinced that the way in which they face problems has anything to do with their headaches. The only way in which such sufferers can be treated is by treating the patient psychologically. The doctor's role is to help the patient understand himself.

The migraine sufferer can, of course, do a great deal for himself. One successful device is for him to examine the events of the minute, the hour, the day before his present attack. What were his attitude and his reaction to them? Did he overcome the problems, think them through, or evade the problem by retreat into illness? Self-examination like this may reveal a characteristic pattern of doing things the hard way. If it is noticed that a headache occurs when efforts are frustrated or criticized, it may not seem immediately significant; but when the coincidence of headache with such events is noticed, the discovery may be put to good use. Each headache can be made to "pay for itself."

Often the sufferer can learn to avoid getting into situations that bring on headaches. He may be able to alter a point of view slightly, to slow up on striving and savor the achievements he has already made. To cure migraine is obviously not simple, yet victims will assure you that anything is better than such misery.

If you have never had a migraine, you may feel that a "sinus headache" is pretty bad. Aches in the CONTINUED ON PAGE 113 © 1953 by Stewart Wolf and Harold G. Wolff. From the book Headaches: Their Nature and Treatment, published by Little, Brown & Co., Boston.

Can this Marriage be Saved?

The fifty-fifty marriage has a much higher record of success than any other, yet only about one third of all marriages, even in the educated part of the population, ever attain the status of a real partnership. Often the partners start with widely different degrees of dominance, which they are unable to manage in such a way as to produce teamwork on a basis of equality. They can be helped by a marriage counselor. The American Institute of Family Relations, 5287 Sunset Blvd., Los Angeles 27, California, is a national nonprofit organization now in its twenty-eighth year, which keeps in touch with marriage counselors (many of whom it has trained) all over North America and is always happy, without charge, to refer inquirers to competent help near them, if possible. A few weeks or months of counseling cannot be expected to change the basic personality; but it may show the possessor of this personality how to direct it along constructive lines, how to acquire more self-reliance or how to turn a dominating tendency into leadership rather than mere bossiness. The counselor in the case here described was Pierce Ommanney.

PAUL POPENOE, Sc.D., General Director.

SHE: "Whenever Ron goes into the old song and dance about how he loathes his boss and how his work is dull and meaningless, I make the appropriate clucking, sympathetic sounds and for the thousandth time suggest he quit."

HE: "Perhaps I could endure the emptiness and lack of love in my home if I received any satisfaction from my work. At home I'm silently pressured by Eve and at work I'm steam-rollered by my boss and his wife."

LEONARD NADEL

EVE TELLS HER SIDE: "At first I thought I was coping with just another one of Ron's depressions," said tall, slender, thirty-year-old Eve. Her pretty face mirrored the shocked bewilderment she had felt when her husband had unexpectedly asked for a divorce. "During the ten years of our marriage, Ron and I have never had a serious quarrel. My sisters and I weren't allowed to whine and bicker. I've managed to side-step arguments despite the fact Ron is high-keyed, intensely critical of little things, and very moody. On an average of every six months he sinks into an ocean of gloom.

"Whenever these dreary periods descend I keep the youngsters quiet and out of sight—Susie is nine, our twin sons are six—supply Ron with everything he requests, however wild and unreasonable, pour forth my utmost in the way of sunlight and cheer. Ron has always seemed to respond and in the course of time climb back to normal.

"I had no idea he considered his existence a misery and our marriage hopeless. There isn't another woman in the picture. All he wants, so he says, is to leave and be entirely free and independent, whatever that may mean. I still feel stunned by his attitude.

"I won't pretend Ron and I have been as happy as some couples—we just aren't the blissful type—but certainly we are better off than many couples who stay together. We have our children. We have a pleasant home and an interesting, if small, circle of friends. Ron has been dissatisfied with his work for a long while—he is in charge of design at a large firm that manufactures ceramics—but he knows I would have stood behind him in any change he cared to make. I have a small income from my grandfather's estate and I have repeatedly offered to lend Ron the principal if he ever wanted to establish a business for himself.

"I have tried to be a good wife and mother and an efficient housekeeper, something I was obliged to learn from scratch, since I grew up in a houseful of servants. I have done my best to be an agreeable companion to Ron, somebody loyal and generous and understanding. I have become a fair cook. I wield a paintbrush and hammer under Ron's direction; every time he gets restless he redecorates our house again, which keeps it in a constant state of upheaval. Our décor reflects his ideas, not mine.

"When Ron is sick I nurse him faithfully. His depressions often wind up with an asthmatic attack, a siege of sinus or a digestive upset. He has an ulcer like his father before him. Last month his boss threatened to reduce the annual bonus and Ron was sick in bed for a week with worry and a flare-up of his ulcer.

"In the early days of our marriage I took on the burden of handling our finances at his request. Ron declares he can't abide the mundane chore of paying bills. I deposit his hundred-and-twenty-five-dollar weekly check along with my dividend checks in a joint bank account; Ron often forgets to advise me of his withdrawals and to fill out stubs. Twice last year I heard from the bank that our account was overdrawn. On the first occasion Ron had bought a topcoat, three pairs of slacks and six shirts in the same week. The second time he went on a buying spree in a do-it-yourself store. I didn't complain of his extravagance and irresponsibility. In fact, I didn't even tell him of the financial crisis. I sold enough bonds to get straight with the bank and allowed Ron to continue in the serene belief our checking account must be stocked by elves.

"On the other hand, just the other day Ron objected vehemently when I bought three lipsticks at a sale in the drugstore. I listened to his nasty cracks without comment. I try to take trifles in my stride and hide my feelings like my father. One time I wrecked my father's brand-new convertible and he said nothing about the accident, not a CONTINUED ON PAGE 166

"Ron didn't show for dinner that night. By eight o'clock I was definitely worried and thought I'd better go hunt for him. Usually he heads for the ocean. I drove twenty-five miles to find him. He was walking along the beach and I saw at a glance the guy was in the lower depths."

Welsh rarebit—but with plump oysters and tender mushroom slices; a dish that says "Come to supper" to your dearest friends, and worthy of a glamorous chafing dish, your best silver and china. Spoon it over outsized biscuits (made with bacon worked into the dough), hot and buttered. A cooked vegetable salad and a tray of pickle relishes go along. And why not cold cantaloupe wedges for dessert?

WONDERFUL CHEESE DISHES

Chicken and tender endive baked with nutty Parmesan; eggplant and sausage with creamy Mozzarella—here are the JOURNAL'S most delectable, all-time cheese favorites.

September has come. There's "a flush of red in the blue, the haystack on the marsh catches the glow, the apples are red on the trees." Amber-gold, and smooth as country cream, a splendid cheese rarebit with oysters and mushrooms is ladled onto big biscuits laced with bacon crumbles, split and buttered. A dish like this is a real event!

Is there any dessert in the world to compare with a cheese board of Roquefort and Camembert wedges, with a pile of crisp cold apples in the middle? Perhaps, if it's a luscious cream-cheesecake, glazed with sweet strawberries. Be adventurous with cheese—try small cubes of Cheddar as a garnish for tomato or cream-of-pea soup, instead of croutons. Spread toasted English muffins with half-and-half butter and blue cheese. It's delicious! Mix grated Cheddar into the crust of your next peach pie. "The only way to know cheese is to eat it." And since, for most people, it's hard to hear the word "cheese" without getting hungry—on to the recipes!

OYSTER-AND-MUSHROOM RAREBIT

Sauté in a little butter ½ pound sliced mushrooms until golden brown. Remove them and set aside. Then heat 1½ dozen oysters just until the edges curl. Add oysters and mushrooms to the following cheese sauce, just before serving. Cheese Sauce: Melt in a saucepan or chafing dish 2 tablespoons butter. Blend in 2 tablespoons flour and then 1½ cups light cream or evaporated milk. Stir in and heat gently 3 cups grated Cheddar cheese. Season with 1 teaspoon Worcestershire sauce and a dash CONTINUED ON PAGE 114

Eggplant, sausage, Mozzarella cheese—and a tantalizing fragrance! Serve this delicious casserole with a fresh green "antipasto salad"—lettuce, slivers of anchovy, sliced olives and artichoke hearts. And then there's a loaf of Italian brown bread, thickly sliced and buttered.

STUART-FOWLER

Chicken slices and endive, baked in a rich, creamy Parmesan sauce. Nothing could be better to celebrate a festive occasion than this delectable, very "special" dish. Serve your masterpiece with brown-and-serve salt sticks and a crisp, cold bowl of fresh-vegetable relishes.

Collector's Items

in the Raw

FROM THE JOURNAL KITCHEN

STUART

Uncooked delicacies for the appetizer tray—stuffed mushrooms, cucumber boats, and oysters with red caviar.

Like swimming without going near the water, cooking without going near the range has a great many advantages. Not only do you stay nice and cool, but you know you haven't wasted any vitamins and minerals, or destroyed the wonderful flavors which are so delicate and delicious in many uncooked foods.

Let's start with something sure-fire, such as raw mushrooms, whose unexpectedly soft, nutty crispness makes them popular as canapés, appetizers or salads.

Stuffed Mushrooms: Remove the stems (save them for soup) from ¾ pound mushrooms and peel the caps by hand, grasping the edge and pulling across the top as though you were taking off a kid glove; leave whole and stuff with a 3-ounce package cream cheese to which the juice of 1 lemon, 1 small can skinless sardines, 2 teaspoons chopped chives (or minced onions), ½ teaspoon salt and a little ground pepper have been added. If this mixture is too stiff to handle, add a little heavy cream at the last minute. Anchovies may be substituted for the sardines, in which case omit the salt. This may be used as a "dip" with other vegetables.

Marinated Mushrooms: Remove the stems and wash but do not peel 1 pound mushrooms, leaving caps whole if small, otherwise halving or quartering, and place in a bowl with 1 cup white wine vinegar, 2 teaspoons olive oil, 1 clove garlic cut into several slices, 1 teaspoon marjoram, ½ teaspoon sage and 2 teaspoons chopped parsley. Let stand, stirring occasionally, from 12 to 48 hours. Drain and serve in a bowl with toothpicks on the side. Or, for a sensational salad, serve on soft lettuce.

The brave man—more likely, woman!—who ate the first raw oyster would feel he had not lived in vain if he could eat

Oysters Imperial: Add 1 level after-dinner-coffee spoon black caviar (or a heaping after-dinner-coffee spoon red caviar) to each raw oyster on the half shell, sprinkle each with just a trace of minced chives and 6 drops lemon juice. Serve on cracked ice, 4 large or 6 small oysters per person.

By now you should have an open mind about raw fish, popular in so many countries, including the Scandinavian. This is the Japanese way:

Mamuko Sashima: Cut a slice of fresh halibut, tuna, bream or swordfish into thin strips and marinate in the refrigerator for 24 hours in 1 cup vinegar, 1 teaspoon sugar, 2 tablespoons soy sauce and 1 tablespoon chopped parsley. Serve cold.

People who are far too squeamish for a main course of steak tartare—who, in fact, don't even like rare meat—will rave about cannibal meat balls, especially if you call them by some such name as Hamburgerettes Tartare: Have ¾ pound round steak, without fat, ground twice; add 1 teaspoon salt, ¼ teaspoon pepper, 1 teaspoon Worcestershire sauce, 1 teaspoon salad oil, the yolk of 1 egg, slightly beaten, 1 teaspoon lemon juice or wine vinegar (optional) and 2 teaspoons chopped pickle. Mix thoroughly and let stand in the refrigerator for an hour or more before forming into balls the size of a large marble. Roll in finely chopped parsley to which a few minced chives have been added until entirely (and deceptively) green, then roll in finely rolled cracker crumbs to firm them a bit if you like. Serve on a platter with toothpicks.

Here are two suggestions for uncooked vegetables which, not being salads, are to be served at room temperature rather than chilled. The first of them is improved by standing for an hour or so, as zucchini does not discolor or become soggy.

Zucchini Creole: Wash thoroughly but do not peel 4 small zucchini (about a pound) and slice thin; add 2 juicy ripe tomatoes, chopped, ½ large green pepper, chopped fine, 3 large scallions, tops and all, minced (or 2 small white onions), 1 teaspoon salt, ½ teaspoon sugar and a dash of freshly ground pepper.

Cucumber Boats: Peel 1 large cucumber, cut in half lengthwise, then across; carefully scrape out the seeds with a small sharp spoon and place them in a bowl, breaking apart with a fork and mixing with 2 drops garlic, 1 minced scallion (or 1 teaspoon minced white onion), ¼ teaspoon curry powder, ¼ teaspoon red paprika, ½ teaspoon salt and 3 rounded teaspoons cottage cheese; spoon this mixture into the quarters of cucumber.

Salads are traditionally eaten raw, but these are just off-beat enough to make them distinctive.

Spinach Salad Omar: Remove the large stems from ¾ pound young spinach; wash, drain, dry and cut into strips 1" wide. Keep chilled. Rub salad bowl with garlic; break into it 1 whole egg and beat lightly with fork; add 1 teaspoon sugar, ½ teaspoon salt, ¼ teaspoon dry mustard, ¼ teaspoon paprika, ½ teaspoon Worcestershire sauce, 3 teaspoons catchup and stir into a smooth paste. Add ½ cup salad oil alternating with ⅛ cup vinegar, and beat with electric mixer or a rotary beater until smooth and thick; pour over spinach.

Harvy Scarvy Relish: Chop fine 2 peeled and cored apples, add equal amount of diced celery and 1 medium-size onion, chopped fine. Add ½ teaspoon salt, ⅛ teaspoon pepper, 2 teaspoons tarragon vinegar and 4 teaspoons salad oil. Let stand an hour before serving Cardamon Fruit Salad: With a sharp knife, peel 2 grapefruit (preferably pink ones) and 2 oranges, leaving no white pulp; section, and put into a bowl with any juice obtained while preparing. Peel 2 bananas (preferably red ones) and cut in half lengthwise, and again crosswise. Peel and core 1 large apple and cut into thin rounds. Pour the juice of 2 lemons over the apple and banana to prevent discoloring. Put them in the bowl, too, and add ½ teaspoon whole cardamon seeds. (You have to crack the pods to get at the seeds.) For your dressing, use 2 teaspoons honey thinned with 2 teaspoons light cream, adding ¼ teaspoon whole cardamon seeds, ¼ teaspoon salt, a few mint leaves or ¼ teaspoon dry mint. Pour over the fruit which has been placed on a platter of soft lettuce leaves.

Cauliflower Salad: Slice thin enough flowerets of washed cauliflower to make 1 heaping cup, loosely packed. Add ½ cup Cheddar cheese, cut into thin strips, ¼ cup chopped green pepper, ½ cup minced Spanish onion and 1½ cups chopped water cress. Serve with 3 tablespoons French dressing.

Salad Palette: This mixed salad will be a "thing of beauty," especially if you have a large, rather shallow bowl. Wash and dry by spreading on paper towels 1 head Boston lettuce, 1 bunch water cress and 1 head romaine or garden lettuce. Peel 3 firm tomatoes. Slice 1 cucumber paper thin and 10 radishes quite thin. Cut 1 stalk celery fine, including some of the tender leaves, and cut ½ green pepper into thin sticks. Rub the bowl thoroughly with a clove of garlic. Now comes the artistry: Tear the greens into small pieces and cover the bowl, slice the tomatoes thin over the lettuce, and spread the cucumbers over them without covering them completely. Sprinkle on the radishes, celery and green pepper and place the water cress around the rim of the bowl with the stems stuck under the lettuce, so that the cress frames the salad. One half pound Belgian endive may be used instead of, or in addition to, the cress; pull the leaves apart and stick the blunt ends under the lettuce so that the "petals" radiate like those of a sunflower or daisy. Serve with about 1 cup spicy French dressing and 3 teaspoons grated Parmesan cheese, but do not toss until everyone has had a chance to appreciate your creation.

It certainly isn't news that some of the best things to drink are raw—milk shakes, eggnogs, fruitades and vegetable juices in almost endless combinations.

Pineapple Drink: Combine in blender 1 cup pineapple juice, 1 teaspoon lemon juice, ½ bunch water cress and 1 cup cracked ice. Buzz a few minutes.

Tomato Juice: Combine in blender or shaker 2 cups tomato juice, 1 teaspoon lemon juice, ½ teaspoon salt, ¼ teaspoon pepper, 1 large cucumber, peeled, seeded and grated, a few drops hot pepper sauce and ¾ cup cracked ice. Buzz or shake a few minutes.

4 Souper ways to serve tuna!

TUNA BURGERS. Here's a new kind of burger! Mix 1 7-oz. can drained, flaked tuna, 1 can Campbell's Cream of Mushroom Soup, 1 tbsp. each minced green pepper and onion. Fill 6 hamburger buns with mixture; brush buns with butter. Bake on cookie sheet in hot oven (400° F.) about 10 minutes. 6 servings.

PERFECT TUNA CASSEROLE. A never-fail meal, all in one dish! In a 1-qt. casserole, combine 1 can Campbell's Cream of Chicken Soup, ½ cup milk, 7-oz. can drained, flaked tuna, 1 cup drained, cooked peas, 1 cup crushed potato chips. Garnish with potato chips. Bake at 375° F. about 25 minutes. 4 servings.

TUNA LOAF. Any way you slice it, this is soup-erb! Combine 2 7-oz. cans drained, flaked tuna, 1½ cups fine bread crumbs, 1 can Campbell's Cream of Celery Soup, 2 lightly beaten eggs, 2 tbsp. minced onion. Pack lightly in greased loaf pan; bake at 350° F. about 1 hr. Serve with Quick Cream Sauce (blend 1 can Cream of Celery Soup, ⅓ cup milk; heat). 6 servings.

TUNA SHORTCAKE. Creamy and tasty—and ready in minutes! In a saucepan, blend together 1 can Campbell's Cream of Mushroom Soup, ½ cup milk, one 7-ounce can drained, flaked tuna, 1 cup drained, cooked peas, 2 sliced, hard-cooked eggs and 2 tablespoons chopped pimiento; heat. Serve over hot, split and buttered biscuits—or pour on slices of toast. 4 servings.

Good cooks cook  with Campbell's Soups

How to help your child have a better school year

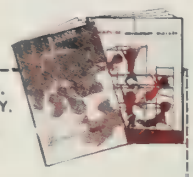
"Good-bye, Mom . . ." Mothers will hear this familiar farewell daily during the school months ahead when 38 million children leave for their classrooms. Among these boys and girls there will be 4 million youngsters entering school for the first time.

Is there anything you can do to help your child get the best possible start in school? Yes, there is. You can take him to your family doctor now . . . before school opens . . . for a thorough check-up.

Although your child may seem to be in tiptop physical condition, he could have some totally unexpected impairment. For example, slight defects in seeing and hearing can handicap a child in his studies and other school activities or cause unnecessary absences. Therefore, eyes and ears should be examined.

You may also find your doctor's advice helpful in improving your child's general health. Is there room for improvement in his diet? Are his habits of play, sleep and exercise all right? Parents should remember that poor health habits can lead to physical and emotional troubles and the sooner they are corrected, the better.

Protection against certain health hazards is necessary when a child starts or returns to school. So be sure to have your child's immunization record reviewed and see that appropriate steps are taken to bring it up to date if necessary.



If you are not certain about your child's protection against smallpox, diphtheria, whooping cough, tetanus and polio, now is the time to see your doctor. It is most important to obtain his professional assistance so you may comply with the school's requirements regarding vaccinations and inoculations.

Teen-age boys and girls, as well as younger children, benefit from regular preschool check-ups. Physical adjustments, weight variations and emotional upsets—all these and similar problems are matters which parents may not understand too well.

So why not get your doctor's help now? Advice based on sound medical knowledge may prevent or clear up many difficulties of the school years. Your child's visit to him can help assure healthy, happy school days.

Metropolitan offers two booklets on health problems of school-age children. The titles are listed on the coupon below. Check the booklet or booklets you want.

Metropolitan Life Insurance Company
(A MUTUAL COMPANY)
1 MADISON AVE., NEW YORK 10, N. Y.

Metropolitan Life Insurance Co.
1 Madison Ave., N. Y. 10, N. Y.
Please send me the free booklet
☐ "ABC's of Childhood Diseases," 9-57-J
☐ "Understanding Your Teen-Ager," 9-57-J
Name_____
Street_____
City_____ State_____

SCENT OF CLOVES

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 54

had begun their breakfast. Edward was not with them, and before she could ask his whereabouts she saw him coming briskly down the ramp which led to the outer wall.

He kissed her heartily, and said, "A quiet night and a bright morning. I hope you slept well. Let's go in. I'm hungry."

It was never expedient to make a request of a hungry man. She fell into step beside him. As they passed the soldiers one of the men had just fitted a piece of cold fat bacon onto a slice of bread and was about to lift it to his mouth.

"Spare a crust for a starving man, your honor," said Edward, in tolerable imitation of a beggar's whine, and took the piece from the soldier's hand. They all laughed. He walked on, cramming the food into his mouth. "It'll be today. There's smoke to the north of us. I'd send out a scout for news, but if I lower the bridge now there'll be trouble."

"Oh," she said. "Why?"

"There's a crowd of countryfolk there, begging admission. They've been arriving all through the night."

She could imagine how safe the castle looked to those who were locked out of it.

"It seems hard, doesn't it?" she said falteringly. "They aren't on either side, and yet ——"

"War always hurts somebody," he said curtly. "Don't look at me like that, Lucy. I can't take in a lot of hungry mouths. I've been up there, shouting to them to turn about and go inland. Cromwell's going straight through to Wexford. The fools out there'd be safe enough if they got well out of his road. But they won't listen."

He had begun to eat, quickly but without haste and giving the food his full attention.

"Maire says she knows a safe place not far from here, some caves, at Cloonmagh."

"Cloonmagh. That'd be no help to them. You can get there only by boat, I believe." He laid down his knife for a moment and put his hand over hers. "Sweetheart, don't look so miserable. There's nothing you can do for them now. I'll go up and shout at them again; threaten to shoot if they don't move away. Squatting there like that, they're as good as dead already." He put the last bit of food into his mouth, took a long draught of ale and stood up.

"I'll come with you," she said.

"You'll only begin to cry and say 'Poor things' and beg me to have them in. And I tell you frankly, Lucy, I shan't, because I can't. If the twelve Apostles stood there asking to come in, I'd be bound to say no."

Something in his voice hinted to her that he was distressed by the plight of the refugees.

"I won't cry," she said, and followed him out, across the courtyard, up the ramp and onto the wall.

Edward went to the cannon station nearest the drawbridge, and she went and stood beside him. It was a perfect August morning, the sky the color of a harebell and cloudless. The moat at the foot of the wall lay smooth and glassy, mirroring the sky's blue.

"Yes," Edward said, "it's smoke right enough. That'll be Shallyran. We're next." He looked down at the huddle of people on the other side of the moat, pressed together at the spot where the drawbridge, if lowered, would touch. "You must get away," he shouted. "Shallyran's burning. They'll be here within an hour. Go inland and keep off the roads."

They turned their helpless-looking faces upward and some held out their hands; but they made no move to go away.

"Do you think they can hear you? Do they understand?"

"Listen," he said.

It came up with dreadful clarity: "Let us in. Sir, sir, in the name of God, let us in." An old woman went down on her knees and held up prayerful hands; a younger one showed her baby, just about Julia's size.

"Tell them about the caves."

"There are caves at Cloonmagh," Edward shouted. "Go there. You can't stay here. You'll all be killed. I can't take you in. Go to the caves."

A man came forward, tugging at the head his donkey. "There's no getting to Cloonma without a boat, sir. Take us in. You can't le us here to perish."

She saw the sweat break out on Edwar forehead. "I won't have you stay there to slaughtered," he bellowed. "If you don't sc ter I shall fire on you."

They moaned and pressed closer togeth

"Edward, Maire said she knew a secret w to Cloonmagh."

He looked at her for a second, his l pressed together; then he looked to the no where the smoke was now a gray column, d tinct against the sky.

"Fetch her," he said.

As she lifted her skirts and ran down t ramp she heard him shout that he was sendi somebody to guide them all to safety.

Maire was like all the rest of them, li peasants the world over: she owned very litt but that little was precious. She began gather her poor possessions.

"And, lady, I'll need food too. If I go in t kitchen they'll not believe ——"

"I'll fetch you food," Lucy said. "Mai you must hurry. Men who should be busy other things are waiting on you."

Maire had hurried; by the time that Lu reached the inner end of the drawbridge, car ing some hastily gathered food tied up i cloth, the old woman was there, clutchin great bundle under the shadow of her shawl

Above their heads, out of sight, Edward shouting again.

"All you down there, pick up your gear a walk back twenty paces. Now stay there. A body who moves a step when the bridge con down will be shot. Shot dead, d'you und stand? Follow the one who comes out a she'll lead you to safety. All right! Low awaaay!"

Gently, with the muted screech of we oiled wheels and chains, the great bridge ca down and spanned the water.

"Run, Maire. And God go with you," Lu said.

"And have you in His keeping, and all y love," said Maire. Looking very small, s scuttled across. She landed on the farther si and cried, "After me, all of you!" and witho waiting to see whether they followed or n set off, skirting the moat and then making the woods.

"Bring her up!" Edward shouted. T chains wound in, link after link, and the brid rose, slanted across the water, was uprigl Edward turned and began to descend t ramp. As he did so there was a sharp crack was followed by the rippling rattle of an o running chain. The bridge remained poised an instant and then fell with a crash which h a desperately final sound.

Despite all their agonized efforts to raise to hack it through, to blow it up, enough mained to afford a passage across the moat f the Puritan soldiers an hour later.

In one respect reality differed from t dream: Lucy was spared the sight of Julia the end of a pike, for Maire's confidence in t caves of Cloonmagh as a hiding place h given her courage enough to carry Little M away with her.

Johannes Belderdik, owner and master the Sea Maid, had, in the years before Cro well's Navigation Act, made regular voyag between Amsterdam and the Irish ports. H had never called at Cloonmagh, which w not a port—just a tiny fishing village, set clo under the cliff and remarkable only for church. The tiny, ancient gray stone buildi was surmounted by a cross, disproportionate tall, and gilded. It constituted a landmark, a Captain Belderdik was on the lookout for it this bleak February morning in the year 165 On this voyage he would put in at Cloonmag because that was what he had been hired do.

A mystery, which he was content to allow remain so, surrounded his errand. A gent man, giving the name of Mr. Bull, and telli some specious story about wishing to inspe an Irish horse for another gentleman, had a …ached Johannes and asked whether he …uld take the risk of carrying him to a small …ce on the Irish coast, land him, wait for an …ur and bring him back again. That Mr. Bull …d money enough to hire a whole ship and … crew in order to make a visit lasting one …ur indicated that something very secret and …portant must be brewing. But that was no …air of Johannes'. He had only to find …oonmagh.

It was more difficult than he had antici…ted. The weather was bad, visibility fre…ently obscured by squalls of sleet. Finally … knew that he had overshot his mark and …ust turn back. So they turned about and at …e next little village, of which Johannes said …biously, "It could be Cloonmagh—if it had …e cross," made a careful approach and, when …e sounding revealed that the ship could go … nearer, lowered a boat.

"Sir," Johannes asked, as his passenger pre…red to embark, "do you speak Gaelic? . . . …en you will have difficulty in ascertaining …ether this is Cloonmagh or not. I will come …th you."

They landed, in the middle of another squall, … the desolate beach and walked toward the …uster of poor clod hovels. The place gave no …gn of human occupation: there was no …und, and not a thread of smoke rising from …y roof. But as the sleet storm cleared they …uld see, beyond the hovels, the squat stone …urch, and protruding from its roof a broken …ump, gilded.

"This is Cloonmagh," Johannes said. "And … a dead village."

"It suits me well," said …r. Bull, forgetting caution … a moment. "If this is …loonmagh, I have only to …llow my directions. I …all be back in an hour." … was a speech of dismissal. …e began to walk, at a …anking pace, was lost to …ght for some moments and …en appeared again scram…ing up the cliff and …ally vanished behind a screen of gorse …ushes and wind-twisted fir trees.

Johannes turned in the other direction. He …alked until he had reached the church, stood …r a moment, looked up at the stump of the …oss and remembered how often, sailing down … Wexford, he had seen it gleam in the morn…g sun or shine wetly through the rain. Then, …epressed by the brooding desolation of the …lace, he turned back. Facing the houses …gain, he heard, and then saw, something …hich indicated that the place was not so en…rely deserted as it seemed. He heard the …ood-demanding squeal and grunt of a pig, …nd saw emerge from behind one little house …nd go to stand by the doorway of another a …reat, gaunt sow, heavily in pig. In prompt …nswer to the demand, the low door opened …nd a very old woman crept out, dragging a …ooden bucket. She pushed and heaved it a …ttle way from the door, the pig rushed to it, …nd she crept back into her house.

Then something happened which brought …ohannes to a standstill. Out from some hid…g place came another figure, a bit of flutter…g rag, a tousled mass of hair, arms and legs …s thin and angular as twigs. It darted to the …ther side of the bucket, crouched down, thrust …s arms in beside the sow's guzzling snout and …rought up handfuls of food and shoveled …hem into its mouth. The sow moved, pivoting …ound, trying to shoulder the intruder away; …he child simply moved around and went on …eeding. The sow let out a cry, disconcertingly …uman, a call for aid. A human child eating …ike a pig, a pig crying out like a child, Johannes …hought.

The door opened again, and out crept the …ld woman, this time carrying a stout stick. …or all her seeming frailty, the blow she struck …ould have hurt had it fallen where the old …oman intended, but the child was too quick. …t was on its feet and running when the stick …hudded down on the edge of the bucket. Run…ing, the child betrayed its sex—it was a girl. She had filled her hands with the dripping, …evolting-looking pieces, and she was so in…ent upon running and eating at the same time …hat she was close enough to Johannes for him to smell her before she noticed him. When she did she stopped short, dropping her hands and staring at him.

He said quickly, "Don't be frightened. I shan't hurt you!" but he spoke, without thought, in his own tongue. He repeated the assurance in halting, painstaking Gaelic. She looked over her shoulder at the old woman, now hobbling toward them, using the stick as a prop. Then she looked at him with an expression of confidence as well as appeal and moved to his side.

"Help me," she said.

The old woman, now close to them, seemed to sense his partisanship; in a spate of Gaelic, too swift for his understanding, she made a speech of self-justification and complaint. The gist of it—so far as he could make out—was that the girl always robbed the pig and the pig must eat or die.

"The child also," he said.

The old woman shrugged, a gesture of helpless indifference. She spoke again. The girl was nothing to do with her. Maire had brought her and now Maire was dead; everybody was dead.

The child beside him said, "Yes. Maire is dead and I am hungry."

"Have you food in the house?" he asked the old woman. "I could pay." A greedy gleam came into her eyes but it vanished.

Of what use was money, she asked, when there was nothing to buy? What food she had would hardly last for herself until her son came back; everybody was dead, and she would have been dead, too, except that she had a son who worked at Shallyran.

Rummaging in his mind for the Gaelic words, he asked, "And the child has no parents?"

No; she never had any; Maire had brought her; Maire was dead, and soon the child would die too—only by robbing the pig had she kept alive so long.

He looked at the girl. He thought of the good food at that moment being prepared in the ship's galley and made an instant decision.

"You come along with me," he said. "I'll find you something to eat."

Her dirty little face took on a look of pure bliss. To his enormous surprise, she stepped in front of him and made him an elegant curtsy and said, "Sir, I should be very grateful."

"Come on, then," he said, smiling.

"God be thanked now," said the old woman, "the pig can eat in peace."

The sailor who had been left with the boat stared to see his captain appear accompanied by a filthy scarecrow child. Johannes lifted her into the boat, thinking how piteously small and light she was.

"Put your back into it, Daan," he said; "this child is starving." Of Julia, he asked, "How long have you lived like this?"

"Since Maire died."

"How long ago?"

"It was Christmas." Tears filled her eyes and slowly spilled over, making tracks down her dirty face.

"All right," he said hastily, "we won't talk about that. You're all right now." He took off his jacket and covered her rags. Washed and fed and properly dressed, he thought, she would be a very pretty little girl. And Geertruida would love her—surely. Geertruida's childlessness had been a great grief to her in the early days of their marriage. . . . "What is your name?" he asked.

"Julia. Maire said remember always . . . shall I say it?"

"Yes," he said, intent and curious, "tell me what Maire said you were to remember."

It surprised him again. He had once heard a gray parrot with a bright pink tail recite in a prim Amsterdam parlor some of the choicest obscenities of the forecastle, and in exactly that same accurate, uncomprehending way this waif now said, in English:

"My name is Julia Ashley. I am English. Cromwell killed my father and my mother and Maire saved me." She breathed hard with the effort and went on: "My mother was a good

HHHHHHHHH

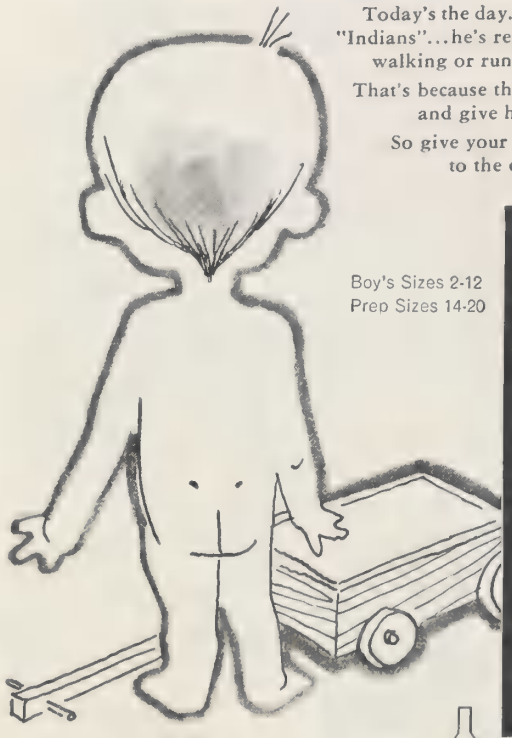
We know more bad things about ourselves than does anybody else, yet no one thinks so highly of us as we do of ourselves.

FRANZ V. SCHOENTHAN

HHHHHHHHH

"There's a new Tonette!
It's really care-free!
Less work for Mommy!
More fun for me!"

Look! A Double-Easy Applicator with New Care-Free Tonette! It's made just for little girls. No skips! No drips! Tonette waves so carefully, so neatly . . . curls stay care-free for months and months . . . without pincurls every day! It's the one children's home permanent that's completely care-free! Give your little girl a New Care-Free Tonette, too!



Special Introductory Offer!

$1.50 value New Care-Free Tonette
$1.00 value Double-Easy Applicator
$2.50 value . . . Now only $1.79

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping
COMMENDED PARENTS MAGAZINE

Let's start from scratch with Jockey Jr.® BRAND underwear

made only by Cooper's®

Today's the day. He's off to climb trees, ride bikes, chase "Indians"...he's ready for Jockey Jr. underwear! Sitting, walking or running there's no gap, bind, or chafe.

That's because they're tailored to fit a boy's figure and give him coverage like no other underwear.

So give your lad a break, and introduce him now to the comfort of Jockey Jr. underwear!

Boy's Sizes 2-12
Prep Sizes 14-20

known the world over by this symbol ® Cooper's, Incorporated—Kenosha, Wis. Licensees and registered users: Canada: J. R. Moodie Company, Limited; Australia: Speedo Knitting Mills; British Isles: Lyle ■ Scott; New Zealand: Lane, Walker, Rudkin; Switzerland: Vollmoeller; France: Verdier; Colombia: Textiles, Ego; Italy: Sacit; Denmark: Taco; South Africa: Ninian ■ Lester; Germany: Volma; Austria: Josef Huber's Erben; Ireland: Dublin Shirt & Collar Company; Mexico: Rinbros, S.A.; Venezuela: HRH; Spain: Nerva.

smartest shoes in any class

Edwards
THE SHOE FOR CHILDREN

REPORT CARD

Fit . . . . . A+

Quality . . A+

Fashion . . A+

At the head of the class, for the feet of the class . . . that's educated Edwards footwear! Fifty-seven years of knowledge stand behind these long-wearing styles that Edwards designs for tot-to-teen-age pride! Expertly fitted by your nearby authorized Edwards dealer, they're priced for value, too! See them now!

Edwards PHILA. 7, PA. • available in Canada—EAGLE SHOE CO., LTD.

lady and my father was a brave man. I must be good and brave."

"Say . . . that . . . again," he told her, in English.

She looked at him blankly. Apparently the little recitation was all the English she knew. Asked in Gaelic to repeat it, she did so instantly.

"Do you know how old you are?"

She looked down at her fingers, moving them against one another, and finally held up her hands, both thumbs tucked down.

"Eight. You are eight years old?"

"In summer. Maire told me."

They had reached the Sea Maid.

"Well, here we are. We'll soon have some good hot food inside you," he said.

Eight, he thought, was a good age, young enough to have something left of entrancing childishness, old enough not to be too heavy a responsibility. Geertruida would love her.

For the third evening in succession, Geertruida Belderdik, having made sure that everything was in readiness for Johannes' return, sat down to await his arrival. She took up her knitting—a pair of long warm stockings for Johannes—but her fingers were clumsy with excitement and impatience.

Twenty-two years of marriage to a seafaring man had not trained her to accept with calm the inevitable rhythm of such a life. Still, when he went away she felt the wrench of bereavement; then, when all her tears were shed, there was the waiting time, during which she could hardly be said to live at all. Finally there was the rebirth, with its own pain, a time when she must count the days, the hours, the very minutes, with so much to be done making ready her feverish welcome, and the exact time was never certain: she must bear the impotent dependence upon wind and weather, she must listen, day and night, for the sound of his coming.

She went to the table, where, on a white cloth, glossy with starch, all Johannes' favorite cold dishes were set out. Cold ham, smoked sausage, spiced beef, pickled red cabbage, honey, her homemade cherry, her apricot jam, a rich plumcake. In the kitchen various hot dishes were being slowly brought to perfection.

She thought—as she touched everything on the table, moving one thing and then the other, until it was all rearranged—that this was exactly how she had not intended to live her life. She had planned that as soon as they were married, he should give up the sea.

There was plenty of money: her father was an East India merchant, not one of the princely ones, but wealthy enough, and she was his only child. Johannes was, at the time of their marriage, one of his hired captains, and in marrying him she had mated below her station. Secretly she had felt confident that that would help her to have her way with him. Secretly she had relied upon her father's wealth to make up for what she thought she lacked in looks and charm.

Toward the money Johannes' attitude h been disappointing. Geertruida was not al in being conscious of the difference in th stations and Johannes was—also secretly—suspicious that people might think that he h married for money that he had refused to ha anything to do with it at all. It took some p suasion on her part to make him consent live in the big Hoogenstrasse house. He h his eye on a small place near the water fro Humble hired captain he might be, but he w in a position to provide a home for his wi and he wanted everyone to know it.

Over the house he capitulated: Geertrui pleaded that it would be cruel to leave h aging father there alone; it was her home, a she loved it; there was ample room there. sound sensible arguments, such as would a peal to a sensible man.

Over the money he was adamant.

"It's your father's now; and when he di it will be yours, Geertruida. I want nothing do with it. I shan't always be sailing other mer ships. When my father dies I shall have n share of the farm, and I shall buy a ship."

It was then that she had said that she ha hoped he would leave the sea. She had be angry, hysterical, tearful, all without effec Johannes Belderdik pointed out that he love the sea, had left his father's farm in Zeelar and served a long, hard apprenticeship on a count of that love. He demanded to be to what in the world would he, a healthy se faring man, find to do with himself ashor Her father, she said, would find him some kin of job.

"I have a job, Geertruida," he said gravel "and I intend to continue in it."

Beaten down at last, she had said, "At lea buy a ship now. Let me do that for you." T Sea Maid had been bought with her mone but when, in the following year, his fathe died, he had paid her back, and she had take the money, resentful and respectful at th same time.

She had tried, in the early days, to do wha many captains' wives did—go with him on hi voyages; but she proved to be a hopelessl bad sailor, constantly seasick. She was sensibl enough to realize that a seasick woman, i the close confines of a ship, was not an attrac tive companion. In the end she had stayed a home and begun the pattern of parting an waiting and reunion that simply led to an other parting. And never once did she suspec that the irksome pattern contributed to keep ing their love alive and fresh. She had never, i fact, brought herself to believe that Johanne loved her at all.

She considered herself very ugly. She ha decided that in early childhood, noticing th differences between herself and all the othe little girls she knew. She had always been smal and thin; her skin was dark, her eyes ver black and her hair—also black—quite straigh and far too heavy and stubborn to be affecte by curling irons or rags. All the other littl

CONTINUED ON PAGE 92

"Oh, Henrietta, you look just beautiful."

IMPORTANT SKIN DISCOVERY FROM JOHNSON & JOHNSON

THE FIRST TRULY EFFECTIVE MEDICATED POWDER

FOR BABY... AND ALL THE FAMILY

Only powder that clears up and prevents even "problem" diaper rash

New, exclusive formula stops not only ordinary diaper rash caused by wet-diaper friction—but sore, difficult ammonia dermatitis.

Completely clears up rashes, chafing, urine scald —prevents their return. Ends ammonia diaper odor.

Stops more kinds of skin irritations than any other medicated powder

The formula has two special antiseptics... relieves the most stubborn irritations as well as simple heat rash, itches, insect bites.

And you can use it with confidence. It's been hospital-proved safe for the most sensitive skin.

Exclusive absorbent action keeps skin cool, dry—in hottest weather

The moment you smooth on Johnson's Medicated Powder, you feel more comfortable. Its thirsty absorbing agents dry up moisture fast.

And it's silky-soft, never gritty. Clings gently, smells fresh and clean. Try it for girdle chafe... on feet and underarms, too.

4 ounces, 49¢

NEW Johnson's Medicated Powder

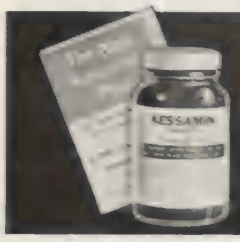
Have a new

Beauty figure for Fall

The slim figure of fashion...

The trim figure of health!

McKesson offers a new Beauty Plan . . . The Kessamin Plan . . . to help you lose pounds, pleasantly, safely!



Look younger, prettier in the new autumn fashions. Shed the overweight that makes you and your figure look older. Here is a plan to help you reduce, easily, safely, pleasantly—and what's more, to keep your figure attractive and slender. It is called the Kessamin Plan.

The Kessamin Plan was compiled by a leading nutritional expert. It allows you the same delicious foods everyone else enjoys. Yet you lose weight while you supplement enjoyable meals with Kessamin Tablets. These little tablets contain a neutral food additive. They help give you a satisfied feeling in your stomach. They make it easier for you to have "will-power" while you lose weight.

Kessamin Tablets also contain vitamins and iron to keep you feeling well and fully nourished on moderate amounts of food. Kessamin brings gratifying results—helps you lose pounds over-all, in a steady, healthful way.

So safe, you'll feel really alive! So effective your figure will look slimmer and younger. So pleasant, you need never be fat again.

It's guaranteed. Either you are pleased and happy with what the Kessamin Plan and Kessamin Tablets do for you—either you win a new beauty figure, lose weight and feel better—or your money back. Ask your doctor about reducing. Consult your druggist about Kessamin. It is one more example of how McKesson "makes it better . . . so it's better for you."

KESSAMIN

BETTER...by McKESSON

© 1957 by McKesson & Robbins, Inc., New York, N. Y., Bridgeport, Conn.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 92

girls were plump and fair-skinned and had light-colored eyes, and hair that was either curly or capable of being made to seem so. To be so different, to be, at the age of twelve, topped by blond beauties of nine—that was bad enough; but when she was fifteen something worse happened. Her father, who doted on her, brought home a length of superb silk, the color of flame with stripes of a darker shade. It would, he told her, make her a fine new dress.

She had unrolled the shining length of it and draped it over her shoulders and gone to look in the glass. It changed her: against the strong vivid color her skin looked creamy, her hair and eyes blacker than ever, her mouth a dusky red. She studied her reflection, first with surprise and then with growing displeasure. Then, throwing the silk to the floor, she cried:

"I can't wear it. It makes me look like an Indian."

Perhaps she had expected contradiction; when he said nothing she looked at him with growing consternation and suspicion. She seized his arm, demanding in a loud voice:

"Is that it? Am I an Indian? Am I? Am I?"

He said slowly, "Your grandmother was Javanese—a princess. And your mother was the most beautiful woman I ever saw."

"A beautiful black woman!" she screamed in derision.

"She was not black," he said, speaking with a sternness he used seldom. "She was beautiful, I tell you." He paused. "Just for a minute," he said, "with that silk about you, you looked like her."

She gave him a look of pure hatred and rushed out of the room.

By the time she was eighteen—and fell in love with handsome young Johannes Belderdik—the consciousness of being ugly, different, somehow inferior, had imposed upon a nature fundamentally passionate and arrogant a deceptive meekness and an apparent desire to please. That, and her smallness and the piquancy of her tiny features and unusual coloring, made a strong appeal to Johannes. With some diffidence—because of the difference between their stations—he began to pay her attentions which, to his surprise, were well received, not only by Geertruida but by her father, who had been troubled by her surly withdrawal from social contacts, her moods of bitter misery. Johannes had been, and remained, astounded by his luck: his faithfulness to her had been effortless: he knew he had the sweetest, prettiest wife in the world.

Tonight, when she had fidgeted with everything on the table, she moved restlessly about the room, went to the window and pulled back the curtain. Not to be borne, this endless dread and uncertainty. No man who loved a woman would subject her to such torment unless he had to.

As she let the curtain fall and turned back to the room she heard—and it was more a matter of heart than of ear—the sound of a footstep in the street. In a moment she was across the hall and opening the heavy front door. It was Johannes' step, though slower, less springy than usual. She flung herself at him, saying his name over and over. Ordinarily at such a moment he took her in his arms and, because she was so tiny, swung her off her feet and held her high. Tonight, under his heavy cloak his arms were occupied, clutching something bulky. He never came home without bringing her a present, and as she put her arms about him as far as they would go, she had time to think . . . a roll of the woolen cloth the Irish made . . . a wolfskin ——

"Dear Truida! Dear Truida!" he said as her lips traveled over his wet face.

She closed the door against the wind. That was always the loveliest moment of all, the moment when he was safely back and the door shut on all the outer world.

"Safe home once more!" she said in a voice tremulous with joy.

She loosened the clasp of his cloak and gave it a little tug so that it fell with a sodden thump on the spotless floor.

"What have you ——" Then she saw. The child's head stuck out from the muffling folds, a pale sleeping profile, a tangle of bright hair, tucked between his upper arm and his breast.

She was to think, a thousand times, a thousand thousand times afterward that that moment was symbolic of it all—herself running to meet him and throw herself into his arms and his arms not free to take her any more.

"It's a little girl," he said.

"So I see. Who is she? Why have you . . . brought her here?" She heard the sharpness of her voice.

"I'll tell you all about it," he said, and looked about for some place to lay his burden, selected a settle on the far side of the hall and gently laid the child down.

Then, too late by an unreckonable age, he took Geertruida in his arms.

When he set her down they both turned to the settle. "I found her starving in a deserted Irish village . . ."

He had started his story when Anna, carrying a covered dish, came into the hall. She made a stiff bob and said, in a voice of genuine pleasure, "Welcome home, master."

"Hello, Anna. Something smells very good." By that time Anna's gaze, following Geertruida's, had lighted upon the child. She gave an exclamation of surprise and the lid of the dish rattled.

Geertruida, who often eased her suppressed irritation with Johannes by snapping at the servants, swung round and said, "Be careful, Anna. It's only a child. By the way you're gaping, one would think it was a monkey."

"You might have thought so if you'd seen her as I did," Johannes said. "I have cleaned her up a bit, and she's put on ——"

"Dearest," Geertruida said, "the food will get cold. You haven't even taken your hat off. And your feet must be —— Anna, fetch the master's slippers. Johannes, come to the fire."

He removed and flung down his hat and then went to the settle. "We'd better take her in. She might wake and wonder where she was." He lifted the child and shook her gently. "I wanted to keep her awake, so that you could see her with her eyes open. She has beautiful eyes." As he spoke Julia's eyes opened and he spoke to her gently in some foreign tongue.

"Can't she walk?" Geertruida asked in that same sharp way.

"Of course she can. And run. But she hasn't any shoes, you see. We rigged her up as well as we could, but the shoes beat us."

He carried Julia into the parlor and Geertruida drew up a third chair. Johannes set the child down and pulled away the coat in which she was muffled. Geertruida saw that she was wearing Johannes' best shirt, with the sleeves rolled up, and a pair of drawers securely tied about her small waist with a length of tarry string. She was now wide awake, looking from one to the other and then about the room. Johannes smiled at her and spoke in that same strange tongue, and after a moment she slipped from her chair and curtsied to Geertruida.

"You see, somebody has taught her manners. I don't think she'd run wild long," Johannes said.

Geertruida served the food. The table had been set for two, and she deliberately refrained from ringing the bell and asking Anna to set another place. She sat with her hands clenched together in her lap, ostentatiously not sharing the meal. Johannes did not notice. He ate heartily and kept pressing the child to eat. Once he drew Geertruida's attention to her pretty manners. Then he began naming the things on the table, the food in the dishes, making her say the names after him. She joined in the game eagerly, laughing at her failure to imitate him perfectly. Her laugh was delightful, gay and musical. And her eyes, as Johannes had said, were beautiful, the soft dark, almost purple-gray of a thunder cloud, and set between long lashes.

The meal lasted a long time. When it was done Johannes eased his chair back and said, "That was good! Oh, I am glad to be home."

And he had not noticed that she had not shared this, their reunion supper. Tears of self-pity dripped—not down her cheeks where they would have done no harm—inwardly, corrosively onto her heart.

The child ate, lingeringly, gloatingly, slice after slice of bread and honey while Johannes told how and where he had found her, speaking of the pig, the old woman, the desolation of Cloonmagh.

Then Geertruida said, "And what are you ing to do with her now?"

For the first time he wondered whether he d taken too much for granted.

"Well," he said, "I thought you'd like to ep her, Truida. She's a very nice little girl. I ought, when I'm away, she'd be company r you. But of course"—he looked her straight the face and spoke with honest directness—f you don't take to the idea, you're under obligation. I could make some other arngement for her."

"What? The Klopstock Home?"

"No! That'd be the very last place. No, I'd d somebody who did want a nice little girl. failing that, keep her aboard. She was no uble and the men all loved her."

"She'd be better here. Would you like her stay?"

"Of course I should. That's why I brought r home."

Julia had been following this conversation, rning her eyes from one to the other as ough she sensed that the talk concerned her. hannes now spoke to her in the strange ngue, and she smiled and nodded and then oke into that ripple of laughter.

"I told her she was to stay here and be our tle girl," he explained. "And I told her that e must be quick and learn Dutch because I d the Gaelic very difficult."

"I'll have a bed made up," Geertruida said. e went out of the room and stood for some oments in the cold hall, doing battle with rself.

It was true that in time past she had reetted her childlessness, but the children for hom she hungered had been great sturdy ys exactly like Johannes, ch one a link in the chain nding him to her more osely. This strange child, ppearing out of nowhere, ould never be a link. Already she had come between them, spoiled this appy evening.

In the end the long years f hiding her true feelings, iding even her real nature, came to her aid. nce again it was a matter of pretend: give ay but be watchful and when the slightest xcuse offers itself, edge her out.

She was able to give her orders about the reparation of a room for Julia in a manner hich gave no indication that the child's arival was other than a pleasure to her.

The thought came to her in the night. Johannes was already asleep and she was just lipping into sleep when the thought came nto her mind as though an enemy had spoken in a loud clear voice.

She tried, on this first occasion, to refute it, ut feebly and with little conviction. It followed so naturally on her secret fears that within a few minutes she had accepted it as ruth and told herself that she had always nown it to be true. Always, wherever he was ound, even Alexandria or Tripoli, she had isualized the place full of tall, full-bosomed ussies with pink-and-white skins, light eyes nd fair hair. That had been part of her misery, hat she, who could never bear to have about he house a servant girl who was not old or ositively ill-favored, must bear the dread that t each landfall Johannes betrayed her.

Every time he came back she questioned im closely. "Tell me what you did, where you vent, whom you saw. I want to share it all with you." She had never, in all the years, had he slightest confirmation of her suspicions; e was a loving husband, tender, indulgent, ut her wounded self-esteem had been past ealing long before she met him, and it had gone on festering despite the balm of a seemngly happy marriage.

And now she knew.

That was a bad night. And from that night on always she woke. Always suddenly, as though someone had roused her. And except that every day added to the weight of evidence, the night's ordeal was always the same.

Always the same. . . .

The child's hair, now that it is properly washed, is just the color his was as I first remember him, a color hard to describe, a brown made up of copper, and dead beech leaves and honey, always changing. And her eyes are beautiful; he mentioned her eyes almost before he was inside the house, beautiful because they reminded him of other eyes, set in a pink-and-white face.

She's eight years old. Nine years ago he went twice to Ireland. I remember every voyage he has made in twenty-two years. And this year, with every port closed to the Dutch, at the risk of his life he must go to Ireland again on an errand I always suspected.

What a careful plan to fool me! "She has not," he said, "run wild long; see what pretty manners she has!" She had not run wild at all. A week of fasting would strip the flesh from the bones of a child that size.

Who was she? Damn her, damn her wherever she is; may she rot in hell forever and ever. May he —— Oh, no. I love him; he is mine; he belongs to me. Not true. If he loved me, if he belonged to me he would have given up the sea.

He did not give up the sea because this woman, this child's mother, lived on the other side of it.

Once or twice he woke and found her crying. "Why, Truida? Why, my dearest?" She had her reason ready. Time was running short, soon he would be gone again; she would be alone and he in danger from the sea.

The Sea Maid was a good ship, he said, and he was a good sailor. Nothing to fret about.

"And this time, when I go, you will not be lonely. You'll have Julia."

Yes, indeed; she would have Julia!

Outwardly life in the Hoogenstrasse house went on in orderly serenity, and whenever, in later life, Julia looked back upon this time, she saw it golden with sunshine. Even in winter, when the canals froze and she went skating with a crowd of little boys and girls, the sky seemed to be blue and the snow, when it fell, fell through sunshine.

Her memories of Maire and of the dreadful time after Maire's death dimmed every day, despite Aunt Geertruida's efforts to revive them with questions. Aunt Geertruida spared no pains to teach her to speak Dutch, and since, as soon as Uncle Johannes had gone back to sea, nobody about her spoke a word of any other tongue, she acquired it quickly and easily. Then the probing began.

"With whom did you live before Uncle Johannes brought you here?"

"With Maire, but she died."

"What was Maire like?" That was a question hard to answer; she had never noticed Maire much, she had been accepted, missed and mourned but not observed in a way that furnished a description.

"She was kind."

"Was she young or old?"

"Oh, very old." But what did that mean? To a child of eight any person fully adult would seem old.

"As old as I am?"

Julia would ponder this, bringing her brows together in a frown of puzzled concentration. "I don't know, Aunt Geertruida. I don't know how old you are."

"Did she look old? Was her hair gray?"

"Yes. Maire was old. Her hair didn't show. She had a shawl." Julia brought that proof of memory forward with an air of triumph.

Then possibly Maire was not the mother—the grandmother; bastards often ended up in their grandmothers' care.

"Was Maire married?"

"I don't know."

"Who else lived in the house?"

"Only Maire and me."

"And Maire taught you manners?"

"Yes. Because she said one day they would come back and she must say that I knew my manners."

"Who would come back? Julia, try to remember."

"I don't know, Aunt Geertruida." She knew that this answer, so often the only possible one, was unwelcome. She tried hard to remember, to catch at the fleeting memories of those days. "There was a place. Maire went there to wash, but they were different people. Not the ones

There are no ugly women; there are only women who do not know how to look pretty. LA BRUYÈRE

Act now . . . for your children . . .
send them back to school in

U. S. GAYTEES®

They'll take weather easy, too, in this light protective footwear easy to wear

easy on and off
easy to clean easy to dry
easily your best buy

U.S. Gaytees. FASHION OVER THE SHOE

SNO-SUIT BOOTS
Red, White, Brown

CAVALIER BOOTS
Brown, Red, Black, White

SOU'WESTERS
Yellow, Red, White

PUDDLE JUMPERS
White, Red

InsulAir
White, Red

InsulAir ®
Red, White

US RUBBER United States Rubber
Rockefeller Center, New York 20, New York

who would come back to see if I knew my manners. Maire cried."

"Why? What about?"

"She said, 'Now they will never know how hard I tried.' And she said I must remember."

"What?"

"What Maire told me. I do remember that, Aunt Geertruida. Shall I say it for you?"

"No, thank you. I know that part."

Conscious of another failure to please, Julia would sigh. She had known, almost from the first day, that it was necessary to please Aunt Geertruida, who did not feel toward her as Uncle Johannes, or even as Anna and Wilhelmina did. Aunt Geertruida never looked at her as though the sight gave her pleasure, and this, Julia thought, was because Aunt Geertruida did not like her hair. She often mentioned how untidy it was. Nothing, no amount of combing and brushing, could bring Julia's hair to the state of perfection of Aunt Geertruida's, which looked as though it had been painted on her head, but finally Anna and Wilhelmina between them devised a coiffure which resulted in a cessation of complaint. They brushed it flat with a wet brush, plaited the ends back hard and turned the plait back on itself and tied it with a narrow ribbon.

It was the first thing Uncle Johannes noticed when next he came home. "What have you done to your hair, my pretty? You look like a skinned rabbit."

Aunt Geertruida said, "That is the only way to keep such a mop of hair tidy."

"Well, I don't like it. It makes me think of orphans."

"I am an orphan," said Julia brightly, "and I'm very lucky not to be in the Klopstock Home."

Uncle Johannes looked displeased. He untied the ribbon and loosened the plait, ruffling her hair with his hand.

"You're not that sort of orphan," he said. "You'll never be an orphan so long as I'm alive."

"I know," she said happily.

She knew about the orphans. They lived in a big house on the Herrencanal and when they went for a walk they went two by two and never spoke above a whisper. They had very dull gray clothes and their faces were sad. They never joined the other children at the skating; Anna had explained that kind gentlemen gave them food and clothes, but couldn't afford to provide them with skates. It was, however, not Anna but Aunt Geertruida who had pointed out that Julia was lucky not to be in the Klopstock Home, and Julia, in hearty agreement with the remark, had sensed no unkindness in it.

She never thought Aunt Geertruida unkind. Strict, certainly, and rather sad and gloomy, especially when Uncle Johannes was at sea. Everything cheered up when he was at home. Julia came to share, though naturally with less violence, Geertruida's pattern of life—the sad parting, the long waiting, the glad reunion.

Time passed quickly because there was so much to learn: needlework and knitting and embroidery, spinning and bleaching; how to cook and how to clean house.

Very soon, it seemed, they were celebrating Julia's twelfth birthday.

Johannes had decided that Midsummer Day should be her birthday. She had said that it was in summer and, "Nothing," he said, "could be more summery than Midsummer Day.

He was home for that birthday, and gave her a string of coral. Aunt Geertruida had made her a blue dress which laced down the front with a coral-colored ribbon. Anna had contributed a handkerchief edged with lace she had pegged herself, and Wilhelmina had given her a tame green finch in a cage. It was a wonderfully happy day—until suppertime.

The parlor faced north and for just a few evenings in the height of summer was granted a brief share of the setting sun's light, not quite direct, but diffused and otherworldly. On this evening, as they sat down to the special birthday supper, the light came in and cast its enchantment upon Julia. It touched the edges of her brown hair so that her head had a nimbus of gold, it shone on the youthful moistness of eyelid and lip, it transformed the unfinished prettiness of her face into something of momentary, dazzling beauty.

Geertruida saw it as she handed the girl her plate and sat for a moment staring as though she had never seen her before. Then her gaze went to Johannes, and she saw that he was staring, too, doting, entranced.

All at once she knew that she could bear it no longer. She let the serving spoon drop into the dish with a clatter, put her hands to her face and burst into a fury of weeping.

They jumped up and went, one on either side, to pat and clasp her, to ask, over and over again, what was the matter. The real reason could never be told. Presently she gasped out that she did not feel well, had not felt well all day.

Johannes held one of her hands in his, and laid his other on her forehead. "You have a fever," he said. "Come, up to bed with you. Julia, run and tell Anna to make some hot lemon tea." He lifted Geertruida and carried her upstairs.

His concern and the concentrated attention soothed her. She said that she felt better, lay for a while feeling rather ashamed of her outburst, and presently fell asleep.

At some hour in the short darkness of the midsummer night she woke, and now she felt genuinely ill; very ill indeed. As in her seagoing days Johannes tended her with matter-of-fact kindness. During the rest of the night the fever mounted steadily and in the morning Johannes sent for Doctor Beets.

The doctor said it was the summer fever which had been raging through the poorer part of the town for three weeks or more; now it was appearing in the better-class districts. It was nothing to worry about, he said. He bled the patient, prescribed a nauseous draught, and advised that she should drink as little as possible. He then departed himself, having added unassuaged thirst to the misery Geertruida was already bearing.

It was the season for voyages to the Baltic ports and Johannes was due to sail for Riga in three days' time. The Sea Maid was refitting and taking on cargo and there was a good deal that demanded his attention, but Geertruida clung to him and he stayed at home all day, until, at about six o'clock, the medicine seemed to take effect. She stopped asking for water and complaining of pain, and became drowsy.

He left Julia sitting by the bedside, said he would not be long and hurried away to the docks. Julia was very pleased to take his place: for a long time now one of her private daydreams had been concerned with doing something for Aunt Geertruida which would convert tolerance into positive affection; this seemed to be her chance.

Johannes returned in the last, long-lingering twilight. As he hurried along he hoped that Anna or Wilhelmina would have had the sense to relieve Julia of her watch—for he had been delayed far longer than he had expected; but as he passed the kitchen window on his way into the house he saw two white caps just visible behind the potted geraniums.

He entered the house and ran upstairs two at a time. Before he reached the landing he could hear Geertruida's voice, louder than usual, hoarse and scolding.

She lay high in the bed, her face dark and dusky against the white pillows, and she seemed not to notice his entry. Julia had left the chair and was standing against the wall, as far from the bed as possible; she turned as he entered but did not move.

"Oh," she said, "I am glad you've come."

"—— away, right away," Geertruida said. "This is my house. You have no right here, it was a plot ——"

He stood, poised for a moment between the raving woman and the frightened girl.

"Run along, Julia. Go get your supper."

He went to the bed and tried to take one of Geertruida's wildly flailing hands. She tore it away with a loud cry.

"Don't touch me! I know how you've plotted and lied and ——"

"Julia," he said, "I told you to go. Send Wilhelmina to fetch Doctor Beets."

That set her in motion—and once she had gone, with her frightened white face, he felt that he did not mind what Geertruida said. It was only the fever talking.

Only the fever talking. . . . He tried to remember that as it all came pouring out, uninchable, sometimes incoherent. Only the er talking . . . but it was Geertruida, telling truth at last; the truth as she saw it.

By the time Doctor Beets arrived, Johannes ew what had lain concealed behind the ade of his marriage. It was as though, unssing one night for bed, he had discovered clean flesh rotted with leprosy.

As soon as Geertruida was quieted he left na by the bed and went in search of Julia.
found her sitting by the untouched supper le in the parlor. She had lighted the candles d drawn the curtains and she looked calm, ich was a relief to him. He was also calm, twardly, but there was a tremor in his mach, and before he sat down to the table took a bottle of schnapps from the cupboard.

"You shouldn't have waited for me, my ar," he said.

"Oh, I wanted to. Shall I cut the bread?"

While she did so he took a drink and felt the irit run, warm and steadying, through his mach. His mood lightened. He told himself at what Geertruida
d said to him hardly attered, so long as at she had said to lia had been harmless not understood. That must discover, so that damage was done he uld mend it. He said:

"Your aunt is out of r mind with fever. You understand that,
n't you?"

"Did she say terrible ings to you too?"

"Terrible!" He pre-nded, not to amuseent exactly but to mething akin, some-ing which would inte confidences without eming to do so. "I ver guessed there were many things to be acsed of. And that just ows what fever will
—in her right mind
ur aunt doesn't think have a fault at all."

"She called me a bas-
rd. Once I heard a boy
y to another: 'You astard!' He was any, so I knew it wasn't nice word."

"What happened, extly? Tell me from the eginning."

"She woke up and sked me to lift her in e bed. Then she asked e for water and I told er what you told me.
nd then she was angry. It was all muddled, ut it was about you and me and Maire and ot wanting me here and my being a bastard.
he said I was your bastard. I stayed up to ask ou what it meant. And, Uncle Johannes, you an tell me the truth because even if it's not a ice thing to be, if it makes me belong to you would please me very much."

He said, "Nothing could make you belong o me more than you do. We belong to each ther for the best of reasons: because I'm fond f you and you're fond of me." It occurred to im that, up to a very short time ago, that was ne kind of belonging which had been between im and Geertruida. He poured and hastily wallowed some more schnapps. "I'm not our father," he said. "I only wish I was. But our father, I reckon, ranked high. Do you ecollect that piece you were taught to say?
Your mother was a lady and your father was a rave man. You must hold on to that. And beng brave"—he hesitated, knowing exactly what he wanted to say but finding the words lusive—"being brave isn't only about not minding being hurt or in danger. There's an-ther way of being brave. For instance, now, ust forgetting all those things that were said, nd not meant; not minding a bit about what s said. Do you see what I mean?"

"I do if you mean not crying about it. But ou must mind what people say, mustn't you?
Aunt Geertruida is ill. But it did sound as though she didn't like me and never wanted me to live here."

"Nothing she said this evening means anything," he said firmly. "The only thing, the only kind thing to do is for us to forget it all. And it's time you went to bed."

When she had gone he emptied the bottle and finally fell asleep where he sat.

In the morning Geertruida, though weakened, was herself again.

"I must get well quickly," she said. "You have only three more days. Oh, dear, this was such a short time and I spoiled it. Really I didn't feel well all day yesterday, but I kept about not to spoil the day."

"Yesterday," he told her, "was not the birthday. That was the day before. Yesterday you—you slept most of the time. Doctor Beets gave you some medicine and you ——"

"Then you leave the day after tomorrow. Oh, Johannes! I've wasted two precious days then. I must get up at once."

In the end he promised her that if she would stay in bed and not fret he would defer his sailing for two days. She was delighted.

"Johannes, that is the first time you've ever done that for me. Thank you, my dearest. I shall be quite well tomorrow."

"I hope so," he said. He knew what she was thinking and felt sick. At the moment he felt that he could never share her bed again. "It isn't just to humor you, Truida. Things are all behindhand with the ship. I shall have to sleep aboard tonight—probably every night until we do sail."

Twice before he sailed he made indirect reference to what Geertruida had said in delirium.

"Julia is twelve now. It's time we began to think about her future."

Geertruida, touchingly convalescent, had insisted on going on with her knitting and was counting stitches. "Twenty-five," she said. "What do you mean by her future? She'll be married one day."

"Not before she's seventeen if I have any say. That leaves five years. I've been thinking she should go to school."

"To school? Girls don't go to school." Geertruida's voice was calm, but she had taken her finger off that twenty-fifth stitch and was looking at him intently.

"Call it what you like. Mevrouw den Hage has four girls of her own and accommodates five or six others and hires a teacher for them. What's that but a school?"

"A private arrangement to spare Mevrouw's purse, I should say. Do you think she would take Julia?"

"I could ask. Would you like me to?"

Sudden, almost unbelievable happiness welled in her heart.

"It would be a very pleasant and advantageous arrangement for Julia. I have taught her what I know, but that is little. Also, now that she is twelve I don't like her to walk in the streets alone; I prefer to stay at home and a servant can't always be spared ——"

"You don't think that you would miss her company?"

"I should miss her, certainly; but we must consider her first."

Then it was true; she had resented the child's presence. And if that was true, so might the rest be: that she believed he had been consistently unfaithful to her.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 97

HOW MY TRUE LOVE PROPOSED TO ME

By BERENICE THORPE

Your gown tonight reminds me
Of the way our old shingled shanty used to look
Just after a rain,
When the red in the shingles came out
And shone in the sun against the brown.

And the way you carry your graceful lean body
Makes me think of the firs
That rose above the moss-covered roof
Swaying in the wind.

I am restless with wondering tonight,
Because the light in your dark eyes
Is like the candle tip
That stood in the shanty window after dark
To welcome me home.

Act now . . . for yourself . . .
take weather easy with

U. S. GAYTEES®

Today's most complete line of light protective footwear easy to wear

easy on and off
easy to clean easy on shoes
easily your best buy

U.S. Gaytees® FASHION OVER THE SHOE

RAINPAL
Clear, Smoke

RAINTONE
Smoke, Black, Natural

CAVALIER
Brown, Red, Black, White

REGENT
Black, Natural, Smoke

InsulAir®
Red, Black, Brown, White

InsulAir
Brown, Black

US RUBBER

United States Rubber

Rockefeller Center, New York 20, New York

DEBORAH KERR starring in Leo McCarey's "AN AFFAIR TO REMEMBER"

A CINEMASCOPE PRODUCTION RELEASED BY 20th CENTURY-FOX. PRODUCED BY JERRY WALD PRODUCTIONS, INC. COLOR BY DE LUXE

Soft as Moonlight and just as flattering ...a Lux Complexion!

"—That special feeling of knowing you look your very best—I think a soft smooth complexion has a lot to do with it. That's why I use Lux!" says Deborah Kerr

Moonlight works its own kind of magic—but then, so does a soft smooth Lux Complexion! And mild gentle Lux, with its rich Cosmetic lather, can do as much for you as it does for any Hollywood star.

We're sure of that—so sure that we promise complete satisfaction to Deborah Kerr and you. Naturally, you can have your money back, unless you agree that Lux is the nicest complexion care in the world! The Lux fragrance will be as popular with you, too, as it is with the stars.

For a complexion you'll love and he'll love, too—use Lux!

Now! Lux Soap comes in four soft, lovely pastel colors, as well as pure white. Buy new color Lux by the color of its foil wrapper!

9 out of 10 Hollywood stars depend on LUX

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 95

'll go and ask about it now," he said, and from the stifling room.
he other reference concerned the house.
rtruida said something about his retire-
t from the sea and he said:
When I do, I shall build a house, somere on the other side of the Zee, looking h over the water."
You mean leave this house?" she asked.
Yes. I never liked it, you know. When I e I shall have a house of my own—that's y man's right; and I shall have an apple ard and keep bees. Still, that's far ahead.
re's ten years' sail in me yet."
I hope you will change your mind about , Johannes. I should like us to have some together before we are too old."
nd suddenly the idea of retirement was e than ever detestable to him and he wond whether, poor woman, she had not been t in doubting that he loved her.
this unaccustomed uncertainty of mind mood he made his final arrangements;
his farewells and gladly made his escape.

hey expected him back on the last day of tember, and on the twenty-seventh day of month preparations for his welcome were ady in full swing. So much noise was being de that the doorbell rang twice before Geerda heard it and sent Anna in to answer.
fter a few minutes she lumbered into the m.
It's a Captain Wilhelmsteen, of the Dol-n, Mevrouw. He asks to speak with you."
Did he say —— It isn't bad news, is it?"
ertruida asked.
He didn't say. Just asked for you," Anna
l. But after Geertruida had gone down the rs, Anna stood clasping her hands to her nach. She said afterward that her inside w before anyone in the house did.
nd it had known rightly. Captain Johannes derdik would not be coming home from voyage. He was dead and already buried araway Riga. And he'd been the victim, of the storm Geertruida had always aded but of a simple accident.
Captain Wilhelmsteen had seen it happen;
ship and the Sea Maid lay side by side, lphin already laden and waiting for the tide,
Maid taking on casks of tar and turpen-
. A hoisting rope, insecurely lashed, had ped and a cask had fallen and rolled over-rd, carrying a seaman with it. Johannes, o was watching the loading, dived over to aid and the frantic man had grabbed him the head as he came out of the dive. They'd h gone down to death together.
It should never have happened," said Cap-n Wilhelmsteen. "That sort of accident esn't happen once in a hundred years. But pen it did, and to one of the best men that r sailed. That's all I can say, Mevrouw, ext that we gave him a proper funeral and k Marsman is bringing Sea Maid home."
Geertruida said nothing. She remained sit-g stiffly upright in her chair and then, quite wly, she keeled over on the floor.

eertruida lay for several days in a darkd room, refusing all food and comfort. She and longed and prayed for death, but did die. Anna tipped the scales the morning of fifth day, by spooning a little brandy into mistress' flaccid mouth. The spirit, rapidly meating her depleted body, had a curious ct. It made her very angry with Johannes.
If he'd done what I asked him to, she thought,
*s would never have happened. He never did e me or he'd have wanted to stay at home with . The sea and his other women, that was all ever cared about. He dared to bring his bas-d home and expect me to take care of her.
en that I did. Why should I grieve for the th of a man who used me so badly?*
Oh, the relief of that anger! The joy of not eving.
Anna came along with her routine, hitherto itless persuasions—a little milk, Mevrouw, up of broth, just to please me, Mevrouw.
is time she was successful, and presently,
urished, Geertruida slept.
She woke, of course, to misery again; to zing down the long gray avenue of the fue, cold, hopeless. He'll never, never, never me home again. How can I bear it?

She swung now between moods of sober anguish and anger. In neither mood could she bear the thought or sight of Julia. Julia was the creature who had filched away some of his love and much of his attention, the creature who had spoiled their last days together. When she was angry and reviling Johannes, Julia was the living proof of his heartless infidelity.

There was the real Julia, swollen-faced, red-eyed with weeping, trying to share the grief.

"Poor Aunt Truida ——"

"That was his name for me."

"I know, that was why I used it."

"Leave me alone. Go to the kitchen."

Misery and anger agreed on one thing: Julia must be got rid of. The Klopstock Home?... No! That'd be the last place.... You're not that sort of orphan. You'll never be an orphan while I'm alive.

Klopstock Home. Orphanage. Refuge for bastards and unwanted brats. The proper place! And Geertruida knew Mynheer Kinker, one of the governors, slightly. One day Geertruida was going to walk out and call on Mynheer Kinker. She knew exactly what to say.

Mynheer Kinker was sympathetic, but a little puzzled. In June, when Johannes was ashore, he had met him with Julia and had thought what a pretty, pleasant-mannered little girl she was.

He said now, "Could it be, Mevrouw, that this disobedience and naughtiness of which you speak are the result of her grief? I well remember when Elsa—my eldest—lost a puppy to which she was devoted. She uprooted and stamped upon all my best tulips!"

"It's not that. Not that at all," said Geertruida. "Julia was becoming unmanageable long before my poor —— One of the last things he did in June was to try to make arrangements to get her out of the house. He asked Mevrouw den Hage to have her, but ——" She left it there without saying that Mevrouw den Hage had said she would try to make room for Julia at Christmas. Let him find a reason for himself. "It is a great worry to me, Mynheer. You see, I feel so responsible, and if I can't control her I can't be responsible, can I? At the orphanage the girls always look so very well controlled."

"I sometimes think," said Mynheer, pulling at his lower lip, "that they are a little too well behaved. But of course when one is dealing with large numbers one must have more discipline than would be desirable in a private home." He was quoting word for word the retort which the superintendent of the orphanage had made to one of his mild remarks about the orphans' unnatural orderliness.

"Control is just what she needs. I do realize she will be an expense to you. I would gladly make a donation of ... shall we say a thousand guilders? Would that cover her keep and everything for four years?"

"Good gracious! That would be enough to"—he was about to say "keep four of them for four years," but thought better of it and ended, "send her to Mevrouw den Hage's."

"Exactly," said Geertruida. "If Mevrouw den Hage would have taken her I should have paid, so it makes no difference."

His mind's eye presented him with two little pictures, one of Julia so happy with Johannes on that summer day, the other of the orphans quietly and listlessly taking their daily walk, with a big, surly-looking girl at one end of the line and the superintendent's assistant, a sour-visaged woman, at the other. It seemed a pity, but if Mevrouw Belderdik couldn't manage—and really, poor thing, she did look frail and helpless.

"Well," he said, "in such a case, of course.... Let me take the particulars. Now, her name?"

"Julia." He wrote that and held his pen poised. Not Belderdik, Geertruida thought fiercely. There'd been some other name tacked onto Julia in that parrot recital, but she couldn't think of it. "Maire" she could remember. And it was near enough. Bastards took their mother's name.

"Maire," she said, and spelled it. "It's an Irish name, I suppose."

"And she is—how old?"

"Twelve last Midsummer Day. Mynheer Kinker, all this ... so upsetting ... I feel a little faint. Do you think ... a little brandy, please."

For Juffrouw Klopstock, superintendent of the orphanage, and for Juffrouw Hoorne, her assistant, each day ended with a pleasant little ceremony—chocolate drinking. In winter they drank it by the fire in Juffrouw Klopstock's sitting room, in summer on the balcony overlooking the garden. Chocolate, imported via Spain from the new lands in the west, was a very great luxury indeed; even the very wealthiest people did not drink it regularly. The Juffrouws managed to do so because Juffrouw Klopstock, under her plump pink lethargy, concealed a genius for financial shift and contrivance. For her the chocolate drinking was a symbol of triumph over adverse circumstance; for Juffrouw Hoorne it stood for social achievement.

All day, every day, Juffrouw Hoorne did Juffrouw Klopstock's bidding, shouldered the whole burden of the orphanage routine. All day long she went about in a state of smoldering revolt, carrying on a silent, angry monologue: There she goes again, lazy cow, lazy pig! Complaining, complaining, making me do all the work and taking all the credit. Just because she was born a Klopstock and this was her aunt's house! I'm nothing but a slave.

Then it would be nine o'clock and Juffrouw Klopstock's musical voice would call, "Klara! Come along!" And that was the signal for the luxurious moment, the cozy little chat, the easing of weary feet, the salving of the bruised self-esteem. By bedtime the furrows were smoothed from Juffrouw Hoorne's brow, the harrow marks from her soul, and she would retire asking herself where in the world could she find another job where her only work was to see that work was done by other hands, where else could she be sure of a fire in her bedroom in cold weather, drink chocolate each evening and be admitted to the company of a lady like Juffrouw Klopstock?

On the evening when Julia was admitted to the home the October gales had set in. Juffrouw Klopstock's sitting room seemed more than ordinarily cozy as the two ladies settled down by the fire, the silver chocolate pot and two china cups on the table between them.

Earlier in the evening the superintendent had received Geertruida and Julia.

"I thought," said Juffrouw Klopstock, "she seemed a very quiet little girl, not at all what Mynheer Kinker had led me to expect."

"She cried when Louisa gave her her clothes," said Juffrouw Hoorne.

"Quite understandable. Her own dress was very pretty."

"I don't like new girls of that age. They don't settle. And if they're rough their language is shocking and their manners appalling, and the few from decent homes pine."

"Twelve is rather old," Juffrouw Klopstock admitted. "But I couldn't go against Mynheer Kinker. However, I don't think Julia will give you any trouble. Her origin is very obscure—even Mevrouw Belderdik seemed to know nothing of it—but I'll wager that she is well bred. Did you notice her hands?"

If there was one phrase which Juffrouw Hoorne really hated it was "well bred." Juffrouw Klopstock used it very often, sometimes innocently, sometimes with malicious intent. This evening it was an impersonal observation and had no connection with Juffrouw Hoorne's lowly birth, nor with her large, red, coarse-skinned hands. Anybody set to work in a dairy at the age of ten would have hands like that, she told herself, as she tucked them under the shawl she had donned before making her rounds of the drafty dormitories.

"I didn't look at her hands. I go by faces, their expressions. I thought she looked surly and too much head-in-air. I should say she'd been spoiled to the point of becoming unmanageable, and then pushed off on us."

"Well, I know of no one better qualified to manage the unmanageable than you, my dear Klara," said Juffrouw Klopstock, perhaps a trifle too sweetly.

Juffrouw Hoorne considered the remark. Something, somewhere had gone slightly wrong this evening.

"If you mean that as a criticism," she said, "I would like to point out that I am responsible for keeping forty noisy girls of all ages so quiet and unobtrusive that you can pretend that they aren't in the house at all."

That was the first time in almost nine years that she had allowed a piece of her private monologue to slip out. She was astonished to hear herself saying such a thing; but, she thought stubbornly, it is the truth.

The big grand house on the Herrencanal had been built by Juffrouw Klopstock's grandfather, who had made a fortune in the slave trade. Juffrouw Klopstock, the orphaned daughter of the old man's younger son, had been brought up there by her aunt and uncle. The uncle had died and the two women had lived on alone. The aunt was always saying, "You'll be well provided for, Ellen." The years crawled by. When the aunt died she left the big house and the bulk of her fortune to the Christian Benevolent Refuge for Orphans. She expressed a wish that her niece should be appointed as superintendent.

It had been a calamitous blow, but after a period of bitter rage, Juffrouw Klopstock had settled down to make the best of things. It was still possible to be comfortable, and when she had completed a number of what she called "arrangements," she was pleased to realize

---

Ask any WOMAN

By Marcelene Cox

As soon as some women put on lipstick, their voices seem to come from a different location.

Television hasn't really killed the art of conversation, as any parent knows who has tried to listen to a program the children don't care for.

Daughter's tranquilizer:
"I love you," sincerely said.
Mother's tranquilizer:
Knowing the children are safe in bed.
Grandmother's tranquilizer:
Baking a batch of homemade bread.
Father's tranquilizer:
Keeping the family out of the red.

Perhaps one way a woman can tell she has reached safe middle age is by noting how quickly the seat beside her on the train is filled.

She's the kind of woman who, if she learned to sew, wouldn't stop until she had a ruffle on the chimney.

The wife of a famous gardener shares a Chinese proverb:

"If you want to be happy for a few hours, get drunk. If you want to be happy for a weekend, get married. If you want to be happy for a week, kill your pig and eat it. If you want to be happy all your life long ... become a gardener."

You know when a daughter has grown up; she asks someone else to put the worms on her fishing hook.

Often we are prone to think another person is in better circumstances than ourselves because we observe him making some small expenditure which with us has always been an economy.

Unretouched photo of Charlene Veth, Jackson Heights, N. Y. (See her pretty face below.)

GOOD HOUSEKEEPING MAGAZINE proved in its famous testing laboratory: New Woodbury Shampoo holds curl better, keeps set longer! Example shown above: The left side of Charlene's hair, washed with her usual shampoo, got limp, straggly. Right side, washed with Woodbury, is springy, curly, beautifully manageable.

Leading shampoos were tested this way on hundreds of women. Results were checked by Good Housekeeping Magazine's laboratory. New Woodbury with its curl-keeping ingredient holds waves best! Protects hair from drying out – leaves it shiny-clean, without dull soap film! Costs less than other brands – a generous bottle is only 39¢. If it isn't the finest you ever tried, we'll return your money! Fair enough?

WOODBURY HOLDS CURL BETTER, KEEPS SET LONGER

that her position had, after all, improved. She now had authority; she had Juffrouw Hoorne and thirty to forty downtrodden little girls to wait upon her and do her slightest bidding, and the governors gave her no trouble at all. By adopting a highhanded manner toward them from the first she had bamboozled them into regarding her as patron, not an employee.

Oh, yes, what Klara, bristling like a hedgehog, had jerked out was quite true.

"My dear Klara," Juffrouw Klopstock said, "why in the world should I criticize your methods when they are so effective and fit so well with my design? You might as well criticize some of my financial arrangements—which benefit us both. Let me refill your cup."

The smooth devil! thought Juffrouw Hoorne with a mingling of hatred and reluctant admiration. She has an answer for everything.

But this evening the chocolate drinking had not had its usually emollient effect and for that the new girl, Julia Maire, was to blame. That idea took its place in Klara Hoorne's hard, narrow mind and nothing could ever dislodge it.

Julia woke to the clanging of the rising bell. She had cried herself to sleep and her eyes were gummy, her head thick-feeling and heavy. There were five other girls in the small room, and as they rose, yawning and stretching, she was conscious of their eyes on her. They dressed quickly and Julia, following their example, began to put on the ugly clothes.

There was an iron tripod in the corner of the room. It held a brown basin, and a dish with a piece of rough soap in it. On one side of the tripod stood a jug, and on the other a wooden bucket. Two girls took their turns at washing, and then Julia went forward.

"You're last," a girl said.

She said, "I'm sorry," and awaited her turn. When it came there was not a drop of water in the jug. Holding it in her hand, she turned with the intention of asking where she could fill it. They stood in a group, watchful, inimical; a ripple of smothered laughter, derisive rather than amused, ran among them. Occasions for amusement were rare in the Klopstock Home.

Hateful, she thought, setting the jug down. She looked at the towel, thin and gray and sopping wet. She couldn't bring herself to put it to her face, but she wiped her hands on it.

The door opened; the giggling stopped. The girl called Louisa who had handed out the clothes last evening was standing in the doorway. Last night her flat face with its reddened snub nose and thick eyebrows drawn together in a perpetual scowl had been just one more disquieting, disheartening thing. This morning, because she had quelled the giggling by merely looking in, she had the face of a friend.

"Please," Julia said, "could you tell me ——"

"You mustn't speak to me till I speak to you. I'm the chief orderly."

All the five faces took on exaggerated expressions of shocked disapproval.

"Good morning," said Louisa formally.

"Good morning, Louisa," said five sycophantic voices in unison.

"You may go down." She passed on, and Julia, lining up behind the others, could hear, from the next room, her formal greeting and the chanted response.

They moved, in line, with exaggerated care not to make a noise, along the passage and down some stairs to a door which led out into a yard. There, behind a trellis, six doorless privies stood in a row. They were occupied; they were vacated; occupied again under the eyes of those waiting. Horrible, horrible.

After that, still in line, they went into a large, half-underground room in which there were three tables—two long ones and between them, at one end, a square one. One place at the square table was served by a red-cushioned chair; everywhere else were narrow backless benches. Girls were moving, quietly and busily, between the tables and the kitchen next door. They set wooden bowls on the tables, took their own places behind the benches and waited. Juffrouw Hoorne entered, walked to the red chair, and said, "Good morning, girls Everybody said, "Good morning, Juffrouw Juffrouw Hoorne said:

"God bless this food and make us thankfu Amen."

There was porridge in the bowls, well mad pleasantly salted and hot. To eat with it the were thick slices of bread, one for each girl. T drink there was milk, not the fresh cream liquid but a pale, bluish fluid, twice skimme supplied by a cheesemaker with whom Ju frouw Klopstock had made one of her "a rangements."

The day was to come when Julia was to e all her portion and long for more, but on th first morning she was too wretched to be hur gry. She sat staring round, loathing all she sav

At the square table Juffrouw Hoorne wa carving a large joint of pink-and-white sa pork. Nobody else in the room had meat; an perhaps, Julia thought to herself, the extr food was provided at that table to make up t the girls there for their afflictions. They wer all disfigured in some way; one had an ugl birthmark, one a harelip. There was a girl wit one hunched shoulder, and two wore expre sions of mild idiocy. And there was Louis whose fearful scowl was in itself a disfiguremen

Julia was looking, although she did no know it, at one of the outward manifestation of Juffrouw Klopstock's genius. As soon a breakfast was over all these afflicted gir would go off to the saltings, to split and clea fish and throw it into the barrels.

When Juffrouw Klopstock took over th superintendency of the home, girls had staye there until they were thirteen or fourteen, an had then been placed out domestic service; their ti with the orphanage we severed and whoever ther after profited by their l bors, it was not Juffrou Klopstock.

From the day on which she weighs 140, the chief excitement of a woman's life consists in spotting women who are fatter than she is.

HELEN ROWLAND

The two simple-minde creatures had helped her t remedy this state of affairs When they reached an ag to go out into the worl Juffrouw Klopstock tol the governors that she was gravely wor ried about them; they were not capable c holding their own in a workaday world. Sup pose she tried a little idea of her own. Th poor girls could be found some easy mechani cal work, well within their capacity, and the could remain in her care. Their wages woul cover the cost of their keep.

The governors took the trouble to look a the girls who were, all too obviously, exactl as the superintendent had described them. S they went to work in the fish saltings, and fron time to time they had been joined there b other girls whom Juffrouw Klopstock deeme unfit to face the world. Their earnings were th matter for some very complicated "arrange ments." The real profit of the enterprise di not appear in the accounts or anywhere else, was concerned with the supply of fish, bot fresh and salted, to the home at a cut-rat price. The orphans were appreciated at th saltings, never absent, never late, never seek ing other employment.

Nobody lingered over breakfast; Juffrou Hoorne rose and said grace again and the la bor force marched out.

The other girls remained standing, an somebody whispered. Louisa spoke quietly t Juffrouw Hoorne, who nodded and said, " understand that you did not wash this morn ing, Julia Maire."

Julia said, "I couldn't, because ——"

"I did not ask you a question. One rule o the house which you must learn is that girl speak when addressed or when given permis sion to speak, not otherwise. Another is to b clean, in your person, in your clothing and i your work."

"There wasn't any water ——"

"Be silent!"

"—— and I didn't know where ——" sai Julia, now as angry as the juffrouw.

"You will have no supper this evening."

"—— to get any ——"

"Louisa, show Julia where to find water and see that she washes, thoroughly. Has an other rule been broken?"

Had there been, nobody would have been so travagant as to report it now. This was exitement enough for one morning.

"Very well, you may disperse," said Juffouw Hoorne.

"You'll soon be in trouble if you go on like hat," said Louisa happily.

"But it was true. The other girls had used l the water and when I asked you, you iid ——"

"That you shouldn't speak without you ere spoke to first. It's the rule."

"Then it's a very unfair rule."

"Now you're finding fault with the rules. our very first day too!"

"But it is unfair," Julia said stubbornly, "if ou've done something you couldn't help and hen mustn't even explain."

"You keep on," said Louisa, "and you won't et supper tomorrow either."

Provoked past caution, Julia used a word he had heard Uncle Johannes use, but which he would never have let him hear her say.

"Damn the supper! And you too!"

There had not been such a day in the Klopstock Home for a long time.

There was nothing, so far as Julia could see, o mitigate the bleak dreariness of the place. The one seemingly obvious advantage, plenty of company, proved to be illusive; you were onelier here than you would be in the middle of a desert. In the Klopstock Home everybody was the enemy of everybody else. Everybody was a willing spy, since it is a rule of human nature that some of your own misery can be lightened by seeing somebody else in worse case. Julia quickly learned that every word she spoke was reported and that every gesture of friendship was regarded with distrust as being likely to lead to some incautious word which she, in turn, would eagerly betray.

You didn't have a friend; you didn't have a moment's privacy; you had very little leisure. Juffrouw Klopstock, in addition to her arrangement with the fish salter, ran several subsidiary employment schemes with private households. The home took in washing and plain sewing and embroidery; it was common enough for a lady in Juffrouw Klopstock's social circle—which was wide and growing—to say that she had a superfluity of pickling cabbage, or plums or apples, and that if all those willing little hands at the orphanage would do the pickling or the preserving and let her have back just what she needed, the rest could go into the storeroom at the home.

It was by way of one of these arrangements that Julia made her bid for escape.

A lady of Juffrouw Klopstock's acquaintance had in her garden in the summer after Julia's admittance to the home a heavy crop of black currants, a troublesome fruit, tiresome to pick, tedious to free from the stalks—in fact, precisely the job for the Klopstock girls. Ten of them, under Louisa's stern eye, did the picking and struggled home with the heavy baskets of fruit, and practically everyone, during the next few days, had a hand in the preparation, the boiling, the straining, the bottling. About two thirds of the finished product was to go back to the old lady, and one afternoon two orphans set off, pushing the little low wooden cart used for such errands.

Juffrouw Hoorne saw them off, and turning back into the house remembered that a piece of plain sewing, just completed, could be delivered along their route. It was ready to hand and she took it up, thrust it at the first orphan to come in sight—who happened to be Julia—and told her to run after the pair with the cart and give it to them to leave on their way.

Julia ran out of the house and then stopped. The two orphans pushing the cart were now at a little distance along the path which edged the canal. She began to follow them, her feet going slowly, her thoughts very fast.

The idea of running away was not a new one: she had entertained it from the very first day and had been watchful for a chance. She was now alone, and out in the street, but there were the clothes, instantly recognizable by anybody. Then she realized that she held, folded in her arms, somebody's winter cloak.

With her heart beating so violently that it seemed it might shake her to pieces, she turned down the next side street, shook out the cloak and put it on. Then she pulled at her hair and shook it loose. The long, heavy cloak was eccentric wear for a hot summer's day, but at least it covered her completely.

Now, where to go? What to do? She realized that she had never carried her plans for escape thus far in her mind. Getting away had always been the problem.

The thing to do, she told herself firmly, was to find a house which looked as though servants were employed there, go to the door and ask if they wanted one.

She was now in a poor street of small, shabby houses and unprosperous-looking shops. The shabby street led into another of much the same kind, but that, at its farther end, opened out into a square of good, solid-looking houses.

Now she must do it; and the jolt and beat of her heart told her how much she dreaded the ordeal. No good lingering. She walked straight to the first house along one side and knocked on the door. It was opened by a pleasant-looking, middle-aged woman.

"Good afternoon," Julia said. "I wondered if you wanted a servant."

The woman laid her hand on the door, which had been wide open, and pulled it half closed. Suspicion wiped the pleasantness from her face. "Are you a gypsy?"

"Oh, no. No."

"Or in with thieves or anything?" Her eyes sought the square, all quiet in the sunshine. "I know that old trick, sending somebody to look for a job and spying about. We've got a savage dog in this house, let me tell you." She slammed the door.

Well, that was horrid, but it was only one house. There were eight more, here in this very square.

"No, thank you. And we never take chancecomers." . . . "No. Our mistress always has girls from the country." . . . "No. We always get our new girls from the Klopstock Home."

It takes two to make a wish

And two to give you an alluring, blemish-free skin—Cuticura Soap and Cuticura Ointment!

Want to win and hold a man? Of course you do! Then make sure you have the two things that assure you the allurement of a soft, smooth, naturally radiant skin.

First—Cuticura Soap. Many skin specialists say it takes a superemollient soap to help preserve the natural moisture and normal, healthy acidity of the skin. And Cuticura Soap—alone of all leading soaps—is superemollient and mildly medicated to help you maintain the clean, clear, fresh, baby-soft skin men love.

Next Cuticura Ointment. This emollient does more than help clear up externally caused pimples. Along with modern, scientific medication it contains effective softening elements—goes after hateful blackheads, flaky dryness, oily shine—softens and gently stimulates as it helps heal.

Thrilling results often in 7 days. Cuticura Soap and Ointment work in record time. In a few days your skin feels like silk, begins to look glowing!

Special Offer! Send 25¢ (no stamps) to cover mailing for miniature Good Looks Kit containing trial size Cuticura Soap, Ointment, Medicated Liquid, and Talcum with antiseptic-deodorant C-8. Write Cuticura, Dept. LH-79, Malden 48, Mass.

COMMENDED BY PARENTS

Cuticura

Available in Canada

Wishing won't help your skin—Cuticura will!

And all the time the curious, speculative, assessing eyes, noticing the too-long cloak. Better get away from here, quickly.

Down another street, across a canal—not so nice as the Herrencanal, dirtier.

Now another pleasant street. Try again.

Presently she was convinced that it was not, after all, possible to get a servant's place in that way. But there were other things. Saltings. The one which employed the orphans couldn't be the only one in Amsterdam—but that one must be, at all costs, avoided. Get down near the harbor, find a place to sleep and tomorrow morning keep a sharp lookout, see into which shed the orphans marched to work and pick the one farthest away.

Now the streets became familiar, full of sad memories. Here, and here and here, she had walked, swinging on Uncle Johannes' hand, coming down with him to visit the Sea Maid. Right here on this corner was the place, half tavern, half eating house, where only last June, returning from the docks, he had said, "Are you thirsty, sweetheart? I am." And they'd gone in and sat in a kind of box place, with high sides and a table, and he had drunk schnapps and she had had a long cool drink that tasted of lemons.

The window was lighted, and except that now it was evening instead of midmorning, it looked exactly the same; there was the ham on the dish, the pies and the pastries, the little three-cornered cakes.

I'll have no supper tonight, she thought, but without much feeling. Having no supper was a thing Julia had trained herself to bear, and although a voice in her mind added, And no breakfast tomorrow, it was not hunger which made her stare into the little window. She was looking at the enclosure, made by two facing settles, where she and Johannes had sat, and taken their drinks, and laughed.

A voice said, "Feeling peckish, eh?"

She turned; it was a sailor—the same clothes, the same face almost as she remembered, the general sort of sailory look, calling to mind Daan and Pieter and all the others who had made such a fuss of her every time she visited Sea Maid.

"No. I wasn't looking at the cakes. I was just looking in."

"Well, come in then, and take a good look. I'm going in myself. Come in and keep me company, eh?"

"I haven't got any money. You'd have to pay for me."

"What'd you want with money? Pretty little girl like you. Come right in and ask for what you want."

He was the first really kind person she had met for a long time. But sailors were kind.

"That is kind," she said.

"Come right in," he said again, and flung open the door.

Only one of the little boxes was unoccupied, the one immediately on the left of the door.

"Sit you down," he said, giving her a little push. "Now, what d'you fancy, eh?"

"A meat pie," she said eagerly.

"And what'll you drink?"

"Last time I was here I had a nice lemon drink."

He said something that she didn't understand at all. He went to the counter and a fat man in an apron put four meat pies on a pewter plate and then gave the sailor two mugs which he carried carefully to the little table and set down. He then seated himself beside her, and she smelled the old, familiar smell of tar and salt water, and sweat.

"There you are," he said, "lay to!"

Now that the food was before her and she was heartened by his kindness, she was hungry. The pies were delicious, the best food she had tasted for a year. She ate three of the four; the sailor ate one, rising now and again to have his mug refilled. She found the drink he had brought her less agreeable; every time she sipped it she choked. He drank it as though it were water.

"You like it, don't you?" she said, and smiled at him.

"Why not?" he said genially. "It's the b schnapps."

"Oh, is that what it is? My . . . somebod once knew used to drink it sometimes. I'll again." She sipped and coughed. "I think for men," she said and smiled again.

He asked her her name, and she told h "Julia," with which he seemed content.

"And what's yours?"

"Hans."

"I shall remember that," she said.

"Maybe you will," he said in a rather p culiar way. "You live around here?"

"Well, not exactly. Just now I don't li anywhere. I'm looking for work."

"You've found it," he said, and smiled, b in a way that made her feel uncomfortab And what did he mean?

"Get that down of you," he said, jerking h head at her mug. "Perk you up a bit. What you like now? One of them cakes?"

"Yes, I would, please. That is—if you thi you can afford it."

He laughed. "I got money and I don't mi what I spend. That's a sailor's life, that is

He lumbered away and came back with refilled mug, and one of the little cakes he between his finger and thumb.

"Get that down," he said, "time I drink th Then we'll go."

"Where?"

"I know a place," he said, exactly as he h said that he had money.

"You mean you know a place for me? place where I can work?"

He had to take the mug away from h mouth in order to laugh. "Now then," he sai quite good-naturedl "don't give me too much the bloody innocence. Li tle of that goes a long wa Work, eh?"

She was now liking hir less; and she knew why He was getting drunk. Tha was the prime failing c all sailormen—except, c course, Uncle Johannes they were the nicest, kindest people in th world, but they did get drunk.

The cake lost its flavor.

He emptied his mug again and sat for moment looking at her.

"You don't want that," he said suddenly "What you want ——" He put his arm, har and heavy, around her shoulders, pulled he round and kissed her full on the mouth. It wa very unpleasant. She pushed him away witl all her might and would have got to her fee but that his arm pinned her down. But sh wasn't angry with him, just confused an rather sorry, because he had been nice to begi with, and now was drunk.

Still pushing at him, she said, "You mustn' do that. I think you're a little drunk."

And he wasn't angry either. "Drunk, am I Maybe I am, but I ain't so drunk ——" an he said something she didn't understand. H lurched to his feet, still holding her, and said "Come on, let's go."

She said, "But you are drunk and I don' think anybody'd give me a job if you went like that to ask for me. Thank you all the same; I don't think it'd be any good."

Then all at once he was angry; and that wa the thing she had been afraid of ever since she suspected that he was getting drunk. Drunk men did get angry all over nothing at all. Now he was shouting about how much he had bought her, and saying many other things which, although she did not understand them, were certainly unfriendly and rude.

He was trying to force her toward the door, but she had her hands clenched on the settle's side and her body partly braced against it. They contested silently, except for his curses, for several minutes, and she looked around the room, searching for one friendly face.

There was none. Four sailors at one table stopped the game they were playing and stared, beginning to laugh and call jeeringly. They were probably drunk too. Two gaily dressed women, sitting with another sailor at a farther table, were watching her with exactly the same expression as her roommates had worn when she lifted the empty jug.

The true way to mourn the dead is to take care of the living who belong to them.

EDMUND BURKE

CONTINUED ON PAGE 102

Refresh without filling...

Have a Pepsi

On or off the green, today's men and women are in great form. Their slim good looks say a lot for their sensible modern diet—for the swing in taste to lighter, less-filling food and drink.

Pepsi-Cola—the modern, the light refreshment—is right in step with this modern trend. Reduced in calories, today's Pepsi is never heavy, never too sweet. At your own oasis, always say "Pepsi, please" and refresh without filling.

The Light refreshment

Campfire®

The Magic ingredient:

MARSHMALLOWS

Marsh Cola Refresher

Frosty Fresher

In this heavenly ice, you taste the tang of cola and the Extra Goodness of CAMPFIRE Marshmallows. CAMPFIRES are the MAGIC INGREDIENT—the marshmallows that stay fresh and soft, melt readily and blend smoothly. Tonight, try this Cola Refresher —quickly fixed with CAMPFIRE Marshmallows.

Marsh Cola Refresher

24 CAMPFIRE Marshmallows
2 cups chilled cola beverage
⅛ teaspoon salt
2 tablespoons lemon juice
Grated rind of lemon

Place marshmallows in sauce pan with 2 tablespoons of cola. Heat slowly, folding until marshmallows are half melted. Remove from heat. Add salt. Continue folding until mixture is smooth. Cool slightly. Blend in remaining cola, lemon juice and rind. Freeze in refrigerator tray, stirring 2 or 3 times. Serve mushy or firm. Garnish with wedge of lemon and sprig of mint. For variety use root beer instead of cola. Serves 5 to 6.

Get dozens of exciting dessert, salad and specialty ideas from Marcia Camp's colorful new recipe book.

Send for your FREE copy today!

10 miniatures equal one regular size

THE CRACKER JACK CO.
Desk 50, 4800 W. 66th St., Chicago 38, Ill.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 100

Even the fat man behind the counter, though he was watching, had a dull look, as though he had seen similar scenes too often to be much interested.

Suddenly the man abandoned the attempt to push her away from the settle. He lifted his hand and dealt her a stinging blow on the side of the face. It jarred her to her heels, so that her hands dropped from the settle and she staggered. He was reaching for her again. He clutched a handful of the cloak; she twisted out of it, leaving it in his hand, and darted across the room, ducked under the counter flap and came up beside the fat man.

"Help me, please," she gasped. "He's drunk."

The sailor came, lurching and cursing, up to the counter, and the fat man proved to be more of a champion than she had dared to hope. He said, "Leave her be, Jack. She's nothing but a kid! You go get yourself ——"

The sailor broke in violently. Of all he said Julia only understood, "You mind your own bloody business, fatty," "cheating little bitch" and "wreck the place."

It was one of the hard-eyed women who saved the situation. She got up and walked down the room, swinging her hips and holding her head high. She slipped her hand under the sailor's arm and said, "You can do better'n that, Jack. What good's a green girl to you? You come along with me."

Astoundingly, he stopped cursing, blinked and grinned and let himself be led away.

"Now you ——" said the fat man, with a look of annoyance, and then a disbelieving stare. "It's a Klopstock girl!"

She stayed in the Klopstock Home for almost two years more, but she never lived down the escapade. All the most repulsive tasks, the heaviest punishments were hers. She spent a good deal of time locked in the cellar—popularly supposed to be haunted by the ghost of a girl who, it was whispered, had been locked in there and forgotten until she starved to death. She was almost invariably prevented, on some excuse or another, from going on the daily walk, which was the one break in the long day's monotony, and the days on which she went supperless to bed far outnumbered the others.

It was a life which must either harden or break any nature, and something in Julia refused to be broken. In the cellar it was cold and damp and dark, but it was peaceful there. And who wanted to go on those stupid, deadly dull walks? Not she! The loss of supper, by this time, did matter rather more, but you could always pretend that it didn't.

You walked warily, outwitted the enemy when you could, and when you could not, bore the penalties as though they meant nothing. You hoped for nothing and cared for nobody.

It took a little girl named Katje to change all that.

Katje was brought in by a kindhearted old marketwoman who had seen her begging among the stalls by day and sleeping in an upturned barrel at night.

Katje knew her name and that she had once had shoes which some other children had taken away—and that was about all. Juffrouw Hoorne, experienced in such matters, said that she thought she was about five years old and had been homeless for a long time.

She was as pretty as a doll, with a china-white face and black eyes and a mop of black curls. She was not, however, at all pretty when she came in; she was caked with filth. By the time she had cleaned her, Julia, without knowing it, had fallen in love with Katje, who had, most marvelously, fallen in love with the Klopstock Home.

"Got shoes again!" she said, with wondering delight, as Julia helped her into a pair of tiny shoes, patched and repatched.

For the first time Julia saw the purpose of the orphanage, and realized that although to her it had always been a hateful place, to such as Katje it was indeed what its proper name implied, a refuge. How horrible the poor little thing's life must have been.

She was on her knees, helping on the shoes, and she looked up, her eyes level with the child's. "You must be very good," she said seriously. "If you're very good and do just what you're told, you'll be all right here."

For a week, at the risk of breaking rules and incurring wrath, Julia watched over Katje, forestalled the tricks always played on any newcomer, and eased her into the life of the place. On the morning when boredom overtook Katje, Julia was in the laundry and her protégée was in the kitchen.

Juffrouw Hoorne had found a job for Katje. She had to grate salt from a block and then pound it until it was fine enough for use.

There were several other girls there, working away in the near-Trappist silence that the rules demanded. Katje, bored with her job, tried to talk, and was hushed, frowned upon, ignored. She was determined to make the others notice her, so she proceeded to show off the simple tricks which had often gained her an apple, a cake or even a small coin in the market place. She turned some expert somersaults, walked on her hands. The other girls gave way to temptation and watched. Juffrouw Hoorne, entering the kitchen, found the pudding saucepan boiled dry, and the bread which had been set to rise on the hearth brimming over the edge of the wooden trough. Katje stood on one leg, the other stuck out at right angles, as she spun round on one toe. The mortar in which she should have been pounding salt was balanced on her head.

Juffrouw Hoorne cried "Stop" in a terrible voice, and Katje did stop, so suddenly that the mortar lost balance and fell, and smashed.

"You naughty, naughty, naughty little girl," said Juffrouw Hoorne, seizing Katje by the arm and administering a sound smack on the ear. Katje had often suffered similar attacks during her short life and she defended herself as she had learned to do. She ducked her head and set her sharp little teeth into Juffrouw Hoorne's thumb. Then she ran behind the table and stood poised to dodge when pursued.

"It was just like dealing with a wild animal," said Juffrouw Hoorne to Juffrouw Klopstock over the chocolate cups that evening. She wore a conspicuous bandage on the injured thumb.

"How unpleasant. Where is she now?"

"In the cellar. She screamed and banged on the door for hours. A most truculent girl!"

A slight look of uneasiness crossed the superintendent's placid pink face. "Neighbors," she reminded Juffrouw Hoorne, "always expect places like this to have a torture chamber. If they hear screaming ——"

"I said she should stay there until tomorrow evening, but of course if you'd prefer to deal with her yourself ——"

"Good gracious. I shouldn't have the faintest idea what to do. Anyway, she's quiet now, isn't she?"

No sound reached this cozy room, but in the passage at the other end of the house as she went to her bed Juffrouw Hoorne could hear noise coming from the cellar. It was muted by distance, and indistinct, but she knew that in the street it would be much more audible. She went to her room, selected her stoutest cane, and carrying it, the cellar key and candlestick, descended the stairs again.

The yelling and the banging had died down before she reached the passage; when she turned into it she could hear another voice, speaking in a firm, soothing tone.

"I can't. I haven't the key. But I'll stay and keep you company. I'm here, right outside the door, as close as I can get."

It was being locked in that Katje minded; company and being talked to did little to lessen the wild panic that possessed her. She began to scream. "Let me out, let me out."

"Katje! you mustn't make that noise. You'll be punished more. Katje, please —— Oh."

Julia had seen the light, and behind it Juffrouw Hoorne. She was startled, but almost immediately calm again. She had broken heaven knew how many rules, and she broke another by addressing Juffrouw Hoorne without permission.

"Oh, please, Juffrouw, let her out. She can't bear it. She's going mad."

"Be silent," said Juffrouw Hoorne. She set the candlestick on a stone slab and beat on the door with the cane. "Be quiet, in there!" she shouted. "If you keep making that noise you will never come out! When you have been quiet for a whole day I shall let you out."

The whimpering, now and again rising to a sterical scream, went on.

"She can't help it," Julia said. "Please, frouw, punish her some other way."

Juffrouw Hoorne had come down with the lf-intention of letting Katje out, caning her roughly and sending her to bed; now a fa- obstinacy rose and overmastered her. That lia Maire, of all people should be telling her at to do!

"You'd do better to begin thinking about ur own punishment!" she said.

"I don't mind what you do to me, Juffrouw, ou'll just let Katje out. She can't bear to be ked up. She'll go mad."

"She will stay there until she is quiet. I've id so and I mean it."

"Then I shall fetch Juffrouw Klopstock."

In the whole history of the Klopstock Home one had ever dreamed of approaching the perintendent except by order or invitation any time; and it was now ten o'clock at ght. The foundations of Juffrouw Hoorne's lid little world rocked, quite literally.

Julia had already turned and was walking way along the passage, a ridiculous yet purseful figure in her too-short, skimpy nightwn and bare feet. Juffrouw Hoorne took o swift steps and caught hold of the looped-up ait which offered itself as a convenient hane at the back of her head. She jerked at it vagely, turning Julia about, and at the same ne giving her two cuts with the cane.

"You insolent little bastard," she said beeen her teeth.

Julia bent and bucked and writhed, trying to ee her head. Juffrouw Hoorne held on and ised the cane again. The key of the cellar or jerked from her hand and fell with a clatr to the stone floor.

Then Julia went mad; she wrestled with the ffrouw, she pushed her; she gave Juffrouw oorne one last mighty shove which carried r some distance along the passage and, ooping, picked up the key.

"Give me that! Give me that key!"

"I'm going to let Katje out and take her raight to Juffrouw Klopstock," Julia gasped. he put the key in the door and turned it. atje lay crouched on the top step, silent now, nd as the door opened she sprang toward it, lmost unbalancing Julia. At the same moent Juffrouw Hoorne pushed the door from e outside. Its swing caught both Julia and atje, thrust them inward and downward. hey rolled to the bottom of the cellar stairs ogether, and above them the key turned again.

"—— so there they are, both locked in the ellar. And what I want to know now is what re we going to do with them. Both those girls ttacked me yesterday. I'm not going alone to elease them and I can't take another girl to itness what may well be a scene."

"No," said Juffrouw Klopstock sensibly. "I ee that. I will come with you myself. Dear e, how very tiresome! And I always thought our discipline was so good!"

The release was an anticlimax; they emerged eekly enough. Katje, who had spent the night curled up against Julia, and who was fully dressed, had suffered little damage except that she had beaten her hands raw by hammering on the door. Julia, thrust into the cellar in her nightgown, was in a palsied rigor from cold. One of the blows from the cane had broken the skin just above her eyebrow.

"You take the little one, Klara. I'll deal with this," said Juffrouw Klopstock. She took Julia to the laundry and made her get into one of the tubs of warm water and kept her there, with a girl bringing fresh hot water, until the rigors grew less violent. She then told her to get into bed, and a few minutes afterward came to the bedroom herself, followed by an orphan carrying a bowl of steaming-hot porridge.

"Don't imagine," she said coldly, "that I'm overlooking your behavior. You haven't heard the last of this, by far."

It was a pity that Juffrouw Hoorne was not present when that speech was made; she was, actually, enjoying the sight of two big girls forcing Katje's raw hands into a bowl of hot salt water. She did not know what Juffrouw Klopstock had said, only what she had done—which was to treat Julia as though she were sick. She brooded over that for the rest of the morning and all through the midday meal, and immediately afterward climbed the stairs and for the second time that day intruded upon the superintendent's privacy.

Juffrouw Klopstock sat in a cushioned chair stitching at the embroidery which occupied so many of her idle hours.

"Well, Klara," she said and raised her eyebrows.

"About Julia Maire."

A glimmer of concern showed in Juffrouw Klopstock's pink face. "Is she ——"

"Oh, she'll be all right. She's very well. Bathed and put to bed and coddled! What I want to know ——"

"You saw the state she was in. We didn't want her ill, did we?"

"I don't want her, well or ill. That's what I've come about. She's fourteen. Two years ago she was unmanageable, but I have tried. I've tried very hard. But I don't intend to have any more. She struck me. Now there she lies, lolling in bed, and when the others go to bed, think what a tale she'll have to tell! Before we know where we are, every girl in the place will be hitting me to get a plate of porridge!"

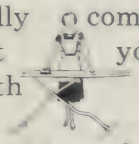
Juffrouw Klopstock saw the funny side of that, and laughed.

Something, stretched tighter and tighter inside Juffrouw Hoorne, tighter every day over all these years, snapped.

"That's right. Laugh. All these years I've done all the work and taken all the blame while you had the money and the praise. I'm sick of it, do you hear me? Every way I turn you get the better of me. Because that little bitch hit me, you take her side. Let me tell you this—unless she's out of this house this very day, I shall be. And then you'll know!"

Yes, she would. Juffrouw Klopstock, successfully deceiving so many people, seldom

CONTINUED ON PAGE 106



"What has ever become of our dream to grow old gracefully?"

More time for fun when ironing is done faster...cooler...easier on a...

Rid-Jid Knee Room®

ADJUSTABLE ALL-STEEL IRONING TABLE

Save time . . . save energy . . . iron the easy way on a sparkling new chrome and yellow Rid-Jid Knee Room Ironing Table! Rid-Jid's exclusive knee-contoured leg design gives extra inches of knee room for really comfortable sit-down ironing.  You iron at your comfort-level, sitting or standing, with  12 easy height adjustments. Fully-ventilated, open-mesh steel top lets steam and moisture through . . . makes ironing faster, cooler, easier.

The Rid-Jid Knee Room Ironing Table is on sale now at your hardware or department store at a new low price. Look for it!

Perfect companion to the Rid-Jid Knee Room is the new Rid-Jid Roll-Or-Tote Laundry Cart. You can raise it . . . lower it . . . roll it . . . tote it . . . fold it. It's the laundry cart with a dozen uses.

THE J. R. CLARK COMPANY • SPRING PARK, MINNESOTA

The 27th in a Series of Advertisements Presented by New York Life to Help Guide America's Children to a Better Future

Should your child go into Food Retailing?

The retail food business is the biggest, fastest growing industry in America. In less than three decades the number of its employees has doubled and sales volume has quadrupled. Such growth has created enormous opportunities for new people to rise in food retailing.

by L. V. EBERHARD

President, Eberhard Foods, Inc., Grand Rapids, Michigan

(As told to DONALD ROBINSON)

SOME YEARS AGO, a friend of mine got a job as a helper in a Florida food store. Those were rough days in the food business, and his pay was only fifteen dollars a week. But not for long. My friend was a bright young fellow and he was quickly promoted to be manager at thirty-five dollars a week. A year later, he was getting forty-five dollars, plus a percentage of all the sales. Then he made an important decision. An ambitious chap, he decided to go into business for himself.

Scraping together his pennies, my friend opened a small food store in Tampa. He worked very hard and soon he had two stores. After a time, he sold them and built a super market. Today, he has thirty-five super markets. Their sales exceed $66,000,000 a year.

Horatio Alger stories of this sort are not unusual among the top men in food retailing. I know of few fields in which so many persons have begun with nothing and gone on to real success in their own stores or by working up to the top in established companies.

The retail food business is the biggest, fastest-growing industry in America. In 1929, it had 723,407 employees and an annual sales volume of $10,837,400,000. It now has nearly 2,000,000 employees and a sales volume of over $48,000,000,000.

All available evidence indicates that this phenomenal rate of growth will go on at the same pace in the future. We are likely to have 30,000,000 more people to feed in the United States by 1975, and their needs will add up to a heap of eggs, milk, steak and other edibles, especially when you realize that the American people are devoting more and more of their income to food. From 1935 to 1939, they spent twenty-three percent of their disposable income on foods. In 1956, it was twenty-five percent.

This means that there is, and will continue to be, a vast demand for new people in the retail food industry. And that there are, and will continue to be, enormous opportunities for new people to rise in the food industry.

Figure it out for yourself. Over 2,500 chain and independent super markets will be opened this year alone. Tens of thousands more stores will come into being in the next few years. These stores will have to be staffed.

Personally, I cannot think of a more rewarding, opportunity-laden industry for an ambitious boy to enter. It is, to begin with, a truly important industry. After all, what can be more essential than helping people to eat better for less money?

The retail food industry has literally dedicated itself to this end and it has been accomplishing wonders at it. In 1933, the cost of warehousing, transporting and vending food took 24.5 cents out of every sales dollar. By concentrating on a principle of large volume, low profit margin and rapid turnover, we have succeeded in cutting this to 18 cents—a 25 percent reduction.

That the people of the continental United States have such a high standard of living—eat better than any ner nation on earth—can be attributed, in large part, the miracles that have been performed here in lower- the cost of food distribution.

This is being increasingly recognized around the orld. Recently, for example, the Government of the ommonwealth of Puerto Rico became seriously con- rned about the prices of food.

What did it do?

It promptly invited several American food market erators to come down and demonstrate their modern ethods of "selling lots for little." As a result, numbers American-type markets are springing up in Puerto ico, and the people there are eating far more for far less.

Food retailing has its other satisfactions. It has done uch, for instance, to ease distress among farmers. When rious surpluses occur in various farm commodities, od retailers join hands in nationwide campaigns to spose of the overproduction.

Inside their own communities, food store men enjoy unexcelled opportunity to render service. And not st as a business proposition.

On hundreds of occasions, food stores have distributed pplies free among flood and disaster victims. I know a store which put its only truck at the service of a arby flood-ravaged town for days, moving the per- nal property and furniture of the flood victims to fety. I can cite countless cases in which food store men ve materially assisted local charity drives, community tterment measures, and "Get Out the Vote" moves. ne store I know goes so far as to sponsor a highway fety program for young bicycle riders. Another gives way a porterhouse steak to each blood bank donor.

Understandably, food retailers stand high with their eighbors. It is no coincidence that so many of them ve been elected mayors of their towns.

The work itself is fascinating. I say that from experi- nce. Food retailing is a lively business where you are in ntact with all types of people. It is a very interesting siness, too. Every day wonderful new products arrive. ou have the fun of introducing them to your customers. hink of frozen foods. A few years ago, they were vir- ally unknown to the general public. Now they are ousehold bywords.

Even eggs are being modernized. We'll soon be selling em without shells. A machine has been invented which an actually crack the shells and neatly drop the contents nto one dozen cup-like compartments in a plastic box.

As a friend of mine said, "You never know what's oming next in the food business."

The fact is that there is a revolution underway in food tailing. Nowhere is it more apparent than in the stores emselves. A store thirty feet wide and sixty feet deep sed to be regarded as unique. People called it "a big tore." Now, stores cover as much as 50,000 square feet.

No more do they have to be musty and crowded. The ast majority of new ones are spotless, air conditioned, rilliantly lighted, with wide aisles, gaily colored walls, littering display fixtures and music in the background.

Once an inventory of 1,000 items was extensive. Now any stores stock 7,500 different items. And not only ood. Many carry gifts, housewares, toys, magazines and lothing.

The industry offers newcomers an assortment of 249 ifferent positions. They range from moving stock to anaging stores, from warehousing to advertising. Usu- lly, new men are trained on the job. In larger stores they ay start as stock men or clerks and learn how to handle, isplay and order merchandise. Later, they may be put n the produce department to get acquainted with fruit nd vegetable problems. After that, they may go into the eat department.

If a newcomer shows aptitude, he is likely to be pro- oted in short order to department head, to assistant tore manager, to store manager and on up in the firm. he industry is expanding so rapidly that promotions ome quickly.

In my company, I have seen a young man, with no revious experience, get to be a store manager in charge f a $1,000,000 business in less than twelve months.

Most food store operators make it a practice to fill top positions, wherever feasible, from within their own organizations. Just recently, a survey was made to see how effective this policy has been. It was learned that seven out of every ten food-chain executives came up through the ranks.

From the bottom up, the pay is excellent. In many food stores, a college graduate can—in most parts of the country—expect a beginning salary of $4,200 a year and possibly as high as $5,500. After five years, he should be earning a minimum of $6,000 and perhaps as much as $11,000. After ten years, if he keeps progressing, his salary should range from $10,000 to $18,000. Beyond this, as owner, partner or member of top management, a man has virtually unlimited opportunities.

Owning your own business is possible with surprisingly little money. When I started my first store, all I had for capital was twenty-five dollars and a sack of sugar. That tiny store has since grown into ten super markets with a $17,000,000-a-year volume.

Before branching out on his own, however, a young man will want to weigh carefully the relative advantages of working for an established organization or of owning his own business. The would-be proprietor should be sure he is qualified, in temperament and experience, to assume the wide variety of responsibilities confronting the owner of a food store in today's dynamic food distribution industry. Many high school and college graduates today find they prefer the greater opportunities for specialization, the wide variety of insurance and pension benefits, and the regular hours offered by employment in established companies.

Of one thing I am sure, the opportunities and rewards are great for ambitious, capable young people who decide to make food distribution their career—whether as employee or proprietor.

It is true that the capital requirements for an average volume super market may run from $220,000 to $300,000 today. However, with the cooperation of a friendly wholesaler, a knowledgeable young man can start a neighborhood food store at an outlay of a few thousand dollars. If he picks the right location and is a smart businessman, his trade will grow and he'll soon be burgeoning into the super market class.

As you can see, I'm very fond of food retailing. I cannot deny, though, that it has some bad points. For one thing, the hours tend to be a bit longer than in other fields. Although most store employees are on a forty-hour week, executives, as in other industries, may put in ten, twelve and more hours a day. They may work a few nights a week, and some Saturdays.

And because competition is intense, you are continuously under pressure from your customers, from your superiors and from your subordinates.

To make a successful career of food retailing, a boy should: 1—Be good at figures. 2—Be neat and well organized. 3—Be interested in food. 4—Be a friendly lad who likes to rub shoulders with people. He may have thousands of different persons going through his store each week and he has to make them feel at home. 5—Be willing to accept responsibility. 6—Have imagination. It is vital to food merchandising. 7—Be able to work under pressure. And, 8—Revel in competition.

A boy can enter food retailing after two years of high school and, if he is persevering, do well. As a rule, a high school diploma is a prerequisite today and a college degree desirable.

The broader his education, the more equipped a boy will be to learn the business, and the higher will be his starting wage. Most preferable would be for a young man to take a regular college course in food retailing. Michigan State University gives one, leading to a bachelor's degree, and other universities have or are contemplating similar programs. Scholarships can be had at Michigan State. Many companies also award scholarships, good at any college, to promising school boys who have worked in their stores.

I would certainly urge any boy considering food retailing for his career to get a part-time or a summer job in a food store. This is the best way to find out whether he's suited for it.

It's a great life, food retailing. My sons are in it, and I hope their sons will be in it, too.

L. V. Eberhard, author of this article, discusses with his store managers how a new package design, together with effective store display, can increase sales of a product. Meetings like this of the managers of Mr. Eberhard's various stores are a regular weekly procedure.

Nylic

HOW TO HELP YOUR CHILD HAVE THE CAREER HE WANTS

Many factors will enter into your child's choice of a career: his interests, his ambitions, his abilities, the counsel he receives from teachers, friends and family. But, most of all, it will depend on his opportunities to get the training he needs to enter the field of his choice.

Even though his college days are still years away, it's never too soon to start making sure that your child will have the opportunity to continue his education when the time comes.

Your New York Life agent has chosen as his career the business of helping families plan for the future—for education, for retirement, for all the things which life insurance helps make possible. Through training and experience he has become a highly qualified specialist. You'll find him both able and willing to help you.

Booklets available on many careers

This article on Food Retailing is one of a continuing series on career opportunities for young men and women. Thus far, similar articles have been prepared on Newspapering, Law, Medicine, Accounting, Teaching, Architecture, Aeronautical Engineering, Electronic Engineering, Public Service, Farming, Chemistry, Selling, Nursing, Starting a Business of Your Own, Pharmacy, Dentistry, Banking, Printing, Home Economics, the Mineral Industry, Personnel Work, Retailing, Atomic Science, Librarianship, the Armed Forces and Engineering. Each is available in booklet form and will be sent to you on request. You'll also find additional help in our free booklet, "The Cost of Four Years at College." Just drop a postcard to:

NEW YORK LIFE
Insurance Company
51 Madison Ave., Dept. 27-J, New York 10, N. Y.

The New York Life Agent in Your Community is a Good Man to Know
Copyright 1957, New York Life Insurance Company

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 108

deceived herself. She knew Klara's value exactly. She used her hard—but that meant nothing. It was like whipping a donkey: that didn't mean that the donkey had no value.

"She shall go this very day," she said firmly. "My dear Klara, if I had known you felt so strongly—that she'd give you such trouble—I'd have got rid of her long ago."

"Get up," Juffrouw Klopstock said quite pleasantly. "Dress as far as your petticoat and then come to my room. And be quick."

The short November day was dying. A sad gray light lay in the bedroom, and in the passages; but Juffrouw Klopstock's room was warm and light.

"Now let me look at you. That cut on your face—something will have to be done about that. Loosen your hair."

When she turned back to Julia she held a pair of scissors in her hand.

"Stand still," she said, and snipped, pulling the clipped ends forward. "That hides it well. Now, let us see."

She turned to two dresses which hung over a chair. One was blue sprigged with little flowers; the other was gray with bands of purple. Juffrouw Klopstock held them up, measuring them against Julia.

"Fortunately you're tall. How old are you? I forget."

"Fourteen last Midsummer Day."

"You forget too. It was fifteen. The blue suits you better but the other makes you look ol—your age. Put it on. Now, listen carefully to what I have to say.

"You've been a very wicked, ungrateful girl. You know that, don't you? But if you are careful, and clever . . . we may arrange something for you which will be much better than you deserve. When you're spoken to, speak up. And smile. Try to look as lively and attractive as possible. We're going out and I wish to be proud of you."

She stepped back and regarded Julia critically. She looks very delicate, she thought with some dissatisfaction, far too slender—but girls often are at that age. And she's graceful, too, and hasn't, thank God, that cowed look. I may manage it.

"You're really very pretty," she said bracingly. "You may look at yourself in my glass if you like. Now, smile—you see what an improvement that is."

"Juffrouw, may I speak?"

"Of course."

"Where am I going?"

"Out. I am making a great effort to arrange something for you. For your future. You realize, I suppose, that you can't remain here after last night's . . . performance."

"Oh," Julia said and her pallor warmed a little. "Juffrouw, is it a job?"

"You could call it that. But you must have some training first and you must seem suitable for it. Here is a cloak."

Juffrouw Klopstock put on her own cloak, a fine one lined and edged with fur.

Along the Herrencanal the lanterns by the doorways were being lighted and a thin rime of frost glittered on the leafless trees. Juffrouw Klopstock set a brisk pace.

They turned in at a doorway. Twelve heads were raised, twelve pairs of eyes stared. The clerk on the nearest stool slid to the ground and came forward and said, "Yes, Mevrouw?"

"I'm Juffrouw Klopstock, of the Klopstock Home. I should like to speak to Mynheer Dekker."

The clerk hurried away and came back.

"You wait here, Julia. Possibly someone could find you a seat."

The clerk offered his own stool, and Julia, blushing, sat down on it, folding her hands in her lap while Juffrouw Klopstock followed up the long room and through a door.

She was gone a long time; then at last the door opened again and there she was in the doorway, smiling and beckoning.

They all looked again as Julia walked the length of the room, so she arrived in Mynheer Dekker's presence pink-cheeked and with that air of shyness which, on a young girl, is like the bloom on a grape.

"Ah, yes," said Mynheer, "I see what you mean."

"Julia, this is Mynheer Dekker."

She made him the curtsy which Maire had taught her so long ago, and remembering Juffrouw Klopstock's admonition, smiled at him.

"Good afternoon, my dear," he said, smiling at her. He looked kind and she thought that she would like to work for him. So she smiled again with innocent seductiveness. He made a little noise of assent, "Um-m-m, I must say she does you great credit," he told Juffrouw Klopstock. "I hope she realizes ——"

"Oh, I told her nothing. It would have been unkind to risk the disappointment."

"We can consider the matter settled," he said.

"You have done me a great favor, Mynheer."

"No, no. On the contrary, Juffrouw. There are plenty of girls, but so few suitable. Things have changed very much lately."

"And I may leave her now? There would be so much envy ——"

"I'll take her round to Mevrouw Helmers myself."

Juffrouw Klopstock rose. "Julia," she said, taking one of the girl's hands, "you are a very, very lucky girl. You are going to be a Company's Daughter—the most fortunate thing that could happen to a girl in your position. I hope you'll be very happy, and very good."

Julia knew nothing about the Company's Daughters, but she was out of the Klopstock Home; and it was the juffrouw's doing. She raised the hand which held hers and kissed it and said, "Oh, thank you, Juffrouw. Thank you."

And Juffrouw Klopstock took her into an embrace and said with an emotion that seemed sincere, "Good-by, my dear. I know you'll be happy. Bless you!"

Their parting made quite an impression upon Mynheer Dekker, who, like most people, had heard several contradictory stories about Juffrouw Klopstock's management.

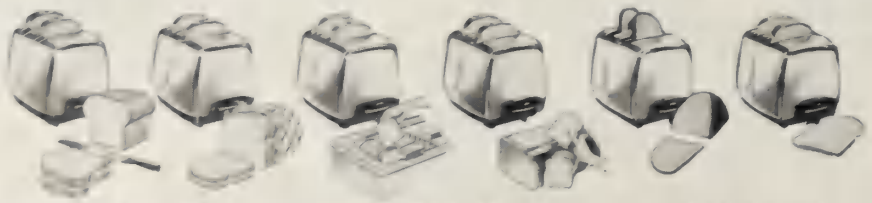
The only completely automatic toaster is . . .

AUTOMATIC

Sunbeam TOASTER

with RADIANT CONTROL

Bread lowers automatically — no levers to push • toast raises silently — no motors to wear out • always perfect toast — just the way you like it.



Automatic Beyond Belief!

The Sunbeam Automatic Toaster with exclusive RADIANT CONTROL is the only completely automatic toaster. No levers to push, no motors to wear out. Sunbeam RADIANT CONTROL automatically adjusts toasting cycle to moisture content of bread. You get toast just the way you want it regardless of whether bread is thick or thin, frozen or fresh, rye or white. You can even reheat a piece of toast without burning. Ask your dealer to show you the new Sunbeam Toaster today. Only, $28.50*

GIVES YOU UNIFORM TOAST EVERY TIME

*Manufacturer's recommended retail or Fair Trade price. Prices slightly higher in Canada.

THICK or THIN FROZEN or FRESH RYE or WHITE

©S.C. ®SUNBEAM, LADY SUNBEAM, MIXMASTER, COFFEEMASTER, IRONMASTER

Look for the MARK OF QUALITY Sunbeam Famous for MIXMASTER, COFFEEMASTER, PERCOLATOR, IRONMASTER, etc.

SUNBEAM CORPORATION, Dept. 50, Chicago 50, Illinois • Canada: Toronto 18

Her time in the Home for Company's aughters was very brief, only a year and a w days long, and, in the sense that it was tremely happy, with every day's passing a ing of regret, it seemed very short; in the nse of experience and education, it seemed ry long.

There was a great deal to learn.

"You must learn to read and write and ckon," Mevrouw Helmers would say. "A ife who can do so is a help to her husband, nd improves her own status.

"You must learn about illnesses and how deal with accidents. Where you are going ere won't be a doctor on the nearest corner nd a midwife in the next street. And if your usband is a nutmeg planter you may find ourself responsible for slaves as well as for our family.

"You must learn deportment. Girls of very ood family go out to the islands now and ou must be prepared to meet them on their wn ground. We can't have your husbands aking unfavorable comparisons."

She never for a moment allowed the girls to se sight of their destiny. They were Comany's Daughters, being trained to make good, cceptable wives for the Dutchmen who lived n the Molucca Islands nd grew nutmegs and loves for the comany's trade.

The system was an ld one. It had begun the days when few irls would voluntarily ice the long sea voyge—seven months of , at least—and spend e rest of their lives in xile; the white men en had been glad of ives of any kind. But e private arrangeents, generally made y ships' captains actng as go-betweens etween distant husands and greedy famies in Holland, had ot always worked out well. The Daughters ere now all picked girls, and properly trained; nd they were not sent out, as in the earlier ays, just anyhow and to anybody. Negotiaons must be conducted, credentials produced, nd in most cases the formal marriage by roxy—known as a glove marriage—was perormed with as much ceremony for an orphan irl as for one of good family.

Mynheer Dekker had chosen well in makng Mevrouw Helmers head of the establishent. She was shrewd and practical, knowldgeable and kind. In all ways, except one—nd that vital—she did prepare the girls for eir futures: she spoke of "your husband" a sensible and realistic fashion; but she hared the prevailing view that "innocence" a bride was no drawback.

The girls, of course, were not innocent at ll and the words in which enlightenment was pread would have shocked Mevrouw Helmers ery much indeed. A very pretty, jolly, friendly irl named Frieda was Julia's mentor in this natter, and a promising friendship died unmely. From the evening when Frieda "told" ntil she sailed in January for the Moluccas, ulia had to avoid her because she couldn't ear to look at or touch her. She thought it as all intensely horrible. As Frieda ripped way the veil she saw again the face of the ailor who had pretended to be kind, the face f the woman who had led him away. So that as it! she thought with sick disgust.

Curiously enough, along with this deep reulsion against the physical side of the mannd-woman business, she developed an interest , a yearning for, something called "love."

Mevrouw Helmers thought girls should be ble to read, should take delight in reading, nd she read to them, and gave them to read, e kind of story most likely to provoke avid erusal. In these pairs of lovers figured promiently; two French ones—oh, and a very sad tory—Héloïse and Abélard; two Italians—nd what a tragedy—Romeo and Juliet; two nglish, long ago but still achingly sad, Trisam and Iseult.

Julia saw them, clean, brightly yet delicately colored, made of china, moving stiffly against a background of trees and flowers; the young men carried papers upon which they had written poems, the young women walked along with fawns pushing their noses into their hands. They spoke, they said, "I love you. I love you," but their words had nothing to do with that! Sometimes they touched hands. In such an interchange Julia would gladly have taken part with a young man, tall and slim, with yellow hair and blue eyes, a younger Uncle Johannes.

That was "love." But Mevrouw Helmers never spoke of that. She said, "your husband," and every time she said it—once Frieda had explained things—Julia saw the drunken sailor, felt his slushy kiss and the weight of his arm.

Being a Company's Daughter was pleasant indeed, but it was a short-lived business, a mere prelude to something else—and very often, when she looked into the future, Julia wished that Juffrouw Klopstock had sent her to the fish saltings.

Mevrouw Helmers had a very clear-cut idea of what the prospective brides should know about their duties, but in many other matters concerning the Moluccas and the life there she was curiously vague.

GOSSIP

In old England, there were usually two godmothers to sponsor a child. They were called "Godsibbs," a kin or relative through God, "sibb" being Anglo-Saxon for "kin." The two Godsibbs often met in the home of their mutual godchild and had little chats together. The term "Godsibbing" came to be applied to these trivial talks. Later corrupted to "gossiping," the word gradually lost its original meaning, and now to gossip is to carry tales or spread scandal.

The girls currently under the home's tuition had therefore a choice of two pictures when it came to throwing their thoughts forward to their future home. There was Mevrouw's—rather ordinary and unexciting, a Dutch landscape with nutmeg trees, some dark-skinned slaves and "your husband" superimposed upon it; and there was the one composed of rumor, truthful reports, products of overstrained imaginations, of old sailors' tales, ancient letters, things overheard—and that was a picture of a nightmare paradise. This was the one which the girls held up to one another, with shudders, with delight, with yearning, with dread foreboding. They whispered of slave revolts, of nutmeg planters and their families wiped out in one night of fire and slaughter; there were bats as large as rats which drank your blood as you slept; there were sharks in the sea and crocodiles in the rivers. Even cannibalism was not overlooked. But there were also the flowers—twelve inches across, some of them, and of such fragrance that if you smelled them too close you swooned; there were fruits of a flavor unimaginable; there was unending leisure—if you had a baby you did not even have to carry it in your arms, a brown slave did that; there were parties every evening, picnics every day.

Julia never really saw either picture of the islands; was never much affected by the threats or the promises of the future; when she looked forward she saw one thing only—"your husband."

And so the weeks sped on; and the months; inescapable, relentless as death, the future advanced.

One day in November, a mild, mist-moisted day, she and a girl named Marie with whom she had made a pleasant but carefully not intimate friendship were in the garden, cutting the very last roses of an unusually protracted season.

Mevrouw Helmers opened a window and called them. They went in, their hands full of the damp flowers, drops of moisture clinging to their hair and their eyelashes. They made a pretty pair, Marie all ebony and ivory and rose, Julia leaf-brown and cream and gray. Mynheer Dekker, who was in the room with Mevrouw Helmers, remarked upon the flowers the girls carried.

"And you look just as sweet and fresh," he said.

Mevrouw Helmers watched without jealousy. They came and went, an endless line of them, pretty young things with all their troubles still to come. Hers—and she had known trouble—were over.

On the table stood a package which had been opened and then just folded together again, and a bottle of Rhenish wine and four glasses.

"Well, shall I tell them, or will you?" asked Mevrouw Helmers.

"I can guess!" Marie cried, clutching the roses to her breast. "It's our turn."

"They just live for the day," said Mevrouw Helmers. "Yes, it's your turn, Marie, and yours, Julia. And I may as well say at once that you are both very lucky girls."

"Both glove marriages," said Mynheer Dekker with an air of personal achievement.

"When?" demanded Marie.

"At the end of this month."

"I must be off," said Mynheer Dekker. "I'll just drink to your happiness and then you can know all the details."

Mevrouw Helmers began to pour out the wine.

Marie turned to Mynheer Dekker and said prettily, "Mynheer, will you be the proxy in our wedding?"

"I shall give myself that melancholy pleasure," he said, and took the proffered glass and

CONTINUED ON PAGE 109

for DEPENDABLE STORAGE safe and sound

CALL YOUR ALLIED MOVER

...he's the No.1 Specialist

Ask your Allied Mover for a copy of "Before You Move." See the yellow pages of your phone book, or write Allied Van Lines, Inc., Broadview, Illinois.

ALLIED VAN LINES • WORLD'S LARGEST LONG-DISTANCE MOVERS

New idea! VINYL in a floor wax

and the beauty of it is — *it's childproof

Never before such a high gloss!

New Simoniz Floor Wax with vinyl in it, gives you higher gloss than you've ever known. On any kind of floor—linoleum, asphalt, rubber, vinyl tile or finished wood! Throughout the house!

No wax easier to apply!

New Simoniz Floor Wax polishes itself. No buffing. No rubbing. It spreads evenly —without streaks—quickly sets to a tough, beautiful, vinyl gloss!

Wet spills won't harm gloss!

Splashes and spills—so common with children—won't hurt the tough vinyl surface —or shine. Simply wipe them up. New Simoniz Floor Wax is water-repellent.

Never before such protection!

The miracle of vinyl—and only Simoniz has it—gives you the toughest floor surface. The kids won't scuff it, or harm the gloss with their roughhousing. No doubt about it—it's childproof!

No finish so easy to maintain!

Simoniz Floor Wax with vinyl has a gloss that lasts and lasts. You can even damp mop your floors freely without dulling the shine. Without spoiling the wax finish.

Good news about re-waxing!

Here's the one floor wax you can remove evenly before re-waxing. Simply use your regular household detergent and warm water. The beauty increases with re-waxing. You'll be amazed, once you try it.

Simoniz® Floor Wax

For all floors—linoleum, asphalt, rubber, vinyl tile and finished wood

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 107

ng his beaming smile around. The dark ll bless her, was all right, flushed and kling, her ordinary youthful prettiness sformed into beauty by the glow of exitement—but the other looked as though she received a mortal blow. And, of course, as a step in the dark, disguise it how you
ld. He caught Mevrouw Helmers' eye, ed a significant glance at Julia and was sured by a nod. All that sort of thing d be left in her capable hands. He raised glass. "To your future, my dears; may it appy and prosperous!"

hey drank and he left, and before he was out of the room Marie said, "May we
?"

Certainly not. How would you know ch was which? Since you are so impatient deal with you first. Here you are." She ded Marie a buff-colored glove, made for left hand, its cuff embroidered with scarlet

"You are to marry Hendrik Oltman, who wenty-six years of age, and a clerk in the nt's office in Banda Neira. He has good spects and his disposition is said to be able. I congratulate you." She added ckly, "Oh, no! You mustn't try it on; that gs bad luck: glove on, wedding off—did never hear that?"

I think it will fit me," said Marie, measurthe glove against her hand. "And smell it!
esn't it smell lovely?
ndrik Oltman. I like name. Marie Olt-n."

I'm glad that you pleased," Mevrouw mers said. "And now Julia."

t was a glove of yel-silk with pearls sewn pattern on its gaunt-
"Isn't that pretty?
ll, take it, dear. It's
you. Your husband
amed Pieter Vosmar
he is twenty-two.
father has a nutmeg
ntation on a little isd called Rua. You to be congratulated
."

Isn't it wonderful?"
d Marie, and Mev-
w sensibly allowed to speak for them
h.

Run along," she said. "Show off your ves and make the others envious. This is r day; theirs will come."

ulia carried her glove straight to her bed-m and there, with a shudder of distaste, hed her hand into it, grimacing at her own dulity as she did so. Once, she supposed, nebody had tried on her glove and then not n married after all; that was how such erstitions began. Nevertheless she was sing no chance!

e next few days were very trying. Everyng centered upon the wedding, everybody red in the preparations. You were never owed for one moment to forget that you re a bride-to-be. If it was forgotten for a ment Marie would say or do something to ng it back into focus and somebody was e to add, "And Julia too!" Behind Marie's ety her own glumness passed, she thought, noticed, but Mevrouw Helmers had seen nd was not surprised—or worried—when,
e evening, a mere five days before the wed-g, Julia came to her room. Mevrouw was ring—on the wedding clothes—and she ked up with a bright, kind smile which med the very epitome of the general mood, ood in which she alone could not share.

"Mevrouw, I don't want to be married."

Mevrouw Helmers hesitated while she deed between several possible replies and then ghed. "Oh," she said, "the times I've heard t, here in this very room!"

t was clever. It removed Julia's sense of ng different, of being unsuited for marriage.
"Oh, I didn't know anybody else ever felt t way."

"Bless you, child. I've prepared dozens of s for marriage and they took it in one of two ways; either, like Marie, they couldn't wait for the day, or they insisted that they'd rather be dead. And do you know, so far as I can make out, they were as happy, or happier than the others. Sit down, Julia, and tell me what's in your mind. You'd rather be dead, is that it?"

"I wondered whether Betta couldn't go instead of me. She's longing to be married."

"Betta cannot, she must wait her turn. She's only fifteen."

"So am I."

A single question and answer elucidated that little mystery. Mevrouw Helmers thought Juffrouw Klopstock had done rather well.

"It's too late to do anything about that now," she said. She put out her hand and tapped Julia's knee. "You forget all about that year, Julia, save it up until you're thirty-nine. Every woman hates her fortieth birthday, and on the eve of yours you can give yourself a whole year for a present."

It was all so cozy, so feminine, so almost irresistible.

"Now, Julia, the arrangements have all been made. Even if I wanted to I couldn't send Betta in your place, she wouldn't be at all suitable. The Vosmar family is old and important; you don't realize how very fortunate you are. Naturally you have doubts and fears. I've always found that a very good cure is to take the thing that is worrying you and look it straight in the face, and if possible talk it over with somebody of greater experience. Come along now, tell me exactly what is the trouble?"

The very thought of putting it into words made her face burn.

Mevrouw Helmers took up her sewing and made several stitches. Without looking up she said, "It's the . . . physical aspect, isn't it?" She took silence for assent. "I do wish you girls wouldn't pry and chatter, the blind leading the blind! When it comes you'll find it as natural as eating. That is true, Julia. After all, men and women were made and put together in this world by the good God, and He never makes a mistake. Even this reluctance of yours isn't going to be wasted—you'll be all the more delighted when you find how very wrong you were."

She spoke with sincerity and conviction, and Julia recognized the good sense of what she said. But ——

"As for staying here and remaining unmarried," Mevrouw Helmers went on, "that's a fate I wouldn't wish on anybody. An unmarried woman, whoever she is, becomes in time a pitiable object. And you're so pretty; that young man will adore you. Look, you sew on this, it's for Marie, and I'll sew on yours. I want you both to look beautiful."

They sewed for the rest of the evening and Mevrouw Helmers chatted on, making it all sound safe and ordinary and quite, quite inevitable. As they put away their work she said, "Are you sleeping well? I thought not. Go and warm a cup of milk and bring it back here." When Julia returned Mevrouw had a little box in her hand; she opened it and took out a pinch of gray powder which, placed in the milk, instantly dissolved.

That night she slept heavily, and all the next day moved in a placid daze; nothing, not even her own hands and feet, seemed quite real. Mevrouw Helmers repeated the dose each evening until the wedding, and on that day not even Mynheer Dekker, very sprucely dressed and gallant in manner, helping them on with the gloves, kissing them and calling them by their new names, seemed quite real. But she was now Julia Vosmar, properly married, in the sight of God and man, to Pieter Vosmar, whom she had never seen.

(To be Continued)

TO MY PARENTS

BY ELIZABETH BARKINS

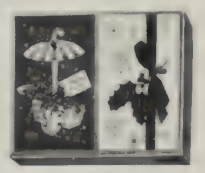
The vast and patient love which lies
Within your hearts
Is more than I can yet surmise—
Still it imparts
This much beyond all doubt for me:
That love itself must surely be
The essence of eternity
In all its parts.

Good thing they wear Health-tex

It plays hard all day

Health-tex clothes for children, sizes 6 months to 8 years of flannels, knit and woven cottons, corduroys and other fine washable fabrics. STANDARD ROMPER CO., INC., 1350 Broadway, New York 18.

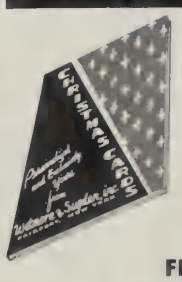
ALL 4 YOURS . . . ONLY $1.00



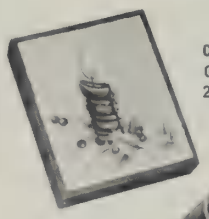
Amazing offer just to show you how you can make these big profits . . . (up to 100%) showing W/S Christmas cards, fine holiday gifts, gift wraps & stationery. Wonderful value . . . 63 Christmas cards and 504" of gift wrapping for only $1.00, a $4.25 value.

YOU CAN MAKE $200-$500 EVEN MORE

. . . make all this in spare time showing W/S Christmas cards, new 6-roll gift wrappings, exclusive personal Christmas cards, notes, stationery and holiday gifts to friends and neighbors. There's no obligation, nothing to return and nothing further to buy. Send for your big $1.00 offer today. We'll send you all the details of our big money making plan along with your order.



Christmas Blessings Religious, 21 Cards



Feature Deluxe, 21 Cards

BIG PROFIT IN PERSONAL CHRISTMAS CARDS . . . ONLY AVAILABLE TO W/S DEALERS

This handsome self-selling album contains complete selections, exclusive with W/S dealers, of famous W/S personal Christmas cards priced as low as 50 for $1.50, with name imprinted notes and stationery. You get 38 FREE samples in the album.

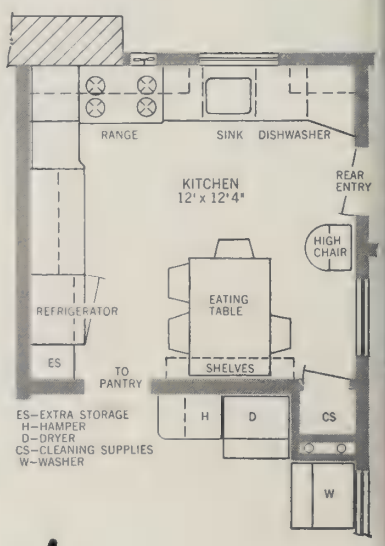
Candle Glow, 21 Cards

504 inch Gift Wrapping Roll

FREE FUND RAISING PLAN

Clubs, organizations, church groups everywhere raise money for their treasury this easy way. This free book also explains its generous Club Charge Account Plan.

SEND TODAY FOR AMAZING OFFER



WETMORE & SUGDEN, INC., 245 Bayfield Drive, Fairport, N. Y.
Gentlemen:
Enclosed find $1.00. Please rush me your big offer. 63 cards, 1 gift wrap roll, FREE personal card samples and 24-page full-color catalog. (No boxes sent on approval.)
NAME .....
ADDRESS .....
CITY ..... STATE .....
☐ Check here if you desire the club plan book and write name of club organization.
My organization is .....

The mistress of this house is tall, so he kitchen is tailored to fit. Favorite utensil hang on pegboard. Under them, a hard wood chopping block spans empty spac over a wastebasket and a cat's dish. Th old floor cupboard is still get-at-able High spot is the squared-off refrigerato against which all built-ins fit flush—n crannies for crumbs or spoons to fal into. It has door racks and salad drawers a generous freezer across the top. Fo this kitchen, its door is hinged on left

Here is the side of the room to whic former owners added range, sink, dish washer. It was left as is. A pink paint brush brought it into one with rest o the room. Green counter you see wa matched by new counters in rest o room. The range, not new, served well with plenty of "setting" space on top
Over the fan, and controlling it, is a pre wired cooking hood—has a built-in ligh and switch plus a rod for utensils. Cafe curtains are of cotton dressmaker fabric

Give a woman a house with room an she can teach it to be a home. Every thing she needs is in the kitchen now. On wall became storage and mixing head quarters, followed by cooking area, with wash-up section near rear door. If the family acquires a freezer it can go or service porch—taking, as it does, s few trips compared with a refrigerator

1900 House—1957 Kitchen

By MARGARET DAVIDSON Homemaking Editor of the Journal

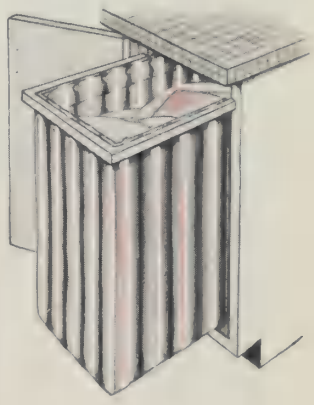
There are three appealing reasons behind this kitchen: George, age 4; Hortense, now 2; and baby Diane, 9 months old. After their father, a rising junior executive, was transferred to the home office came desperate days of house hunting. The young couple's findings: new houses in their bracket all had three or four small bedrooms and one cramped bath. And then they saw the big house half a century old with its assets of space—space—space!

It had a wide tiled hall, and a curved staircase leading to a floorful of bedrooms; it had nooks, window seats, big closets, a pantry, even a separate paneled dining room standing by for evening meals. And there was a garden with running space, a playhouse Hortense and Diane could use in a year or two, an old coach house for George's pirate den.

But the river-fronted house on the hill had its faults too. One was the kitchen. The former owners had half redone it, put in a more than serviceable dishwasher-range-sink section. Still, an old icebox stood on a back porch, relic of days when ice was delivered by the pound, leaving a dripping trail and muddy footprints in wet weather.

"The kitchen," the young mother in this case decided, "ought to be remodeled before we move in." When moving day came it was an island of order in a house still filled with barrels. The minister was handsomely entertained in it that first week when he came to tea, though most belongings were still unpacked. From then on the kitchen has hummed as "the one room in the house where I could put my hands on what I needed—and find it."

At hand are all utensils in the room that is now painted petal-pink. "The room where I'll spend so much time," the mother says, "has to look pretty!" High ceilings were brought down with an overhang of white. The new counter was green plastic to match exactly one the former owners used on the sink wall.



The big improvement was to make room for a new refrigerator in the kitchen. By actual count, a homemaker opens her refrigerator some fifty times a day—and with three youngsters here the count is apt to be higher for snacks, baby foods, and "may I have an apple" trips throughout the day. She decided on a new model, its cost $330, and around it were built flush shelves to replace the clumsy fifty-year-old cupboards with backbreakingly low counters that once stood here. The rest of redoing for the room came to $672. That sum provided a new floor of speckled red plastic tile with insets of black and white; wood cabinets; new counters; electrical work; and an air-freshening ventilator. The total: just over $1000. If the six-year-old sink, range and dishwasher had been replaced, the total would easily have been $600 more.

One good turnabout deserves another. So the old pantry, freed of its overload by the new kitchen

The ex-pantry is a spick-and-span little laundry, in earshot of the children at play. Sink was in. Washer and dryer were added. Pink-green floral curtains match those in kitchen, are hung with rings that clip on, require no sewing, snap off to aid launderability. Under green counter, a hidden fabric hamper slides out from cabinet beside dryer.

Even the hamper can go in the washer. Handmade of denim or mattress ticking, it can be made with a home kit of snaps for attaching fabric to wood. Pull-out frame can be made by home carpenter. Sturdy cloth can match any favorite color scheme. Partition bag, if you like, to divide white and colored clothes.

For breakfast she chose a white plastic table, so spills sponge. Chairs, too, are covered in lacquer-red plastic. Beyond high chair is cleaning closet. Shelves add color to tall walls, hold pitchers and plates too pretty to put away. White splitwood shade helps "bring down" the high window and—like most of the room—cleans simply and with a sparkle.

STUART

The house was old, the family young—and it was affection at first sight.

ıe first room they shaped up: the kitchen.

ɔinets, turned itself into a laundry. Here, again, the l house adapted cheerfully. Its plaster walls took plastic-coated wall fabric that smoothed on tight a glove and will bear up under splashes and scrubs.
green textured design helped hide any unevenness the wall. After old counters had come out, the ısher and dryer from their previous home went ugly in around the chimney. It all saves basement ps—"We can wash and dry every day with no ɔuble." She's right about her indirect savings, too, at help pay for the kitchen. Since children out-ow clothes rather than wear them out, the sim-ɛr it is to do the washing, the smaller the wardrobe ed be.
Old houses lagging on byroads do have such arm, and so many potentials. If sturdy and sim-e, they convert beautifully. It's often worth while capitalize on their assets, to put in a little fond ɔrk and take out big rewards for a growing family.

New! Rubber-cushioned cut-to-fit shelf protection

Rubbermaid® SHELF-KUSHION®

Wonderful! Now buy Shelf-Kushion just as you buy dress fabric—by the yard . . . there's no waste! You'll like the way soft, supple Shelf-Kushion clings to your cabinets . . . hushes clatter . . . wears and wears.

What's more, your shelves are rubber-cushioned against nicks and scratches, and so are your dishes and glassware. Rubbermaid Shelf-Kushion is yours in any lengths, up to 45 feet, in 2 convenient widths, 4 delightful colors.

Wall Cabinet Shelf-Kushion,
11¾ inches wide, 89¢ a yard

Base Cabinet Shelf-Kushion,
22 inches wide, $1.89 a yard

Look for this Rubbermaid Shelf-Kushion Dispenser wherever housewares are sold!

THE WOOSTER RUBBER COMPANY WOOSTER, OHIO

CHILDREN CROWD THIS SUNDAY SCHOOL

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 45

assignment. It's a favorite with the red-haired girl named Jo who responds to Dede's soft-spoken ("We don't want to wake the babies") introduction of Kathy with a friendly wave and a grin.

The gray sky overhead is breaking up into brilliant blue now, and the classroom where the five-year-olds are meeting is bright and cheerful as Dede and Kathy enter it. Twenty small voices are repeating after the teacher, "Thank you, God, for the nice rain ——" One small voice adds forgivingly (and in suspiciously parent-aping tones), "Well, I guess we did need it."

Dede smiles at Kathy and Kathy smiles back with the relaxed friendliness of shared laughter.

Next door the four-year-olds are noisier. Most of them are singing to the accompaniment of a piano played by Teen Aide Sylvia Grainger. In one corner another Teen Aide, dark-haired Susie Cooper, has a special (but not unusual) assignment: making two shy little newcomers feel enough at home to join the rest of the class. Reading them a story, Susie's soft voice has already soothed away earlier tears. Some of the four-year-olds are at the drawing table. A curlyhead in a gay plaid dress spies Dede and comes running to meet her, clutching a picture she has just drawn.

"Hang up my picture for me, please," she demands. "See"—displaying it—"it's an angel."

Dede pins the picture on a low bulletin board and settles herself on a kindergarten-size stool to study it. "I think it's a fine angel," she says tactfully.

The small artist comes close to lean on Dede's knee and reach up to touch one of the tiny pearl earrings in Dede's ears. After a moment she asks thoughtfully, "Dede, do angels have mommies and daddies?"

Dede considers the thought soberly. "I think that they do," she says finally. "But I'll tell you what: I'll ask Reverend Staves about it and let you know next Sunday what he thinks." She gives the four-year-old a quick hug and rises from the stool. "We'll have to run if you're going to get to the nine-thirty service," she tells Kathy. "I have to help teach this morning, so I'll be attending the later service myself."

Waiting for her family after the service, Kathy watches the crowd of homeward-bound people and feels suddenly lonely again. Dede and Pat are busy. The red-haired girl named Jo is talking with Miss Likins and a group of young people. Kathy would love to join them, but she still feels a little shy about that, so she follows her family to the car. The sun has come out now, the damp chill is gone from the air, and the swimming pool in the patio sparkles brightly.

"Kathy Blaine—wait!" a voice calls after her.

Kathy turns to see Jo racing across the patio with—Kathy can't believe it at first, but it is true—the tall, sandy-haired boy she had noticed earlier, the one who reminded her of the boy back home.

"Miss Likins just told me that you like to sing," Jo says. "How about dramatics too? We're just beginning a new project for the holidays and if you'd like to join in we'd be awfully glad to have you."

Kathy nods her dark curls eagerly. "I love to sing. I was in the drama club back home."

"That's wonderful," Jo tells her. "If you'll write down your address for us, we'll stop by and pick you up for Tuesday-evening practice. Oh—and this is my brother, Bob," she finishes as Kathy rummages busily in her purse for paper and pencil and writes her address.

Kathy looks up. "Hi," she says with a smile.

WHAT MAKES YOUR HEAD ACHE?

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 82

sinus are frequently a matter of infection. The aches are dull and they throb, but they are not usually severe. Until recently sinus infections were cured by drainage, an operation not infrequently causing permanent injury. With the discovery of antibiotics, the operation became rarely needed and today most true acute sinus headaches can be rapidly cured.

There is, however, another "sinus headache" that occurs in a closely associated area, the nose. Beyond its duty of smelling, the nose is supposed to warm and clean the air you breathe before it reaches your lungs. The mucus and the fine nose hairs remove the dirt and germs. If there are too many germs or too much dirt, the nose will become clogged and nearby blood vessels congested. Agents such as too strong chemicals, pollens and odors, and a sudden chilling of the body surface, can also produce this condition. When the mucous membrane becomes irritated, naturally, the symptoms are similar to those of any headache and are readily confused with sinus infection. It is this action in a "cold" that often produces headache. It is a fascinating fact that life situations that have a threatening significance to a person may also cause "sinus headaches" by precisely the same mechanism of causing swelling of the mucous membranes of the nose.

Hang-over headaches are not the result of alcohol itself. It is possible that the alcohol dilated the blood vessels, causing pain, but there is no predictable relation between the amount of alcohol and the amount of pain. The headaches vary in the same individual, suggesting that overfatigue, social stress or guilt feelings had more to do with them.

Ears sometimes cause excruciating headaches. No other structure in the body of similar size has such a network of nerves leading to it. For this reason, the ear can be stimulated to pain from sources quite far removed. Thus, ear pain may indicate, among other things, a diseased tooth, tonsillitis or a sore throat.

That your eyes can cause pains in the head has long been recognized. When the eye muscles are improperly balanced, when light rays are improperly received (astigmatism), when the eyes are affected with glaucoma, headaches are the usual result. Farsightedness and astigmatism can produce a feeling of heaviness in the head and an ache that starts around the eyes and finally radiates over the whole head. Pains like this come about for the same reason you get headaches from driving—too much sustained muscle effort. The eye muscles are working too hard to overcome the inability to see correctly. (Reading headaches may come, too, from a combination of eye- and neck-muscle strain.)

Headaches from blows on the head are caused in an obvious manner. The nerves over the skull have been immediately assaulted. When headaches from such blows continue for

TO WEAN

Scientific baby foods have been in use only a few generations. Prior to their development, youngsters went directly from the mother's breast to coarse items on the adult menu.

It was a difficult and tedious task to accomplish the transition. From a Teutonic term for "to accustom," the process of getting a child accustomed to solid food was called wennen.

Naturally, a child broke some of its ties with the mother after becoming accustomed to bread and gruel. So wean eventually came to name the process of detaching a person from any relationship, habit or idea.

WEBB B. GARRISON

Pepto-Bismol works where soda, seltzers and "tummy-aids" fail! For upset stomach, indigestion, nausea, or diarrhea—Pepto-Bismol's special medicinal formula soothes with a gentle coating action. It works both in the stomach and the intestinal tract—where soda and alkalizers never help. For children or adults, this wonderful pink liquid helps control simple diarrhea without constipating.

TAKE HOSPITAL TESTED PEPTO-BISMOL®...AND FEEL GOOD AGAIN!

Can you tie this ?

You certainly can . . . with glamorous Sasheen® the ribbon that makes the "Magic Bow"

The Chrysanthemum Bow looks festive as a fresh-picked pom on gifts of the autumn season. Follow the "Magic Bow" directions on a roll of Sasheen Brand Ribbon. (Try mixing yellow and gold . . . or brown and copper!) At the bow-tie stage, simply make cuts in the loops as shown. Then pull out the loops—and let 'er bloom! Fun at football games: wear a "Stadium Bow"— ■ Sasheen mum and streamers in the old school colors!

"Magic Bow" and method of making patented U. S. Pat. No. RE ■■■

"Magic Bow" instructions are on every roll of Sasheen®, Decorette® and "Magic Bow"® Brand Ribbons

PRODUCTS OF 3M COMPANY — MINNESOTA MINING AND MANUFACTURING COMPANY, St. Paul 6, Minnesota ©3M Co.

a long time, they are likely to be suspect in the eyes of the law. The pain nerves do not have long memories. They are often stimulated by the ramifications arising out of blows, by possible financial compensation for injuries. These headaches are the most difficult for doctors to treat. A successful court action often ends the complaint.

Constipation and other abdominal disorders are often blamed for headaches, although there is no immediate relation. A headache may occur from such causes only incidentally, as a reaction to the discomfort.

Hypertension, higher-than-normal blood pressure, is often blamed for troublesome headaches. All the investigations show, however, that there is no direct correlation between the pressure and the pain and, in most cases, the headaches would have occurred anyhow. The mechanism of "hypertensive" headaches is similar to that of migraine. In late hypertension, however, the kidneys often malfunction, wastes are not removed, and then the body, including the brain, becomes swollen. In this situation pain-sensitive arteries inside the head may be pulled or displaced and cause headache.

True humility is possible only for the greatly successful. The tallest mountains know how far they are from the stars. PAUL ELDRIDGE
Horns of Glass
(Harbinger House)

Brain tumors are a relatively exotic cause of headache. Few of them spread elsewhere, but all of them hurt because they take up space, crowding or displacing the pain-sensitive arteries. Growing in a closed box like the skull, tumors push the very sensitive blood vessels that anchor the brain. Among the symptoms of a brain tumor are fits, failing vision and faulty co-ordination. Surgery is almost always necessary when your headache is caused by a tumor.

It is obvious that when someone says, "I have a headache," he may mean one of a great number of things. The headaches that are easily cured are the ones that are most easily understood. The persistent headaches are often the result of some persistent disturbance in your life adjustment. The chances are that your headache does not come from an ominous cause and will never kill you. It will soon go away. Have you ever wondered, though, what it is you are doing that brings the headache on?

WONDERFUL CHEESE DISHES

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 85

of hot pepper sauce. When the cheese is melted and the sauce is smooth, stir a little of the hot sauce into 2 slightly beaten eggs. Add to the mixture in the saucepan, and return to the heat. Warm gently for about 2 minutes, before serving. Serves 4–6. Double the recipe if you're having a party!

On the first crisp nights in September, a hearty, hot main dish celebrates the change of season. This eggplant casserole's deliciously browned surface conceals two different kinds of sausage, an exotically seasoned meat-and-tomato sauce, and layers of Mozzarella cheese. "There's no cheese that can't find brown bread," the saying goes. So serve Italian whole-wheat bread with your casserole, and a fresh-tasting green salad.

EGGPLANT-SAUSAGE-AND-TOMATO CASSEROLE

Peel and thinly slice 2 large eggplant. Dip the slices into beaten egg and sauté in hot salad oil until both sides are golden brown. Drain on absorbent paper. In a skillet, sauté in a little butter 1 pound ground round steak. Add 3 chopped onions and cook until golden also. Then add 2 cups tomato purée, a good pinch of basil, another of orégano, ½ cup chopped green pepper, 1 teaspoon salt, a little pepper and 1 clove garlic, crushed. Sauté in a skillet until golden brown 6 sausages. Now to layer the casserole: Arrange ⅓ of the eggplant in the bottom, top with ⅓ of the meat sauce. Slice one ½-pound ball Mozzarella cheese and add ⅓ along with ⅓ of the sausage and ⅓ of a pepperoni sausage, thinly sliced. Repeat this until all is used up, ending with a third of the Mozzarella ball on top. Bake in a moderate oven, 350° F., for 1 hour. Serves 8.

A hearty, man's-favorite type of dish is this casserole in which strips of potato, delicately browned in butter, are crisscrossed "log-cabin style" and baked with cheese. It would be perfect with a juicy steak or roast for the hungriest night of the season—after a day of raking leaves, or putting in a bed of tulip bulbs!

LOG-CABIN POTATOES

Make a thin cream sauce, basic method, using 4 tablespoons butter, 3 tablespoons flour and 2½ cups hot milk. Add to sauce 1 pound diced American process cheese, 1 envelope chicken-bouillon powder or a chicken-bouillon cube, ¾ teaspoon salt and ⅛ teaspoon cayenne pepper. Cook in double boiler until cheese is melted. Taste for salt, and, if you like, add 2 tablespoons sherry. Cut large raw potatoes into long slender strips about ¼" thick, using enough potatoes to fill a large casserole. Fry the strips, not too many at a time, in butter until delicately browned. In the bottom of a well-greased casserole make a layer of potato strips all going in the same direction. Then, using log-cabin technique, cross them with a layer going at right angles to them, and so on. When casserole is half full, spoon in about half the cheese sauce, being careful not to disarrange the potatoes in the process. Not that the log-cabin arrangement will be perfect, but it does allow the sauce to circulate and it keeps the potatoes from packing. Also, it looks pretty. When all the potatoes have been used, spoon in the rest of the sauce and top with a layer of bread crumbs and dots of butter. Cover the casserole, and place in a pan of hot water in a 350° F. oven. Shortly before serving, turn to 450°, remove lid and brown a little. This method of cooking requires no watching and you may be sure the potatoes won't dry out.

Among the most magnificent Italian cheese specialties are the delicate, tender puffs of seasoned ricotta or cottage cheese and spinach, shaped into balls and baked in butter and grated Parmesan. It would be hard to find a more delicious luncheon dish, served with a simple salad; or this casserole becomes the perfect "vegetable" to serve at dinner with veal scallopine or roast chicken.

SPINACH-AND-RICOTTA BALLS

Wash 2 pounds spinach and chop quite fine. Barely cover with boiling salted water and cook 6 minutes. Pour into sieve and drain thoroughly, pressing with a spoon to eliminate as much moisture as possible. Add spinach to 1¾ pounds ricotta or cottage cheese with 5 tablespoons grated Parmesan cheese, 1¼ teaspoons salt, 2 whole eggs and 6 tablespoons dry packaged bread crumbs. Beat with a spoon until well mixed and leave in refrigerator overnight so that bread crumbs will absorb moisture. The next day, mold into balls about the size of golf balls and dust with flour. The mixture is rather sticky and you'll have to dip your fingers into flour as you proceed. Put balls on a baking sheet covered with waxed paper and store in the refrigerator. Bring salted water to a boil, lower heat and drop the balls in, not too many at a time. Use an oval roaster for this so that the water surface is greater and you can do more at one time. The point is not to crowd them. After a short time the balls will pop up to the surface. When this happens, continue cooking 4 minutes and remove with a perforated spoon. Transfer to a heated casserole and sprinkle each layer with lots of melted butter and grated Parmesan cheese. Keep hot until serving time. Serves 6–8.

CHICKEN-AND-ENDIVE PARMESAN

Steam a 5–6-pound capon in 3–4 cups salted water until quite tender. Add a few stalks of celery, 3 or 4 peppercorns and 1 onion, chopped, to give the broth some flavor. Cut 6 heads endive in half the long way. Wash well and drain dry. When capon is done, measure 1¼ cups of the broth. Pour into a shallow pan. Add the endive. Cover and steam gently about 30 minutes or until tender, turning once or twice in the broth. Slice all the chicken meat from the bones and place on the bottom of a casserole. When the endive is tender, remove from the broth. Cut off any extra heart which might be bitter, but leave enough heart to hold the head together. Place on top of the chicken. Sprinkle with 2 tablespoons capers and ¼ teaspoon celery seed and pour over all the following cheese sauce: Melt 1 tablespoon butter, and add 1 tablespoon flour. Pour in 2 cups light cream, ¼ teaspoon salt and ⅛ teaspoon freshly ground pepper. Stir over low heat until thickened. Add 1 cup grated Parmesan cheese. Stir until blended. If the sauce is too thick, add 2 tablespoons chicken stock to thin. Sprinkle the whole dish with ½ cup buttered bread crumbs. Run under the broiler to brown, or bake in a moderate oven, 350° F., for 30 minutes. Sprinkle with 2 tablespoons chopped parsley before serving. This dish can be made up ahead and stored in the refrigerator until it is time to be used. Serves 6–8.

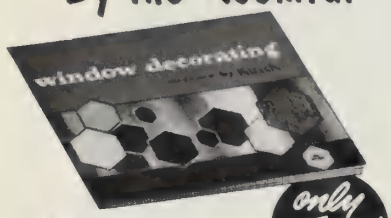
The classic Quiche Lorraine or Swiss-cheese pie has been a favorite for generations. Here's a new version which shares honors with the delicate flavor of shrimp. You're sure to agree it's a most interesting development. Try serving it with big, cold, shapely tomatoes, stuffed with chopped cucumber and cooked peas, marinated in French dressing.

SHRIMP QUICHE

Make a 9" unbaked pastry shell. Place in the refrigerator and chill while preparing the remaining ingredients. Chop an 8-ounce package frozen cleaned and deveined shrimp. There is no need to thaw. Toss together 1¼ cups grated Swiss cheese (4 ounces) and 1¼ cups grated Gruyère cheese (4 ounces) and 1 tablespoon flour. Beat together 3 eggs, 1 cup light cream, ½ teaspoon salt, ¼ teaspoon pepper and a dash of cayenne pepper. Spread ¾ of the cheese mixture in the pastry shell. Add the shrimp and cover with the remaining cheese. Pour the egg mixture over the cheese and shrimp. Bake in a hot oven, 400° F., for 15 minutes; reduce heat to a slow oven, 325° F., and continue baking about 40 minutes or until a silver knife inserted in the center comes out clean. Let stand 10 minutes before serving. Serve warm. Makes 8–10 small or 6 large servings.

TONGUE, LIMA BEANS AND CAULIFLOWER IN CHEESE

You'll need 1 pound cooked smoked tongue; cut it into small, bite-sized squares. Open 2 packages frozen cauliflower and cook until almost tender in boiling salted water. Cook 2 packages frozen Lima beans. Make 3 cups thick cream sauce, using half milk and half light cream. Stir into the smooth, thick sauce 3 cups Cheddar, grated. Season with ¼ teaspoon paprika, ½ teaspoon dry mustard, ½ teaspoon curry powder, 1½ teaspoons Worcestershire sauce, generous pinches of thyme and marjoram. Stir till cheese is melted and flavors blended, then make layers in a deep casserole of the tongue, cauliflower and Lima beans, pouring cheese sauce over all. Bake for about ½ hour, or till flavors have mingled. Serves 8. END



FRENCH SECRET GIRDLE*

Dips and skips your waist, leaves it free and easy yet slims hips unbelievably with satin sheath panels. Nylon power net, panty 12.50 girdle 10.95 bra $5.

For nearest store and free 1957 booklet "Olga tells you how to beautify your figure" write Olga, Dept. J97, 2202 Beverly, Los Angeles 57. *pat.

NEW! Window Decorating IDEAS

"By the Roomful"

only 50¢

32 BIG PAGES IN FULL COLOR

- A fascinating collection of exciting window treatments. All types; every room.
- How to make curtains and draperies ...with sketches, diagrams, patterns. Hints, tips and "stunts" of the experts.
- PLUS a unique, new, removable Color Kit which enables you "automatically" to build correct color harmonies based on your favorite color. Priceless!

Kirsch DRAPERY HARDWARE

KIRSCH CO., 15 Prospect, Sturgis, Michigan

Gentlemen: Enclosed ☐ 50c for one copy of "Window Decorating made easy by Kirsch" (OR) Enclosed ☐ $1.00 for TWO, so I will have an extra copy to give to a friend.

Name_____

Address_____

City_____ Zone____ State_____

"Now look what they have me doing—playing 'guardian angel' to The Green Giant Flavor. Love that job!"

the Green Giant flavor

...takes a lot of loving care

A little girl named Susan remarked the other day that Green Giant Brand peas taste "special-good." Thank you, Susie—there are some "special-good" reasons why you're right. We grow our peas from prize seed in the richest soil. Feed them a diet prescribed by plant doctors. Fuss over 'em like a hen over her only chick. Then we pick and pack them at the fleeting moment of perfect flavor. The Green Giant flavor—nothing else like it in the world of peas. How about pampering yourself with some? Tonight.

Choice of two family sizes: 17-oz. can, serves 4 to 5; 8-oz. can, serves 2 to 3.

the one and only

GREEN GIANT PEAS

BRAND

Picked at the fleeting moment of perfect flavor

Green Giant Company, headquarters, Le Sueur, Minnesota. Green Giant of Canada, Ltd., Tecumseh, Ontario. "Green Giant" Brand Reg. U.S. Pat. Off. © GGCo.

The main dish is cold—tender, juicy veal slices with a heavenly sauce. The table is set with your prettiest dishes and silver, worthy of the food.

Conversation Piece

by Ruth Mills Teague

Delicious hors d'oeuvres are grilled out-of-doors. . .
just the prelude, though,
to a wonderful party meal.

In most parts of our country September signals the beginning of the end to outdoor dining. So for this dinner let's take advantage of the weather while we can and have the first course out-of-doors. It will be meat balls and mushroom caps dipped in barbecue sauce and broiled, and the broiling can be done on the porch, terrace or lawn. Give your guests skewers or forks and let them do their own cooking. There is such a vast variety of grills on the market that, in case you don't already have one, finding one to suit your needs doesn't present a problem. And if you're a city dweller without access to a garden or terrace, the hors d'oeuvres can be broiled in the range and served indoors. I guess that wraps it up in the ways-and-means department.

Zucchini soup will be a fine start for the dinner proper. It can be served hot or cold, but for this dinner I think it should be hot. It's so simple to make—just boil zucchini in bouillon and water with a hunk of bacon and seasonings, press through a sieve or buzz in electric blender and that's all—but the result is a creamy soup with a smoky flavor, and good. I make vats of it every summer and freeze it often in coffee tins as well as the freezer containers available on the market. The coffee-tin-container idea isn't mine. It was given to me by a reader and I pass it on to you with her blessing, I'm sure. They're wonderful for leftovers too. They stack well in the freezer and can be thawed in the oven.

Now the main dish, which is cold and very special. It is veal with tuna-and-caper sauce. In addition to being truly delicious, the preparation is not complicated and it's a beforehand job—what more can you ask? The veal is simmered until tender and juicy, and when cold it is cut into fairly thin slices and spread on the platter from which it will be served. Then it is covered with the smooth tuna sauce and set in the refrigerator for three hours or longer. The combination of the sharp sauce and mild veal provides a taste to remember.

For the hot dish we'll have baked tomatoes filled with artichoke hearts and other things. The dinner plates will have to be cold, but the big luscious tomatoes will retain their heat even on cold plates—and big and luscious they are at this time of year. A salad of crisp greens, cucumbers, radishes and French dressing, some brown-and-serve rolls, and there's the main course. CONTINUED ON PAGE 118

STUART

There's a bowl of tangy barbecue sauce for dipping; a lavish supply of tiny meat balls and raw mushroom caps surround the miniature outdoor grill. Broil your own!

BROWN SHOE COMPANY

Quality at your feet heel-hugging, toe-free fit looks good from any angle

HERE'S THAT BEAUTIFUL
NATURALIZER FIT . . . IN

textured calf

the pumps you've been looking for . . . soft, light and attractively tailored. Naturalizer's new textured-calf fashions in just the colors
you want for fall.

Shoes Illustrated, 11.95 and 12.95
Other styles, 8.95 to 12.95. Higher Denver West and Canada

Naturalizer®
THE SHOE WITH THE BEAUTIFUL FIT

FOR NEAREST DEALER WRITE NATURALIZER DIVISION, BROWN SHOE COMPANY, ST. LOUIS. ALSO MANUFACTURED IN CANADA BY PERTH SHOE COMPANY, LTD., PERTH, ONTARIO music of an orchestra immediately filled the office. "Do you know this song?" he asked.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 120

She nodded her head.

"Listen to the arrangement," he said. "On the repeat, take it from the top."

The music that swirled through the room was stronger than his indifference. She took off her hat and let it drop to the floor. She pushed her hair back and wiped her hands on her dress. Slowly, and with the easy spontaneity that can come only from the heart, she began to sing. She sang with the exact emotional precision she had displayed before, but now her arms hung relaxed by her side and her head tipped gently back on her shoulders. On the last phrase, her tone tightened and she went into a neat, clean ending, without vocal tricks and without gymnastically moving her body.

Lester put the pencil aside and looked up. "Yes," he said, "Ruby Matthews. I had forgotten the name. There are so many names, and I forget them all, but I never forget a voice." He reached into a desk drawer and brought out a hot plate, a dented kettle, two cups from Lindy's and two saucers from Sardi's. "Now," he said, "let's see where we can begin."

They began at the Lighthouse Lantern with Smoke Devereau's piano and a new dress. Smoke came to the rehearsal in a hound's-tooth jacket with suède-patch elbows and the black eyeshade he always wore to keep the glare of the spotlight out of his eyes. After a brief run-through with Ruby, he got up from the piano and bounced across the stage.

"I knew it, honey," he said to her. "I couldn't sleep for dreaming about it. I knew there was a voice with a rabbit-foot in it. It's in yours, honey, in yours."

Lester was responsible for the dress. Ruby didn't know anything about clothes, but Lester arrived with boxes of the latest, most exclusive designs. He and Smoke sat at a ringside table in the vacant club at five o'clock in the morning, while Ruby appeared in the dresses one by one. There were a cocktail dress in scarlet satin, a white formal with a pristine neckline and a pearl-cinched waist, an elegant green velvet with a feather-duster bustle. But the dress she saved to display last became her trade-mark. It was a plain black street dress, regally cut, the simple lines framing the lithe, rhythmic body. A single strand of imitation pearls completed the outfit.

"That's it," Lester spoke up. "That says it. How do you feel?"

Ruby smiled and her joy flashed through the room. "I feel like a princess," she said, spinning around on her heels and waltzing over to the piano. Then, spontaneously, she grasped the edge and lifted her body and sat down on the closed top. She folded her hands in her lap and leaned forward—for all the world a new princess inspecting her realm.

Smoke leaped out of his chair and doffed his eyeshade as though it were a plumed velvet turban. "Princess Matthews," he announced. "Stay there, honey. That's only great."

From that moment on she was Princess Matthews, and from the moment she walked on stage, she was big-time. The beautiful blue note took its solo flight at the Lighthouse. Ruby sat on the piano and sang of love and loss and longing and the freshness of a May morning—of rivers and castles, moments in September, the touch of a hand, a glass of champagne, the bittersweet crispness of a valentine with neither signature nor return address, the dazzling truth of boy meets girl. Each time she came back to the sweet blue note that heralded the new day, the new chance, the new love.

They went on to open at the Chip Room in Chicago, the Raven Roost in Los Angeles, the Droll Corner in New Orleans. The red carpet never stopped unrolling. The silver years were christened as an avalanche of plastic magic poured across the counters of record stores. Fan clubs were formed and the Princess was adopted by the younger set. In a few months she was a fixed star; and the first brilliant flash burned into a quiet steady flame.

Through it all Ruby tried to remember that she was Ruby and not Princess Matthews. She moved out of the mid-town hotel that Lester had recommended, and took a one-room apartment. A hot plate for a stove, one closet, a cubicle bath, an easy chair covered in gaudy chintz, and a record player—these were the luxuries she allowed herself. Even her mother's dream hadn't contained the magic that was now hers, but like a child who is suddenly given all the candy his eyes can hold, her appetite soon began to dwindle. The city was too large and she felt completely lost in it. She finally learned to take sanctuary in two things: music, and writing letters to her mother.

Alone in her room, she transcribed the enchantment that was happening to her: the places, the people, the applause. She told about Princess Matthews, and how everything was more than the two of them had ever dreamed or hoped for. But once the letters were mailed to Ellridge, the dream lost its magic and began to sound strange and wrong. As time passed it became harder and harder to pretend that Ruby and Princess Matthews were one and the same person. The Princess wanted the red dresses and sparkling white gowns, but it was always the simple black dress for Ruby. Every night Ruby carefully brushed the make-up off the collar and pressed it and made sure that it was neat and ready for the next performance. The Princess accepted a strand of genuine pearls from Lester Brannon, but Ruby never wore them. Ruby was afraid to wear them for fear the clasp would break and she'd lose them. And the Princess wanted to belong, wanted to know and talk to the hundreds of people Lester Brannon knew and the hundreds Smoke knew and the hundreds and hundreds who seemed to know the Princess, who followed her everywhere and never, never let her alone. But Ruby knew that belonging to a host of strangers was impossible. What could she talk to them about? She could only talk about a town they had never heard of and a time she no longer understood. She could talk about her mother, her mother who was sick and who had only one thing to think about: the daughter who was finding a something else and not the sickness. Her mother who had listened to the music and told her again and again that the world was larger than the window by the sewing machine, larger than the rusty corner of an all-night cafe, larger than anything the two of them together could imagine.

No, Ruby couldn't be revealed, so the Princess must remain an enigma and a legend. And if Ruby couldn't talk or belong, then she must go on singing. Smoke knew how Ruby felt and he made the arrangements simple and clean and easy to follow. He always waited for her smile before they began and it was never any trouble to throw the ache in her throat as far as the back tables. It sailed above the smoke and the noise and she could lift her head and see the sky and feel like the princess they thought she was. And when the music came back to her, crisp and perfectly formed, the loneliness and strangeness melted and it was all right to be where and what she was.

But the feeling couldn't always be conquered. The blow came the year Lester decided to star the Princess in a Broadway show. It happened the dress-rehearsal night in Philadelphia, during the opening scene. Lester was out in the lobby arguing about gratis tickets. The Princess stood offstage, waiting for her entrance. But just as her music began, a stage hand touched her arm and held out a telegram.

It could have been a congratulatory message from anywhere in the country, but she knew it was about her mother. She had known her mother would die, but the invisible wire that had always starched her backbone snapped: it was as though her mother had been a perpetual source of power and when the pure, nourishing springs that flowed between the two women ceased, both of them died.

An overwhelming wave of fear swept over Ruby, and the thing she dreaded above all else began with her entrance. Smoke started the song twice, then pretended the score was wrong. He turned through the pages, as though he were looking for a missing note. Then Lester Brannon stopped the rehearsal.

"What's the matter with her?"

Smoke didn't answer him. He waved the orchestra quiet, pushed back the eyeshade, shifted the cigar to the other corner of his mouth, and closed the score. "Take five," he said to his men. "On second thought, take ten." As the orchestra broke, he looked up to the Princess. "Get a bite to eat, honey. Get yourself a thick red steak. We'll be here all night."

Ruby left the stage and stood in the wing with the telegram in her hand. The ache that had once been her aliveness, the bell that rang her out of weariness, was gone. It was gone and Lester Brannon and Smoke knew it. She watched them meet and begin to talk in the orchestra pit.

"The part was written for her," Lester said, a steel band containing his voice. "All she has to do is open her mouth and sing."

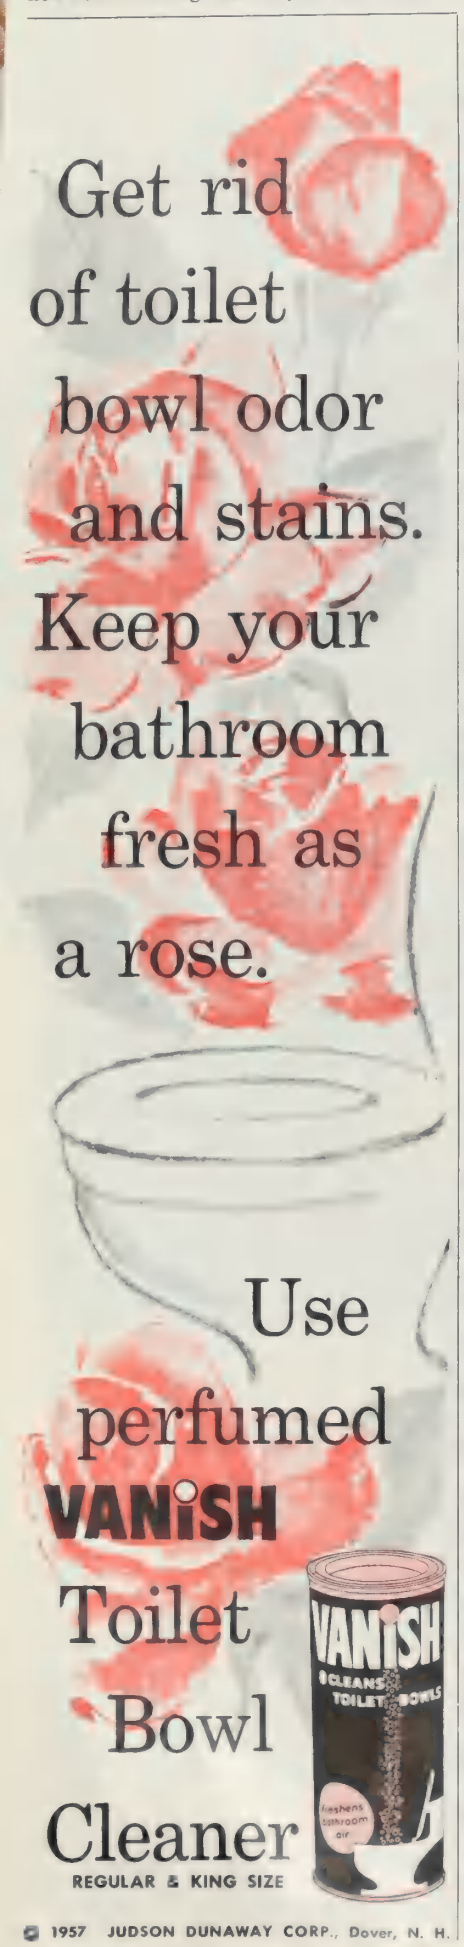
"Yes, sir," Smoke agreed. "She's still got the voice. It's the music that's missing."

"Come off it, Smoke," Lester said angrily. "What's the matter with her?"

"It's the music, Mr. Brannon," Smoke insisted. "It isn't there any more. I don't think there's anything you can do about it."

"Tell her I'm waiting," Lester said.

Ruby didn't listen any more. She went to her dressing room and sat quietly in front of the mirror. Lester would wait. If you wanted to be a person, you didn't work for Lester Brannon. It was only when you wanted to be a princess that you worked for Lester. All he had done was give the Princess the world, laid it at her feet, ready-made. But only Ruby could pay for it. Only Ruby had the educated heart, the sweet blue wings with which to fly.



She changed into a plain sweater and skirt and flat shoes. When she went out to meet Lester he was seated at the piano, turning through the score. "Come here." He beckoned and she came forward. "I know you're tired, Princess, but I want to run through the opening with you."

"I'll try, Mr. Brannon," she said.

He sat down at the piano. "I haven't touched a piano in a long time, but we'll try. I'll give you a ride-out and an opening beat, then I'll follow you in." His fingers were stiff, but the beat was sure and precise. He swung out of the ride-out and held the chord that heralded her entrance.

She missed the cue. "That's it," he said. "Come now, like you always do it."

CONTINUED ON PAGE 124

FIRST WEEK, FIRST GRADE

By MARGARET PARTON

Monday morning: "I won't go to school! They teach you things in first grade!"

Monday evening: "The teacher tried to teach us arithmetic from blocks, but I didn't want my turn. I just crawled under the desk and tickled people."

Tuesday morning: "I don't want to go to school. I don't know any of those people in my group."

Tuesday evening: "Guess what? We had a big mud fight in recess and I had a lot of friends on my side!"

Wednesday morning: "I don't think I'll go to school today. Sometimes the teacher makes us sit still at desks!"

Wednesday evening: "Mother, do you know that this week I'm in charge of the bird-feeding station?"

Thursday morning: "Well, I guess I'll have to go to school just once more. The teacher's going to give us a book with pictures today."

Thursday evening: "Guess what? I can read the words 'Jane' and 'Dick'!"

Friday morning: "Where's my cap? Hurry!"

Friday evening: "I'm old enough to have homework! Don't bother me now—I have to draw a whole pageful of round circles."

From Research comes TRUTH

Penetrating Medical Studies to determine speed of pain relief without stomach upset—confirm:

BAYER Brings Fastest Relief

...the fastest-acting, most gentle-to-the-stomach relief you can get

TRUTH based on 3 years' research

In 1954, as part of a continuing research project to bring greater certainty and absolute truth to the field of pain relief, Bayer sought the aid of one of America's foremost analgesic authorities, whose work is centered in several of New York's largest clinics.

This specialist began a carefully controlled series of clinical tests—tests on people in actual pain—to compare the action of Bayer Aspirin versus aspirin with a "buffer" added.

Thousands of tests were made on patients actually suffering pain . . . the findings were checked and rechecked, analyzed and corroborated beyond any question or doubt. Throughout three intensive years, the results were always the same . . . bringing to light new and additional verification that Bayer brings the fastest relief . . . the fastest-acting, most gentle-to-the-stomach relief—you can get.

TRUTH . . . confirmed . . .

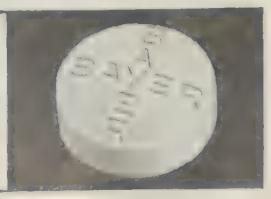
Bayer called for further tests, further evidence. This new research was conducted by members of the staff of one of the East's prominent Medical Schools.

Again and again, the two pain relievers . . . Bayer and aspirin with a "buffer" added . . . were tested clinically to determine speed of pain relief without stomach upset . . . tested on people actually suffering from many types and degrees of acute pain suffered daily by millions.



Again, the results were the same . . . adding further confirmation that ever-dependable Bayer Aspirin is still the fastest-acting, most gentle-to-the-stomach pain reliever you can get!

TRUTH . . . confirmed again!

To climax its relentless search for the truth about pain relief, Bayer requested an eminent professor of a renowned Mid-Western Medical School to undertake a new study of people in actual pain. The two pain relievers were again compared under true pain conditions. The findings of this third study were overwhelming and indisputable!

Hundreds of pain-ridden patients in the three independent studies verified over and over again that Bayer brings the fastest relief . . . the fastest-acting, most gentle-to-the-stomach relief . . . you can get. You can trust your body to Bayer to feel better fast.

THIS RESEARCH is based on the one final and absolute method for testing the value of pain relievers—by studying people suffering from real pain.

For headache, backache, and many other pains...

FEEL BETTER FAST—with BAYER® ASPIRIN

More grown-ups and growing-ups depend on Mum than on any other deodorant

PRODUCT OF BRISTOL-MYERS

New MUM DEODORANT stops odor... without irritation

So gentle for any normal skin you can use it every day

If you've ever worried about underarm stinging or burning from using a deodorant daily—or right after shaving or a hot bath—you can set your mind at ease. New Mum Cream is so gentle for normal skin, you can use it whenever you please.

Mum Cream gives you the kind of protection you can't possibly get from any other leading deodorant—because it works a completely different way. Mum Cream is the only leading deodorant that works entirely by stopping odor . . . contains no astringent aluminum salts. And it keeps on working actively to stop odor 24 hours a day with M-3—Mum's wonderful hexachlorophene that destroys both odor and odor-causing bacteria! When Mum is so effective—yet so gentle—isn't it the deodorant for you? Try new Mum Cream today.

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

AMERICAN INSTITUTE OF LAUNDERING CERTIFIED

WON'T DAMAGE CLOTHES

MUM® contains M-3 (bacteria-destroying hexachlorophene)
...stops odor 24 hours a day

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 122

"How do I do it?" Ruby asked.

A puzzled anger shadowed his expression. "The way you sing, Princess."

"How?" she asked again.

"Your style, honey. I can't explain it to you. Close your eyes. We'll take it from the top this time."

She heard the note, yet she came in a half beat behind him. The voice sounded clean, but it followed his lead every step of the way. There was no structure, no crescendo, no subtlety.

"Honey"—he ripped out the last chord—"you're carrying the show. You can't follow the chorus."

"How did I do it?" she asked for the third time.

"How do I know?" Lester said, astonished. "If I knew, I'd do it myself."

"I know," Ruby said. "I know the way I used to sing, but I can't do it any more."

"All right," he said, suddenly calm. "You can't do it, but nobody else can do it either. Remember that, Princess."

Ruby didn't go to her mother's funeral. The pain had everything to do with her mother's dying, yet it had nothing, and she didn't want to go home because she knew the boys would accuse her. She could hear their angry voices and see their judging fingers. The day the cast took the train from Philadelphia to New York, Ruby went into a church near Pennsylvania Station and prayed for her mother, silently and without crying, and that was the way she celebrated the funeral.

When the show closed after a two-week run, Ruby knew that her voice was still usable and she could still sing in many places. The strenuous, disciplined Princess years had made it a good voice, and there was the Princess money to live on. She broke her contract with Lester because she was too proud to go on singing for him. To the others, she pretended she didn't know how her voice sounded. She broke the contract and made Lester Brannon transfer her money into her name and set out on her own.

The second year, as the memory of the Princess began to fade, she was booked into the downstairs bar-and-grill spots, not the intimate, reserved upstairs. The third year, she played the circuit three times because her new agent held the promise of a New York date under her nose. The fourth year, she took a job as a combination hat-check girl and fill-in vocalist while the engaged orchestra took its breaks. And the last year, she began singing under her own name, Ruby Matthews, in a restaurant that automatically changed both its name and its address every six weeks.

It was then, as Ruby Matthews, that she saw what she must do. She went home. She packed an overnight bag and took a plane to Atlanta and a bus from Atlanta to Ellridge. She got off the bus and a redcap, a boy she had known in school, passed her without any sign of recognition. She went into a drugstore to get a cup of coffee and they wouldn't serve her at the counter. They gave her coffee in a paper cup and she took it into a public telephone booth and called a taxi service she remembered. The driver picked her up on the corner.

"I want to go about ten miles outside of town," she said. "To the cemetery. I'm looking for the place where Big Ruby Matthews is buried."

"Big Ruby?" the man asked. "I knew Big Ruby. She was a fine lady."

When they reached the cemetery, she stepped out at the gate and told the driver to come back for her in an hour because she wanted to catch the bus back to Atlanta. He rolled down the window and stared at her as she walked up the dirt path and into the trees.

The grave was on a hill with many other graves and all of them were related. There was the father she had never known, and the uncle. She wondered what had happened to the Mason jars filled with buttons. There was the uncle's brother, who had carved a beautiful necklace pendant out of a peach stone for her. There were the three Matthews children who had died before she was born, and an itinerant preacher named Matthews who had asked to be laid with any local Matthews when he died. And then there was her mother.

The grave was bare, but flowers had been planted and they would grow with warm weather and rain. It was a small, evenly spaced mound covered with rich black dirt and soft moss and dotted with fallen acorns. The headstone didn't say she was a good wife and mother and faithful servant of the House of Prayer. It merely stated her name and the dates of her birth and death.

Ruby stood at the foot of her mother's grave and felt the cool wind on her cheeks and the dusty fingers of late summer on her arms and legs. The cemetery was completely silent. It was too early for crickets, and too late for the children to be out playing in the yards that surrounded the cemetery. The light in the sky deepened and filtered through the wet blue haze that lingered in the air before settling on the ground.

It wasn't what she had come to do, yet there were the silence and the sky and her mother's name. She lifted her head as she had in the long-ago summers of her childhood and began to sing.

Her voice was a soft, quiet sound. It curved around the words of the hymn with the gentleness of a rare southern snow. It skimmed the edge of the crisp air with the poise and grace of April sunlight. And the feeling was so clean and disciplined it was inaudible to anything except the inner ear of her own heart. She sang all the hymns she remembered the words to, then paused for a moment and walked down the hill. The cab driver was waiting for her and she didn't mind when he took her the longer way to the station because she knew there was plenty of time to make the bus to Atlanta. . . .

Just as there was time for everything. Time for Lester to find her and time to buy a new dress. Time for a jeweler to make a special clasp for the strand of genuine pearls. And now there was time for music.

The Princess felt Smoke's piano breathe and wait for her to set the beat that would lead them home. She remembered something Smoke had said to a newspaper reporter in Los Angeles: "She's the greatest jazz interpreter of our time. There's never been anybody like the Princess." She smiled. Greatness wasn't the most important thing. "I never had a chance to go to school," her mother had said, "but I got an educated heart."

Princess Matthews leaned forward slightly and took the ride-out with the smooth, easy grace of a new ship sailing into its first harbor. She touched the note for the last time, then turned it quietly, gently, to the aisle seat on the fourth row. Lester listened, and in the shining drop of silence that followed, the Princess knew that even Lester had heard the note that was really there. END

SWEET GRASS

By ELIZABETH McFARLAND

My children, the grass is sweet in hidden places
And the long sails touch many an island still.
There flowers may love the sun with open faces
High upon rock, or like fern under Paisley frill.

And the wild, untrammeled
grass is safe from mowers.
Give me your hands, though your shadows are still so small:
For I have children with eyes like the youngest flowers
And sweet grass grows for them where it grows at all.

Borg Fabric Division, The George W. Borg Corporation, Delavan, Wisconsin

BORGANA®

...brilliant successor to Borgana. Most luxurious of all the like-furs, and more than ever "more like fur than fur itself." Silkier, softer, richer because it is the only like-fur that blends Darlan* with Orlon†. Seven new colors: Dawn Beige, Dusk Gray, Starlight Taupe, Celestial Blue, Shadow Brown, Night Black, Eclipse Charcoal... in misses, junior and petite sizes. Incomparably fashioned by the makers listed below.

■ Modelia, Inc., 205 W. 39th St., N.Y. ■ Kraeler-Frasca, 500 Seventh Ave., N.Y. ■ Albrecht Furs, 21 W. 5th St., St. Paul ■ Rothmoor Corp., 22 W. Madison St., Chicago
■ Annis Furs, 512 Seventh Ave., N.Y. ■ Gordon Mfg. Co., Ltd., 423 Mayor St., Montreal ■ Linker & Herbert-Junior Aire, 205 W. 39th St., N.Y.

Borgana is the registered trademark of The George W. Borg Corporation Manufactured under U. S. Patent No. 2,705,880 †Dupont Trademark *B. F. Goodrich Trademark a Borg fabric

Strategic Investment

How to Dress Well on Practically Nothing!

By BET HART

Barbara J. has a raft of memos flying. She has put away all, or almost all, her summer frivolities. In her customary conscientious manner, she has noted down everything she has in her closet to wear now and in the winter months ahead. Her fashion thoughts and ideas evolve around one, and one very important, conclusion—the absolute mainstays already in her wardrobe: her red coat from a season ago, her black faille dress bought last month. These she keeps in mind in making her most important fall purchases.

From this point of calculation, Barbara collects all her fashion wits about her, and on a Saturday, all day, she shops. Monday, on a lunch hour, she buys, a whole day between to re-evaluate her fashion find. It still measures up—and more! A softly tailored suit in a wool tweed of amethyst blue. A short cropped jacket, buttoned in brass, slim skirt. The suit can be worn prettily alone or under her red coat. The price—a wonderful $17.95—leaves enough fashion $'s for new accessories to heighten the investment.

© VOGUE

The forty-hour week—and good for every hour of the working day. High noon on a nonworking day, Saturday, Barbara wears her new suit. She folds a chiffon scarf under the collar, fastens with her gold pin. One vivid color highlighted by another equals more fashion, more beauty. Barbara invests in a new red velveteen bag—$2.98.

10 A.M.

*Behind the desk. Minus the jacket, Barbara shows off her new blouse. Made of Orlon and wool, it is washable and quick to dry for a next day's wear. It can be seen coming or going, for it is equally as pretty tied to the front. Vogue Design No. 9278.

*For sizes and price, see page 166.

PRIGENT

1 P.M.

and a luncheon date on the calendar. Barbara wears her suit with its own matching tweed tie at the collar. Barbara used her ingenuity so the suit can be worn with or without the tie. (Originally it was permanently attached to the collar.) For a feminine look, and still efficient, Barbara wears her black bandeau from last month.

5 P.M.

To or from the office, Barbara dons her new white jersey hat—costs her all of $2.95. The suit again, but today she has the collar folded in a cowl-like fashion held that way her gold pin.

HAT BY SOLOMAN

SUIT BY MANDEL

7 P.M.

Barbara feels the suit is elegant enough to wear for a dinner date after work, and we are inclined to agree. Pink, she discovers, is one of the loveliest shades with the amethyst, and for evening she uses soft folds of it in chiffon to highlight an already pretty neckline.

With her red coat, black dress and new suit, Barbara finds (and only because she's planned it that way) she has a fall wardrobe complete... total cost—less than $50.00!

Black dress, overskirt and veil†	$21.85
Tweed suit	17.95
White Orlon-and-wool blouse	3.75
White jersey hat	2.95
Red velveteen bag	2.98
TOTAL	$49.48

†Bought last month; not shown.

Blue-sky softness in the shimmering satin and double chiffon of this lovely negligee especially designed for Scott. Blue-sky softness in the double luxury of matching Soft-Weve, Scott's superb "facial quality" bath tissue. Five delicate 2-ply Soft-Weve colors for your bath or powder room.

Probably the most noticed luxury in your home...

Soft-Weve® by Scott

Doll by Madame Alexande

Yardley products for America are created in England, and finished in the U.S.A. from the original English formulae, combining imported and domestic ingredients. Yardley of London, Inc., 620 Fifth Ave., N.Y

To make you feel especially feminine

YARDLEY fragrances . . . of course

Which of these lovely, lingering scents is for you? The vibrant sophistication of Bond Street? Delicately exotic Lotus? Perhaps it's April Violets, rain-sweet and incurably romantic. Or is your one and only love the fresh, lighthearted gaiety of Lavender? Not an easy choice to make—but a delightful one. These toilet waters and colognes from $1.35 plus tax.

THE UNFORGETTABLE MISS JONES

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 57

turned the pages until she came to one fresh coffee stains.

Know this district, dear? It's a bit rough; then, in wartime—well, you know how it is. Lots of actresses living around. At least call themselves actresses." Miss Conn ked the end of her pencil. "You got to be ad-minded. It's no use coming here if you n't broad-minded."

ys gave what she hoped was a worldly gh and said she knew all about that. "Mat- of fact," she said, becoming Laurel Jones, was once on the stage myself."

Miss Conn looked vaguely relieved, as ugh a problem had been settled. "I can you a job, but there's something I've got know first. Why aren't you in the forces, r? Why haven't you been called up?"

They had thought of all that at headquar-s. Lys produced her doctor's certificate, convincing story.

H'm. T.b. was it? You look fit enough to . Still, I suppose they know what they are ut. If I were you I wouldn't mention t.b. the interview. Folks don't like it. Puts 'em . You want to go out daily or live in?"

'Daily if possible. I've got a room near arlotte Street." Headquarters had fixed that her too.

Miss Conn gave her a quick look like a prod m two darning needles. "I see."

'If you want references ——" Lys began.

Miss Conn gave a hollow hoot of a laugh. olks don't bother about references these ys. All they want is a pair of hands and a ir of feet to carry 'em round. I reckon you're right. I can always tell the phony ones."

Lys looked away, feeling named, afraid Miss Conn uld see and interpret her ush. She watched the long fingernail take a trip and down columns of mes and addresses, and op suddenly at some-dy's front door.

"Here we are. Peppi own. A nice little guy."

e dialed a number. "That you, Peppi? 've got a girl for you. Seems all right to me, t you'd best take a look at her yourself. I'll nd her round."

She handed Lys an address scribbled on a ece of paper.

"Come back if you don't fancy it. I can sily find you something else. Bonnini, his me used to be. Before the war. He calls him-lf Brown now."

Lys tried not to look at her new reflection the shopwindows she passed on her way rough Soho. It disheartened her. A shock-g-pink beret sat far back on her collection of range sausages. Her shocking-pink coat was mbellished with a large diamond brooch hich, had it been real, would have removed s owner from need of toil for life.

Peppi Brown, lately Bonnini, was a short bby man with licorice eyes, dark curls, and n apron tied across his front. A half-smoked garette that had been carefully pinched out as preserved for further indulgence behind ne ear. He owned an unobtrusive little restau-nt up a side street. Two starved-looking hododendrons stood in gaily painted tubs on ther side of the entrance. Over the doorway e name was newly painted, PROPRIETOR EPPI BROWN.

Peppi had got his papers through in time. e was very proud of the fact. It was the first ing he mentioned. "I am British subject. verything O.K. You lika work for me, yes?"

Lys said yes. She took to him on sight.

His restaurant was beautifully clean and dy, although she gathered he had been run-ing the place singlehanded save for one oman who came in to help with the washing p. The kitchen, too, was as clean as it was ossible to make it. The cellar where the wines ere kept was reached by a steep, sinister one staircase that went down into a cold ark hole that resembled a tomb.

Peppi engaged her at once. He outlined her uties. She must arrive early and clean up and lay the tables while he went off on secret marketings. "One has always friends," said Peppi darkly. After that she would double as cashier and help with the tables when they had a rush.

"Is lotta work," said Peppi, eying her wistfully.

She said she did not mind. Her room was conveniently close. She would not have to walk far through the streets where the air-raid wardens shepherded bewildered, bombed-out people in search of accommodation and the air was full of the tinkling sound of broken glass being swept away on mornings after a raid.

"Nota good neighborhood in wartime. Many women. Many soldiers." He eyed her unhappily. She looked very young. "Never mind. Here they behave good. No monkey business." He patted her shoulder kindly. "Anyone maka da funny business with you, you tella me."

How hard he worked. In the days that followed, Lys' heart bled for the poor little man. His day began at five A.M. He shopped, planned, cooked and cleaned his kitchen himself. He wrote out the menus in blue indelible pencil on limp cards. And when customers came, there he was, a table napkin over his arm, the complete waiter. Helping customers on with their coats. Paying outrageous compliments to the ladies.

During the lunch hour every table would be full with soldiers on leave, glad to get an inexpensive meal, well cooked; with actresses from the neighboring theaters; with ladies of the town. Lys rarely got her own lunch until after three. Then she and Peppi would sit together in one of the screened alcoves usually allotted to lovers, and he would bring her something he had managed to put aside. A scallop of some unnamed meat. An omelet, light as a feather, made of powdered eggs delicately flavored with garlic. And always two cups of good strong coffee. She never discovered where he got his coffee.

Women are the flowers of life as children are its fruit. BERNARDIN DE SAINT PIERRE

"One has always the friends," Peppi said.

Now and again they got a plain-clothes snooper, come to see whether Peppi was breaking any of the new rules and regulations. Peppi always spotted them at sight. He kept a special collection of gristly meat on one side which he served to them unctuously, with a flourish, garnished with parsley.

"I am British subject," said Peppi proudly. "I keepa da rules."

"How do you manage to recognize them for snoopers?" Lys asked.

He winked at her. "Lika da dog. When they come in, my nose end he twitch."

From her glass box where she acted as cashier when she wasn't acting as waitress or cleaner or assistant cook, Lys got a good view of the clients. She began to know them by sight. The women eyed Lys suspiciously at first, but before long they accepted her, pausing to chat as they paid their bills. Second and third editions of practically every film star Lys could remember.

Lys watched, waiting for the women she had been told to watch for, the ones headquarters had described.

They kept a careful eye on her from headquarters. It had all been meticulously worked out before she started. Twice a week somebody waited for her at a bus stop in Oxford Street. It was a different man every time, but always he carried a copy of the Complete Works of John Masefield under his arm, the collar of his coat turned up, the brim of his pork-pie hat turned down. They would join the same queue and board the same bus, either strap-hanging or sitting next to each other. If she had anything to report, in the general hustle and jostle of getting on or off, she would pass him a note. They never smiled or spoke. Lys rather enjoyed all this at first; it was romantic and exciting, as well as comforting to feel she was not entirely alone.

For a long time there was nothing to report.

Peppi kept a special table in an alcove for favored clients. It bore the sign, RESERVED, till Peppi himself took it away and showed the chosen ones to their seats.

The dark-haired girl and the blonde came in together, and took the seats without being shown into them, turning the RESERVED notice down themselves.

"Aha—they come back," said Peppi gaily. "Suzanne and Colette. Very clever girls. Nice girls. Good clients. Drinka da wine, paya da bills." He winked. "Maybe they work in an office, maybe they don't."

Lys' heart bounced, for there, in the alcove, were the two women whose names were on her list—the two she had been briefed about. She watched them covertly from her vantage point in the cashier's box. They were smartly dressed, in a fashion she knew had nothing to do with coupons and shortages.

"The fair one is Suzanne—the dark one is Colette," said Peppi, stirring another spoon-

CAPULET Pinwale corduroy boot with slender tapered toe. Fawn, red, green, navy and black. 6.00

FLIRT Pinwale corduroy with saucy satin bow. Black, green, navy, red, gold, heaven blue and pink. 5.50

DANIEL GREEN Comfy SLIPPERS

DANIEL GREEN COMPANY • DOLGEVILLE, NEW YORK (prices slightly higher west of the Rockies)

ful of paprika into the stew. "They maka lotta money, I think."

Over the table the two women kept up a desultory conversation. Suzanne had a sultry, half-sullen expression, a long loose lock of golden hair falling forward as she talked. Colette was gayer. From time to time she made a joke at which they both laughed. It struck Lys that they, too, were being watchful, scanning each newcomer.

They paused beside the cash desk on their way out. "New here, aren't you?"

Peppi said quickly, "Laurel's been sick but she's O.K. now. She learna da business fast. She's a good girl ——"

The fair one said something which Lys did not catch.

"Sure, I know all about her," Peppi answered. "I tell you, she's good girl."

"O.K. O.K." The fair girl smiled at Lys and pushed half a crown over to her. "Keep it, kid—you look kind of peaked still. Lucky for Peppi you couldn't get into the forces. He's had bad staff troubles. Remember the girl who cleared off with all the tomatoes, Peppi?"

They went off laughing.

"Nice girls," Peppi nodded.

It was the next day that, for the first time, Lys slipped a note to the man at the bus stop with the Complete Works of John Masefield under his arm. The note said simply "Weather changing."

Suzanne and Colette began to come in daily to lunch at Peppi's. Frequently they came in at night, too, with young men. Some were soldiers, but others were rather nondescript individuals, wearing suits with padded shoulders, who appeared to have civilian jobs when most young men were in uniform.

The girls took to Lys almost at once and soon showed her many little kindnesses. Usually they stopped for a word or two at the cashier's desk, and once they brought her a bottle of French perfume.

"It must have cost the earth! I shouldn't let you give it to me. The alone ——"

Colette laughed. "Don't worry, kid. everyone has to pay duty, you know."

Suzanne said something Lys did not and the dark girl answered impatiently, don't be dumb. She's on the level—an can tell that."

Lys, holding the perfume in her hand worse than ever. Setting a trap for traitor was rapidly coming to feel like one he Suddenly distaste for the job she had take overwhelmed her and the excitement an venture began to wilt. But it was too la that now; she had embarked on this jo had to go through with it.

The next step was almost too easy.

Suzanne, pausing at the cash desk to g up change, said, "Do you happen to anyone around here who could do a dressmaking? Mending, altering, puttin hem? I don't seem to get any time at all days to attend to my clothes. I th maybe, living in this district, you might someone ——"

"Maybe I could do it for you—if you wait until Sunday," Lys said, her heart mering.

"Oh, that's wonderful. Sundays, Mon it's all the same to me. Did you hear Colette? She will come and sew for us.

The two girls shared a comfortable flat near Charlotte Street. Dark red c and gilt chairs gave it an air of foreign l which put Lys in mind of a French hote

The sewing was not difficult and th watched her, impressed. "How cleve are," Colette said. "You seem to know h do everything. How is it you aren't mar

"Nobody ever asked me."

"Men!" said Colette. "Aren't they stu She was standing, turning slowly as Lys p up the hem of her frock.

Suzanne sat across the room—the golden lock falling over her forehead narrowed eyes regarding Lys thought "Yes, you're certainly wasted in that re rant, slaving for old Peppi," she said. "N we can find you a better job one of these Better pay and more interesting ——"

Colette turned, interrupting the sen with a question to Lys about the dress was sure that the interruption was delib but later it was Colette who gave her a black taffeta dress, elegantly flared.

Lys said regretfully, "It's much too for me. I'll never get a chance to wear it.'

"Oh, yes, you will," Colette told "We're going to have a party and you help us."

True to the promise, Suzanne and C gave the party. It was on a Sunday an asked Lys to come early and help wit food. When she arrived she was astonish the array in the kitchen—champagne in necked bottles, sardines, caviar, fresh b and black olives. Things no one had se the shops for years. There were gin an mouth in quantities that for most people only a gy memory.

"Take what the bon Dieu sends!" sai zanne lightly, seeing the younger girl's prise. "Will you mix cocktails? That's thing you must have learned at Peppi's

The bon Dieu, thought Lys. It struck he all this largess must come from an entirel ferent quarter. She stood behind the table dispensing cocktails made of rea feeling oddly nervous. She had no idea could be so many men around who were uniform. She was too busy for more th word or two with any of them, but sh that she was being regarded suspicio

But Suzanne, passing, patted her shou "You are a great success, little one. E body admires you very much."

After that she was at the flat almost weekend. She began to recognize the va members of the little clique who dropp regularly. Occasionally there would be a comer, arriving late and saying little to ar except Colette and Suzanne.

Though the two girls did not tell Lys o what was going on, they took less an trouble to hide anything from her.

out of the west . . .

Pendleton skirtsmanship brings you this new skirt wardrobe for autumn. (Plus Pendleton sweaters to color coordinate with them!) Skirt fabrics are virgin wool, in miniature checks, worsted flannels, plaided checks, tweeds and gabardines. Tailoring has that fine Western touch: generously wide seams for smoother fit; deep hems to help secure the slim silhouettes; and rayon half-linings for no "sit-out" seats! Each but 12.95, sweaters 8.95 to 11.95

Pendleton Sportswear

always virgin wool

For descriptive Pendleton Sportswear literature, in full color, write Dept. D8.

Pendleton Woolen Mills • Portland 4, Oregon

"He came from Paris," Suzanne would say. "Here"—holding out a box of bonbons—"have one. They're quite good."

One day she arrived at Peppi's looking harassed, her hair wind-blown as if she had dressed in a hurry and forgotten to brush it.

Lys was in the kitchen and Peppi joined her there and said, "Suzanne wants to speak to you. Alone. She's in the toilet." His licorice eyes bulged with curiosity.

When Lys opened the door Suzanne was leaning against the wall of the mean little lavatory. She took a small, heavy packet from the front of her dress and handed it to Lys.

"Look, kid. I can't explain about this, but we want you to do something for us. We're half expecting a raid on our flat. Someone's gotten nosy about our parties—the liquor, I guess. If the snoopers come or if anyone is trying to make trouble for us, this mustn't be found. Will you keep it for us?"

Lys nodded. The packet was post-card size and, from its weight, she gathered it might be tightly packed sheets of paper. That night in her room she sat holding the package, weighing it in her hand. It could be the information she was looking for. On the other hand, it could just as well be a trap, a tryout to see if they could trust her. If she tampered with this package in any way, they would know it and the game would be up. Everything she had so carefully built up would be smashed.

She hid the package and waited. After three days Suzanne came for it. And by the way she eyed it, Lys was certain her conjectures had been correct. It had been a trap set for her, even as she was setting a trap for them.

From that time on Colette and Suzanne seemed less careful of what they said before her. She helped them in many ways, sometimes gave a hand in the kitchen or did errands, occasionally took messages over the telephone. She never asked questions or showed any curiosity. The people who came to see Suzanne and Colette no longer looked at her doubtfully. They spoke freely before her and, though she understood little of what was said, gradually she came to understand that there was someone in France from whom instructions came to the group and to whom reports were relayed.

Love is just as much of a necessity as bread. HONORÉ DE BALZAC

Lys began to feel that now, step by step, she was coming closer to the object of her search, the information headquarters must have.

And twice a week the punctual plain-clothes man waited with his copy of Masefield, keeping a comforting eye on her. They never smiled or exchanged a word. But presently again she had something for him, scrawled on a slip of paper, carefully passed, in their arranged code.

"The weather is improving," was all it said.

It was a constant marvel to Lys that she was never suspected. By her own standards and training, this acceptance of her appeared careless and rash beyond all belief. Then one day Suzanne, sitting beside the electric fire with its unconvincing bogus logs, sniffed as she turned a page of her newspaper.

"That poor Jones!"

"Is it in the paper?" Colette asked casually.

"Yes." Suzanne turned to Lys, on the divan which became a bed by night. "This poor fellow had a very sad accident. A pity—but he wasn't clever and accidents do happen to people who are stupid." She pointed out the paragraph with a long, crimson fingernail. "Found dead at his home," she read aloud. "Apparently he had fallen down the lift shaft in the block of flats where he lived ——" Suzanne paused and then went on softly, "Silly little man. You see, he tried to double-cross us, and now he has had his lesson."

Lys gulped, looking at the printed page. For the first time it dawned on her just how dangerous this thing which she had undertaken was, what might happen if she slipped up in any way. She continued to look down at the newspaper for fear the horror she felt would show in her face. It was then, for the first time, she heard the name which she was never, never to forget.

"Tiger is wise," Suzanne said, "to choose mostly women to work for him. They're not so stupid as men."

Lys thought for a moment that the others must surely hear the thudding of her heart. Tiger! Was this the ringleader, the center of the entire group of spies—and one she had been sent to identify? Then who and where was Tiger? Surely if she played her cards carefully she would soon know. And after that she would be done with this job which daily became more distasteful to her. She no longer felt that there was anything glamorous or enviable about being a member of the police force. She wanted only to have done with it.

An untimely heat wave grilled London, and Peppi's restaurant became unbearably hot. When business was slack Lys left her glass cashier's box which was like a small greenhouse and joined Peppi on the pavement to get what air she could.

Once Miss Conn from the agency passed and asked how she was getting on. "I could get you a job in the country if you'd like it," she offered. "You look peaked, my dear."

"I'm all right," Lys told her. "I like it here very much." Ashamed of the lie, she told herself that it wouldn't be long now. She was sure the end of this horrible job must be almost in sight.

In the flat off Charlotte Street Lys sensed that something was afoot. There was a stir of excitement, a feeling in the air long before anyone told her anything. A party which had been planned was postponed. The young men she had seen so often came and went with sealed faces, whispering in corners, avoiding her eyes.

Suzanne was away for a week and while she was gone Colette asked Lys to come and sleep

A new idea in smoking Salem... refreshes your taste

Created by R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Company

- menthol fresh
- rich tobacco taste
- most modern filter

It's a new idea in smoking — a refreshing idea for every smoker. SALEM's pure white filter brings you rich tobacco taste with new surprise softness . . . menthol-fresh comfort . . . a smoke as refreshing to your taste as Springtime is to you. Next time you light up — switch to SALEM and smoke refreshed.

Smoke refreshed . . . smoke Salem at the flat. Those were not good days for being alone, with the sirens wailing and the searchlights groping around among the stars. So Lys moved her things over.

Very early one morning Suzanne returned. "I think we've got it," she said. "I've a pretty good idea now what it's all about, but Tiger must come himself and finish the job. That fair-haired boy didn't know much but he knew something ——" She stopped short, for the first time seeing Lys.

"Go on," Colette said, "it's all right."

Suzanne came over and sat on the side of the bed. She took Lys' wrist in a sudden iron grip. "You're not a little traitor, are you? Swear by God." Her face in that moment was frightening—older and suddenly grim.

"I am no traitor," Lys said proudly and it was true, though not quite in the way Suzanne meant.

"No," Suzanne said, letting her wrist go and leaning back against the bed's footrail. "No, I don't think you are. But let me tell you one thing and you'd better remember it. To be a traitor to us is very dangerous. Some have tried it, but it has never been very good for them." She hugged her knees and went on, smiling. "They disappear. A motorcar knocks them down maybe. You remember Mr. Jones and that sad accident in the newspaper?"

Lys said faintly, "Oh, don't, Suzanne!" She covered her face with her hands, thinking of Mr. Jones.

Colette said, "Leave the kid alone. What are you trying to do anyhow? You know she's O.K. Look at the way she kept those papers for us."

Suzanne nodded. "All right. But since she knows so much, she'd better know more." She looked again at Lys. "When we're on to something really big, Tiger comes over here. He'll probably be coming very soon now. There's something he's been wanting to know for a long time and I think we have the right lead."

The Normandy landing, thought Lys, and gulped convulsively and hid it in a pretended cough.

Suzanne turned back to Colette. "The poor little boy," she said. "He was drunk when he talked. Young and drunk. I don't suppose he has any notion how much he gave away."

"Tiger," said Lys guilelessly. "What a funny name."

"Oh, it's only a nickname. His real name is something he does not tell."

"Is he French?"

The two girls looked at each other and laughed. "Well, his father was certainly French," said Colette. "His mother was Irish and he has some of the charm and the brains of each race. Quelle homme! What he tells us to do, we do. When he whistles we go. And he cares not one small damn for any of us."

"Which is a good thing," Suzanne added. "One works best when the feelings are not involved. Besides, I cannot think any woman Tiger loved would have a very good time."

So now Lys was even surer that she was nearing the end of her assignment. Before long she would be able to give headquarters the information they must have. The prospect helped her over the long days in the restaurant.

She shopped and cooked for the two girls at weekends, returning to her own room only to sleep, hurrying rather fearfully through the blacked-out streets on dark and foggy nights when there was never a star to guide her. But moonlight nights when the streets were empty and no sirens had sounded, the dead city was beautiful. Sometimes she went home a long way round to get some exercise, which was a thing in wartime London an energetic girl missed. And so it was she found the bombed church. It stood at the back of a square that had once been fashionable. Only the front of the building had been blown off. Down the long aisle the altar was still bright and shining with golden mosaic in spite of all the dust and debris. The pews still stood in orderly rows. Sometimes Lys went in and knelt down and tried to pray, but the searchlights and all the debris and paraphernalia of war seemed to be a barrier between her and God, and she could never find anything to say.

It was a Saturday night. Peppi closed his restaurant early on Saturdays in winter, and she had promised to cook a meal for the two girls whose lives at the moment appeared to be one long rush.

She let herself into the flat, took off her coat and smoothed her hair. Then she went into the sitting room. She pulled the thick curtains carefully across the windows before she switched on the rose-shaded lamps. As the soft light shone out, she saw that a man lay asleep on the sofa. Lys stood looking down at him, for the moment too surprised to think clearly.

The man stirred and opened his eyes, the same surprise on his face as on hers. For a long minute they looked at each other in the rose-shaded light. Then slowly he sat up and stretched, and smiled at her.

"One beautiful thing in a cold and unfriendly world," he said. "A wood nymph!"

He took her hand and kissed it in foreign fashion, and she stood before him, feeling shy and lost and very much aware of the kiss on the back of her hand.

"I came in to get supper," she said lamely.

"Splendid. We will both get supper."

He was slender and tall, and he was, she thought, the handsomest man she had ever seen, with his high-bridged nose and humorous mouth. He stood watching as she prepared the omelet, ready to cook when the girls came in.

"You help them?" he asked.

"I help as much as I can."

"Good. I was afraid you might disappear and I would find you were just part of my unlikely dream. We shall see more of each other, wood nymph."

It was then she found words for a passionate prayer: Please, God, don't let it be him. Don't let him be the one I have got to turn in to them.

Suzanne and Colette came presently, laughing and chattering up the stairs. They stopped and gave little excited cries of amazement.

"We didn't expect you until tomorrow. How did you come? This is wonderful! And you have already met our little one, Laurel?"

"We have already met," he said. "I fell asleep and thought I was dreaming when I

Noreen

that's the beauty of it

Today, millions of women welcome the extra softness and sheen that comes from a Noreen hair rinse . . . the gleaming highlights and increase in the depth of natural color.

But Noreen can do so much more for those whose hair is more of a problem than a source of pride. If your hair is drab, faded or streaked with unwanted gray, a Noreen temporary color rinse will bring back its natural beauty by augmenting the natural hair color, blend in graying or faded streaks and give your hair a healthy youthful look.

And you can apply Noreen yourself at home next time you shampoo. It's safe, simple and temporary...washes out each time you shampoo. Try Noreen soon . . . make your choice from fourteen glamorizing shades and be proud of your hair's new beauty.

Write for literature and FREE sample offer: Noreen, Inc. 450 Lincoln Street, Denver 3, Colorado. Dept. 14.

Noreen

COLOR HAIR RINSE

at cosmetic counters everywhere also professionally applied in beauty salons

"Could you come back later? I'm pretty much at loose ends between one A.M. and five."

woke. It was a very pleasant dream." Across the room his eyes smiled at .ys.

"Good old Tiger," said Colette ynically. "Turning on the charm as isual."

He spoke English elegantly, with nly a slight accent. There had still been hope for Lys until she heard his name. "Good old Tiger," Colette had said—and Lys knew then that there was no hope. It was the end of something beautiful that might have been, and there was nothing for her but to harden her heart and get on with her job. And she knew that now something had happened which would make a hateful task all the more hateful. Because there is such a thing as love at first sight and she knew he was in love with her. Right from the start. Right from that first moment of awaking. There were so many reasons why she must not fall in love with him, but none of them was the slightest use to her.

They had a gay supper, all four of them sitting down together at the table pulled up beside the electric fire with its load of bogus logs.

He had brought with him golden wine from France. It glowed like bottled sunshine in the tall glasses, and the light of the candles swam before Lys' eyes in a golden glow. Through it she saw only his face, his humorous mouth that could look tender or very cruel, and his dark eyes looking at her as no man had ever looked at her before.

She overheard the two girls talking in the kitchen. "It looks like a case ——" "Oh, surely not. You know Tiger. All the same, it might not be a bad thing. But I don't believe it can be serious ——"

The sirens wailed their dreary message as Lys prepared to go home. The man got up also.

"Don't be a fool, Tiger. It's not safe," Suzanne said sharply.

He turned and looked at her. He said something in French which Lys did not catch.

"I'm quite used to it," she said hurriedly. "Please don't bother. It's just round the corner."

He took a vast, enveloping cloak off the hall chair and threw it round him. "I am seeing you safely to your house," he said.

Out in the street the darkness fell about them like a black velvet curtain. And in the darkness he took her arm and his fingers slid down and found her hand and held it warm and close. It seemed to her like the beginning of one of those great love stories she sometimes read, like Héloïse and Abèlard—like the Chevalier de Boufflers and Madame de Sabran. They, too, had taken one look at each other, and recognized each other. Only in Lys' case the war must spoil this too.

That was the start of their whirlwind love affair, a love affair that might have been beautiful had she not known from the start that it could have no happy ending.

The second time he took her home they stood for a moment in the darkened street before the door of the rooming house. He took her face gently between his beautiful, slender hands and slowly, quietly said, "This is more happiness than I ever hoped to find. It is something I thought could never happen."

Lys said good night quickly, turned and disappeared into the house. She was shaken by the beating of her heart. He had not kissed her or tried to kiss her—and she knew that she had wanted him to.

Alone in her room, she sat on the edge of the bed. There was a raid on. She could feel the rock and jar of the bombs dropping somewhere not too far off, but it seemed of no account compared with the bomb that had dropped into her life. Many things she had been prepared for, but never this. Her first love, and she had to meet him like this, and face the fact that he was a master spy and a traitor. It can never happen to me again, she thought.

Never for a moment did she wonder if there was a way out for her. She knew there wasn't. She knew what she had to do. She sat alone in the darkness in her dingy little room, her head in her hands. She must play out her hand to the end, encourage him, lead him on until she got what she wanted from him.

And then?

It was best not to think about that.

She had been afraid, at first, that Suzanne and Colette would be angry, perhaps even jealous, at this turn of affairs. Whatever their relationship with Tiger, it was obviously not an emotional one, for they could not have been kinder about it.

"Never did I expect to see this happen. Tiger, of all people, to fall for you."

"Oh, Suzanne, I don't think it's serious," Lys said. "It's just that he is . . . kind."

Suzanne's face hardened. "Tiger is not kind," she said. "Do not make the mistake of thinking that. He is hard and ruthless, but it is always those who, when their heart is touched, have great gentleness." She looked at Lys quizzically. "It is an amazement to me, all the same, for you are not very pretty and you are so much younger. You are

NEW OUTLINE FOR FASHION

Vogue . . . the only printed pattern with no margins to cut off; the only printed pattern perforated for easier sewing and greater accuracy. Now the most wonderful clothes to wear are the easiest you can make.

Make this design No. 9247 or choose another Vogue printed pattern . . . get them now at your leading department or fabric store.

VOGUE PRINTED PATTERNS

not in any way what has always been his kind of woman, yet it appears you are the one for him. The Tiger in love—well, well, well!"

He wanted her to leave Peppi's. "I don't care for you to do such work," he told her. "I can find you other things more suitable."

She shook her head. She did not dare become more involved than she was. Besides, the restaurant had become almost a refuge.

"Then I shall lunch and dine there daily and keep an eye on you," he said.

Peppi was delighted. "Very big man. Very important," he told her, polishing glasses and keeping one eye on the alcove where Tiger sat.

"Why is he important? What does he do?" Lys asked because she wondered if Peppi had any part in what was going on, how much he knew. He looked vague, obviously knowing nothing at all.

"I cannot say what he does, but everyone hasa for him much respect." Peppi picked up the limp menu card and hurried across to the alcove. "Yes, sir. Coming, sir."

Presently he was back. "You lucky girl. He wanta talk with you. I thinka he lika you."

He came every night when he was in town for a late dinner. Usually by that time the other customers had gone and the blackout was over the windows. Peppi laid covers for two, and made them an omelet or fricassee of veal, only it wasn't veal. A few enchanted hours Lys had in the small, stuffy restaurant, the shaded lights only half revealing them to each other. A little while to watch his thin, aristocratic face outlined against Peppi's dingy tapestry, to feel his warm hand closing over hers, to walk back at night wrapped warm and safe in his cloak—to pretend her love story was real and would last forever.

Now and again, with a twinge of uneasiness, she wondered, Is he, too, playing a game, and cleverer at it than I? But in her heart she knew it was not so. She had succeeded in her job beyond her wildest expectations and never in her life had she been so desperately unhappy.

"I don't even know your real name," she told him one evening. "'Tiger' isn't a proper name."

"No. It was the name they gave me at school. Does it surprise you to know I went to Eton?"

"Nothing surprises me any more," she said soberly.

He seemed to consider for a moment. Then he took a blank card from his pocket and carefully wrote something on it and handed it to her.

"Comte Abélard de Charno," she read and the words swam before her eyes.

"Now you know something," he said whimsically, "that a great many people would give a great deal to know." He took the card

S S S S S S S

We should live, act and say nothing to the injury of anyone.

ROBERT E. LEE

S S S S S S S

back and tore it into small pieces and made a little pyre of them and set a light to it in the ash tray.

"Why me?" she asked brokenly. "You must have known so many beautiful women."

"Why do these things happen? Who can say? The first time I saw you standing there, looking very surprised—like a wood nymph in dingy Soho—my heart said, 'This is the one,' and my heart has never said that before. That was my enchanted evening." And he added, half to himself, "It was very strange."

"I wish you had never done this kind of work—whatever it is. I hate it."

"Yes. I could easily be placed against a wall and made to face a nasty little row of guns. But the excitement I like and England I hate and hope to see destroyed. Never mind. When it is finished you shall come to me and we will start a new life together—all this will be forgotten. I will tell you something. At this moment I am close to the thing I wish most to discover. Only one small piece of the puzzle is missing. Very ingenious, these English are, but perhaps they will discover that their great surprise is not so much of a surprise after all."

Peppi, leaning against the cash desk, watched them respectfully and remembered his own youth and loves and the blue skies of Italy. Far away.

"Perhaps he marry you," he said to Lys next morning as they laid out the tables together.

"I don't think he will marry me," she said sadly.

Tiger was going up north. They dined together at Peppi's after hours for the last time. Only he did not know it was for the last time. They walked through the starlit streets slowly, postponing their parting. There was no raid on. They went through the yard of the bombed-out church and sat for a little while on a wooden seat there. The altar gleamed through the darkness, its brightness intact. Lys shivered violently.

"You are cold?" he asked anxiously.

"No. I hate this so," she told him. "I don't want you to go. Please, please always remember this, will you—that I did not want you to go?"

He laughed softly. "I will remember it always, but you must not be sad. I am about to make the discovery I came for, to learn for what reason they make these great concrete blocks and hide them so carefully. If I succeed, as I expect to, it will be a great triumph. And I like triumphs very much. For a little while, my darling, I shall not see you, for what I have to do must be done very fast. As soon as it is possible, I will come back."

"I shall never forget you," she said, her face wet with tears, and knew that it was true.

Suddenly she got up, her knees trembling. "Please go," she whispered. "Now. It is best like this. I would rather you went now and left me here."

He caught her hands and would have pulled her to him, but she drew back. She did not know how she managed it, but she did. "Please," she repeated, "please go ——"

She had turned so that she need not look at him. Then she heard the sound of his footsteps dying in the distance. Blindly she went in the ruined church and knelt before the alta trying to pray but finding no words, becau e was a spy and a traitor and there was not ng to be done about it.

Then she went to headquarters and turn him in.

She was in hospital nearly three month "Complete breakdown," the doctors sai "Whatever the job was she was doing, it h been too much for her."

At headquarters they disagreed. "She shou never have been allowed to undertake it—b she pulled it off! A fine piece of work. If sl had stayed on with us she'd have gone rig to the top."

Lys had shaken her head when they to her. I couldn't do that kind of work any mor she thought. Not ever again! All I want is som thing nice and quiet. An office job or may something in a hospital where they won't l likely to look for me.

Her late chief came to see her, bearing small, tight bunch of roses. He was shocke at her drained and exhausted appearanc Something must have happened, he though that she hasn't told us about. Something we wrong.

He took with him the false papers, the fake identity card and forged passport. "Now yo can be yourself again," he told her. "They' given you a good bonus as well as the Geor medal. You would have had a promotion, to if you had stayed on. But I think myself yo are wise to chuck it." He was really concern over her appearance. "Have a fresh hairdo he said, patting her arm. "Buy yourself a ne outfit and send us the bills. Forget the lot them."

"But will they forget me?" she asked.

"The women are in prison and will be d ported. The man made a dash for France, b the ship he was on was torpedoed. It is u likely he escaped. All the same, I'm going t give you a letter and a private telephone nun ber, just in case. If you ever have the slighte suspicion that you are being watched or fo

FIRMER "Health Center" SUPPORT

IS THE REASON

you get up feeling wonderful!

Spring Air mattress pattern shows extra-firm "Health Center" section where 70% of your weight lies

People who own Spring Air "Health Center" Mattresses step out of bed sparklingly refreshed.

What makes them sleep well? Extra firmness across the mattress mid-section (where 70% of the body weight lies)! This extra firmness keeps them on a level surface—the only way a person can totally relax! Spring Air calls this exclusive feature the "Health Center." You can easily locate it by the change in pattern coloring.

Like to get up feeling wonderful? Try a Spring Air "Health Center" Mattress and you will!

Spring Air "Health Center" Mattresses and Box Springs suggested retail prices —from $69.50 each. Also, in foam rubber and king sizes.

SPRING AIR "Health Center" Mattress

Write for FREE booklet, "All The Secrets Of Sound, Healthful Sleep."

THE SPRING AIR COMPANY

Dept. 530, 666 Lake Shore Drive • Chicago 11, Ill.

Copyright 1957—The Spring Air Company

lowed or hear anything you think we should know, get in touch at once. It's unlikely, but we'll leave nothing to chance."

After he had gone she lay with closed eyes, trying to stop the tears that forced their way through her eyelids. Tiger dead! Never again to see him standing with his head thrown back, his eyes filled with the look that was for her alone. Tender and kind. Never to meet those eyes across a table in candlelight or to know again a thousand little moments indelible in her memory. Why had it had to happen like this?

Even as she tried to realize what had happened, she could not believe it. Tiger could not be dead. He would appear again someday. He must. Never mind what they said at headquarters. Tiger who got his own way in everything wasn't likely to be dead unless it suited him.

Lys was the neat, slim, tailored girl she had been of old. The last of the red-gold dye was washed away from her hair and the permanent grew out. She wore her sleek, dark hair long, in a knot at the back of her head. She no longer looked younger than her age. The matron of St. Patrick's Hospital, where she went as a nurse's aide, was surprised to hear she was only twenty-one.

It was early spring when she went to St. Patrick's. Shattered laburnum blossoms were blown wetly about the streets, and excitement was in the air, running high everywhere along with men's hopes. The patients at St. Patrick's were mostly old people, maternity cases and mundane complaints. It was a quiet life, as hospital life goes. They laughed at her at first because she was so scared. Scared to go out alone (for in those early days she was always expecting a hand on her arm, a voice in her ear). She had an anxious, fearful way of peering at the beds when new patients came in.

"As though," said the sister in charge, who was Irish, "she expects to find Old Nick himself lying there."

"She's been through a bad time," the matron said. "Go easy on her, Kathleen."

"Well, so have most of us been through some bad times," said the sister in charge. She had herself been dug out of debris twice.

Lys had been awarded the George medal for gallantry, courage and devotion to duty in face of considerable personal danger, and she could never abide the sight of the thing. She threw it into a drawer and forgot it.

The months went by, brought full spring, brought early summer, and V-E Day and V-J Day, and none of Lys' private fears were realized.

Time went on and presently the days were better. One does not forget, only it becomes easier to remember. And now she knew that what she had done was right, that there had been no other possible course open to her. Tiger had been a spy and a traitor, belonging to the limbo of war that was now over.

The tall slim girl who went about the wards, neat and quick and efficient, bore no resemblance whatever to Laurel Jones. Meeting her late chief once in the Strand, she had to speak to him before he recognized her.

He laughed and patted her shoulder. "You've nothing to worry about," he said. "There's not a chance of anyone recognizing you, even if there had been anyone left to do it."

But she kept the letter and the telephone number he had given her. Even after the horror had faded and memory no longer hurt her so much and the war was done.

Bands played in the streets. Tattered flags fluttered in the summer breeze. The war was over.

Paper chains and red, white and blue flowers, kept for the visits of royalty, lay in a heap in the middle of the ward. Someone had sent in armfuls of flowers from the country.

"We're going to be the smartest ward in St. Patrick's," said the little probationers. The convalescent patients and walking cases lent a hand.

"Don't let Mr. Troad stretch," said the ward sister. "He has only just had his stitches out."

Mr. Troad was a large, lumbering sort of man, so ugly you thought at first it simply couldn't be true. Nature had played every unkind joke with his face but had atoned for it with a pair of the kindest, most trustful blue eyes. In his overzealous longing to be helpful, Mr. Troad was a great nuisance.

"Now, Mr. Troad, you heard what sister said," Lys called to him firmly, as she saw him about to climb on a chair. "No stretching." Lys had been his nurse and his eyes followed her with the loving regard of a dog, touching and faithful. "Sit down, and we'll call if we want you," Lys told him.

He picked up a newspaper and sat down to read it, from time to time putting it down on his knee to watch Lys hanging chains and rosettes. Presently, to encourage him, she gave him a hammer and a saucer full of tacks and let him nail up some of the paper flowers.

"Here's a hammer," she said.

"Hammer?" said Mr. Troad. "I need no hammer. Here you are. Look at this. I invented it myself. Knocks in nails or takes them out again. Opens bottles. Absolutely marvelous. Always carry it with me. Couldn't have got through life without it." Mr. Troad set happily to work, first knocking a bottle of medicine off a locker onto the floor.

Lys picked up the newspaper from the bed where he had laid it. She was about to replace it on the locker when something caught her eye. A familiar doorway, flanked by two lanky rhododendrons in wooden tubs. The doorway in which she and Peppi had stood so often on hot summer nights when the asphalt of the footpaths was soggy with heat.

"Scene of the Tragedy," said the caption.

Putting one hand against the wall to steady herself, Lys read on. "Soho restaurant keeper found dead at the foot of cellar steps. . . . Broken neck and multiple head injuries. It is thought he may have fallen in the dark. . . . The police are making inquiries, but foul play is not suspected ——"

Lys swallowed convulsively, feeling dizzy. Peppi would never have fallen down his own

WASH BACK THAT FRESH, NEW LOOK

Woolite started the rejuvenation of cashmeres and woolens. It is the cold water soap that keeps them bright and youthful, without shrinking and without matting. You don't even have to block them. Woolite is recommended by famous woolen wear makers, on their washing instruction tags.

You'll find that Woolite does the same wonderful things for synthetics, blends, and for silks and cottons, too. Per washing, it costs about 3 cents.

As soon as you can, we suggest you get some Woolite at a department or specialty store, or wherever woolens are sold. Also available in the 20-packet Travel Pack.

The Miracle Cold Water Soap

WOOLITE

made by the makers of Lastic Life, the golden cold water soap for elastic garments

THE ONE COLD WATER SOAP WITH THE SEAL OF QUALITY OF THE UNITED STATES TESTING COMPANY

Woolite, Incorporated, 10614 Riverside Drive, North Hollywood, California. 509 Madison Avenue, New York. 11054 South Michigan Avenue, Chicago.

B&M does something wonderful to beans!

For hours and hours B&M Brick Oven Baked Beans are baked in a rich and golden brown sugar sauce with lots of tender selected pork. Only this slow oven baking in real brick ovens gives these special beans their "home-baked" flavor. Serve them to your family soon and often!

B&M brick oven
BAKED BEANS
SEALED OVEN-HOT IN BOTH GLASS JARS AND TINS
BURNHAM & MORRILL CO., Portland, Maine

They're Extra Good With B & M Brown Bread

cellar steps. He knew them like the back of his own hand. She felt again the iron grip of Suzanne's fingers about her wrist and heard Suzanne's voice in her ears: "To be a traitor to us is very dangerous." But Peppi was no traitor. Fat, good-natured Peppi, who knew nothing whatever about her or her assignment, had had to die just the same. This meant that headquarters was wrong, she thought, panicking. They hadn't rounded the whole gang up. Someone was still around.

Next time, thought Lys, it will probably be me. The ward darkened suddenly. It began to swim oddly before her eyes. The ward sister, looking up from her job of administering a potion to someone, said, "Halliday is going to faint. Catch her, someone."

Mr. Troad obliged, more adroitly than might have been expected.

Lys' faint was put down to overwork and she was given a day off. "Get out into the sun," said the ward sister.

She sat on the grass in the park near the hospital, watching children play and lovers hold hands, and tried to persuade herself that Peppi's accident might have been an accident—only she knew very well that it wasn't. She shuddered, trying to put the picture out of her mind.

A long shadow fell over her. A pair of feet stopped beside her. She froze, afraid to look up, her heart standing still. This is it, she thought. It was only Mr. Troad, let out for his first gentle exercise, wearing a deplorable bottle-green suit which made him look like Froggy-would-awooing-go. He lowered himself carefully to the grass beside her.

"How nice—how very nice to find you here," he said. "One feels strangely lost after a spell in a hospital. Like a man from the moon. However, one must face up to it and get back to the old life as soon as possible. Can't afford to be away, now that everything will be starting up again."

"And what exactly was the old life?" Lys asked. She found it difficult to fit Mr. Troad into any profession.

"Did you never hear of Troad's Tours?"

"Of course," she said to please him, but she never had.

He had started just before war broke out as a small travel agency, but even at that uneasy moment it had gone well. He sent people round in motor coaches. Fumbling in one of his pockets, he produced a brochure.

"Out of date now, of course, but I'll get going in no time. Troad's Tours Take You. What do you think of that for a slogan?"

Lys said she thought it was wonderful.

"A fortune—that's what I'll make. In no time. You'll see." He smiled at her. When he smiled some of the ugliness went from his face and he had an oddly wistful boyish look.

In some odd way he reminded Lys of Peppi when he told her of his plans and dreams. A fleet of cream-and-blue coaches. Tours to distant places for people who had never been there before. Tours for rich Americans too.

"That's the market to aim for," he said. He gave a keen look at her. "Wish you'd join me. Why don't you? Money in it. We need guides, drivers, hostesses and all. Can't get reliable people these days for love or money."

She did not answer his question directly. "It will be better now the war is over."

"I don't know. Folks have changed. I wish you'd come. Pay you well. Office up in Hampstead. Hospital work is much too hard for you; anyone can see that. Fainting the way you did no good at all. Change of job, that's what you want."

Hampstead, she thought. Well off the beaten track. Far from Soho. She said, "I'll think it over."

Six months later she went to see him. Things had obviously been marching with Mr. Troad. The entire front window of his office on Hampstead Hill was filled by an enormous poster. It showed a large, luxurious coach in cream and blue and gold, taking a load of smiling people toward a highly colored citadel in which the architecture of all nations appeared to be jumbled together in one grand ragout. Churches jostled mosques and minarets.

Mr. Troad was so delighted to see her, so persuasive, that she took the job he offered almost before she realized what she was doing.

"Splendid, my dear girl. Splendid! Now let me show you round."

He gave Lys a small office to herself next door to his, but she spent quite a lot of time downstairs, lending a hand to Miss Joad and Miranda. Troad's was a very friendly office.

It wasn't the life she had thought of for herself, and at first she told herself it was only marking time until she found something more suitable. But presently she gave up all thought of changing. Mr. Troad was amenable and easygoing up to a point, and after all, she knew the worst about him. He was kind, and wouldn't be the sort to make passes at a girl.

The years went by quietly. Four years—five years. Mr. Troad made Lys a partner in the firm, which was doing splendidly. She no longer awoke crying in the night for what might have been. She never thought about Tiger any more. She had come to accept the belief that headquarters had been right when they said he was dead.

Mr. Troad was making a fortune, though he had accumulated ulcers on the way. It had all fallen out just as he had said it would. Everyone wanted to visit England's beauty spots in luxurious coaches and Mr. Troad took them there at an inclusive fee. He also sent them to Venice, to the Dolomites, and he was at that moment compiling a brochure setting forth the allurements of Greece. Meantime, the high spot of the season was a luxury tour to the château country and the walled cities of Brittany for a party of American tourists.

He is the best physician who is the most ingenious inspirer of hope.

COLERIDGE

"Mostly widows. Spending their husbands' insurance money," said Mr. Troad. "That's the market you want to get!"

The trouble, as always, was labor. Staff was hard to come by, and troublesome and inefficient when you got it. Miss Joad remained a tower of strength in the downstairs office. The little typist, Miranda, was doing well enough, though she was unreliable on the telephone. For the tour of the château country and the walled cities of Brittany Mr. Troad had put on his best driver, an Irishman called Mike, and their most alluring guide, a Pole named Mr. Petchek, who knew France. Mr. Troad had taken a lot of touble briefing him, and as far as one could tell, Petchek welcomed the prospect.

So it came as a complete surprise when Lys found a slip of paper on her desk one afternoon. In silence she handed it to Miss Joad.

"Oh, dear—trouble again."

Miss Joad read it and whistled. "You'd best tell him, dear. You manage him better than any of us."

Lys read the message again as she switched on the electric kettle and waited for it to boil. It struck her Mr. Troad might take the bad news better with a nice cup of tea. It wasn't really her job to make the office tea; it was Miranda's job, being youngest, but Miranda was off on an errand somewhere.

Mr. Troad's ulcers had made him more short-tempered than of old, and he was rapidly going bald. He had the air of rising out of his hair, like a bather emerging from the surf. He was given to shouting—and a conviction that the world was against him, and often, thought Lys, it looked as if it might be. He shouted now.

"Gone? What do you mean, he's gone? He can't be. He is coming to see me at four o'clock. Don't be silly, my dear girl."

"He left this note on my desk."

Mr. Troad groaned and buried his face in his hands. "Read it. Read it. I never could make anything of the fellow's writing anyway."

Mr. Petchek had never been a tidy man. He always looked vaguely crumpled and dirty, and his note was just like him. He had not bothered to put it into an envelope. He had nply laid it on her desk, the paper mussed d looking as if it had gone around for some ne in his pocket and had been used for her things before it became a note at all.

"It just says, 'Good-by, chaps. Over to you. will get me to the island valley of Avalon, ere to heal me of my grievous wounds.'"

Mr. Troad stared at her. "But he can't say st that when he's walking out on us!"

"That's just what he's said," Lys told him tiently.

"This is ridiculous! I never heard anything e it. Avalon, Avalon; where is that? And nat's all this about wounds? No one told me tchek got wounded. Why wasn't I told?"

"It's a quotation," said Lys, and did not ld from Tennyson, as she thought it doubtful hether Mr. Troad had ever heard of Tenny-n. "What he means is he is fed up and clear-g off. It was probably that last tour with the rth-country businessmen that did it. He uldn't understand anything they said."

"So the moment he can't understand what meone says, he quits, not caring how much convenience he causes. It's preposterous!"

He sank back in his chair, his voice drop-ng to normal. "What on earth are we to do, ys? There must be dozens of chaps would mp at the job—well paid, driving round the âteau country on a foam-rubber seat with a t of rich widows. There must be someone in is city who would jump at the chance."

"If we could only find them."

"Why don't you take it on yourself? You uld do it easy."

"The brochure says 'Male escort accom-anies throughout.' Can't you imagine what our American ladies would say when they und they were merely being escorted by nother woman? If you like, I'd go along and nd a hand on this trip—since there is so lit-e time to brief anyone you managed to find."

"You'd do that? It might make all the dif-erence. I'll think it over. Avalon—most pre-osterous thing I ever heard of. Terrible llow."

He was still firing off "terrible fellows" when ys quietly closed the door behind her.

"How did he take it?" asked Miss Joad. She loved a bit of excitement.

"Not very well. There isn't much time to find a substitute."

Mr. Troad came in with a newspaper. "Here we are. Very thing. Might be exactly the chap we are looking for. Read it. Read it."

Lys read it out aloud: "'Ex naval officer, retired, seeks open-air job for health reasons. Go anywhere. Do anything. Good appearance. Languages. Refs.' . . . Health reasons?" She raised her eyebrows doubtfully.

"Don't look for trouble," said Mr. Troad. "I'll get hold of the fellow at once."

From the beginning Lys was conscious of a curious presentiment about Lt. Rory Mallory. A door was opening, something was starting. It seemed, for one thing, a risk taking on anyone come by through one of those personal advertisements.

His letter to Mr. Troad was ordinary enough, and plausible enough: "I have been out of the world for three years, and am now advised to lead an open-air life, at any rate for a time until I find my feet again. May I please have further particulars? Your job interests me."

Out of the world. What exactly did that mean?

"Go on. Read on, my dear girl," said Mr. Troad impatiently. "He's had t.b. and just been discharged cured. Not served a prison sentence, as you appear to think. He's enclosed a whole batch of references. I believe this is our man."

Lys had a sort of hunch, also, but she was not at all sure about it.

"We must get in touch with him at once. Arrange an interview."

The moment he saw Lieutenant Mallory, Mr. Troad knew that he would do, and that his hunch had been right. The young man was tall and very thin, with hollow cheeks and a slightly concave figure. His pleasant, plain face was a sailor's face, and he had managed to keep, through all setbacks, that boyish look sailors so often have.

But the marks of his illness were still on him. He had a nervous way of passing a hand over his hair when he was bothered or discouraged. He had not felt at all optimistic about landing Mr. Troad's job. He was certain that the ugly man with the peculiar name would turn him down. He was wrong. Mr. Troad lit the electric fire for him, sent out for coffee and sandwiches, and offered him a fortnight's pay in advance.

When Lys came in Lieutenant Mallory looked up at her anxiously. He had had a qualm when Mr. Troad said, "I must, of course, consult my partner," for he thought the partner might not pass him so easily. He hardly knew what he had expected, certainly not this tall, pale girl with the sleek dark hair and pretty eyes. His spirits rose.

For the next hour they sat watching Mr. Troad's happy pencil take a tour of the château country and the walled cities of Brittany, and listening to his unending spate of conversation. Through vineyards and along riverbanks he took them into Brittany, to Dinan and Mont-Saint-Michel, and then he had to go and get a drink of water.

"Does he always talk so much?" Rory asked.

"Always," said Lys. She was thankful to note that the young man appeared to be quick in the uptake. The few questions he had asked had been sensible ones. Maybe there won't be any need for me to go along at all, she thought. If he has navigated a destroyer half round the world, he should be able to manage a coachful of widows round France.

Mr. Troad, however, thought otherwise. "Well, there you are. That's the route. Lys here, my partner, has said she is willing to go along and show you the ropes, as you've come into things rather at the eleventh hour. She'll be a great help to you, I know. Most capable. Sometimes there is rather a difficulty in allotting rooms."

Rory thought Lys looked extremely capable, but he wished she was a little more friendly.

The coaches Mr. Troad supplied for his Continental tours were the last word in luxury. Rory stood watching the luggage being loaded onto the roof where it was covered with a navy-blue tarpaulin, nicely curved like a stockbroker's waistcoat. Each passenger had two suitcases and a handbag, all apparently filled with lead nuggets. Rory had watched this growing mound with astonishment. Why should anyone need so much that was so heavy on a fourteen days' trip?

He could see Lys greeting the passengers as they turned up by car or taxi, chatting with the loquacious ones, cheering the timid ones, and he wondered why he had ever thought her forbidding. Certainly she had a cool, rather aloof manner, but in the past ten days he had come to like it. She wore the uniform Mr. Troad had personally designed for his lady guides, blue with silver buttons and a saucy peaked cap, and her hair was loose about her face and less severe than usual. There had been one bad moment when Rory half thought Mr. Troad would want to put him into fancy dress also, but it passed.

"Ordinary clothes for the male guide," said Mr. Troad. "Tweed coat. Flannels. Anything you have."

Rory turned to look over his passengers. They appeared to him all exactly alike, sisters in a family of twenty-five. They were all middle-aged, wearing good suits, and pearls that were probably real, and their immaculately dressed hair was slightly blued. Only Mrs. Chubb was candidly plump and slightly untidy-looking, and for some reason he warmed to her at sight. Mike, the driver, was already in his seat. He chewed gum and, catching Rory's eye, winked at him.

The ladies clambered in, each making for the seat of her choice, when a sudden outburst of loud voices came from the office. Mr. Troad appeared, obviously harassed, accompanied by the passenger they had been waiting for. Mrs. Maitland, an Englishwoman, had booked at the last moment. Now that she had arrived, she wasn't alone. She had with her

CONTINUED ON PAGE 139

Save time, money... starch in an INSTANT

And Niagara® Starch gives you perfect results for only 1¢ a quart*

You'll love the ease of making Instant Niagara Starch. Just swish it in cold water ... it's ready! Dissolves instantly ... stays dissolved. No white spots or streaks.

Gives a wonderful "like-new" look to all your cottons. So thrifty ... makes a quart of medium starch for a penny! Instant Niagara saves time, saves work ... gives results beyond compare. Try it.

*Medium Starch Solution

Niagara® Instant Starch

Produced by Corn Products Refining Co.

"In 5 minutes...dinner with a magic Italian touch"

When it's dinnertime in Orvieto—or at home—you can enjoy Italian cooking at its best. At your house—just call on Chef Boy-Ar-Dee to do the cooking.

Any fine chef will tell you it takes an experienced hand to prepare the dishes you enjoy at an Italian cafe . . . and one savory forkful tells you this same special skill goes into the making of Chef Boy-Ar-Dee Spaghetti and Meat Balls.

The delicious, slow-simmered sauce combines the reddest, juiciest tomatoes, cheese and onions, all spiced to perfection by a skilled Italian hand.

The plump meat balls are formed from pure beef, browned outside to seal in the juices. And, of course, the spaghetti itself is the thin Italian kind, cooked to just the right degree of tenderness.

This flavorful dish is a favorite right around the table. Chef Boy-Ar-Dee Spaghetti and Meat Balls is ready to heat in cans of 2 or 5 servings each. Just 13¢ a portion.

Why not get a can (or several) today. Bring a real taste of Italy to your table this very evening.

real Italian-style CHEF BOY-AR-DEE® Spaghetti and Meat Balls tall young man with a good bit of flaxen air like flat hay. He had his hands full of honey which he seemed to be trying to give o Mr. Troad, who did not seem to want it.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 137

"But I tell you I did book for him. Two places, I said quite definitely in my last letter. One for my nephew, Alec Strong, the well-known motor racer. If you would look in your files you will certainly find the letter——"

"There is no time to look in my files, madam," said Mr. Troad. "The coach is just off. Mr. Strong can go, provided his papers are in order. There is room for him, but I warn you——"

He left her abruptly and beckoned to Rory. "What do you think? I've never heard of the fellow. Know anything about him?"

"He looks inoffensive enough, and we've two spare seats."

"O.K. But look out for that woman. Every trip has its troublemaker, and she's the one. Keep clear of her and stand no nonsense."

Rory took a look at the waiting Mrs. Maitland. She wore a mackintosh, a black beret and stout shoes. He felt he could handle her all right.

They were off. For the first time for three long years and a bit Rory Mallory was aware of a sense of well-being. He caught Lys' eye and smiled at her, and she smiled back and his heart began to beat suddenly in a new and pleasurable fashion. He had once again a feeling he had often had as a young man—of something pleasant coming nearer and nearer, and a complete absence of worry. He could hardly believe in his own good fortune.

He stole another look at Lys. She sat in a single seat opposite him across the gangway. Her long eyelashes made a tender little shadow on her cheek. In repose her face, he thought, was oddly sad for anyone so young, and he wondered what life had done to make her look that way. She would have been just growing up in the war and he knew what had happened to lots of girls who grew up then.

"You must tell me if there is anything I ought to do," he said. "It's new country to me, and I expect you've done it often before."

"I've helped out sometimes with home tours, but never abroad. It's not really my job, only these days one has to be prepared to turn a hand to anything in an emergency."

"What was this particular emergency?"

She told him about Mr. Petchek and the Island Valley of Avalon and, unlike Mr. Troad, he had heard of the place before, which was cheering, for if you have to travel with someone for fourteen days it is pleasant to feel he knows what you are talking about.

The sea was satin smooth, scattered with fish scales of silver. With the menace of seasickness removed, the ladies settled themselves about the decks in the sunshine. Mrs. Maitland's nephew leaned on the after rail with Mike, the driver, apparently giving him good advice.

"You know what?" Mike said aside to Rory. "That guy knows everything."

The coach, parked aft, looked like a country cottage. Rory joined Lys and they stood side by side, waiting for France.

"Is his name really Troad?"

"I believe so. Why shouldn't it be?"

"It's so odd. I wondered if it was a name taken for business purposes, the sort of thing sometimes done."

Over the years Laurel Jones' face appeared suddenly before Lys, who hadn't thought of her for a long time. What made her remember just now? she wondered uneasily. Maybe it was coming to France. In the heat haze, the coast was already beginning to form and solidify like the start of a fairy tale. . . . What a long way I've come since those days, she thought.

"Last time I was here I had to swim for it," Rory was saying. "They blew us up just along there. It was a lovely day, just like this."

They were joined by Mrs. Chubb, looking wind-blown, her hair soft about her face, so that they saw a glimpse of the pretty girl she had once been.

"We certainly have been real fortunate in our weather and I can't tell you how I am looking forward to the trip. I reckon it is going to be something to remember all my days. And for you two young people, why, it must be heaven. Romance against such a background. Don't waste a moment of it."

Rory said solemnly, "I personally don't intend to, but I'm not certain about Miss Halliday."

Farther along the deck Alec Strong had collected a knot of ladies and was giving them a lecture on the coast of France. "He should be the guide, not me," said Rory ruefully.

"Let him alone—he likes to be important," Lys laughed. They watched the ship maneuvered alongside the quay, and the wave of blue-clad porters surge aboard.

"You do the baggage, Rory. I'll collect the ladies," she told him. His heart gave a pleasurable lift. It was more than three years since any woman had used his Christian name.

Twilight was beginning to fall when at last they were off through the flax fields and the mustard fields of France. A small new moon like a golden eyelash hung high in a cloudless sky, promising pleasant weather. Lys had moved over the gangway and now shared a double seat with Rory, aware that the feel of his shoulder against her own was pleasant and companionable.

Lys sat very still, oddly at peace, her hands in her lap. Rory had a crazy longing to take one of them in his own and looked away, studying the night sky, because it was too soon, far too soon. It wasn't the time to tell her how desperately he needed a little kindness, a little companionship and love, but with growing confidence he felt that the time would come.

Their first night was spent in a typically French family hotel and, though a little taken aback at the plumbing arrangements, the ladies were ecstatic over the atmosphere. Only Mrs. Chubb seemed at first inclined to be a little awkward and went round moaning, "I sure did look to get a toilet to myself."

At breakfast next morning everyone was in high spirits. The weather held. The great cream-and-blue coach lumbered through narrow lanes, and under medieval portcullises. Sometimes alone, occasionally joining up with other parties, the ladies were escorted down endless corridors and through great rooms filled with faded tapestries and beautiful furniture, and all the complicated domestic arrangements of bygone days.

They did two châteaux the first day. One was lovely and sunlit, looking out over neat vineyards, but the other was cold and dark, with a brooding, evil atmosphere. Here the guide proudly pointed out a trap door which, opened, led to the dungeons, and the endless sound of the river running underground far below.

"This was a very good place for disposing of enemies," he informed them. Lys shivered and it seemed to her that the long passages were haunted with the sad, thin ghosts of those who had met their fate in this uncomfortable fashion.

"I would hate to have to spend a night here," she said, but the ladies thought it wonderful. Such atmosphere. Only Mrs. Chubb said it was creepy and, like Lys, was glad to get out into the sunshine again.

The countryside was placid and beautiful. Small white farms stood among apple orchards which spread away from the road. They lunched luxuriously at a hotel, bought souvenirs and then drove off to their next halt down a long white road between lines of poplars straight as drilled soldiers.

Contrary to Mr. Troad's predictions, Mrs. Maitland, apart from looking permanently disapproving, gave no trouble. She took the rooms allotted to her, and did not complain about the food. It was Alec, her nephew, who was tiresome. There was always something wrong.

"These fire precautions," he said. "Have you given any thought at all to them? My dear chap, should fire break out, my aunt, in the room she has, would be burned to death."

Rory had gone with him into the lower regions of the hotel where they spent the night, to inspect. It was true enough. Fire precautions in most hotels in France are nonexistent. Rory stroked his chin, and said one could only hope fire would not break out.

"Rather casual, aren't you, my dear chap?" Alec said coldly, "I would have thought part of your job was to look after such things."

"And build fire escapes?" asked Rory amiably, but Alec was not amused. To Mrs. Maitland's credit it must be said she accepted the prospect of roasting with calm and when her nephew continued to point out her grim danger, she smoothed him down.

The trip had suddenly taken on for Rory a rosy glow, so that he begrudged the passing of every day. He had never thought of falling in love again, but he had fallen in love, and his heart was filled with longing and with all the old dreams. A house of one's own and a dear companion. What more had a man any right to ask of life? If he did this job satisfactorily, perhaps Mr. Troad might give him something permanent. Life, that had to him so recently seemed hopeless, was suddenly lit with possibilities.

He stole a look at Lys' gentle profile outlined against the apple blossoms and the blue of the sky. He thought, growing cold at the prospect, Perhaps she already loves someone. But she did not look like a girl happy in love. Perhaps she had once loved someone and lost him in the war. That would be bad enough, but not too bad, for it would mean there was a chance for him. Deep in his heart something told Rory there was hope for him. Maybe sometime during this trip there would be a chance to talk to her, to find out about her all he wanted to know so badly.

Their next château loomed up ahead of them. It stood high, apparently in the middle of a lake, and Mike had to maneuver his great bus over a narrow bridge and into a wide, courtyard. Another party had already drifted in and stood waiting in the great hall where a handsome, olive-faced young guide was peddling post cards.

"Thank goodness, this isn't such a gloomy one," Lys said, standing back to look at the towers and turrets outlined against the sky. One side of the château rose up out of the lake, its windows looking out onto the water with its swans and lily pads. A flock of white tumbler pigeons cascaded from one of the towers, beautiful against the cloudless sky.

The guide commenced his duties, speaking in perfect English. He took them through great galleries full of pictures, through salons hung with Gobelin tapestries, one room opening into another in bewildering fashion. It would be easy to get lost in here, thought Lys, keeping an eye on Mrs. Chubb, who was apt to wander off absent-mindedly.

"Does anyone live here? I mean really live?" someone asked.

"Monsieur le Comte comes from time to time to inspect his vineyards and attend to business matters," said the young man. "The private apartments are not on view, however. They are in the other wing of the château, over the lake."

He changed the subject to speak of a famous love story. In other days Madame de Sabran and the Chevalier de Boufflers had passed some of their time here at the start of their famous romance. He had been one of the Knights of Malta, and had taken the vow of celibacy before he met her. He could not marry her, for if he left the order he was without means, and she was a woman of wealth. Not until thirty long years had passed and the horrors of the revolution had come and gone were they able to marry.

"And you mean," said Mrs. Chubb, "he was faithful to her all that time?"

"It is possible that in the flesh he was not faithful to her, madam, but in the spirit and in his heart there was never anyone else."

A murmur of sympathy rustled the party like wind over a field of corn. It was the love every woman dreamed of, the sort of unfaithfulness every woman is ready to forget. Lys stood looking out the heavily barred windows, over the sunny fields of France where once those two had walked hand in hand. Turning suddenly, she found Rory looking at her across the room, with a look no woman misreads.

How foolish I was, all those years, she thought, to imagine that, because of that one time, it was finished for me. She had told herself she had done with romance once and for all, that she would never put herself in the way of being so hurt again. But this was different. This wasn't going to hurt The old hot, sweet emotion filled her, that she had never thought to feel again. It was as if his heart called to her over the great, dusty, too magnificent room "Where?" and her heart answered him "Here."

The party streamed back into the great hall, politely thanked the guide, and went out into the sun again.

As they clambered aboard the bus someone said, "Where is Elaine? I want to show her this cute little ash tray I bought. Have you seen Elaine?"

It was then they discovered that Mrs. Chubb was missing.

REFERENCE Library

AN AMUSING IDEA

FOR THE FIRST COOL DAYS:

PLAID BLANKET JACKET

You can make this pretty jacket, with a minimum of effort and a maximum of effect, from a 36″x-50″ baby-carriage robe. (They sell, in stores throughout the country, for $4.95 and up.)

For cutting diagram and instructions, send 15c* to: Reference Library, Ladies' Home Journal, Independence Square, Philadelphia 5, Pennsylvania, and ask for Pattern No. 2637.

*Pennsylvania residents please add sales tax.

"I'll go back," Lys said. "I saw her in the long gallery just before we left. She can't be far away."

The guide had disappeared, but the big nail-studded oak door swung back easily, and Lys hurried through the hall to the long gallery. There, sure enough, happily bending over a showcase of ancient manuscripts, was Mrs. Chubb.

"Oh, my dear, you don't mean you are all waiting for me? I'm terribly sorry—but you must take a look at this. It's one of her letters, written by her own hand to the man she loved. . . . Look, you can just decipher the words 'Mon très très chere.'"

"I know. . . . It's tantalizing to have to brisk through so quickly, but they're waiting. One would need several days here to see the half of it. You must come back one day."

"I guess that is just what I shall do," said Mrs. Chubb, slipping her hand through Lys' arm.

Somewhere far off a door opened. Footsteps sounded on the parquet floor, and Lys hurried, not wanting to have to explain her return. As they entered the big, cold hall the sun went in and the light died out of the tall, narrow windows, leaving the hall full of shadows.

A man was leaning over the gallery, looking down into the hall, his hands, long and slender, folded on the stone balustrade. Beside him, standing on its hind legs, and also looking over, its long narrow face and bulging eyes distressingly human, was a thin greyhound. As the two women came out into the hall, the greyhound growled. Otherwise Lys might never have looked up.

For a moment the shock was so unnerving she half thought she was going to faint. So all along she had been right! Tiger wasn't dead. Hadn't she known that well enough, even in the days when she had wept her pillow wet mourning for him? He wasn't dead, but the fine, high-bridged nose had coarsened and thickened, the sleek dark hair was gray now at the temples. He stood looking down into the hall from which the sunshine had ebbed, saying a calming word to the dog.

It's all right, Lys thought, her heart hammering. He can't possibly have recognized me. She hurried Mrs. Chubb through the big doors and into the bus. I recognized him because he was up there in the gallery in full light, but we were in shadow, she told herself desperately. Besides, if he had recognized me, he would have said something, made some sign. But in spite of her passionate assurances to herself, her heart bumped uncomfortably, she felt a little sick.

Rory looked at her. "Anything wrong, Lys?"

She shivered, not answering.

"What is it, Lys?"

"I'll tell you sometime. Not now," she said. She sat beside him, glad of his nearness and his cleanness and his youngness, lost again in utter amazement at the girl who had once been herself.

Words she remembered reading long ago, and heartily disbelieving, came back into her mind now, fitting themselves to the tune of the rumble of the coach:

Tides do be running the whole world over.
'Twas only last June month I mind that we
Was thinking the toss and call in the breast of the lover
So everlasting as the sea.

Here's the same little fishes that spins and swim
And the moon's old gleam on the gray wet sand
And him no more to me, nor me to him
Than the wind going over my hand.

It came out of a slim blue volume of poems by a woman and Lys had thought scornfully how little the writer knew about love, but now she thought, ruefully, How much she knows!

They drove slowly down the hill through the vineyards and out onto the road again. Lys looked back at the château mirrored in its lake, a replica of it faithfully reflected in the looking-glass waters. The flat blind row of windows were closely shuttered. No one had come out onto the terrace to look after the coach. It's all right, she told herself. He didn't know me. Laurel Jones is really dead and gone.

All the same, she must think the whole thing out carefully. There was the letter they had given her at headquarters, to be used in an emergency. It was safe in her passport. It would not be a bad idea to tell Rory about it, to tell him some of the story, so that if anything did happen, he could send it along.

Surely it was foolish even to think it was serious enough for action! She would go to headquarters when she got back to England and tell them.

The hotel where they stayed that night had a restaurant gayer than anything they had struck so far. "Give them one Bohemian joint," Mr. Troad had said, "or they won't think they are getting their money's worth."

Tonight the ladies had gone all Bohemian and were loving it. A man with a concertina played dance music from a little platform. A man with a fiddle went round and, selecting diners at random, leaned sentimentally over them, pouring forth yearning music like the sauce on the fish. The place was lit with candles in bottles in best Left Bank style and a girl wearing remarkably few clothes sang songs of whose doubtful nature the ladies were blissfully unaware, as they applauded.

"I think it's just darling," said Mrs. Chubb. "I feel I really am in France."

Mrs. Maitland had selected a round table, and chosen a favored few from among the ladies as her guests. They were drinking champagne. Mostly Mrs. Maitland was very aloof, which gave to her parties an air of spurious importance.

Rory and Lys had a corner table to themselves. They had been left out, for which Rory was thankful.

"Something happened today. I knew it as soon as I saw your face, Lys. Can't you tell me?"

He waited, haunted as always by that other man, afraid that she had heard from him, or of him.

"That's why Starlac® is called the heart of milk" says Elsie, the Borden Cow

Borden's Starlac is the finest, pasteurized milk with water and fat removed. And it tastes just like what it is—the delicious heart of milk.

This modern nonfat milk mixes instantly, dissolves completely, even in ice water. Drink it and use it in all your made-with-milk recipes.

Starlac costs as little as 7¢ a quart when you buy it in the money-saving 12-quart family size. (The price is slightly higher in the smaller sizes.)

Put heart-of-milk nourishment in low-cost dishes

Pastry browns better when it's made with Starlac. Waffles made with Starlac are crisper.

Milk desserts, sauces and gravies are so much smoother when you make them with Starlac.

And every time you add Starlac to chopped meats and casseroles, you add extra nutrition.

7¢ a quart in the 12-qt. family size packages

1857 SECOND 100 YEARS

If it's Bordens, it's got to be good!

© 1957, The Borden Company

"It helps, talking about things," he said, id because he could bear it no longer, he ached over the table and took her two hands his. "Darling, darling Lys. I love you so uch. I didn't mean to tell you yet, not till we t back, but I love you so. I can't bear to see ou look sad and bothered."

All the brave speeches he had rehearsed de- rted him, and he sat there dumb.

"At least," Rory said huskily, afraid he id wrecked everything, "we can be friends."

"Dear Rory, I want a friend desperately," e said. "Something did happen today. When went back for Mrs. Chubb I saw someone—a an out of another life. So long ago and far way ——" She broke off and covered her ce with one hand.

"Was it someone you loved?" he asked.

"Someone I thought I loved very much. ong ago, when I was young and silly."

"And you love him still?"

She said passionately, "No! I hate him. hey told me he was dead and I . . . hoped he as. Oh, don't let's talk about it. It's not a retty story. One day I'll tell you."

He felt dizzy with thankfulness and relief.

"Will you do something for me?" she asked uddenly. She had remembered the letter.

"I'd do anything in the world for you."

She fished the letter out, and handed it to im. The envelope was blank, with no name or ddress on it, and heavily sealed.

"Keep this. It's addressed inside to the per- on it has to go to, if it ever has to go, and here's an address penciled inside that might elp if anything happened. Don't open it un- il—unless—I mean as long as everything is ll right."

He looked at the envelope, then at her, tartled. "Look, darling, hadn't you better ell me the whole thing?"

The human heart refuses to believe in a universe without a purpose.

KANT

"There may not be a reason. I think prob- ably there won't be. It's only if . . . something should happen—to me—then I want you to see that letter goes as soon as possible."

He stared at her blankly. "You mean some- thing might happen to you? But, for heaven's sake, Lys, what sort of a something?"

"Oh," she said, suddenly desperately flip- pant because otherwise she might have cried, 'you never know. Accidents do happen. Peo- ple get . . . run over in streets—or fall down ift shafts—or break their necks down cellar steps."

He said slowly, "I don't like this. Can't you tell me what it's all about?"

"Not now. Because it's more than probable I'm just being silly." She drew a deep breath. "You see, the thing is, I don't believe he recog- nized me, but I can't be absolutely sure."

"And you think if he did recognize you—it might mean ——"

"Oh, let's dance. Let's dance and forget it. When we get home I'll tell you the whole wretched story, and you can give me back that letter."

How right I was not to panic, she told her- self a week later. They had finished the tour of the château country and were heading for the coast and the walled cities of Brittany. Noth- ing had happened. In the bright sunshine, driving through the fields of France and along the Normandy seacoast with its flat saltings and huddled fishing villages, the haunting fear she had felt appeared ridiculous.

They had left the quiet side roads and by- ways. Buses swooped down on them from all directions with mad tootling on horns, and driving, even for Mike, who was tough, was a nerve-racking hazard. The French driving technique was unique. No one slowed down at corners. Round they swooped, often on the wrong side of the road. Even Alec Strong's nerves were shaken. A sort of rapprochement had sprung up between him and Mike, the driver, where once it had looked like open war. Alec often sat with him in the driving cab.

Now it was their last day in Normandy. The weather held and they drove slowly, partly on account of the road hazards, and partly be- cause the day's run was shorter than usual. The hotel where they planned to stay and pick up mail was only ten kilometers away.

The road ran through a forest where tall trees shut out the sun, and made a pleasant carpet of pine needles. Rory had arranged a picnic lunch. The ladies settled themselves comfortably while Mrs. Maitland, convinced she was the only person who knew how to run a picnic, unpacked the hampers haughtily. There were boiled eggs, and golden rolls filled with thinly sliced pink ham, baskets of peaches and slim bottles of golden wine, warm from the heat of the coach.

"There's a little stream down there," Rory said. "Let's use it as a wine cooler." He and Lys picked up the bottles and carried them down to the stream.

The bus with Mike sitting beside it, his shirt a pleasant flash of blue against the dark of the trees, was a little way down the road in its patch of sunshine. And suddenly Lys had the inexplicable feeling that comes to people and tells them they are not alone.

She looked up and saw, leaning over the culvert, watching them, a monk in a brown habit, girt about the middle with a white, knotted cord. He fingered it as he watched them, placid and benign.

"Where on earth did he come from?" asked Rory. "We're miles from anywhere."

"There must be a monastery somewhere about. This looks a good place for a monas- tery." She called to him gaily, "Bonjour, mon père."

He nodded and smiled at them, but did not reply. When next they looked he had gone as quietly as he had appeared.

"We dreamed him," said Lys. They were out of sight and earshot of their party, and Mike had laid him down to sleep. Rory put his arms out and drew her close to him. They

You can save a lot of calories by sweetening with Sucaryl and you can't taste the difference

WEIGHT-WATCHER'S PRUNE WHIP

½ pound dried prunes
1 cup water
1 teaspoon unflavored gelatin
1 tablespoon water
4 egg whites
2 teaspoons lemon juice
2 teaspoons Sucaryl solution

Simmer prunes in water until soft. Pit prunes, force through sieve and add juice. Soften gelatin in 1 tablespoon water; dissolve over hot water. Beat egg whites until foamy; gradually beat in gelatin, lemon juice and Sucaryl. Fold in prune pulp. Chill. Makes 6 servings.

Note: For topping, combine ¼ cup nonfat dry milk solids, ¼ cup ice water and ½ teaspoon Sucaryl in small bowl. Beat at high speed until it reaches the consistency of whipped cream.

Sucaryl makes it easier for you to watch your weight . . . by giving you wholly natural sweetness without bitter aftertaste, without one single calorie.

You use Sucaryl practically anywhere you would sugar . . . in coffee, tea or any other drink . . . on fruits and cereals. Cook with it, bake with it, any Sucaryl-sweetened dish tastes just like its sugar-sweetened twin. Sucaryl, of course, is for anyone sensibly counting calories, and for those who cannot take sugar. Your drugstore has Sucaryl in tablets or solution. Low-salt diets call for Sucaryl Calcium. Abbott Laboratories, North Chicago, Illinois and Montreal, Canada. Abbott

Get your new Sucaryl Recipe Book—free at your drug store.

Sucaryl®

Non-Caloric Sweetener—No Bitter Aftertaste

RAISE FUNDS FOR CLUBS OR GROUPS SELLING

Mitchell

CHRISTMAS CARDS

FREE SAMPLES of 11 name-imprinted Christmas cards (57 actual sample cards). 40 cards for $1.49 to 25 cards for $2.95, including family, parchment & beautiful scripture text cards.

FREE NEW Big Catalog of novel gift, household and baby items, novelties, toys & full-color literature of greeting cards, gift wrapping and stationery. Plus $4.50 worth of samples of greeting cards & gift wrappings sent on approval.

— SAMPLES ON APPROVAL—USE THIS COUPON —

MITCHELL GREETINGS CO., Dept. L-57
47 W. 7 Mile Rd. • Detroit 3, Mich.
Please rush free samples, other boxes on approval for FREE TRIAL, and full details of your easy money-making plan.

Name_____
Address_____
City_____ State_____
If writing for organization, give name_____

"Profits for Everyone Since '21"
ACT NOW! BONUS GIFT FOR EARLY ORDERS

The Shoe That's KIND To Your Troubled Feet!

Dr. Scholl's

Combines Style Distinction With Perfect Foot Ease

Sizes, Some Styles
2½ to 13
AAAAA to EEEEEEE

Dr. Scholl's Shoes are ever so kind to your feet by letting your toes have their own sweet way . . . by helping keep your arches in place and by snugly, comfortably hugging your heels. For everything your heart desires and your feet require in a shoe—it's Dr. Scholl's.

Dr. Scholl's Shoes are made in all sizes for all types of feet. Expertly fitted at Dr. Scholl's Foot Comfort® Shops in principal cities and selected Shoe and Department Stores. If not obtainable locally, write for catalog to DR. SCHOLL'S, Dept. J97, Chicago 10, Ill.

stayed that way for a long minute, letting happiness soak in, at peace. She whispered the words he had longed to hear her say:

"I love you."

Something of their happiness seemed to communicate itself to the ladies, for everyone was in high spirits during luncheon. "I can't bear to think we have only four days left," said Mrs. Chubb. "This darling place . . . I wish we could just go on driving and driving."

"The money would give out," said Alec very practically. Nobody listened to him, though the ladies turned placid polite faces to him, like gentle sheep. Some of them dozed a little in the pine-scented shadows, but at length the picnic hampers were repacked and the ladies climbed back on board.

"Did you see that old guy in petticoats back there?" said Mike. "Funnest thing I ever set eyes on. He had a motor bike—believe it or not. Tucked up his skirts and had a pair of white drawers underneath. I tried to parley-voo with him, but he didn't seem to understand. Just shook his head and went off. I never saw a monk on a motor bike before."

They drove slowly out of the wood and onto the shore road beside the saltings, where, on a flat wind-swept beach, men were digging bait. Their hotel lay in the center of the little town on a wide sweep of river spanned by a stone bridge.

They picked up the first mail they had had, a counterblast of post cards for the ladies, replies to those they had fired off from every halt, and a batch of office mail for Lys and Rory. They carried it out to the wide veranda that looked down over the river and the picturesque little town. Alec and his aunt strode briskly by, stretching their legs in a walk.

Lys opened her letter from Mr. Troad. "Oh, dear," she said, "if only he'd type it! See if you can help me make out what he says."

Mr. Troad's handwriting was of a very strange and rambling nature. If one stared at it long enough, bits became legible here and there. Presently they realized the operative word was "telephone." Someone had telephoned.

"Asking for you, as far as I can make out. Miranda took the message. No brains, that girl. Or was it a message from you and, for some reason, you were trying to reach me? We could make nothing of it, and I don't suppose it was important. At first it appeared they were trying to get in touch with some other young woman ——"

The letter roamed off into utter incoherence, and Lys did what she so often had done in the past, put it aside for further consideration when she had a spare moment. But who could have telephoned—if the word was "telephoned"? Lys dismissed it as just another of those muddles Miranda was apt to make.

There was a second note from Mr. Troad, marked "Private and Confidential," this time a business communication and, thank goodness, typed. He wanted Lys' personal view of Rory.

"If he's done a good job, we might take him on permanently. I liked the fellow. Let me know what you think of him."

"By the way, I have just had another talk with Miranda about that telephone call. She now says it wasn't for you at all. It was someone trying to get in touch with a woman named Jones. Laurel Jones, she thinks it was."

Lys sat very still, with the odd feeling of sinking slowly into a bath of ice-cold water. It crept to her knees, and up along her spine, and engulfed her heart. So that was how it was, just as she had known from the very start. In a moment of ghastly clarity she knew exactly how it had been. "Oh, no," Miranda would have answered guilelessly. "There's no one called Jones on the tour. Actually the lady guide is Miss Lys Halliday." She closed her eyes, and saw Miranda as clearly as if she were sitting beside her.

It's true, she thought, I might as well face it. But with only three more days of the tour to run, there was a chance she might elude them. And once I get out of France, she thought, I'll never, never ——

Mrs. Chubb joined them, sighing from her climb up the steps from the river. "This is certainly a darling place! I wish we could stay here two or three days. What wouldn't I give to be young again going around a lovely country like this with a handsome young man!"

Rory grinned at her. "You really think I'm handsome, ma'am?"

"You remind me of someone I knew a long, long time ago. Gather ye rosebuds whilst ye may, my children." She patted Lys' shoulder, and drifted off.

"She's a honey," said Lys softly.

"All she asks of life is a toilet of her own," said Rory. He threw his cigarette away. It fell like a firefly into the stony garden. "Will you marry me as soon as we get home?"

"As soon as we get home," she said and saw it like a little star of light at the end of a dark tunnel.

"We shan't have much money and I probably shan't have a job."

"I think you'll have a job." No need to worry, she assured herself. I am safe—even if they do try to get me. Only three days to go.

They sat side by side holding hands. Shall I tell him now—everything? Lys wondered. She was loath to spoil the peace of this golden moment. Besides, it was something so hard to tell. Tomorrow evening, she thought, I'll tell him the whole thing, and maybe I'd better write a note to headquarters telling them I've seen Tiger

NEXT MONTH

■ No one was more surprised than Betty Lussier when, on a shopping trip to New York, she impulsively bought a tractor! Back home in Madrid, she had a busy husband, four small sons—and an eighth-floor apartment. But she knew she wanted to farm, and now that she had the tractor, she'd find the farm somewhere. . . .

She found it in Spanish Morocco—a wild, half-civilized land totally unprepared for the shock of a woman in blue jeans who plowed the land and preached democracy!

AMID MY ALIEN CORN
By BETTY LUSSIER

condensed in the October JOURNAL and where he is. In a moment of wisdom she had penciled the address of the château on the back of the envelope she had given to Rory. It's only three more days, and we always go around in a mob anyway, she thought. What could anyone do?

Mrs. Chubb tapped at her door late that night. "Do forgive me, dear, but I so long to know how things are going with you two young people. Of course anyone can see how it is with the lieutenant. He's head over heels in love with you. Have you settled anything yet? I hope you don't think I'm being impertinent."

"I think you're dear to be interested."

"I suppose I'm romantic," said Mrs. Chubb. "It's just made this trip for me, having you two dear things to watch and think about. I always say the next best thing to having a love affair of your own is to watch someone else having one." She sighed. "Mr. Chubb and I were very happy, but he was more of a practical man, not romantic. The boy I really loved was killed long ago. I thought at the time I would get over it, but do you know, dear, I never did." The eyes behind the exotic glasses were wistful. "It was an airplane accident. I often wish folks had never invented those horrible things. Mr. Chubb was always most kind, but I never could like the way he chewed his food." She paused for a moment. "He left me very well provided for." She leaned forward and patted Lys' hand. "You marry your sailor. He's the right one for you."

"I'm going to," Lys said. "If—when I get home."

Mrs. Chubb kissed her. "Follow your heart," she said, "you should always follow your heart. I hope you'll have lots of nice children and let me be godmother to the first."

They left the good weather behind early next morning. A cold sea mist came drifting over the saltings and hid the endless gray quicksands from which the sea seemed to have retired forever. They saw Mont-Saint-Michel in an opening in the fog for a moment, rising to a pinnacle out of the gray muddy shore. The tide was out, but a roughly chalked notice said it was expected in at four that afternoon.

"It rises," Alec Strong informed them, "in a matter of minutes. A man on a horse galloping cannot get away from it. I remember an aunt of mine ——"

The ladies turned patient faces, listening to his anecdote, as the big coach wormed its way into the car park. A few white gulls swooped there, like pieces of paper blown in a wind. A lot of tourists were abroad that morning, so that although it was still early, the parking place by the entrance to the fortress was already packed with charabancs and coaches, private motorcars, and strange vehicles that looked like the result of a liaison between a motorcycle and a perambulator. Mike had difficulty in maneuvering himself into a place, and the ladies had some way to walk to the entrance.

Once inside, some of them regarded the steep, narrow street winding up between a bazaar of little shops and booths and restaurants with a good deal of misgiving.

"Do we have to climb right to the top?"

"Not unless you want to," Rory comforted them. "There is a very nice restaurant halfway up with an open veranda looking out on the sea. Those who don't want to go all the way can wait there. We'll divide the party into those who are going to the top and the rest."

The cobbled pathway wound ever steeper in fantastic fairy-tale fashion between stalls loaded with china figures, copper goods, bottles of liqueur, brass fancies, plaques and religious souvenirs. Determined middle-aged women, slightly mustached, shot from doorways waving menu cards in the faces of passers-by. The air was full of the hot garlic smell of good French cooking, laced with a slight suggestion of dubious drains.

By the time they reached the halfway mark, most of the ladies had had enough, and welcomed the idea of a veranda and a chair and a chance to write post cards. They drifted into the restaurant.

"One of us had better stay with them," Rory said to Lys. They stood aside to allow two brown-clad monks, their knotted white girdles swinging, to pass them. The mist had begun to drift away, letting pale sun, like weak lemonade, stream through.

"I'll stay. They'll prefer to have a man go with them," Lys said, half regretfully, for she wanted to see the cathedral. "Maybe I can nip up alone after you get back." The monks had disappeared down the narrow path. There was no one near and Rory bent and kissed her.

She watched his tall, thin figure following the more energetic of their ladies up the last flight of steps that led to the magnificent carved doorway of the cathedral. At the corner he turned and hesitated for a moment, but she waved to him encouragingly, and he went on until the big door took him, and she was alone.

The ladies were sitting happily in the weak sunshine on the veranda. They were drinking lemonade and orangeade out of sealed bottles, having been warned by Alec against the coffee.

"I just can't believe it's true," said Mrs. Chubb, "but you know what he says? He says there's no water supply whatsoever in this fortress so they imported one lot some years back and they just use it over and over again. With some kind of a filter."

"If Mr. Strong says so, it must be so," said Lys, and ordered a drink in a sealed bottle.

It was pleasant to sit there in the sun, with the murmur of the women's voices all about her. She hadn't slept very well the previous night for thinking of Mr. Troad's letter. This evening when we're alone together, I'll tell Rory the whole story, she told herself again. Maybe he will just laugh at me for thinking anything

CONTINUED ON PAGE 144

This is no place for "second-best"...

Cold Salmon Garni: an extra festive treat when you top it with Best Foods—the creamy-smooth mayonnaise America likes best!

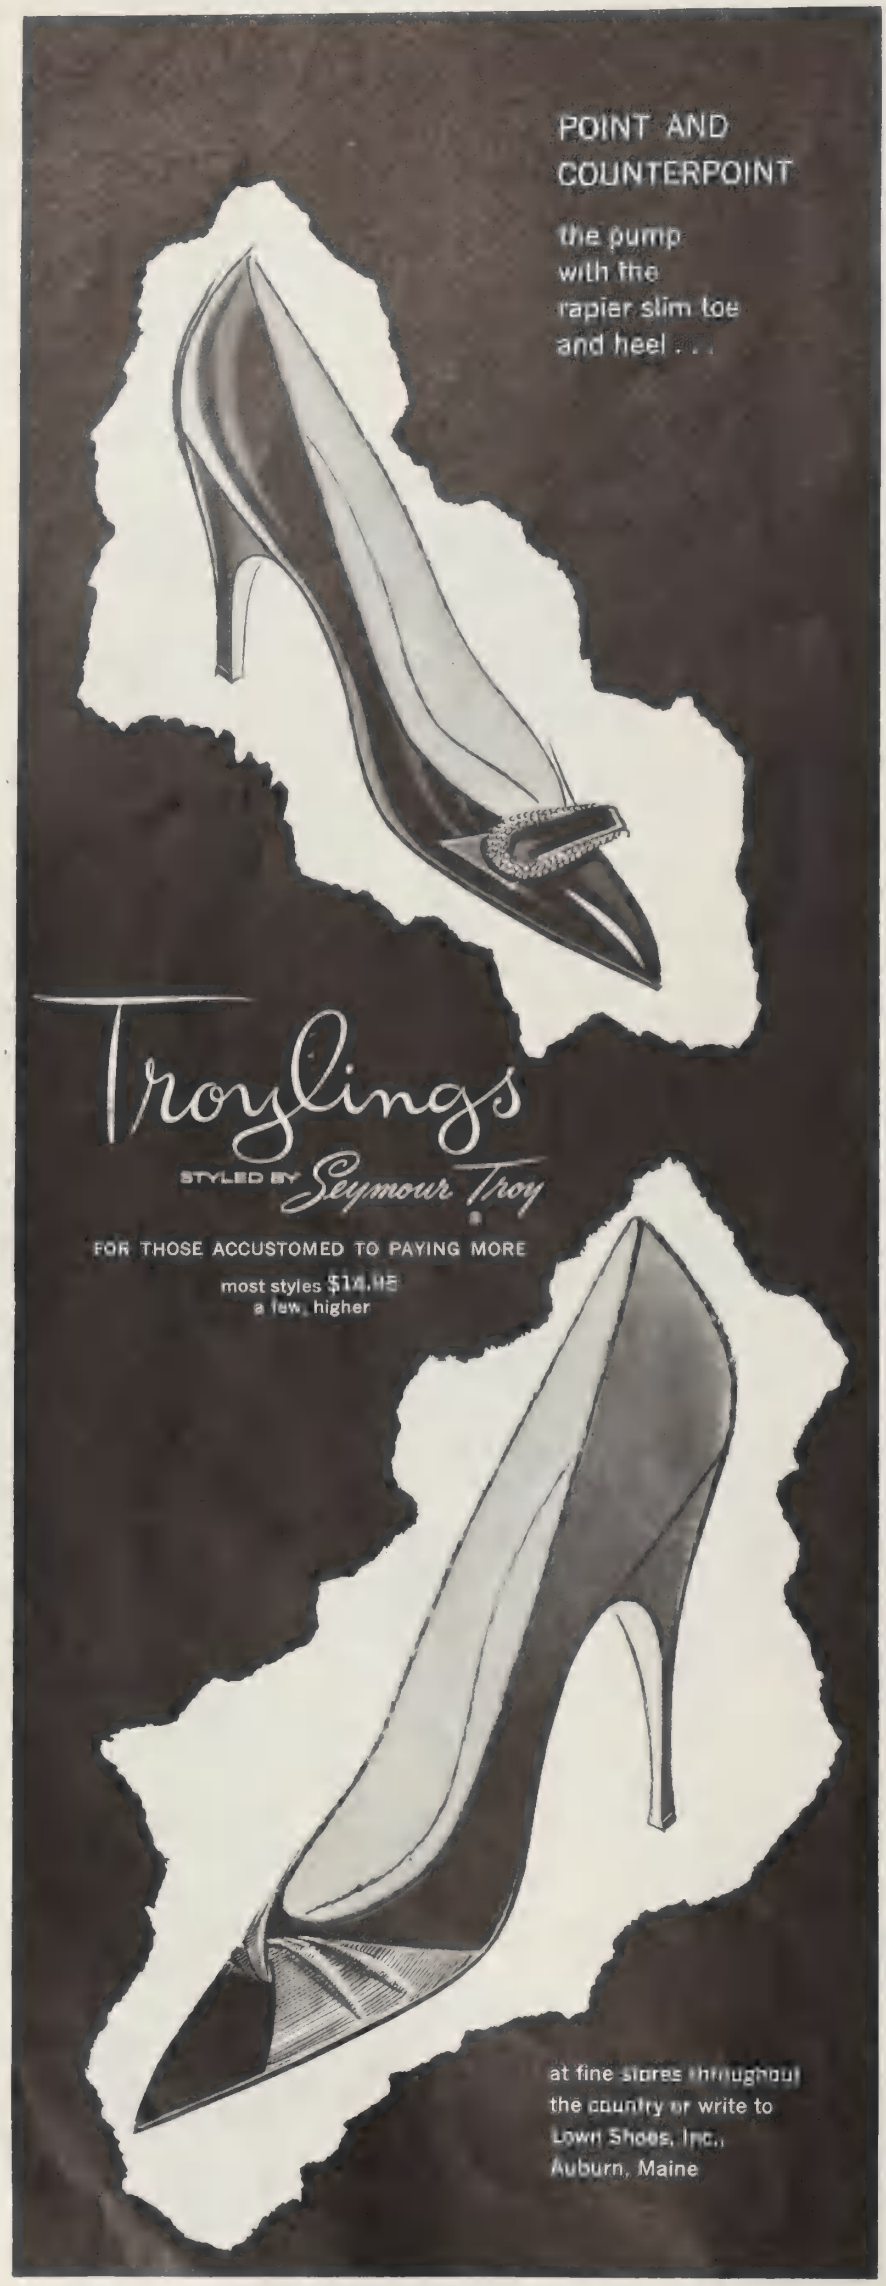
this is the place for Best Foods



(It's real whole-egg mayonnaise!)

☆ Best Foods® gives you rich, full-bodied consistency . . . always

☆ Delicate flavor to help salmon and other food flavors

☆ Extra creamy-smoothness and unmatched lightness

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 142

could happen now, after all these years, but I don't care. And in two days they would be home again.

She dreamed of quiet evenings by the fire, of walks together at weekends over the downs. If Mr. Troad gave Rory a job there was no reason why they should not get married at once. She must write and tell Mr. Troad; probably he would think it had all happened rather quickly, but she knew she could manage him—she could always handle Mr. Troad.

A scream broke the peace of her daydream. It came from Mrs. Hannay of Arkansas. Mrs. Hannay had just said, "This treat is on me, dear," and reached for her handbag, when she found it was not there.

"Oh, my—I've left it with all my money, and my passport, and my pearls, someplace! All my letters, all my travelers' checks. I reckon I just got out and left it on my seat in the coach. If I've lost those pearls I'll never, never forgive myself. Mr. Hannay gave them to me on our honeymoon and I can never, never replace them. I'd better go right back to the coach. If I left them in any of the shops on the way up I know I'll never see them again." Tears spilled down her face.

"If you left them in the coach there's no need to worry. Mike is always with his coach," Lys comforted her. "He doesn't trust foreigners, and he himself is absolutely reliable. You stay here—you don't want that climb again, I'm sure. I'll nip down and see if I can find it. It won't take me any time."

"You're a real good girl," said Mrs. Hannay. "I'll never forgive myself for this, or for giving you all this trouble."

"See to the others for me, will you? Don't let Mrs. Chubb go wandering off alone," Lys told her.

She hurried down the cobbled street between the stalls of souvenirs. The viragos in charge did not bestir themselves for her. Experience had taught them that girls in uniform are rarely good customers. They sat in the doorways of their shops, fanning themselves, shouting items of interest and criticisms of passers-by to one another, in broad patois.

Lys stopped once only, to buy a post card to send to Mr. Troad. Through the wide carved archway of the entrance she could see the car park with its labyrinths of cars, and in the far distance Mike, in his blue shirt, sat on the back step of the coach reading a newspaper.

She began to weave her way through the neatly ranged cars, thinking only of Mrs. Hannay's bag. It would be tiresome if she really had lost it. There would be endless bother and frustrating visits to police stations.

She was halfway across the park when someone called out suddenly behind her, "Mademoiselle! Mademoiselle!" It was almost a cry of anguish. Instinctively she stopped and turned.

Up in the restaurant overlooking the endless gray expanse of quicksands the ladies waited in the sunshine, consoling the distraught Mrs. Hannay with tales of property lost under even less hopeful circumstances, in even more unlikely places, and miraculously retrieved.

"I do hope nothing has gone wrong," said Mrs. Chubb uneasily. "It couldn't have taken Lys this long to get down and back. Not with her young legs. She's been gone almost an hour."

At four o'clock Rory and Alec Strong returned with the rest of the party enthusiastically mopping heated faces.

"I wouldn't have missed it for the world," said Mrs. Maitland. "But what an eerie place it is. Do you know they showed us a great aperture in a wall where they used to poke in anyone who died. Because, of course, up here, with no soil depth, there wasn't any place to bury them. And as for the sanitary arrangements—well ——"

"About them, the less said the better," said Mrs. Campion from Litchfield, Connecticut.

Rory's voice cut sharply through the babble of talk. "Where's Miss Halliday?"

They clustered round him, explaining. "Mrs. Hannay's handbag—left in the coach, she thinks, and Lys went back to see if it was there. She should have been back long ago, but it's more than an hour ——"

Rory took Alec's arm. "Be a good chap. Take charge. I'm going to look for her."

He ran down the narrow street, brushing off the vendors of bric-a-brac, the keepers of restaurants like so many gnats.

Mike was still sitting on the step of the coach, idly turning over the pages of a newspaper. He looked surprised. "Miss Halliday? She never came down here. Sure, I've got Mrs. Hannay's bag. She left it on her seat and I put it inside my locker. But Miss Halliday—I haven't seen her."

A cold sweat broke out on Rory's forehead. "I might have an accident," she had said. "Get run over, or fall down a lift shaft." She had laughed when she said it, making a joke of it. "But if anything happens to me, read it and send it on as quickly as you can."

But this kind of thing, Lys thought, bewildered, simply does not happen. Not in broad daylight, and in a crowded place with people all around. A voice had called out sharply behind her "Mademoiselle" and she had turned instinctively, believing that someone had been hurt.

The monk she had seen leaning over the culvert was coming toward her, another younger man, dressed in ordinary clothes, beside him. Her first thought was that they had found Mrs. Hannay's bag and were coming to tell her, and she stood waiting for them.

They were in a sort of cul-de-sac made by the maze of cars, and by the time she realized what was happening it was too late. There was no time to shout for help, no time to do anything. Taking her by the arms, they bundled her into a nearby car.

The young man with the monk slammed and locked the door on her side, and jumped into the driver's seat. The monk pulled the shabby rain-stained blinds down over the windows. Then he sat back, his hands splayed on his knees on the rough brown habit.

Lys tried to speak to the men beside her. "Father—mon père ——"

He turned to her and smiled, and made strange brutish noises, touching his throat and ears. He was deaf and dumb—or was he only pretending to be?

Ahead through the windshield, over the driver's shoulders, she could see the road they were traveling along. They had passed that way only yesterday, and now she had no doubts as to where they were taking her. It was the direct, cross-country route to the château where Tiger had seen her. By the roundabout route they had taken it had been several days' tour. Going direct across country it was probably only a matter of hours.

Why was I fool enough to think he hadn't recognized me? she asked herself. I should have made a bolt for home the moment I saw him. Only it had seemed so unlikely that there could be any danger after all these years. She closed her eyes, feeling sick. I always knew they would find me, she thought. In my heart I always knew.

But what could they do? She would not be allowed to disappear. There would be inquiries made. Mr. Troad would pursue them, she knew, with dogged thoroughness, and Rory had that letter. If only he acted on it and sent it off at once, machinery would be put into motion, the French police alerted. The thing was to keep calm and try to gain time.

If only in her mind a little voice had not whispered that she was not likely to win the battle of wits with Tiger twice over. That would be expecting too much of fate.

She pressed her hands to her eyes and tried to think. They would have missed her by now. Rory would take the ladies back to the hotel, open the letter, and maybe guess more or less what had happened. How long would it take for the letter to reach headquarters? When

CONTINUED ON PAGE 147

Die we must, ultimately, but we can live, if we love.

JOSEPH FORT NEWTON
Love and Learn (Harper & Bros.)

just comb it in...

then comb out!

it's the 1-step permanent!

creamy PROM

FASTER . . . BECAUSE PROM IS A WAVING CREAM! Just comb in PROM's waving cream once—(then roll up and rinse). One Step! That's all. The neutralizing is automatic! When your wave's ready . . . comb out!

EASIER . . . BECAUSE PROM IS A WAVING CREAM! No dripping . . . No dabbing . . . No messing! Creamy Prom stays where you put it—waves where you want it!

SOFTER . . . BECAUSE PROM IS A WAVING CREAM! No after-wave dryness! No snarls! No frizz! PROM is rich with costly conditioners. It actually waves in silken softness . . . leaves hair far easier to manage. And, it's the longest lasting home permanent you've ever had! TRY IT!

Creamy Prom

For complete permanents... REGULAR, SUPER, VERY GENTLE – There's a PROM perfect for your hair.

end curl Prom

One step END CURL PROM – For in-between permanents, neckline stragglers and all end curl hair-styles.

PROM is ideal for children's hair, too!

NEW!

Betty Crocker

Cake 'n Frosting Mix!

YOU GET BOTH IN ONE PACKAGE!

FAMILY SIZE! Cuts in 9 big servings! FAMILY EASY! Quick to mix, quick to frost! FAMILY GOOD! Betty Crocker's own Cake 'n Frosting Mixes!

TWO FAVORITE COMBINATIONS: White Cake with Fudge Frosting. ↓ Chocolate Devils Food Cake with Fluffy White Frosting. →

Cake enough for 1 extra-big layer . . . plenty of frosting for top and sides! You get both in one package . . . to bake in your own 8″ square pan, or 9″ square pan, or 9″ round pan. Now you can have fresh-baked, fresh-frosted cake any time you want it! Quick! Easy! Economical! And just plain good!

General Mills

"I guarantee a perfect* cake 'n perfect* frosting!"

Betty Crocker

*Yes, every mix we make for you is guaranteed to come out perfect, or send the box top to Betty Crocker, Box 200, Minneapolis, Minn., and General Mills will send your money back.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 144

ıld they get moving? Not, at best, until torrow, and between now and then stretched l long, hateful dark hours of the night.
ybe the accident, whatever it was to be, ıld have happened long before anyone ld find her ——

t was best not to think about it.

he car stopped at an auberge on the edge a mustard field stretching golden yellow ıy to the horizon. The monk went inside, ving the driver in charge. He got out and ned against the door.

he monk reappeared in a few moments
h a glass of cider and a long yellow roll d with cheese which he handed Lys ough the window. She shook her head. As clambered into the seat beside her she made udden wild bid to attract the attention of a n driving by in a cart with a slow, sad rse. A hand was clapped over her mouth and was thrown roughly back onto the seat.
e driver turned in front of them, laughing.

They reached the château soon after seven clock that night. The sun was going down, nding long golden fingers through the trees.
e grim shadow of the château was reflected, ole and entire, in an opal-colored lake ere the swans floated among the lily pads.
e château windows were closed, as before.
o one peeped through the shutters. No one ited on the terrace. The place looked dead d deserted without a chink of light coming t into the gathering twilight.

They went through the great doors and she mained where the monk left her, alone in e center of the vast hall, with the evening adows gathering and filling it like water wly rising in a bowl. In sudden panic she n to the big oak door and tried to open it, aking and battering at it, but it was locked d barred.

Then a door opened in the gallery above
d her mouth went dry, for a man stood there ckoning to her. It was only the deaf mute ho had laid aside his brown habit and now ore the blue-and-white-striped coat of a rvant. He made guttural noises, indicating at she was to follow him.

The conducted tour had not touched this rt of the château. They went through a long llery that led into a vast salon with lovely anging crystal chandeliers and slender-legged ld furniture, the walls and windows hung ith panels of crimson brocade. At the far end as a small room elegantly paneled in dark ood. The open fireplace was stacked with gs. The familiar scent of French cigarettes lled the air—the special cigarettes he had alays smoked and managed to get in such uantities even during the war.

He was standing with his back to the woodacked grate, his head thrown back just as he had so often seen him in her nightmares.

The deaf mute left them, closing the door.

For a long minute he looked at her and she ealized with a surge of relief that all his one-ime power over her had gone. Was it possible hat she had ever thought she loved this man vith the graying hair, the hard, fine lines bout his eyes, the smile that was not gay at ll?

"Well, well," he said at length. "Sit down, won't you, Miss Laurel Jones?"

She sat on the edge of the brocade sofa while he remained standing, his hands behind him, looking down at her with his sharp, bright eyes.

"You have certainly changed. For the beter—neat, soignée, sophisticated."

He lit a cigarette and flung the match away with the flick of the wrist she remembered so vell.

"You still do not smoke? So that wasn't just nother part of the act. No?" He broke off nd stared for a moment at the end of his cig-rette. "Those terrible clothes," he said. "Even n them you did what no other woman has been able to do—you took me in completely.
You must have been worth a great deal to your employers. I hope they paid you well."

She got up and walked to the window. The shutters on this side of the château were open.
She could see far below a small rose garden where in the gathering darkness a silver fountain played. She took off her cap and put t down on a little table beside the window.

"Is there any point in going over all that now?" she asked wearily. "We were both of us fighting for our countries in our different ways. It is all a very long time ago. What do you want, Tiger?"

He looked at the end of his cigarette, and then again at her. "What do you think I want? You played me the dirtiest trick a woman can play a man. You led me on to believe you were in love with me, you made me trust you and confide in you ——"

"If you knew how little I liked doing it!"

"Don't try that line with me. It will not march, my child. You pretended to love me and I believed you. I thought you were all I had ever dreamed of in a woman. It nearly cost me my life. It was not your fault that I had the good fortune to escape. . . . I dislike being made a fool of."

She turned and faced him, sick with weariness, but scorn and dislike had taken away some of her fear. "We're wasting time," she said. "There is no war on now. You can't get rid of me as you did Mr. Jones and Peppi and the others."

"Peppi. Yes, poor Peppi. I never could be certain—was he involved or not?"

"He knew nothing at all about any of it."

"Ah, well, we could not afford to take risks. As you know, we are thorough in our methods. It took a long time to find you, for you are a very clever girl. Strangely, I have always been sure that one happy day the time would come—though I didn't really expect that you would come walking into my home! Shepherding a group of old women but looking beautiful and slender and soignée, all I had once dreamed of making you. The rest was easy—a telephone call to the travel company in London soon gave me your real name and the route of the tour. That is not a very clever young woman you have in your London office."

Lys smiled. "No, Miranda is not very clever."

"Miss Lys Halliday, late Miss Laurel Jones. Ex-policewoman. No doubt, as you say, a search will be made, but it is not likely they will find you because no one will connect you in any way with me or with this place."

With a wild catch of hope, Lys thought of the letter she had given Rory and the address penciled inside. Even now it might be on its way to London. But would there be time—oh, would there be? Time was what she must work for. She must fight for it.

He threw away his cigarette and came to stand directly before her. "You asked me what I want. Such a foolish question. You know as well as I do what the stakes are in this game. For six years you have been the winner. Now it is my turn."

Her mind raced, trying to think what Rory would do about the letter and how long it would take. Surely he must have sent it off before this. He would have to find someone to take over the tour, but of course he would manage. The address in pencil should bring him. By tomorrow surely he would arrive.

Tiger's voice came to the end of a sentence she had hardly heard. He said sharply, "We will start tonight. There are two old friends of yours who will be as pleased to see you as I am. You remember Suzanne and Colette?"

She said nothing, closing her eyes.

His voice went on, icy with mock courtesy. "But I am very thoughtless. We will start tonight—after we have dined, of course. No doubt you will want to wash and perhaps rest for a little? I must show you to your room myself. Nowadays, alas, I have no women servants. Once there was a large staff here, but I do not wish to have the village women about. Their tongues are too long. Rudolph, whom you have already met, is deaf and dumb and also he cannot read or write. It makes him very reliable."

He took her through the labyrinth of passages to a large bedroom with faded brocades and a four-poster bed like a great galleon in one corner. Mirrors in heavy gold frames reflected the two of them for a moment, standing on the threshold

"It is a little cold and comfortless, I fear," he said. He went to the fireplace and knelt and put a match to the wood and it caught and blazed, filling the room with dancing shadows.

"Now I will leave you until we dine." He moved away, closing the door after him, and she heard the key turn in the lock.

Lys went to the window and opened one of the shutters. Far below, a sheer drop, lay the lake with its lily pads and sleeping white swans. There was no escape that way. All she could hope to do was to keep her head and try to fight for time. The letter—the letter. It would bring help, and so would Rory.

If only the little hammer inside her head would cease drumming out its message, It may be too late . . . too late . . . too late——

The water in the ewer was icy cold. Lys washed and tidied her hair as best she could. Her face, white, with shadowed eyes, looking back at her from the clouded mirror seemed the face of a stranger. Then she sat by the fire, holding her hands to the thin blaze, still cold with shock.

Somewhere far off a gong rang, echoing through the stillness. Then the key turned and the servant, Rudolph, opened the door, stepping aside politely for her to pass. He wore a striped coat and dark trousers, the perfect gentleman's servant.

6 P.M.

By ALICE BOYD STOCKDALE

This moment will not fit
An apron pocket
Nor cup between two hands,
Nor can one lock it
Like sweet basil
In a jar to savor
Someday, recapturing
Its fragrant flavor.
This moment blooms
Full-blown and fleet,
Happening in hardly
Half a heartbeat. . . .
"Daddy's home!"
The startled door swings wide
Letting love
And laughter step inside.

In the great dining hall tall candles burned in silver candelabra. Heavy curtains were pulled over the windows, shutting out the stars. Tiger had put on a wine-colored velvet jacket that matched the Burgundy which the deaf mute poured into the glasses. Between the candles a silver dish was piled high with grapes, emerald green and purple black, covered with fresh, soft bloom.

The dinner was good—an omelet, a bird and a savory—but Lys could not eat. She played with the food on her plate while the man who sat opposite watched with cold, cruel eyes. Over the table he raised his glass to her ceremoniously.

"For me, this is a dream come true. Come, my dear, you must eat. Otherwise you may find the trip ahead of us tiring. Night is so much the best time for traveling when one is in a hurry. No one remarks your passing by."

The deaf mute brought coffee in gold-and-black cups. Lys drank some and it steadied her. The servant brought sweetmeats and she took a gaily wrapped piece of chocolate and played with it. In her heart she prayed, Rory, dear Rory, please do something! Please hurry—before it is too late.

Tiger was speaking again and his voice reached her as if from a great distance. "In other days we grew very fine fruit here. Also the wine we made was some of the finest in Normandy. I would have liked you to see this place as it was in those days—before the war." He went on, painting a picture of life as it had been in other days, but she hardly listened.

Then he was standing, and suddenly his tone became harsh. "Come," he said. "It is time for us to go."

The great doors were thrown open onto the courtyard. An iron lantern, hanging outside, lighted the scene. The long, low sports car was waiting for them, the deaf mute beside it, a rug on his arm.

Lys crossed the threshold and then stopped. "My cap," she said. "I left it in the small room beyond the gallery. I'll get it." She turned swiftly, but Tiger stopped her, his hand on her arm.

"No," he said. "You need no hat."

She looked about her wildly. There was no one save the deaf mute in sight, and in that instant she knew that her chances of escape were narrowing desperately. She stepped into the car and Tiger took the driver's seat beside her. He drove slowly out of the great gates in the white moonlight and turned south.

Rory took the ladies back to the hotel and hurried to his own room. He had locked the envelope which Lys had given him away in his attaché case with his business papers. "If anything happens to me," she had said, "read it and send it on as quickly as you can."

Inside the blank envelope was another, heavily sealed, addressed to the London headquarters of MI-5. On the envelope was penciled in Lys' handwriting, "Château Caranac, Normandy." There was a number after this and the words, "They have got me."

Rory looked at his watch. Four o'clock. She must already have been gone for two hours. Out of his anxiety and fear for her there came to him, as there always did in moments of stress and danger, a great calm. He planned quickly what he must do.

First, the tour. He could not leave twenty-five ladies abandoned in Brittany, but, thank God, there was Alec Strong. He said to Alec on the telephone, "There are only three more nights to go. Will you and your mother take over? Everything is mapped out on the route and I'll hand over the papers. Something has happened to Miss Halliday and I must stay and find her." He added, "I'll ring Troad in London and explain. I can't think of any other way out. Will you do it?"

Alec Strong accepted with such alacrity that Rory felt it was what he had been hoping for all along.

The tour members, assembled in the hotel lounge, listened to Rory with shocked faces. Snatches of their conversation reached him afterward as he and Alec went over last-minute instructions. "Surely not murder." . . . "Like that poor child with a bicycle—like those poor souls camping in the mountains." . . . "Why, of course he must go. Mr. Strong will look after us splendidly."

Alec said, "Have you any idea where to look for her?"

"I'm not sure—I think so."

"But surely we ought to alert the police!"

"I shall do that if necessary," Rory said quietly.

While he was packing Mrs. Chubb came tapping at his door. "Look, just what do you intend to do?"

He turned a white, strained face toward her. "First I must get to the airport and have a letter taken at once to England. Then I'm going back to one of the châteaux we visited. There's a bus at midnight."

"Never mind the bus, dear boy. You can hire a car, can't you? Mr. Chubb left me very well provided for and I have far more than one woman needs. Take this and use it, and my love to you both."

She pushed a roll of bills into his hand and hurried away.

The money made all the difference. In the rented car he drove across country instead of following the roundabout route they had taken in the coach. Beyond going to Caranac—because that was the address she had written down—Rory had no idea what to do after he had taken the letter to the airport and arranged to have it delivered by hand in London within two hours. At Caranac he would ring Troad, assuring him the tour members were in good hands and explaining about Lys. Maybe Mr. Troad knew something that he, Rory, did not know. MI-5. What could she possibly have to do with that? It was a department that dealt with crime and espionage.

A.M. Your mid-morning "Coffee-break" is a special treat when a neighbor drops in for a friendly chat. Then there's nothing like a good hot cup of your own delicious coffee to help perk you up.

P.M. Mid-afternoon when marketing's done, you've really earned a "Coffee-break"! What a welcome gentle lift it gives you! What a relief! It actually helps you think better, work better, feel better!

TV What could be more pleasant than a relaxing demitasse of your own fine coffee while you're watching TV? Especially for guests, the mid-evening "Coffee-break" shows the warmth of your hospitality!

HINT A demitasse should be just a little "richer" than regular full-bodied coffee. Easy method: use 3 level tablespoons or 1½ standard measures of coffee for each ¾ measuring cup of fresh cold water.

GOOD COFFEE... EVERY TIME!

Use 1 standard coffee measure (2 level tblsps.) of coffee for each cup of fresh cold water. Time the brewing exactly! Delicious—always!

PAN-AMERICAN COFFEE BUREAU
120 WALL STREET, NEW YORK 5, N.Y.

Brazil • Colombia • Costa Rica • Cuba • Dominican Republic • Ecuador • El Salvador • Guatemala • Honduras • Mexico • Venezuela

© 1957, Pan-American Coffee Bureau

He tried to remember just what Lys had said, the whole conversation. Once she had been in love with someone, but she was not in love with him any longer. That much he remembered. But what could it possibly have to do with MI-5?

At Caranac, Rory took a room in the little estaminet close to the gates of the château. The first thing was to find out about the place and the people who lived there. He questioned the pretty, dark-eyed waitress who brought his morning coffee and rolls.

"Mais oui, monsieur. The family still lives there. At least all that remains of the family, for now there is only Monsieur le Comte. And he does not come very often. The château is open each day for tourists to see, for it is very splendid. Perhaps monsieur would like to go?"

"Perhaps," said Rory. "What is he like, this Monsieur le Comte?"

It seemed to him that she avoided his eyes. "The comte of today is a stranger to us all. He comes only to see about the wine and then he goes again."

"Is he here now?"

"I do not know, monsieur—but it is easy for me to find out. My fiancé's mother lives in the lodge. She will know."

"Is he married, this comte?"

"No, I do not think he is married, monsieur, but perhaps he is. Many ladies come and go, but in the village we do not know who they are. His servant who goes everywhere with him is deaf and dumb, so no gossip arrives from the château, which is perhaps good, for gossip is not wise."

He finished his coffee quickly and went to the post office. It was now after ten o'clock. The London offices would be open. To his annoyance the only telephone was against the wall in the main office where every word would be overheard.

He stood anxiously waiting for his call to go through. When it did he got Miranda.

"Ow, it's Mr. Mallory. . . . From France—oh, dear, that's ever so expensive, isn't it? . . . Yes, he's in. I'll fetch him. Will you hold on, please?"

Then Troad's voice came to him. "Gone," repeated Mr. Troad. "What do you mean, gone? She can't be gone — Yes, yes—I'm listening. But it's incredible. . . . Yes, of course you must. Do whatever you think best, spare no expense. You've alerted the police? . . . Well, ring me when you have any news."

From time to time Rory looked at his watch, doing silent calculations. By now his letter must surely have reached headquarters. They would get things going at once, alert the French police. If he started anything on his own he might do more harm than good. So there was nothing to do but sit here—waiting. The little maid came back presently.

"Alas, monsieur, if you wished to see Monsieur le Comte, you are too late. He left very late last night in his automobile. Nor does anyone know when he is expected to return. It is possible he has gone south where he has other property."

Where his other property was the little maid did not know. After she left him Rory sat for a moment, fighting his sense of helplessness and despair. He was roused by a blast on a motor horn. A large coach, red-and-cream-colored, drew up in front of the hotel. Out of it poured a stream of sight-seers and the air was filled with English voices, speaking with a broad North Country accent. Presently the entire company assembled for coffee.

"How busy we are," cried the little waitress, important and delighted as she bustled around with her trays. "Presently they will go to the château. Why does monsieur not go with them? It is my fiancé who takes the parties around and it is very interesting with many pictures and much fine furniture."

That, thought Rory, was not a bad idea. Maybe he could slip in with the rest, unnoticed. Once inside he would leave the main party and wander off by himself on the chance that Lys might be there somewhere. Anything was better than sitting here waiting.

All about him the honest Lancashire voices boomed and twittered. When the newcomers straggled on foot up the long drive to the courtyard Rory joined them and got into conversation with two young men about his own age, passing unnoticed through the turnstile with the rest of the party. As they moved on in the wake of the guide, Rory lingered behind, watching his opportunity. A door closed, the voices of the tourists and the sound of their footsteps on the marble floor faded. He was alone.

He ran up the staircase to the gallery that looked down into the great hall and from there he came to the floor to which tourists were not admitted. There were endless passages with secondary staircases and innumerable doors opening into big, empty rooms. Floating up the stair wells he could hear now and then the voice of the guide, reciting his tale of old loves and long-forgotten romances.

Rory came to an open door, leading into the long room furnished with gold-legged furniture and crystal chandeliers and hanging tapestries. There was no one in sight. The place had an unlived-in feeling until Rory saw on an onyx ash tray a recently stubbed-out cigarette.

A door at the far end of the room led into a smaller one, paneled with greenish wood, the fireplace piled with apple logs. A litter of French newspapers lay filleted on the floor as if someone had torn through them in a great hurry and let them lie. The grate was peppered with more cigarette butts and Rory picked up one. It bore a French trade-mark with no trace of lipstick.

He stood looking about him. Over the windows the shutters were closed, keeping out the sunlight. He pushed one aside and found himself looking out onto a small rose garden where a fountain played. Then something caught his eye that made his heart give a great jump and start a wild hammering.

On the little table next to the window lay a saucy blue cap, its silver badge catching a splinter of sun that crept through the shutter. Lys' cap.

He picked it up and held it in his two hands ridiculously and senselessly comforted by the feel of it. She had been here—now at least he knew that. The police must be alerted so that they could come and search the place at once. Rory lifted the cap to his lips for a moment, then stuffed it into his pocket, and as he did this heard the sound of footsteps. Someone was coming from the long room to the little antechamber where he stood.

He drew back into the shelter of the heavy curtains and waited.

The man who came in was a servant, dressed in dark trousers and a blue-and-white-striped coat. He carried in one hand a bright orange-colored duster and he had the careless, off-duty air of one who knows his master is not at home. He took a cigarette from a box and lit it, picked up the papers from the floor and looked at the pictures. It was some moments before he noticed Rory standing in the window. Then the cigarette fell from his lips and his jaw dropped.

Rory got between him and the door. He pulled Lys' blue cap from his pocket and held it out.

"Mademoiselle is here. I wish to see her at once."

The man's jaw quivered and his eyeballs bulged unpleasantly. He made strange guttural noises and touched his ears and throat. A deaf mute! Rory remembered what the waitress had told him. All the same, thought Rory, his back to the door, the fellow could not be left to give the alarm. The wisest thing would be to knock him out, but he seemed such a piteous creature, standing shivering there, that Rory had not the heart to do it. So he took the thick cords from the curtains and bound him well, hand and foot, using those cunning knots that seamen learn. He left him on the sofa where he would be reasonably comfortable and, for safety's sake, bound him there also. Then he locked the door, pocketed the key, and stood for a moment breathing heavily, trying to decide the next move.

It was hopeless to look for Lys alone in this labyrinth. He must alert the police at once, with her cap as evidence, and have the place searched.

He did not wait for the rest of the party, but let himself out of the big doors and made his to the gendarmerie. It was a square, white ding, standing in a neat garden planted lobelia and calceolaria, as if there was ing much doing in the way of crime in e parts and the force had plenty of time gardening.

oday, however, they appeared busy. As y entered, a middle-aged inspector was ing into a telephone and a number of cemen were standing by, evidently await- orders. A young man holding gantlets a crash helmet went out as Rory arrived, arting with a roar and clatter.

omething was afoot and Rory's throat felt denly dry. Had they heard something from land? He tried to attract the attention of an rly gendarme who waved him impatiently le saying, "Presently, monsieur. Presently." But this is important, très important!" y told him desperately.

Here we also have on hand something portant, monsieur. Tout à l'heure."

Look here—at least tell me this," Rory plored him. "Is it about a Miss Halliday? ve you had word from tland Yard—in Eng- d?"

Blankness descended over gendarme's large face a curtain. "Miss Halli- ? England? Scotland rd? Mais non, monsieur. re today there has been accident—a very terrible ident on the road in the ith—and they have sent us to go immediately to ntify the victims. If mon- ur will excuse me—mon- ur, the inspector, will be e in a moment and will e you attention."

There was nothing for it t to wait as patiently as ssible. Rory sat down on wooden bench, gnawing thumb. The fleet of cars nt off. The station cleared ttle. The inspector, mop- g his brow, turned to e Rory his attention— t the telephone rang ain, and again he said, ne moment, monsieur."

In desperation Rory ned on the desk and ited. Lys' small blue cap s folded in his pocket, and his fingers sed round it. The precious moments were ssing which might make the task of finding more difficult hourly.

Then the door opened to admit a large, uare man so unmistakably English that ry's spirits rose. Even before crossing to desk with an air of authority that sug- ted the place belonged to him, the man ened his coat and showed a badge sewn ide.

Help had arrived.

ys saw the olive trees huddled into little ves on the stony hillsides and felt the rmth of the sun. She stole a quick look at er, driving with only one hand on the eel. With the other he had just lit a cigarette. showed no signs at all of strain after the g night's drive. His eyes, half closed, were ed on the white road that stretched ahead them.

Seeing him so, when he thought himself observed, she could understand where he d got his savage nickname. There was nething in the way he held his head—in narrowness of his forehead and the lazy, f-closed insolence of his eyes—that was in- ed like a tiger. She shivered violently. The emblance did not end there, she thought, a tiger plays with a man, letting him al- st escape and then—when escape seems tain—puts out a paw and pulls him back. ying with him as a cat plays with a mouse.

The countryside was awaking to the summer rning. Though it was still early, the roads re no longer empty. Cows streamed out of fields for the milking. Knots of children ttered down village streets to wait for ses that would take them to school. Farm rts, drawn by huge horses, ambled slowly from gateways and monopolized road centers, slowing all traffic to their own peaceful gait.

Tiger swore softly under his breath and looked quickly at Lys, who knew that he looked but kept her eyes away. She sensed that he was uneasy as the buses appeared, taking workmen to the town, and she wondered whether the time had come to make a bid for their attention.

As if he guessed this, Tiger turned sharply off the highway to a side street. And now Lys knew there was no time to be lost. The village they were entering straggled over fields and among olive groves, round a long, narrow, cobbled street with small dingy shops. In the doorway of a restaurant waiters were setting chairs and tables out into the sunshine underneath the plane trees. Suddenly outside a large, square building that was probably the mairie Lys saw an empty bus taking up so much of the street that there was barely room to pass between it and the stone wall opposite. In the sun it stood there, probably waiting to take its load of children to school.

Tiger was driving a great deal too fast. The half-smoked cigarette hung from his lip, and now he had both hands on the wheel. As he tried to swing out to pass the standing bus Lys seized the wheel and wrenched it violently, taking him by surprise. They crashed into the stone wall with a sickening, crunching sound.

She heard his shout, ending in a scream, and felt herself hurtling through the air with nothing in her heart but an immense relief and thankfulness.

All down the street windows shot up and voices shouted. Gendarmes poured in a blue stream from the mairie. Whistles blew. A terrified dog went off howling down the road.

In London, seated at the desk in his private office, Mr. Troad was writing a letter. It was obviously a letter that moved him deeply, for as he wrote his plain face quivered and his mouth framed the words he was putting down. Several times he stopped to reread what he had just written.

"This terrible affair," wrote Mr. Troad. "I don't know when I have been so shocked and upset by anything and only thank God that you are safe. Of course Mallory did the only possible thing to do and I am more than grateful to him and will see that it is made worth his while. But the thought that you have been in danger and might easily have been killed has quite knocked me over.

"I don't mind telling you this has brought me to facing a fact that has been in my mind for many years. I fell in love with you from the very first, Lys, when you looked after me in the hospital. I know I'm a darned ugly fellow and I always told myself it was no use, that someday another fellow would come along. I tried to assure myself that I would grow out of it in time. Only I never have grown out of it and, as it seems no other fellow has come along, I wonder if there is a chance for me. As you know, the old firm is doing very well and looks like doing better. And if a man's entire love and devotion ——"

He broke off, daydreaming, a luxury he seldom allowed himself. With young Mallory in the office—maybe in time a partner, for anyone could see he was the right type of fellow—Mr. Troad realized that he would be able to take life easier. He would have more leisure and why should he not travel himself and see the world?

He saw a picture of Lys and himself in a gondola, honeymooning at the start of a new and wonderful life. He stared at his half-written letter and tried out new and unaccustomed words that did not come easily

H H H H H

THOREAU SAID:

I would rather sit on a pumpkin, and have it all to myself, than to be crowded on a velvet cushion.

When you travel to the Celestial City, carry no letters of introduction. When you knock, ask to see God, none of the servants.

There are a thousand hacking at the branches of evil to one who is striking at the root.

If you would convince a man that he does wrong, do right. Men will believe what they see. Let them see.

The only prayer for a brave man is to be adoing.

H H H H H

NOW Jell-O Instant Pudding's special magic makes

ICE CREAM PIE

No freezing...keeps firm in your refrigerator!

JELL-O BRAND New INSTANT PUDDING

No Cooking "BUSY-DAY" Dessert

7 FLAVORS

EASY-AS-PIE ICE CREAM PIE

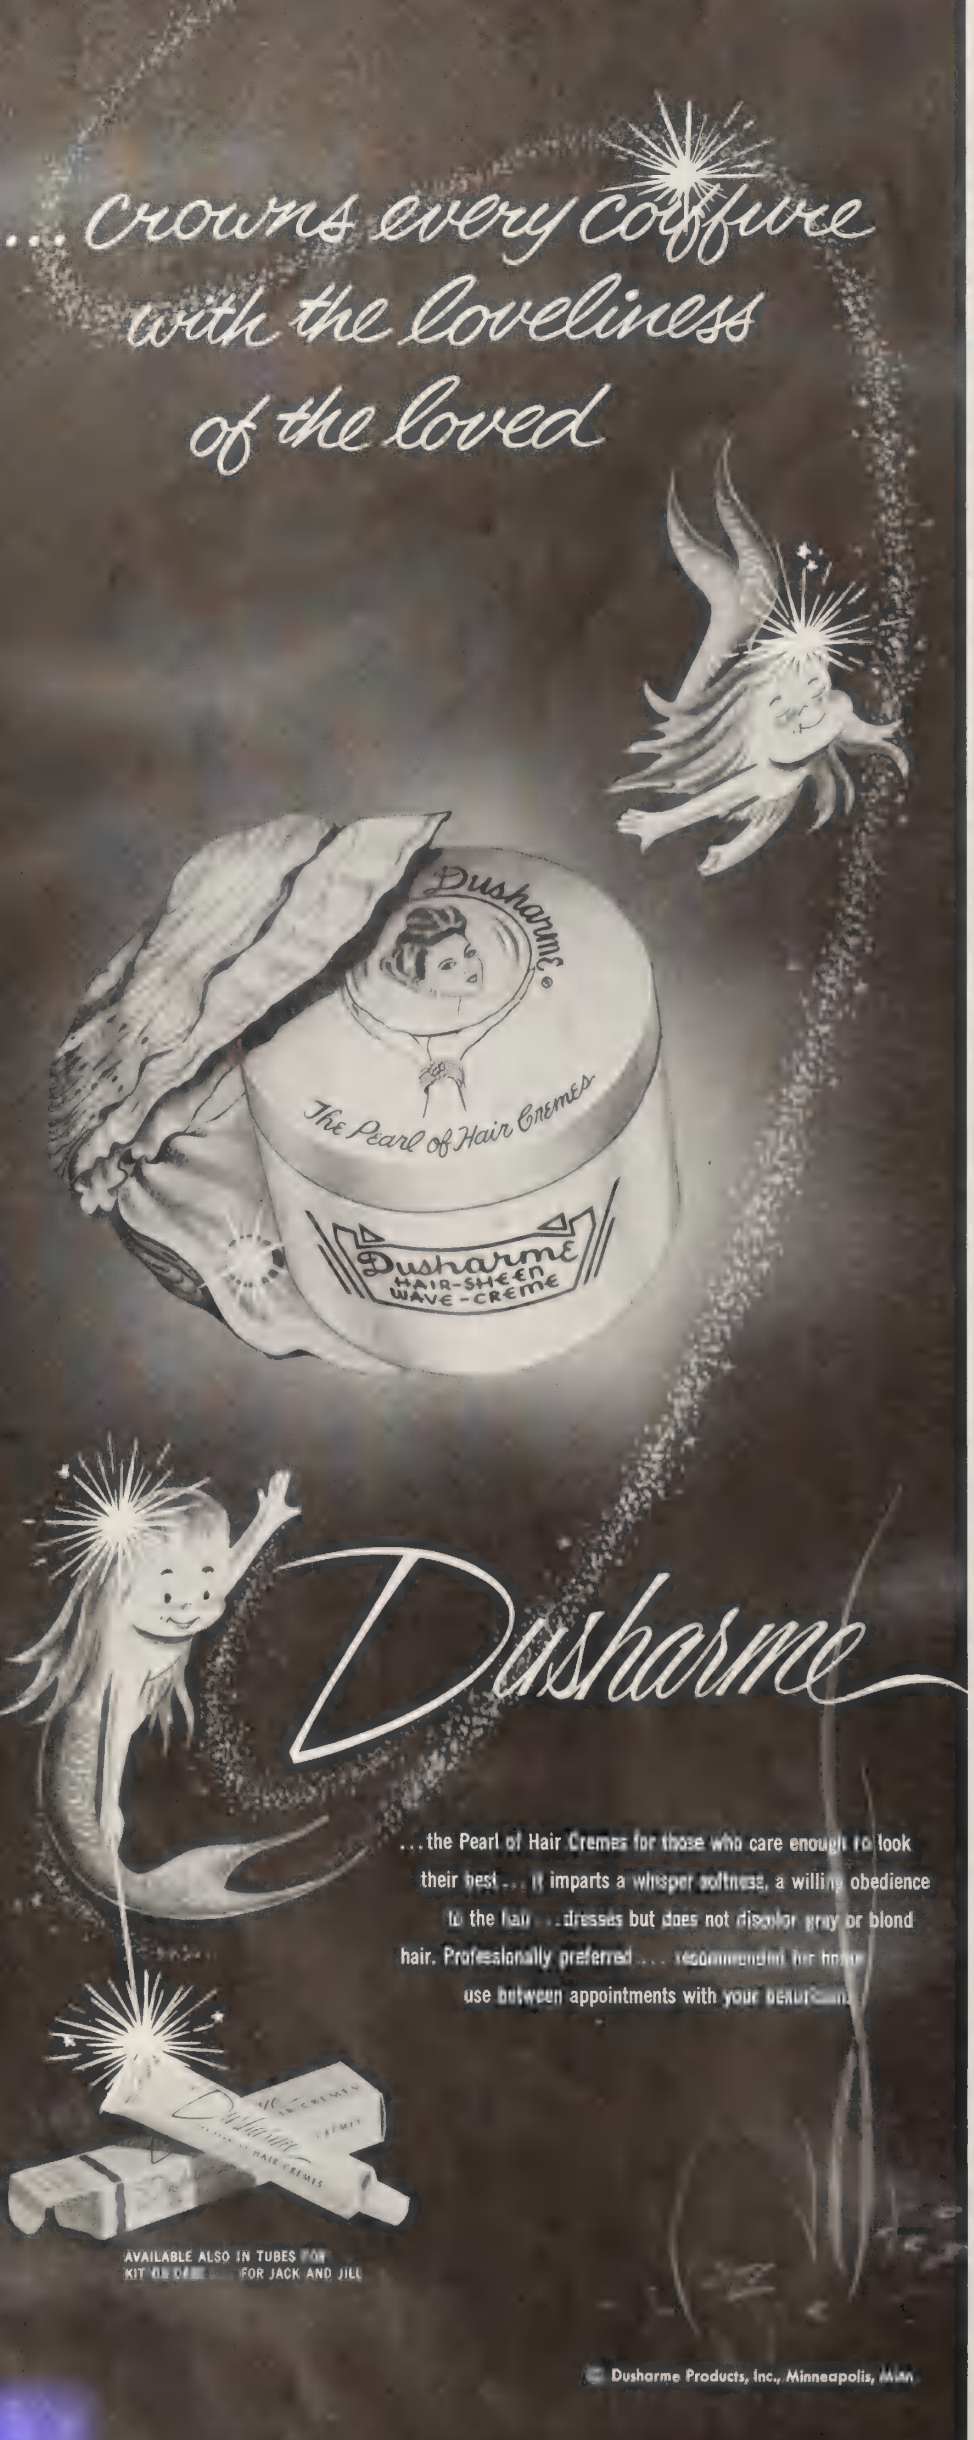
1. Ice Cream. Blend together lightly in bowl one pint vanilla ice cream and one cup of milk.

2. Jell-O Instant Pudding. Add package Chocolate Instant Pudding. Beat until just mixed . . . one minute.

3. A baked pie shell. Pour at once into 9-inch pie shell. Let stand in refrigerator about one hour.

Jell-O Instant Pudding is the magic that makes this ice cream pie smooth and "cut-able." Keeps up to 24 hours in your refrigerator. And how those Jell-O Instant flavors blend with ice cream!

Try these pairs for a beginning. You'll discover other dream pie combinations yourself!



Jell-O Strawberry Instant Pudding with Strawberry Ice Cream!

Jell-O Lemon Instant Pudding with Pineapple Ice Cream!

Jell-O Vanilla Instant Pudding with Pistachio Ice Cream!

Jell-O is a registered trade-mark of General Foods Corporation

...crowns every coiffure with the loveliness of the loved

Dusharme

...the Pearl of Hair Cremes for those who care enough to look their best... it imparts a whisper softness, a willing obedience to the hair...dresses but does not discolor gray or blond hair. Professionally preferred.... recommended for home use between appointments with your beautician

AVAILABLE ALSO IN TUBES FOR KIT OR CAKE ... FOR JACK AND JILL

© Dusharme Products, Inc., Minneapolis, Minn.

to his tongue. "My darling" . . . "My little dear one . . ."

The door opened and Miss Joad came in with the afternoon post. "Letters at last," she said. "Now we shall know from Lys herself what happened. She must be right enough, for her handwriting is quite normal."

He took the letters, hoping she would not notice that his hand was trembling. He held Lys' letter for a moment before he opened it, happiness filling his heart like a warm tide because she was safe and well and her handwriting was normal.

Then he opened the letter.

"I can still not understand how I escaped with only a few scratches and a sprained wrist. I was certain when it happened that it was the end—but here I am, being terribly well looked after by that dear Mrs. Chubb who arrived yesterday with Rory. I will tell you the whole story as soon as we get back and I am terribly sorry about the bother we have given you.

"I don't know how we are ever going to thank you for all your kindness, and for promising Rory a permanent job, which makes all the difference in the world to us. I was going to write and tell you that he and I are going to be married. It all happened very quickly and no one was more surprised than I, because for so many years I have ruled out all idea of anything of the kind."

The warm tide that had filled Mr. Troad receded, leaving him very cold. His face worked and the end of his long nose twitched painfully. The words hummed in his mind like bees. Going to be married—going to be married—going to be married. Rory Mallory and Lys. And he had been fool enough to imagine that she might have considered an ugly old fellow like himself.

The closing words of her letter swam before his eyes:

"I shall never forget all I owe you. It was a very lucky day for me when I came to see you that morning after the war. Bless you fo everything."

Well, well, well, thought Mr. Troad, blow ing his nose. When one of your citadels ge knocked down, there is nothing for it but start and build up another. He tore the letter h had been writing into small pieces and droppe them into the wastepaper basket. At lea there was this to it: she would not go very fa away. With Mallory working in the offic they would be bound to live somewhere nea and he would see her from time to time. H would be able to give th two of them a helping han now and again when the needed it.

Maybe, thought M Troad, that is all one ha any right to look for, grow ing older. The chance to he out the young and to l deeply grateful when the gave you a chance to do and did not slam the doo in your face.

He wrote out a telegram "Best congratulations an my love," and was thankful she would nev know how much there was of his love. H folded it up and put it in his pocket, decidin to send it off from a post office on his wa home. Not through the office. He did n feel up to discussing it with the office ye but tomorrow he knew he would be able t carry it off as he had carried off wor things in the past. Tomorrow he would t them.

Miss Joad brought his tea. She looked him, intuitive and uneasy. "You all right? Y look kind of ——"

"Of course I'm all right. A touch of h fever. It's nothing."

"But there isn't any hay," said Miss Joa

"Well, maybe it's a chill then. Don't fu me, my good woman. I dislike being fusse I'll go home early."

"And to bed?" she persisted. "I think yo ought to go to bed."

"All right. All right. I'll go to bed then said Mr. Troad impatiently. "Only leave n in peace." EN

E E E E E

A wise man of Athens was asked when injustice would be abolished. "When those who are not wronged feel as indignant as those who are," he said.

Arthur Mee's Blackout Book. (Hodder & Stoughton)

E E E E E

SHE LOVES ME—SHE LOVES ME NOT

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 80

Sammy ——" Then I struggled to my feet. "Sammy," I said frantically, "Sammy, this is Marsh Hammond. Marsh, this is Sammy—Marsh just happened to be dropping by," I babbled—then I stopped. Nobody was paying any attention to me.

"Hello, old buddy," Sammy was saying to Marsh, grinning.

"You're late," Marsh said reproachfully.

"I know," Sammy apologized. "Little trouble with the bomb," he said, gesturing toward his car, in which, I realized dazedly, he had just driven up. "Say, man," he said, "you got the wrong house." He nodded. "I live next door."

"Oh," Marsh said, looking at me, "a fortunate goof, I must say, old man. I thought this was your mother." He grinned. "She has such an open, welcoming face."

Sammy patted me casually on top of the head. "No," he said, "this chick is more than a mother to me." He looked at me. "Marsh and I are working out at the Y pool," he explained. "Like to ask you along," he said, "but I'm afraid it would give the squad quite a shake ——"

"Thanks just the same," I said coldly, realizing with shock that Sammy didn't seem the least bit perturbed at having found me in Marsh's arms. There was, I decided grimly, little need to worry about Sammy's jealousy.

"Well, then," Sammy said to Marsh, "I guess we better motate. Time is running out."

"Time is of the essence," Marsh said.

"Time is money," Sammy said, nodding.

"Time must have a stop." Marsh turned to me. "Shakespeare," he explained.

"An English poet," Sammy added kindly.

"Dead now," Marsh said.

"See you," Sammy said to me as, with a wave, he clattered down the steps.

They both got into the car and drove awa

I just stood, for a long time, staring aft them. What, I thought, has Norma Gillison g that I haven't got? At least her boy friend ha shown a little human emotion. Sammy simp didn't care. I picked up the groceries and we into the kitchen and dumped them on t table. My sister Andrea was crouched on t kitchen stool, her nose squashed against t window over the sink, peering out.

"What are you doing?" I said.

Andrea turned reluctantly away from t window and got down. "Just tell me o thing," she said, in a slow, reverent voic "was that a high-school boy?"

"Yes," I said. "Marsh Hammond, h new ——"

"Poor old Sammy," Andrea said, "I'll b he was absolutely wild with jealousy."

"He fought it down," I said shortly, sta ing out of the room. Then mother came in.

"Hello, dear," she said. "I see you remem bered the cabbage. We're having coleslaw she explained, burrowing in the shoppi bag. "I just got to thinking, why must always be lettuce, lettuce, lettuce ——" S pulled the cabbage out and began rinsing "That was a nice-looking boy on the fro porch, dear," she said. "Is he new? My goo ness, I imagine poor Sammy was simply si with a good-looking boy like that around."

"Not yet," I said rigidly, "but he's going be."

I walked slowly up to my room, thinkin Sammy, I decided grimly, was taking me mu too much for granted. Otherwise he'd ha kept Marsh Hammond off my front porch he'd had to use a flame thrower to do it. thought about how I would have felt if it h been the other way around—if I'd fou

CONTINUED ON PAGE 152

Today's smartest floors wear KENTILE®

n pink and Piastra white marbleized Kentile rubber tile and brass star inserts. Wall base is black KenCove. Counter top is Kentile cushion-back vinyl.

ve on luxury and love it with KENTILE rubber tile—

o much quieter! So much springier! So much longer wearing!

Room dividers on movable brass rods plus the excitement of this handsomely designed Kentile floor make for dining room drama! Yet this elegant room is so easy to have and so easy to take care of—thanks to Kentile rubber tile. Restful, quiet, with the buoyant resilience only Kentile rubber tile offers, it cleans in a jiffy and needs only occasional light waxing. And its mirror-smooth jewel colors stay fresh looking through years and years of hard wear. Do come and look at Kentile rubber tile (KenRubber®) at your Kentile Dealer's very soon. He's listed under FLOORS in your Classified Phone Directory. Kentile, Inc., Brooklyn 15, New York.

It's so easy and so inexpensive to do-it-yourself!

KENTILE FLOORS

AVAILABLE IN RUBBER ▪ CORK ▪ VINYL ASBESTOS ▪ SOLID VINYL ▪ CUSHION-BACK VINYL ▪ AND ASPHALT TILE . . . OVER 150 DECORATOR COLORS

ntile, Inc.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 150

Sammy with his arms around some beautiful girl. I'd have died, I thought, I'd have simply died. But not Sammy. He didn't think he could lose me, or—I paused, my eyes widening—he didn't care! It was a terrifying thought. The more I thought about it, though, the surer I was. Face it, I told myself firmly. If you can't make Sammy jealous of a boy like Marsh Hammond, you might as well shave your head.

Then I looked at Sammy's picture, smiling out at me from my dresser, and I thought about how sweet Sammy is, and how much I loved him, and I made up my mind. I'd make Sammy jealous of Marsh Hammond, I decided, if it broke every bone in my body!

I waited until Sammy got back from the pool, and then I wandered out in the back yard. Sammy was out in his back yard.

"Hi," I said, leaning against the fence and looking into Sammy's eyes. "Sammy," I said, "I love you, and all that, but that Marsh Hammond is the most adorable boy I have ever seen." There, I thought, that ought to do it. I watched Sammy closely.

"Yeah, he's built for action," Sammy agreed. "Good swimmer too. Little weak on the butterfly, but a terrific crawl man. He's a good guy," he said. "He liked you too."

"He did?" I said blankly.

"Yeah," Sammy said. "Said it was the first time a woman hadn't fallen all over him, drooling. Thought you were a real neat chick."

This was better, I thought happily, than I could have dreamed. "Yes?" I said. "Well?"

Sammy looked puzzled. "Well, what?"

"Well, what did you say?" I prompted.

"I agreed," Sammy said, looking baffled. "What else?"

I sighed. "I guess," I said slowly, "that's just one of those things that if you don't know, nobody can tell you." I felt very depressed. Maybe, I thought, it's already too late. Sammy was talking again.

"I said," he said patiently, "how about the Passion Pit tonight?"

"Sure," I started to say, then I stopped myself. "No," I said, "no, I don't think so, Sammy. I really ought to study tonight."

"Study!" Sammy said, looking stunned.

"Well," I said evasively, "you know how it is. Daddy has been after me again." I patted Sammy's cheek. "I'll see you tomorrow," I said briskly and went into the house. Sammy was still standing at the fence, looking after me in a thoughtful way. There, I thought with satisfaction, that ought to be working.

I went straight to the phone before I had time to change my mind. I never call up boys, but this was an emergency.

"Hello?" I said, when Marsh answered. "This is Laurie. Laurie Merritt—you remember, the one with the open face ——"

"Well," Marsh said, sounding pleased but not surprised, "how are you?"

"I'm fine," I said, "but I'm having some trouble with my French lesson. I thought maybe you could help me."

There was a short, loaded silence. I could practically hear him thinking. "I don't know," he said then, cautiously. "I don't take French."

"Oh," I said, in a disappointed tone. "Well, maybe we can find something else to do."

There was no pause this time. "Sure thing," Marsh said happily. "Be right along." He hung up. It's simply amazing, I thought sadly, how easy it is when it doesn't matter. And that was probably why it was easy, I thought, as I went upstairs to dress. Marsh was so used to women fighting over him that he was intrigued by one who, deep down, didn't care. I sighed, slipping into the new lavender linen that I had been saving to stun Sammy with. Sometimes I am struck by the irony of life.

By the time I was ready, I heard a car coming around the corner. I looked over at Sammy's house. The light was on in his room, I noticed with satisfaction—that meant he was there, and could see our house. Well, I thought, here goes. Though Sammy and I were not officially going steady (in some ways, my parents are terribly old-fashioned), this would be the first time in ages that I had actually had a date with anyone else. It's funny the things a person will do for love.

When Marsh got out and slammed the car door I went outside to meet him. "Hi," I said, loudly, taking hold of his arm and looking up at him in an adoring way. Take that, Sammy Hastings, I thought bitterly.

Marsh looked down at me with interest. "Do you always yell at your guests?"

"Let's go out in the patio," I said. "We can sit in the lawn swing and talk." The patio is right under Sammy's window. When we got there I switched on the outside light, which makes it as bright as day.

Marsh sat down in the swing and I got us some lemonade, and sat down beside him.

Marsh looked at me approvingly. "Warm night," he said.

I laughed. "Oh, Marsh," I said in a light, clear voice, "you say the craziest things." (Sound carries well at night, and Sammy's window was open.)

Marsh looked a little startled. "What's so crazy about that?" he said mildly.

"Just a minute," I said, remembering something. I went in and got the portable radio I got for Sammy and me to take to the beach, and brought it out. I turned it on until we got some lovely, dreamy Ray Anthony.

"You sure that won't bother your folks?" Marsh said. "Isn't it a little loud?"

"Oh, they don't mind," I said calmly. I looked at him. "Shall we dance?" I said.

Marsh grinned. "Why not?" he said graciously, getting up. Probably, I thought, I should be glad he was so conceited—any normal boy would have thought I'd gone a little mad. To Marsh, I supposed, it was only the natural maneuvering of a love-crazed girl. We danced through several pieces, with me resting my head tenderly on Marsh's shoulder and noticing from time to time that Sammy's light was still on. Then suddenly it went out.

"What's the matter?" Marsh said, surprised. "Why did you stop?"

"Wait a minute," I said tensely, dropping my hands and standing quietly in the middle of the patio. I hope, I thought nervously, he haven't gone too far. Suddenly I remembered the time we were at Ocean Park and an enormous man with a red mustache had tried to get fresh with me and Sammy had hit him as hard as he could in the face. Goodness knows what would have happened if there hadn't been other people there, I thought anxiously. I looked at Marsh. Not only was he handsome, I realized, but he was huge. "Marsh," I said nervously, moving away from him and sitting down on the swing, "Marsh, maybe you'd better go ——"

"Go!" Marsh said, looking baffled. "What's the matter—am I breaking out?"

"Sh-h-h!" I said. Somebody was coming down the Hastings driveway. Then I relaxed. Sammy had gone into the garage. He was working on his car. Well, I thought, relieved, that's all right. Then it began to hit me. He was with another man, the handsomest boy in school, laughing and dancing and goodness knows what, right under Sammy's nose—and there Sammy was, poking around in a carburetor! Maybe, I thought, it just isn't going to be any use. Maybe, all these years, to Sammy I have been just a pal.

"Come on," Marsh said patiently, "let's dance."

I looked up at him. From the garage Sammy couldn't see or hear anything. "Oh, I don't think so," I said vaguely. What, I was thinking frantically, am I going to do now? I mean, if this didn't work, what was left? It was an alarming question.

Marsh was studying me. "You know," he said, "I hope you won't mind my saying so, but you're a kind of a strange girl."

I shrugged. "I don't mind," I said. I wonder, I thought wanly, when it was that Sammy stopped caring.

Marsh sighed in an exasperated way. "All right," he said, sitting back down beside me, "you don't want to dance any more—we'll talk."

"O.K.," I said. There was a pause. Finally I remembered that I was a hostess. "Well," I said politely, "what would you like to talk about?"

Marsh shook his head. "Look," he said reasonably, "you call me up and ask me to come over. You act real glad to see me. You want to dance. And now ——" He paused. "Well?"

"I know," I said, making an effort. "I'm sorry," I said, "I really am. As a matter of fact," I said, "I think you're very nice."

"H'm-m," Marsh said. "Nice, huh?" He didn't seem too pleased. I guess, I thought, he's used to more. Then he smiled at me in a confident, intimate sort of way and leaned toward me, putting his arm along the back of the swing. "Laurie ——" he said.

"Marsh," I said suddenly, "listen. Suppose you were going with a girl. Say you had been going with her for years, and you were really in love, you know, and then this girl went and got over another fellow—said she thought he was adorable, had him over to the house, danced with him and all—what would you do?" I leaned forward, waiting tensely.

"Well," he said, "I'd tell her if she wanted to be my girl, she'd have to cut it out. Then I'd go and belt the other guy until he lost interest." He laughed. "I guess," he said, "I'd just do about the same thing anybody else would do."

The magic of first love is our ignorance that it can ever end. DISRAELI fittingly yours...

Comfort has emerged in new fall attire! Exciting fabrics and feminine fashion flair join the established walking ease of Foot Saver Shoes. You'll love the gentle whisper of style, the satisfaction of comfort on the go.

Foot Saver's exclusive Shortback® last insures snug heel fit, yet permits caressing foot freedom.

Foot Saver Shoes

For free Fall Style Booklet and name of nearest Foot Saver dealer, write: 44 West Main Street, Columbus 15, Ohio

Footsaver Shoes for men are manufactured by Commonwealth Shoe and Leather Co., Whitman, Mass.

"Well," I said gloomily, "practically anybody." I sighed. "Good night, Marsh."

When Sammy picked me up for school the next morning, he acted as if nothing had happened at all. "Hey," he said cheerfully, "I see Marsh was over last night. Have a good time?"

"Wonderful," I said intensely. I waited. Nothing. "I certainly do like Marsh," I said.

"Yeah," Sammy said, "so do I." Suddenly I became desperate.

"Sammy," I said, "you know, I've been thinking. Maybe we've been seeing too much of each other. I mean, maybe we should sort of mix more. Mingle. You know?" I studied my fingernails and held my breath.

Sammy squinted at me, nodding soberly. "Good idea," he agreed. "Matter of fact I've been thinking the same thing myself."

I stared at him. "You—you have?" Then it was true! I sat mute with horror.

"Sure," Sammy said, rattling on as if he hadn't just shaken me to the very core. "Say you meet a guy like Marsh, for instance. Now, we've got to be fair, Laurie. Many girls would call Marsh more attractive than me. Some would even think him handsomer ——"

I pulled myself together. "Those with eyes," I agreed coldly.

"True," he went on, guiding the car into the campus and coming to a stop, "true, he may not have my sterling qualities—fidelity, loyalty, trust ——"

"You sound like something printed on the back of a dime," I said bitterly.

"He may not have my sunny, fun-loving nature—but enough of that. Marsh Hammond, Laurie," Sammy said sternly, "is a very fine chap!"

Dazedly, I shook my head. I felt that I was going mad.

"What's more, Marsh likes you. It's natural enough that he should," Sammy added kindly. "Though immature," he said, "you have moments of a certain harried charm ——"

"I could listen to you for hours," I said, reaching for the door handle, "but I'm afraid I've got to be going ——"

"In fact," Sammy went on serenely, "that's the way you might sum the whole thing up. Nature. Marsh likes you—you like Marsh. It's nature. I understand." He patted my head in a fatherly way. "Feel free," he said.

"Thank you," I said frigidly, "so much."

But nothing stops Sammy. "Now on the other hand," he went on, "let's take me ——"

"No," I said, "let's don't."

"Take me," he said relentlessly. "I was saying to myself just the other morning, 'Hastings, get hold of yourself, man! Get out of that rut, boy! Look about you.'" He gestured dramatically at the hordes of students crowding the parking lot where we sat, somehow banging me sharply on the nose. "'That's life, boy, life—surging and milling about you. Live it! Take it by the throat! Think of the battles, waiting to be won! Think of the girls, waiting to be kissed.'"

